DR. CLARK (Caithness) said that during the 12 years he had been in the House he had not spoken with a greater feeling of responsibility than he did now. When the speech of the Colonial Secretary was read by President Kruger and the Boer Government he thought that it would hardly tend towards peace, or to that union of the States and colonies of South Africa which was so much desired. The policy of the right hon. Gentleman, as declared that day, would, he feared, prevent certain reforms which were necessary in the Transvaal from being carried out so quickly as might otherwise have been the case. The Colonial Secretary had again repeated certain statements which he ought to know the Transvaal Government repudiated. The right hon. Gentleman said that certain Uitlanders paid nineteen-twentieths of the taxation. The Transvaal Government asserted that this was utterly untrue—that it was a fiction. The Boer Government denied that there were legitimate grievances among the Uitlanders. [Ironical cheers.] The two charges that had caused a great deal of trouble in South Africa and had rankled in the minds of certain Africander statesmen had been made, one in the House and one outside. The Colonial Secretary at a South African banquet accused the gentlemen who formed the Government of the South African Republic with being corrupt. The right hon. Gentleman had not repeated that charge in the House; but he had now made the charge that the condition of things in Johannesburg and the grievances there were such that unless the Boer Government brought about a radical change there would probably be a recrudescence of troubles. Those two charges might be true or not, but he asked the House to contrast the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman with what occurred a few years ago. The Jameson raid was not the first raid. The first raid was the Shepstone raid. For four years the British Government controlled the Transvaal—from 1877 to 1881. Did the Government during those four years give a vote to the Uitlanders? Did they carry out the pledge made by the predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman that representative Government would be granted? No; during those four years the Transvaal was ruled by the British Government as despotically as Turkey or Russia was now ruled. With regard to President Kruger he believed him to be as honest a man as there was living. Could they say so of the British Government and the Colonial Secretary (Sir Theophilus Shepstone) who formerly administered the Transvaal? If anyone wanted to ascertain the facts he had only to inspect the letters to the Colonial Secretary by the right hon. Member for Bodmin, where it appeared the Colonial Secretary swindled and cheated us, where his presents, his mistresses, even his fishing-rod were all put down as forage, and the British Government had to pay for it, and stopped Sir Theophilus Shepstone's pension for the purpose of making up for the money stolen by himself or his family. Well, it was too strong to say "by himself," for he should not think the old man knew the work he was doing by his sons. With that fact before them, however, it was not advisable to bring a charge of corruption against the men who formed the present Government of the Transvaal. Speaking from the standpoint of the Boers he said they had done all that men possibly could do to aid the Outlanders. He must be frank, however; he did not think the powers given to the Second Chamber were adequate and that reform in this direction was necessary. But the Outlanders appeared to think they ought to be allowed to hold the country in four years for nothing. Why, it was not yet ten years since he went down from Pretoria to lay the foundation stone of the first house in Johannesburg. What had caused all this estrangement? It was the policy adopted by Lord Derby. He agreed with the Secretary of State for the Colonies that the Aliens Bill was not in accordance with the provisions of the Convention of 1884, and if he, by force or otherwise, compelled the Transvaal Government to see that that Convention, as regards the rights given by the Sands River Convention, the Pretoria Convention and the London Convention were carried out, he would be perfectly justified in doing so. Apart from reform of the Second Chamber, the only other grievance was that the Transvaal Government carried on a system not of free trade, but of protection, and gave monopolist concessions for the purpose of developing industry. But was not that the case with other Republics, the French and the American, with the German Empire and other civilised countries. If there were any special taxation put upon aliens different from citizens there would be reason to complain, but the alien had almost the same rights and privileges, so far as taxation was concerned, as the native, and no special burden was placed upon him. All the gold was open to everyone, native or alien. There was no royalty at all in the country, though there ought to have been. With regard to Mr. Cecil Rhodes he had a high respect for him on account of his great ability, high character, and charming personality; and he regretted to see him placed as he was. In his reply earlier in the day the Colonial Secretary seemed to say that one of the questions that must be considered by the Committee was whether the condition of things before the raid was sufficient to justify a rising. He could only say that if the Committee accepted evidence on that point the Boers would tell them it amounted to a breach of the 1884 Convention and affected their right of self-government, and would refuse to give evidence; and if we persevered Heaven knows what terrible results would follow. He regretted that he had been compelled to state so strongly the view held by the Transvaal people in regard to this matter; but it was better that that view should be stated as it was held in the Transvaal.

Sir HENRY HOWORTH (Salford, S.) said that the question which many hon. Gentlemen had been asking themselves, independently of Party considerations, in regard to this Committee was, Cui bono? If the agent of this country did a wrong there must be a complete and drastic inquiry into the whole transaction. And if this country entered into obligations to bring certain people to trial, the promise must be carried out. But the obligations of this country had been carried out to the letter. There had been trials both here and in South Africa, and every possible issue had already been raised in regard to some of the subjects of this proposed inquiry. The Committee would inquire into the administration of the territory of the Chartered Company, into the circumstances of the raid, and into the internal administration of the Transvaal. As to the first of those subjects, he could see very little harm in the inquiries of the Committee; though he could not agree with the Leader of the Opposition in comparing the position of affairs with the position of the East India Company. The East India Company was a separate and substantive governing authority outside the authority of the Colonial Office. The Chartered Company had been subject immediately to the Colonial Office, and the Colonial Secretary last year altered the whole constitution of its military arrangements. But in regard to the other two subjects of inquiry he saw every promise of difficulty and danger. A great English proconsul was to be put on his trial. He did not know Mr. Rhodes, and he had never seen him; but he could not help feeling that, a hundred years hence, the men who had added to the Empire a territory seven-fold as great as the United Kingdom, would stand in the rank of men like Clive and Hastings. And if a man like that were to be brought to trial, for a great offence against the State, he ought to be tried by a proper and judicial tribunal. A Committee of the House of Commons, the Members of which were selected because they were partisans, and everyone of whom had more or less made up his mind as to the issue, was not the proper tribunal for such a case. The trial might have been transferred to the grandest Court of Justice in the world—Westminster Hall—where Bacon and Strafford were tried. As it was, the verdict of the Committee, whatever it might be, was discounted beforehand both here and at the Cape. If the Commitee found that no blame at all attached to this great proconsul, he would go back with such power and prestige that he would be a dangerous citizen of the Empire, because he would be sore and angry that he had been brought here not to be impeached for high crimes, but to be brought before a mere Committee of the House of Commons. And was such a Committee to be intrusted with the very delicate questions of alterations and reforms in the internal Government of the Transvaal? He would rather leave such questions in the hands which hitherto, under desperate difficulty and strain, had conducted affairs with admirable skill and prescience. From the day when the Colonial Secretary jumped in front of the German Emperor with that famous dispatch, he had conducted the affairs of South Africa with singular prudence and skill. It must not be forgotten, either, that ours was not an Empire of Englishmen only; and that in these matters we had to deal with a large population which did not speak our language, and which possessed different traditions. In Holland he had seen many newspapers with correspondence from the Cape, showing that angry feeling had been roused in Cape Colony; and he could not help feeling that unless we were careful in handling these questions, we should have a fire ablaze in South Africa which could not be put out without a desperate strain on our resources. It was impossible to deny the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman—that if this matter were to be settled with the concurrence of this country, the Outlanders must be conceded the rights and privileges hitherto denied to them. The right hon. Gentleman had fought hard for that position; and it was impossible to face with equanimity the question being left to a tribunal so inappropriate as a Committee of the House. This was not the time for blustering words. Recriminations ought to be avoided, in order that those subjects of the Crown, who had always been very loyal, but who were very sore just now, should not feel that this Mother of Parliaments was, where Englishmen and Dutchmen were at issue, treating the latter with any want of justice.

Mr. LEONARD COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said he had had hopes of not taking part in this discussion, because he was satisfied that, whatever might result from the labours of the Committee, very little good would result from any more speeches which might be delivered. ["Hear, hear!"] After the speech of the Colonial Secretary the House might wisely have allowed the discussion to lapse. [Cheers.] The hon. Member for Salford had spoken anxiously as to the effect of appointing the Committee; but one comfort was that, at any rate, the Committee would not make speeches. [Cheers.] They would ask questions and elucidate facts, and possibly they would come to conclusions which would command respect. But they would not make speeches. [Cheers.] There would not be that danger of exasperating opinion in South Africa which, he feared, would result from a continuance of this discussion. The hon. Member for Caithness had used language which he could not accept as accurate, when speaking of corruption in the administration of the Transvaal, when the country was under the British Government, and had referred to letters bearing his signature as having exposed that corruption. It was quite true that when the Transvaal was administered by our Government the accounts were kept in an exceedingly loose fashion—especially at the beginning of affairs—and vouchers were not forthcoming for much of the expenditure, or when they were produced they were not considered satisfactory by the Treasury. But the whole amount involved was exceedingly small, and nothing transpired that could sustain a charge of corruption. However, he did not rise to continue the discussion. He felt sure the speech of the Colonial Secretary had persuaded everyone that if we were to clear ourselves this Commission should sit, and that we should wait in patience until its exhaustive inquiries were concluded.

Mr. J. M. MACLEAN (Cardiff) said that, after the discussion which had taken place, and especially after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary, that the Government thought they were bound in honour to reappoint the Committee, he would ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Ordered,—That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the origin and circumstances of the incursion into the South African Republic by an armed force, and into the administration of the British South Africa Company, and to report thereon; and further, to report what alterations are desirable in the Government of the territories under the control of the Company.

Ordered,—That the Committee have leave to hear Counsel to such extent as they shall see fit, and have power to send for persons, papers, and records.—(Secretary of State for the Colonies.)

MR. J. L. CAREW (Dublin, College Green) rose to move an Amendment which stood on the Paper in the name of Mr. P. O'Brien (Kilkenny), proposing "That the Committee do consist of 17 Members."

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, Order! An Amendment of which notice must be given can only be moved by the hon. Member who put it down.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) pointed out that a Member of the Government had often introduced a Bill of which notice had been given by another Member of the Government.

*MR. SPEAKER: All Members of the Government are considered one person for all such purposes.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN, who had been absent from the Chamber, now returned, and moved his Amendment. He said he understood from the statement of the Colonial Secretary that the Government were prepared to accept his proposal.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said he should not object to the enlargement of the Committee from 15 to 17 Members if the reason were that the Opposition were not fairly represented upon it. But his right hon. Friend the Colonial Secretary had stated as the reason for the proposed increase in the membership of the Committee that a certain section of the Irish Party was not represented upon it at present. He had no personal objection whatever to Nationalist Members sitting on the Committee. He acknowledged their ability and he had experienced their eloquence. [Laughter.] But he failed to see a sufficient reason why another Irishman should be added to the Committee, in the fact that the Nationalist Party happened to be divided into sections, and that no Gentleman in that Party could speak on behalf of all his colleagues. [Laughter.] Besides, there were other Irishmen in the House besides the hon. Gentlemen opposite. It appeared to him a strange thing that when the Government came to the conclusion that it was necessary to add another Irishman to the Committee they should have overlooked that Irish Party which was mainly responsible for placing them on the Treasury Bench. [Laughter.] He did not see why the divisions in the Nationalist ranks should be officially recognised by the Government, especially in view of the fact that it was not at all improbable that before long there would be 80 Nationalist Parties. [Laughter.] Great constitutional and Imperial questions might arise before this Committee, and if it were necessary to add another Irishman to the Committee he should not be chosen from the ranks of those who had never shown that Imperial instincts dominated their policy. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said the hon. and gallant Member was entirely mistaken in the view he had taken of the matter. The Government in the course they proposed to pursue in regard to the enlargement of the membership of the Committee were not doing a special favour to any section of the House. They were simply doing a bare act of arithmetical justice to the Nationalist Members. When the Committee consisting of 15 Members was appointed last year with only one Nationalist Member upon it he urged that, in proportion to the strength of the Opposition, the Nationalist Members were entitled to two representatives on the Committee. He failed then to carry his point, but the Government had now yielded to that view, and in order to equalise the representation of parties on the Committee they proposed to add also to the Committee one of their own supporters in the person of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University. It was quite true that, as the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh had said, great Imperial questions were to be considered by this Committee. But all those who took alarm at the prospect of its appointment might be assured by the recollection of what had happened in the case of the Financial Relations Commission, for if the Government were not satisfied with the findings of the Committee they could appoint another. [Laughter.]

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I desire to say that the Government understood it was the general wish of the House that the Committee should be increased, and they put down the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for London University as the Member they suggested as the representative of this side of the House in the event of another Member being added to the Committee as the representative of the opposite side of the House. Of course, if the House should decline to increase the Committee, and should retain the original number, 15, the name of my right hon. Friend will be withdrawn. I would point out that in the appointment of a Committee practically only two parties have to be considered—that is to say, the Government of the day, and the Opposition, and the Committee is divided in proportion to the Members sitting on the two sides of the House. In the case of a Committee of 15 Members the Government nominate nine members, but they have nothing whatever to do with the nomination of the remaining six. We did nominate our nine members, and a difficulty arose—with which we had nothing whatever to do, and as to which we wash our hands entirely—as to the composition of the other six members. We understood there was a difficulty in substituting another Irish member for one of the members from the Opposition side who had already been nominated, and in order to meet the wishes of the other side we suggested that in that case it might be convenient to increase the number to 17, so that the difficulty might be removed. The decision which the Government came to was really with a view to conciliate everybody; if it has not that effect, and any objection is taken, the Government are perfectly indifferent in the matter. If we have any preference, I may say we would rather go back to the Committee of 15. [Cheers.]

Sir JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) said that as his name had been mentioned, perhaps the House would allow him to say that he thought, from the turn the discussion had taken, it would be very much better to leave the Committee with 15 members. ["Hear, hear!"] Personally it would be a great relief to him.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Committee do consist of 17 Members," put and negatived.

The names of the Attorney General, Mr. Bigham, Mr. Blake, Mr. Buxton, and Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman as members of the Committee were agreed to.

On the Motion that Mr. J. Chamberlain be appointed to serve on the Committee,

Sir WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said the right hon. Gentleman had said himself that he knew there were charges brought against him. He thought those charges were most abominable, and he was not in the least implying that there was one word of truth in them. [An Hon. Member: "What are they?"] The right hon. Gentleman alluded to them himself, and was it not rather strange, if these charges were made, that the right hon. Gentleman should sit upon the Committee and act as a judge? That was a rather difficult position for him to be in.

*Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT hoped his hon. Friend would not press the point. This Committee would be utterly useless unless they had the Colonial Secretary upon it—["hear, hear!"]—who had had all the means at his disposal of placing before them the information on the subject which they had had.

The name of Mr. Chamberlain was then agreed to, as were also the names of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Cripps, Sir W. Hart Dyke, Mr. John Ellis, Sir W. Harcourt, and Mr. Jackson.

On the Motion that Mr. Labouchere be appointed to serve on the Committee,

Mr. HENRY SETON-KARR (St. Helen's) said he desired to take the opinion of the House whether the hon. Member for Northampton should occupy a place on this Committee. The hon. Member stood in a category by himself, as he had expressed in his interesting journal views hostile to the Chartered Company and to Mr. Rhodes, which, it seemed to him, absolutely pledged the hon. Member to one side of the question. ["Hear, hear!"] It was impossible to suppose that any evidence brought before the Committee would alter the hon. Member's opinion.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw his objection. I think I can give him two reasons why he should do so, which, I trust, may be conclusive to his mind. The first is a general reason which applies to the appointment of the members of all Committees. The arrangement is, as I have said, that, the proportions being settled, the nomination of the members on each side is left to their respective side, and for the Government, therefore, to interfere and to object to a nomination from the side of the Opposition, or vice versâ, would be to strike at the system under which our Committees are elected and would give rise to endless difficulties in the future proceedings of Parliament. ["Hear, hear!"] As to this particular objection, I am bound to point out to my hon. Friend that it is entirely in accordance with precedents that the hon. Member for Northampton, who has undoubtedly taken an extremely strong view, and expressed an extremely strong view in respect to this matter, should be a member of the Committee, and be enabled thereby to bring his charges to the test. ["Hear, hear!"] If a Member of this House thinks that he has an allegation to make of serious importance against any person who may be a witness before a Committee of Inquiry, that is the only proper and reasonable way in which his allegations may be brought to the test. I can quote precedents, such as that of the Hyderabad and Deccan Committee, in regard to which very strong charges were made, I think also by the hon. Member for Northampton. [Laughter.] The hon. Member, however, was appointed to that Committee, and did very useful service to the Committee in their endeavour to elucidate the question. Another precedent is the case of the Foreign Loans Committee, in regard to which my noble Friend Lord James of Hereford had made certain charges, and Lord James of Hereford was appointed to serve on that Committee. I think, therefore, we are only following a course in accordance with precedent.

Mr. SETON-KARR said he would withdraw his objection.

The name of Mr. Labouchere was then agreed to, as also were the names of Mr. Wharton and Mr. Wyndham.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—SUPPLY.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY moved:—

"That so soon as the Committee of Supply has been appointed and Estimates have been presented, the business of Supply shall (until it be disposed of) be the first Order of the Day on Friday, unless the House otherwise order on the Motion of a Minister of the Crown moved at the commencement of public business to be decided without Amendment or Debate; and the provisions of Standing Order No. 56 shall be extended to Friday.

"Not more than 20 days, being days before August 5 on which the Speaker leaves the Chair for the Committee of Supply without question put, counting from the first day on which the Speaker left the Chair under Standing Order No. 56, shall be allotted for the consideration of the annual Estimates for the Army, Navy, and Civil Services, including Votes on Acount, the business of Supply standing first Order on every such day.

"Provided always, that on Motion made after notice by a Minister of the Crown to be decided without Amendment or Debate, additional time, not exceeding three days, may be allotted for the business of Supply, either before or after August 5.

"On the last but one of the allotted days, at 10 o'clock p.m., the Chairman shall proceed to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the outstanding Votes in Committee of Supply; and on the last, not being earlier than the 20th of the allotted days, the Speaker shall, at 10 o'clock p.m., proceed to put forthwith every question necessary to complete the outstanding Reports of Supply.

"On the days appointed for concluding the business of Supply, the consideration of such business shall not be anticipated by a Motion of Adjournment under Standing Order No. 17; nor may any dilatory Motion be moved on such proceedings; nor shall they be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the sittings of the House.

"Provided always, that the days occupied by the consideration of Estimates supplementary to those of a previous Session, or of any Vote of Credit, shall not be included in the computation of the 20 days. Provided also, that two morning sittings shall be deemed equivalent to one 3 o'clock sitting. That this Resolution be a Standing Order of the House."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think this rule, which was in operation all through last Session, on the whole gave satisfaction to all quarters of the House. I am the last person to suppose that any rule that we may adopt is absolutely without inconvenience, there must always be a balance of inconveniences. I am myself of opinion that the balance in this case is in favour of the rule which we tried experimentally last Session becoming part of our permanent rules. I desire once and for all to put upon record my sense of the manner in which all Parties of the House co-operated to make this rule a success. [" Hear, hear!"] I have seen it attributed to my peculiar foresight and ingenuity that what some critics describe as a reform was carried out with success, but I disclaim all merit whatever in the matter. The merit belongs entirely to the majority and minority in this House, who together resolved that, as far as they could, they would see that our Debates on Supply were conducted in a manner and with that moderation as regards the expenditure of time which can alone make it possible for a Government to give time to the adequate criticism by private Members of our general financial and administrative system. The Government endeavoured, as I believe every Government will always endeavour, to so allocate the Fridays in each week as to meet the convenience of Members of the House. It was in the power of the House last Session, and would be in any future Session, to so deal with the Votes that came on on the earlier Fridays as to drive very important questions on to the later Fridays, and no doubt if that be done the rule would unquestionably break down and we should then revert to the unfortunate system which prevailed so many years, under which the Government first passed all the legislative measures which they thought necessary, and then squeezed into the last weary fortnight of the Session the necessary discussions on the Estimates. I understand from some quarters of the House that there is a desire—I think a natural desire—to try this rule as an experiment, at all events for one more Session. [" Hear, hear!"] I entirely sympathise with that view, and I shall not press the last line of the Resolution which proposes to make the Order part of a permanent legislative arrangement. While the Government will continue in their earnest endeavour to so arrange the business of the House on the successive Fridays as to suit the convenience of Members in all parts of the House, I trust the House, on its side, will during this Session, as during last Session, do all they can to make the rule which was passed in their interests, and not in those of the Government, a real working success. I do not think it needful to say more. If objections are raised I shall be glad to deal with them as far as I can in the reply which I shall have the right to make. Meanwhile, I hope the House will enter upon the experimental part of the Motion with an earnest desire to make the experiment a success. [" Hear, hear!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman does not move the last line?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: No, Sir.

*MR. SPEAKER read the Motion omitting the proposal to make the order a Standing Order, and was about to put it to the House, when

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.) rose and said: I think we are all in an agreeable humour this afternoon. [Laughter and " Hear, hear!"] The Leader of the House has spoken in very moderate terms of the introduction of this new practice—too moderate, I think, because after the experience of last Session we are grateful to him for the introduction of this rule, and particularly for the manner in which he has worked it. [Cheers.] Its success depended entirely on the manner in which the Leader of the House dealt with the rule, and on this side of the House I think we have every reason to acknowledge that the right hon. Gentleman gave us every facility we could have desired, and he has given us credit, which I think was deserved, on this side of the House —[The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: " Hear, hear!"]—for our efforts to make the rule a success. But the permanent success of the rule must always depend on the manner in which it is dealt with. In framing a permanent constitution we must not rely too much on the virtues of the living Sovereign, because we do not know how far they may be inherited or not by his successor. So I think the right hon. Gentleman has done wisely by stating that there should be further revision of the rule before it is permanently established on the Standing Orders. Of course the danger is that we might have a great block of undiscussed Estimates at the end of a Session. That did not happen last year, but if ever it did, I do not think the rule would prove a success or be accepted by the House. We ought all to endeavour to avoid such a difficulty, and of course one that must be experimental is whether the number of days allotted to Supply are exactly the right number, and it might in the future be necessary to consider whether a large number of days ought not to be allowed. The right hon. Gentleman has shown a wise moderation in agreeing that the rule shall be a sessional order for this year, and I think he may rely upon its being met, as it was last year, by every inclination on our part to make it a success. [Cheers.]

Mr. SETON-KARR said that as a private Member he viewed with a great deal of suspicion this cordial co-operation of the Leader of the Opposition with the Leader of the House. He himself objected to the Order, chiefly because it contained a time limit and the hateful principle of the guillotine. This rule worked well last Session, but it did not follow that it would work well every Session, any more than it followed that the present Government would always be in power with a majority of 150 at their backs and a weak and demoralised Opposition in front of them. [Opposition laughter.] They might have a man ruling over them in the future who would make a very different use of the rule. ["Hear, hear!"] He submitted that the Leader of the House should be satisfied by taking Fridays and leave out the time limit, which was unnecessary. He also asked the Leader of the House to secure Tuesdays to private Members who wished to move resolutions on abstract subjects. In Supply there was not sufficient scope for discussing such subjects. Private Members would take the uncertain chance of the ballot if Tuesdays were left to them, say, until Whitsuntide. ["Hear, hear!"] He should like to know whether the Factory Acts, the Free Trade Acts, and the Acts for the Protection of Seamen, would ever have been passed had the private Members of the time been deprived of the opportunities they then possessed of bringing forward abstract questions before the House. All the subjects dealt with by those Acts were brought forward by men like Mr. Bright, Mr. Cobden, Lord Derby, and Mr. Plimsoll, when they were private Members of that House. Yet those measures remained unimpeached for their value at the present day. By depriving private Members of their opportunities for addressing that House they were causing the oratorical power of the House to deteriorate. As matters stood, under recent innovations the oratory of the House was confined to the two Front Benches and to the hon. Member for King's Lynn. The time of the House was now entirely occupied by the Government, and the privileges of private Members were entirely taken from them. There could be no doubt that private Members were desirous of retaining some, at all events, of their old privileges, the existence of which was now threatened. He did not intend to divide the House upon the question, but he sincerely hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would give his attention to the points that had been urged upon him in the course of this discussion, and would give hon. Members a satisfactory assurance with regard to them.

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) thought that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down would scarcely be satisfied with what had fallen from the two Front Benches in reference to this subject. He, however, was very much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury for the assurance he had given the House that the claims of private Members would receive his sympathetic consideration. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman had been a little too modest when he attributed the success of the rule last Session, not to the Government, but to hon. Members on both sides of the House. Hon. Members must not rely upon the accuracy of that assertion in too great a degree. The resolution of last Session had placed the time of the House absolutely in the hands of the Government. The Government having brought forward that resolution, were bound to make the working under it a success, and in every way to meet the wishes of the Opposition in connection with it. But that might not always be the case, and he should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman could not introduce some words into this very drastic resolution which would prevent any subsequent Government from abusing it. The right hon. Gentleman might himself be a private Member some day, and he appealed to him therefore to so frame the resolution as to prevent its abuse by some future unscrupulous Government. Another point to which he desired to draw attention was that last Session many hon. Members, especially those sitting on the Opposition side of the House, did not approve of the sudden closing of Supply, which they feared might lead to some indecent expressions of objection. Happily, last Session those fears proved to be unfounded. But on the concluding day some 30 votes remained for discussion, and five Divisions were had upon them before the guillotine fell. Fortunately hon. Members were all in such an amicable mood on the occasion that the passing of the last vote was received with general cheering. On that last day some two millions of money were voted, and in his opinion it was a very serious matter to vote such a large sum at a single sitting under the procedure which the rule imposed, especially seeing that the votes included those relating to Uganda and other highly contentious subjects. The fact that such was the case ought to make hon. Gentlemen thoughtful before they agreed to this resolution. Another point was that before this resolution was passed the House had the power of selecting the subjects in the Estimates which they desired to discuss, but after the resolution was passed that power passed to the Government, who might postpone the passing of a vote on which an inconvenient discussion was likely to arise until the guillotine had fallen. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman might effect a great improvement in the resolution by striking out the words "Votes on account." He would not move an Amendment to that effect himself because he had no desire to take up a hostile attitude towards the resolution, but he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would consider the point. He might, however, remark that the introduction of votes on account was an evidence of the careless way in which the Estimates had been prepared.

MR. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) thought that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had taken away a great deal of the objection which private Members had to their time being taken away. He, however, could not account for the extraordinary fatality that always rendered it necessary for a Conservative Government to make drastic rules still more drastic. It was now proposed to institute a "time gag." He fully appreciated the excellent way in which the principle of the resolution had worked last year. Of course they had now in office a perfectly sound Government who would do nothing that was unfair, but that might not always be the case. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies speaking on the subject in 1893, had said that a "time gag" might be used by an unscrupulous Government for avoiding debates on inconvenient subjects. He asked why in the name of common sense should the Conservative Party seek to emphasise and enlarge the effect of this rule, and to give the Government of the day such a power. The Government ought to rest satisfied with obtaining Fridays for Supply, and should not ask the House to go further in that direction.

MR. HENRY LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said that he wished to point out to the hon. Member behind him, that there had been ample time to discuss all matters of interest arising out of Supply last Session. He did not think the Government were open to the complaint urged against them by the hon. Member. For that side of the House it might be said that they seemed to pass their time in defending the Government against their own followers. He and those on the Opposition Benches said that, although the Government was a bad one, they might go farther and fare worse. ["Hear, hear!"] He observed, however, that hon. Gentlemen on the other side limited their opposition to making complaining speeches. The Member for St. Helens was a gentleman who, vowing he would never consent, consented; he said that he disagreed with the Government, but that he acquiesced in their wishes as a faithful follower. He doubted whether the Government cared one sixpence whether the hon. Member took their view or not. [Laughter.] All that they wanted from the hon. Member was that he should acquiesce and that, as a dutiful follower, he should walk into the Lobby with them, which he was sure the hon. Member would do most faithfully and humbly. For his part, he was glad the Government were going to renew this rule. He regarded it as an advantage to the Opposition. He thought they had under it more time for discussing the Estimates and that the time was better apportioned than formerly.

Mr. B. L. COHEN (Islington, E.) said he had not intended to take part in the Debate on this most reasonable, and, he would add, most useful proposal of his right hon. Friend, which he thought would have been accepted by the House with the unanimity and alacrity which the success of last year, in his judgment, justified, if, indeed, it did not dictate. But he was unwilling to leave the support of the Government proposal entirely to the intermittent compassion of the hon. Member for Northampton. He did not yield to either of his hon. Friends who had spoken on that side in his horror of the gag when applied to check discussion on proposals for legislation. But it seemed to him that both his hon. Friends lost sight of the difference between the gag when applied to Supply and to Bills submitted to that House. That difference was emphatically pointed out by his right hon. Friend when he last year made for the first time a proposal similar to the one now under discussion. Supply must be, and always was, voted sooner or later in each Session of Parliament. This was a proposal to make it sooner instead of later, and to render more effective the discussion of Supply than would be possible were it left, as was done by the late Government, to the last week or ten days of the Session. He was surprised that the Government proposal should be objected to as abridging the privileges of private Members. For himself he should not regard that as a great calamity, but as a fact the suggestions of the Leader of the House would give greater and not less opportunity to private Members, as they insured a certain and a considerable number of days to Supply, which was the delight of the critical private Member. His hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens spoke of what was accomplished on private Members' days in old times by such illustrious Members as Bright, Cobden, and Lord Shaftesbury. Yes; but in those days they did not have 70 to 100 questions put on every Government afternoon to Ministers which took one hour or one and a-half hours of Government time; they did not have two or three Motions for the Adjournment of the House in each Session; and Government Bills were not discussed at the length and during the number of days as now. He had no right and no desire to criticise these altered conditions, but he said they necessitated altered procedure, and because he believed the proposals of his right hon. Friend would conduce to the more efficient and more expeditious dispatch of the business of this House that he should give them his cordial support, and he hoped they would be unanimously accepted by the House.

Mr. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) said there was one matter to which he wished to call the attention of the Leader of the House. His hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens had endeavoured to drive a bargain with the right hon. Gentleman as to the days to be given to private Members. He did not wish to drive a bargain, but to ask for an act of justice—to make a suggestion which he thought had not been made before. During the last Session it was inevitable that foreign affairs and colonial affairs should occupy a large portion of the time of the House, and he supposed that it was inevitable that their active and energetic Irish friends should manage to obtain a very large and disproportionate share of the time of the House. He asked the Leader of the House and the Secretary to the Treasury to consider the necessity of providing adequate time for the consideration of the large English Votes—Votes for the Home Office, for the Board of Trade, and other Votes. He did not blame the Government that these Votes were postponed to a time of the Session when it was impossible that full time should be given to many important questions. He should ask the right hon. Gentleman and the Secretary to the Treasury to bear in mind, in allocating the time, that although the English Members did not press the Government with vigour and vehemence, there were many questions of great importance, not necessarily controversial questions, to be brought up on the Votes. [" Hear, hear ! "] He had urged last year when this proposal was before the House that the House should be associated with the Government in the allocation of the time to be devoted to the various Votes. He was only desirous of saying now that if they did not find a spirit of fair play and reasonable consideration, as to which he appealed to the Government, this question would come up again.

MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) ventured to protest against the suggestion that Ireland took up too much time of last Session. Certainly it was not in excess of their tactical capacity —[laughter]—and he rather gathered from the statements of the Leader of the House, that this Session Ireland, particularly on financial questions, would have to be heard. It was evident that for the future every patriotic Irish Member, on whatever side of the House he sat, must watch carefully every proposal either of an Irish or an Imperial character. Certainly it would be the duty of himself and hon. Friends to take up rather more of the time of the House in Supply during this Session than they had done of late years. [A laugh.] He mentioned that point as one which might be taken into account in calculating as to the probable success of this Rule in future.

DR. CLARK (Caithness) hoped the Leader of the House would consent to the slight modification suggested on his own side of the House, namely, to strike out the words of the Rule giving power to a Minister to allot three additional days to Supply. If that alteration were made he thought it was probable the clause would work well and might safely be made a Standing Order. The Rule had been successful because the Government carried out the reform suggested by Members below the Opposition Gangway. The late Government accepted it and agreed to give Fridays for Supply; they agreed to lay down the principle that they should have two lines, so to speak, one for legislation, and the other for Supply. When Members knew that by obstructing Supply they could not obstruct legislation, they would not be inclined to waste time in Supply. At the same time he thought the votes for the Board of Trade, the Local Government Board, and the Board of Agriculture should have a better place than they had last Session, because last year the House passed Bills practically giving those Departments the right to legislate. The First Lord must admit that the discussion had been very reasonable. To-night they had adopted a new precedent, and the right hon. Gentleman would agree that never before had a Government been allowed to take the nights of private Members without a protest. [The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: " Hear, hear ! "] As a matter of conciliation the right hon. Gentleman might agree to the Amendment suggested.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs) congratulated himself upon having been one of the very few Members on the Opposition side of the House who throughout had supported these Rules. The Rules had unquestionably been successful, but at the same time they had taken something away from private Members. It therefore seemed to him that something was due from the Government to private Members in return, and he suggested that that might take the form of a little further progress on the part of the Government in the direction of reforming the Rules of Procedure of the House. There was one way in which, without disadvantage to public business and with very great advantage to the business of any Government, some equivalent could be given to private Members, and that was to make some provision for the continuance of Bills in one Session at the stage at which they were left in the preceding Session.

MR. T. M. HEALY hoped that the time which the Government necessarily saved by rules of this kind would not be used to pass Bills of a minor character, to which strong objection was taken, without giving some return to the general body of Members. Towards the end of the Session there was a great desire on the part of subordinate Members of the Government to push on their own schemes, and they were quite ready to take advantage of the indulgence which the House allowed to the Government as a whole by rules like this. He and his Friends were entitled, under the circumstances, to claim that the Government should use their power and influence with their own supporters to prevent those Irish Measures to which there was no objection being blocked, so that Irish representatives should not return to their constituencies empty-handed.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) did not think it would be to the general advantage that Bills should be hung over from one Session to another, but he believed it would be a great boon to private Members if they were allowed to ballot on Tuesdays for Bills or Notices of Motion. The result would be that many valuable Measures in the hands of private Members would have some chance of passing, which was almost impossible under the present Rules.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London had made a suggestion which he should, of course be glad to consider, although it was not strictly germane to the rule they were now discussing. It was undoubtedly the fact that only those private Bills that were not only uncontroversial, but so uncontroversial that no kind of opposition existed against them, had any chance of passing; and he was afraid there had been cases such as those alluded to by the hon. and learned Member for Louth in which Bills that were really quite unopposed had been, for one reason or another, objected to at 12 o'clock. One side of the House thought the other side had taken an unreasonable objection, and they directly retaliated by taking opposition to a Bill or Bills, and so the contest went on to the general injury of all concerned. It was inevitable that that kind of vendetta should be pursued, and the only suggestion he had to make was that great care should be taken that mere arbitrary objections should not be taken to Measures after 12 o'clock at night. Before he came to the criticisms and suggestions nearly connected with the Rules before them he ought to notice what fell from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dumfries. When the hon. and learned Gentleman suggested that a Rule should be passed to carry Bills over from one Session to another he must have recognised the fact that there were no body of gentlemen in the House who would probably more object to that than private Members, in whose interests the change was proposed. He had always thought there was a great deal to be said for the change which was long ago advocated at great length by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth, but he believed it would be found that any Government who suggested such a plan would meet with very severe opposition from the first persons whom the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries desired to benefit—namely, the private and independent Members of the House. He would now leave these subsidiary questions and come to what was more revelant on the present occasion. The hon. Member for St. Helens (Mr. Setôn-Karr) backed up by the Parliamentary authority of the hon. Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley) had raised grave objection to what was called the time limit, which was part of the rule, and he suggested that the first part of the rule should be passed, and that referring to the time limit left out. This, it was thought, would be the better arrangement. But his hon. Friend must see that in making that request they were asking for a great deal. The Government in laying down a time limit did so in order that the rule should not be used as an instrument for obstructing legislation; for if there was no time limit—if that part of the resolution was deleted they might find themselves in August or September with a mass of the Supply undisposed of, and the time being occupied in delaying legislation. ["Hear, hear!"] That, he thought, would be a one-sided bargain. He recognised that the present or any other Government might be driven out of the rule, but the consequence of this would be that they would have to revert to the old system and cram Supply into the late days of August and September. They would really give the Government more power without a time limit than with one, as they could not force the hand of the Government to bring on Supply at their desire, for the Government could easily put off Supply by Votes on account until the months he had just mentioned. Of course he did not approve of that course —of postponing Supply until the House had partly emptied itself, and when hon. Members were too exhausted to discuss any difficult question fully. ["Hear, hear!"] He admitted, therefore, that the rule might be passed without a time limit, but he urged that that rule as it stood tied the hands of the Government far more than the course for which the hon. Member for Islington contended, and even under the worse management with regard to Fridays it would be impossible to prevent hon. Members from discussing, week by week, the administrative shortcomings of the Government. The hon. Member for West Islington (Mr. Lough) had remarked that he would like to see Votes on account left out of the rule. He doubted whether it would be wise to do so, but before definitely pronouncing on the point he should like to see how the rule worked for another Session. The hon. Member seemed to think that the necessity for Votes on account had something to do with the laxity, or bad arrangements of the Government. But that was not so. All Governments must take Votes on account in order to carry on the business of the country, and no skill on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Secretary to the Treasury, could possibly avoid the necessity. The hon. Member for St. Helens, referring to Tuesdays, had said with perfect truth, that questions could be brought on and discussed on those days under the old rule which it would be practically impossible to discuss on Fridays under the Estimates, and he referred to discussions on Tuesdays which had been of great value, and which had been calculated to bear fruit in the development of the policy of the country. That was true, and he should be desirous to preserve, as far as possible, a reasonable number of Tuesdays for the use of private Members, but private Members, as far as his experience went, constantly showed their appreciation of this privilege by having an early count and going home to dinner. [Laughter.] When his hon. Friend appealed to him that no Tuesdays should be taken before Whitsuntide he must surely have felt that he was making a request to which neither the present, nor any other Government could possibly accede. But the Government had no desire to take more Tuesdays than was absolutely necessary. Last Session the Government adhered to this rule; Fridays were never interfered with except in respect of Government Bills, and he hoped that experience would be repeated. He hoped that under no provocation would the Government be induced to infringe the rule to take Supply every Friday during the Session. ["Hear, hear!"] While there was every desire to preserve Tuesdays as far as possible for private Members, that must be made subordinate to those private questions in which not only the Government, but large numbers of private Members were interested. His hon. Friend appeared to think that unless private Members were bringing forward or discussing some abstract resolution they were no better than blind animals, following blindly the direction of the Government or the Opposition as the case might be. That was not the view he took of the functions of a private Member. He was for many years a private Member, and he did not remember that he ever brought forward an abstract resolution on a Friday, and he repudiated the idea that during those years he was nothing better than a blind animal. [Laughter.] He thought it would be desirable in the course of the present Session to give some priority to those important Votes in Supply, which were not discussed at great length in a previous Session, and if the House would consent for the purposes of Supply within reasonable limits, to regard two or three Sessions as one, these important Votes which had not been adequately discussed in a previous Session, might, in course of time receive the full attention of the House. [Cheers.]

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) thought that after a Bill had passed the Second Reading and through the Committee stage, no single private Member should be allowed to oppose it on the Report stage, or on the Third Reading. This was the practice under the old Half-past Twelve o'Clock Rule, and did much to facilitate useful legislation.

Resolution agreed to.

SUPPLY.

Considered in Committee:—

[MR. J. W. LOWTHER, Chairman of Ways and Means, in the Chair.]

ARMY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE, 1896-7.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

> "That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £255,300, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Capitation Grants and Miscellaneous Charges of Volunteer Corps, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897."

MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) moved to reduce the Vote by £20,000, which was approximately the Irish contribution to that sum. He took this course for this reason. This was a large Vote for the physical education of the English people, and there was no similar provision for the physical education of the Irish people. This Vote was placed among the Army Estimates, but they knew that that was not a correct description of the Vote. From the military point of view, no one could seriously contend that the Volunteers were a great advantage to the country.

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS said the hon. Member would be quite out of order in discussing the general question on this Vote. The hon. Member must strictly confine himself to the limits of the items of the Vote which was now presented to the Committee.

MR. KNOX said he saw the Vote related entirely to Volunteer Corps. These Volunteer Corps were entirely in Great Britain. There was not a single Volunteer Corps in Ireland, and he took objection to that distribution of Imperial expenditure. This expenditure was confined solely to one part of the United Kingdom.

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: Order, order! That argument is applicable to the original Vote. It does not apply to this part. The hon. Member must confine himself strictly to this Supplementary Estimate. He must not discuss the general principles of Volunteers Corps or whether the money applied to Volunteer Corps should be applicable to Ireland or not. It does not arise on this Vote.

MR. KNOX said he should postpone the greater part of his remarks until they came to the Army Estimates. On that occasion he should go into the whole subject. He wished merely to move, as a matter of protest, the reduction of £20,000. He wished to ask why it was that this extraordinary course was taken every year in succession, of presenting an enormous Supplementary Estimate for the Volunteers. He wanted to know why this payment, which was really made in April, should not be included in the original Estimate, and why there should be an entirely fallacious decrease shown on the original Estimate. Surely it was known that the Department would have to propose this additional sum before the close of the financial year? It was a false principle to proceed on the basis of first bringing in an estimate which they knew would not do them, and then bringing in this fresh Estimate, having got some sort of apparent credit for having kept their Army Estimates down. He saw nothing in the items of this Supplementary Estimate which could not in the ordinary course have been foreseen in the original Estimate that was set down by the Department. The present course was not, in a financial sense, being quite fair with the House. This Supplementary Estimate was vicious in principle, and it was entirely contrary to the financial principles which ought to guide that House. It was not right to cut down at the beginning of the year and to claim credit on a ground which they knew was baseless, and on these grounds he moved to reduce the Vote. They knew it was usually done; they knew it had become customary, and he would like to ask this simple question—whether it is contemplated by the Government to make this an exceptional arrangement, or whether they intended to repeat it year by year?

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said he desired to offer his hearty thanks to the Government for the enormous deal they had done for the Volunteer Force. In reply to the hon. Gentleman opposite, he would like to ask how was it possible for the Government to foretell what was the number of efficients in the Volunteer year before that year was completed? The Volunteer year only ended on the 31st of October, and it was quite impossible for the Department to tell what would be the number of efficients at the end of the Volunteer year. He was sure the Committee would be delighted to see the great increase in the number of efficients in the Volunteer Force, and the diminution of those earning the third-class grant. There was one point on which he would like to ask his right hon. Friend for information. That had reference to the matter of Sergeant-Majors of Volunteer Corps.

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS said it would not be in order to discuss this matter, which was not included in the Vote.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT submitted that there would not be a capitation grant at all without sergeant-majors.

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS said it was not the capitation grant that came under discussion, only the Supplementary grant.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT said he would not trespass further on the time of the Committee; he simply gave this indication of the desirability of giving attention to the matter.

MR. LOUGH asked the right hon. Gentleman in his reply not to confine himself to meeting the argument advanced on behalf of Ireland, but to give some explanation of what this increase of the capitation grant meant. If it was to provide more efficiently for the Volunteers in order that they might be an economic substitute for the army, then he would be very glad to hear it. He would far rather vote for better provision for the Volunteers than add to the extravagance of the regular army.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said there was one item in the Vote he did not quite understand, and it seemed to him to be original, and, if so, it raised a question of principle, and that was the additional capitation allowance for engineers efficient in submarine mining. As this stood, it would seem to be, not a continuation of the original Vote, but a new additional grant. All the other portions of the Estimate were continuations of the original Vote, but with regard to this item, as it was described, it looked as if it were not in the same category. He only wished to know whether any new method was to be adopted for promoting efficiency of engineers in submarine mining. His own idea was that this duty ought not to be confined to engineers, but should be entrusted to sailors. Did this involve a new grant?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford) said he thought, perhaps, the description was not the best that could have been chosen. The intention was that it should be a special allowance for efficiency in submarine mining. The fact was, engineers had to spend considerable extra time to make themselves efficient, and had greater wear and tear of clothing than other Volunteers, and in consequence it was found extremely desirable at the ports to offer inducements to Volunteers to enter this particular service, and about ten years ago the War Office offered this special capitation allowance, enabling these corps to be kept up. His hon. Friend, who was continually taking the Navy under his charge, thought that sailors would do the work better, and he could inform him that sailors did undertake the work at some ports, and did it very well. As to the general criticisms offered by the hon. Gentleman opposite, there was nothing in the nature of that evasion the hon. Member assumed there was in presenting these Supplementary Estimates. The fact was, that last year about this time the Government asked Parliament to give the whole capitation grant to the Volunteers, in order to bring up to date payments they considered, in some cases, remained in arrear, and such, according to the War Department's view, were made in advance. The hon. Member was of opinion that the Volunteers began their year with the financial year, but the Volunteer year began in November, and consequently in paying them in April they were paid when five months of the year had run, and some of the officers said they were paid only half way through the year. For this reason, the Chancellor of the Exchequer assenting, and it being convenient, public funds permitting, the advances were made at a rather earlier period this year than in other years. There was no fetish about the 1st of April, and this was done in the present year because it was convenient to public funds, and there were economies also allowing it, and so it was arranged the payments should be made in January and February. It was, he understood, convenient to the Volunteers, and there was no reason whatever why it should be withheld until the month of April.

MR. KNOX said the right hon. Gentleman had not met the point raised. He could not see any reason why this should not have been estimated at the time the original Estimates were drafted. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, who invited him to join his regiment, took the ground that it was impossible to foretell how many Volunteers there might be to come in for these grants for efficiency, but he did not understand it was the view of the War Office that there was this extraordinary fluctuation in the Volunteer force. Their point was, that certain capitation grants were due on April 1, and they asked Parliament to allow them to adopt the course of paying them in the same year before April 1. That was a bad principle. If the Volunteers ought to get payment in February before it was absolutely due, then this ought to be done every year. The Volunteers were not more hard-up this than another year. Naturally they wanted it every year, and if there was a good reason for it then the payment should be made in advance every year. What would happen if this were not paid now, but allowed to go over? The payment would come into the new Estimates for a new year, and probably at the end of that year there would be another payment to meet because it was convenient, and working out this it would be found that the Volunteer Estimate for one year might be double what it was the year before. He did not suppose that would be done, for it was perfectly clear that if the Treasury adopted the principle of allowing payments to be made in advance they must follow it out every year, or there would be loud complaints from Volunteers of going back on the arrangement. It must have been known at the beginning of the year that this would have to be paid out before April, and therefore provision should have been made for it in the Estimates.

MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) was not at all satisfied, and did not think that a satisfactory reason had been given for not including this in the original Estimates. He was quite sure that if a board of directors in a commercial enterprise were to make such a blunder in an original estimate they would be bundled out of office by the shareholders. Why did not the War Department conduct its affairs in a businesslike way?

Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £235,300, be granted for the said Service."

The House divided:—Ayes, 23; Noes, 127.—(Division List, No. 8.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (REPORTS OF MONEY COMMITTEES).

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY moved:—

"That the Proceedings on the Reports of the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means and other Committees authorising the expenditure of Public Money may be entered upon at any hour though opposed, and shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order regulating the Sittings of the House, except of Standing Order No. 5."

MILITARY WORKS (MONEY).

Considered in Committee:—

[CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS in the Chair.]

*MR. BRODRICK moved:—

"That it is expedient to authorise the issue, out of the Consolidated Fund, of any sums not exceeding in the whole £5,458,000, for the expenses of certain Military Works and other Military Services, and to authorise the Treasury to borrow by means of terminable annuities, payable out of moneys to be provided by Parliament for Army Services, and, if those moneys are insufficient, out of the Consolidated Fund, such sums as may be required for the purpose of providing money for the issue of the above-mentioned sum of £5,458,000 out of the Consolidated Fund, or the repayment to that Fund of all or any part of the sum so issued, and also to authorise the application of the Surplus of Income above Expenditure for the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1897, towards paying any sums authorised to be issued out of the Consolidated Fund for Military Works."

He said: I rise to renew the Motion made in this House in June last. On that occasion I briefly explained to the House the reasons which, in the judgment of the Government, made it necessary to ask Parliament to undertake certain urgent military services by loan. The House may, perhaps, desire that I should justify the proposal to proceed in this manner rather than through the medium of the annual Estimates, and it is desirable, for the benefit of those who may not have the past history of this matter in their recollection, to remind the Committee that the services proposed to be undertaken are such as it has been customary for the last 50 years to undertake out of capital moneys and not out of annual Estimates. ["Hear, hear!"] In 1854-6, at the time of the Crimean War, a sum of £860,000 was spent on building large camps for the extra soldiers then under arms. In 1860 Lord Palmerston and succeeding Ministers applied to Parliament for loans amounting to a sum of £7,460,000 in respect of forts and other defences round the coast. In 1872, Lord Cardwell carried out the Localisation of the Forces by an Act, under which £3,500,000 of capital money had been spent. In 1888, Mr. Stanhope, by the Imperial Defence Act, obtained £2,600,000 for the fortification of our Military Ports and Coaling Stations. In 1890 a sum of £4,100,000 was granted for the reconstruction of barracks, in consequence of the representatives before Lord Randolph Churchill's Committee that the condition of some of our barracks was a disgrace to the British nation. This last loan, I should mention, differed from those which preceded it, in that it was repayable, and is being repaid, by annual instalments charged on the Army Estimates. It is in pursuance of the policy accepted by Parliament in relation to the loans of 1888 and 1890 that we are now forced to come to Parliament again. There was no pretence at the time—as any reference to Mr. Stanhope's statement will show—that the loans then granted represented a final or complete treatment of the services for which provision was asked. On the contrary, Mr. Stanhope, in introducing the Bill of 1888, spoke as follows:—

> "It will be fully understood that the scheme now submitted does not pretend to be an exhaustive one, or to complete all the defences which the Military Authorities think necessary and desire to see carried out. What it does aim at is to carry out in the next three years, or in other words, as quickly as possible, all the most urgent of these defences."

He said: I rise to renew the Motion asked for by the Military Authorities amounted to £9,000,000; Lord Randolph Churchill's Committee vouched for the necessity of the service; and the amount voted by the House of Commons in 1890 was £4,100,000. We are thus brought face to face with the difficulty which we are asking Parliament to enable us to meet. Loans have been granted for the more urgent fortifications which could be carried out in three years, and for the barracks which it was estimated could be erected in five years. Those loans are now exhausted, and we are obliged to come to Parliament again. In the face of the above-named precedents, I do not know whether any question will be raised as to the course we propose to take of proceeding by loan. The advantages of this course are so overwhelming that it is not astonishing that Parliament has sanctioned it again and again. It is obvious in all matters connected with fortification or the renewal of barracks, that it is unwise and uneconomical to proceed haphazard. A recognised scheme must be drawn out. ["Hear, hear!"] Contracts must be entered into, and work proceeded with regularly from month to month. This is exceedingly difficult under annual Estimates. Money may be available in one year, and not in another, which causes postponement and delay. Even when money is available, no contract can be made for a fresh work till the Vote is passed by Parliament—an event frequently delayed till the best building months of the year are gone. When money has been voted and the building commenced, a long frost in the winter may upset all calculations, and perhaps reduce the expenditure in the financial year by one-third, which money returns to the Exchequer, and the funds have, in the following financial year, to be re-voted, this course possibly necessitating fresh taxation by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whose provision for this service in the preceding year has been torn from him by the ruthless clutches of the National Debt Commissioners. [Laughter.] If we proceed by loan, all these inconveniences are avoided. Moreover, I submit that this process opens the most convenient channel for Parliamentary criticism. A scheme can be put forward as a whole; it can be discussed, modified, or rejected. Whatever is approved can then be carried out in the promptest and most economical manner. The Resolution to which we ask the Committee to assent is to the expenditure of £5,458,000. Of this sum £1,120,000, or about one quarter, relates to services in which the Navy has an equal interest, with the Army, if not a primary interest. I do not refer to the cost of guns or ammunition, which, being of a less permanent nature than the works, will be provided on annual Estimates. We have four classes of ports for which defence has been authorised by Parliament in the past. We have military ports, and naval bases at home of the type of Portsmouth, Plymouth, and Cork. We have to defend mercantile harbours, such as the Clyde, Forth, Dublin, Belfast, and the Bristol Channel. We have Gibraltar, Malta, and other fortresses abroad; and we have coaling stations in every part of the globe, which though fortified and manned by the Army, are maintained for the service of the Navy. The additions which are now proposed to the defence of these ports are due to two main causes. The first of these being the provision of works for medium and quick-firing armament, which has not hitherto been supplied, and the defences against torpedo-boat attack at our naval bases which has been strongly urged by the Admiralty. The second is that the large Admiralty works contemplated at Gibraltar have made it necessary further to strengthen the armament at that fortress, while the development of foreign power in the seas to the east of the Cape, make it incumbent on us to secure our ports in those seas against such an attack as could be made upon them. ["Hear, hear!"] So far we are asking Parliament for nothing except to make good a policy which it has already sanctioned. But we have been obliged, under urgent pressure from the Admiralty, to consider the fortification of four harbours at home, to enable trading ships to find protection on reaching our shores in the event of war, and to enable Her Majesty's fleet to act with greater freedom and activity in the Atlantic. These four harbours selected for their naval tactical character are Berehaven, Lough Swilly, Falmouth, and Scilly. Now, before I justify these proposals, I ought to make it clear to the Committee how these questions, which involve more than one of our two great services, are dealt with. Any question of defence or of combined attack which arises at the Admiralty or the War Office is referred for consideration to the Joint Naval and Military Committee on Defence, on which the Senior Naval Lords and two other Naval Members represent the Admiralty, while the Army is represented by the Adjutant General, the Inspector General of Fortifications, and the Inspector General of Ordnance. Their conclusions are considered by the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Secretary of State for War, who either decide the question or, if its importance warrants it, as in the present instance, bring it before the Cabinet Committee, presided over by the Lord President of the Council, at which the Commander-in-Chief and the Senior Naval Lord are present. This system has worked with great harmony and smoothness, and the House may rest assured that the proposals now submitted are founded on the best expert opinion, reviewed not only in principle, but in detail by the Cabinet Committee. The addition of quick-firing guns to the defences, and the further provision necessary against torpedo attack were put forward after exhaustive inquiry by the Joint Naval and Military Committee in 1892 and 1894, and the Government included them in this Bill when it was proposed to introduce it last year, because they felt that, with due consideration to the safety of the ports affected, they could no longer be delayed. ["Hear, hear!"] With regard to the mercantile strategic ports named above, the Naval and Military Committee were unanimous in attaching a just importance to the defence of these strategic naval positions. They reported in these words:—

> "Berehaven and Lough Swilly are natural harbours admirably situated as strategic harbours on the verge of the open ocean. If defended they would not only afford a very considerable safeguard to our trade and commerce, but would enable Her Majesty's Fleet and ships to act with greater freedom and activity, confident in the existence of a coal supply at the very points where it would be wanted by vessels covering our trade and acting against hostile squadrons in the Atlantic. With the resources of these ports available, our ships would be able to chase further and would be placed at an advantage as to coal endurance compared with the ships of any nation to which we may be opposed. It is certain that the waters to the south and west of Ireland will receive much attention from an enemy seeking to injure our trade. Berehaven would save 180 miles of coal distance to Her Majesty's vessels cruising in the Atlantic. Lough Swilly is a most important point, especially for the American trade, which would in case of war pass round to the north of Ireland. Falmouth is required for a dispatch station. The Scilly Isles, connected as they are by telegraph with England, form a most important signal station. With a coal supply available at this spot, a fleet covering the channel could be kept coaled up ready at all times to chase in full strength."

Nothing that could be said from this Bench would add anything to the combined and deliberate opinions of our Naval Advisers on these points, but I would beg the Committee to notice that the sum it is proposed to vote to complete the defence of these ports and coaling stations all over the world will not in all absorb more than the price of a single ironclad or than that of any two of the great Atlantic liners, which for the lack of a single one of these protected harbours might become a prey to an enemy's cruiser on the outbreak of war. ["Hear, hear!"] The second heading of the Schedule, and pecuniarily the largest, is that for barracks and completion of large camps, on which we ask Parliament for £2,989,000. I do not propose to detain the Committee long on this head, because the question is one which is familiar to the House and to the country. In 1889 £9,000,000 were pressed upon us by the Military Authorities to meet the necessary amendments of barrack accommodation, and £4,100,000 was voted as immediately urgent. If I am asked to state why £9,000,000 were required, the answer is that for the first two-thirds of this century the housing of the troops was greatly neglected, that there has been a great advance of sanitary science in the last few years, and a general rise of the standard of accommodation for all classes of the population. ["Hear, hear!"] Moreover, there is a continuous and healthy pressure from this House that the Army, for the benefit of recruiting and for the credit of the country should be properly housed. ["Hear, hear!"] The sum now proposed is necessary, first, to complete the replacing of wornout and unsanitary wooden huts at Aldershot, the Curragh, Colchester, and Shorncliffe. These were originally built to last 20 years, and although those erected at the time of the Crimean War were dealt with in 1890, those erected between 1855 and 1875 have far outrun their span of existence, and are most costly to maintain in repair. Next we have to provide for the increased garrisons at fortresses and coaling stations abroad, which have been pressed upon us by the Colonial Defence Committee or by the increases of garrison under successive Governments. We have also to build a cavalry barrack in Ireland, in place of Island Bridge Barracks, from which the troops have had to be withdrawn owing to typhoid fever; we have a Military hospital to build in London; we have to replace the barracks destroyed by fire at Winchester; and we propose to erect a large number of married quarters at various stations, in order to obviate the inconveniences which fall on a class on whom Military service often presses hardly. The details of the proposed expenditure under the head of Barracks will, as in 1890, be laid before the House in a schedule. So far I have been dealing with undertakings for which we have already received the authority of the House. I come now to the last head of the Loan—£1,149,000, the main items of which represent proposals of a novel character. To these proposals I beg the special attention of the Committee. We have, however, in the first instance, to complete the arrangements for mobilisation for the defence of London, for which sums have been taken in the annual Estimates. The principle on which our troops will be employed for defence in case of invasion was drawn out ten years ago by the most eminent soldiers of the day, and was then approved by the Government. The points at which the various army corps will be stationed for the immediate attack of an invading force have been clearly laid down. But it has been held that, apart from the Mobile Army and the recognised garrisons, London must be surrounded by defensive positions strongly held and fortified with artillery, as a second line of defence. ["Hear, hear!"] By this means alone can the field army be given absolute freedom of movement, and have the security that a light column striking at London from some other point of the coast will meet with determined resistance. ["Hear, hear!"] These positions therefore have, after an exhaustive survey, been selected by trained officers, and approved by the Commander in Chief and Adjutant General. Since 1888, by successive votes of Parliament, 13 of these centres have been acquired; storehouses have been erected on several of them, and works commenced. The scheme, therefore, is in full working, and the expenditure hitherto has been about £68,000. A further sum of £96,000 is required mainly to complete the storehouses and the access to the works. The objects attained will be recognised by every Member of the House. Sites have been chosen deliberately instead of hurriedly; concentration at these sites has been worked out; the storehouses will contain the ammunition and entrenching tools assigned to the lines of entrenchments to be manned, and we shall thus carry further the decentralisation of stores. Ten years ago the stores were all concentrated at Woolwich; and it was estimated that it would have then taken six weeks to distribute the stores in the event of war. In addition to the more easy and expeditious distribution of stores, we shall moreover have the very large forces assigned to these positions so placed as to be available within a few hours, to be drawn forward to support the field army in any place where additional numbers are required. ["Hear, hear!"] Even at a distance of nearly a century it may be worth quoting the opinion given by the Emperor Napoleon as to the value of fortified positions, especially in the case of the less highly trained troops:—

> "At the time of great national disasters Empires frequently stand in need of soldiers; but men are never wanting for internal defence, if a place be provided where their energies can be brought into action. 50,000 National guards, with 3,000 gunners, will defend a fortified capital against an army of 300,000 men. The same 50,000 in the open field, if they are not experienced soldiers, commanded by skilled officers, will be thrown into confusion by a few thousand horse."

The last, but not the least pressing of our requirements which I have to bring forward is the provision for the training of the troops by means of ranges and of manœuvres. ["Hear, hear!"] The question of ranges in this densely populated country is becoming yearly more difficult. ["Hear, hear!"] We have to find means for Corps of the Regular Army, of Militia, and of Volunteers, to shoot every year. We could not of course undertake to provide ranges in every county or for isolated companies. But our proposal is to expend a sum of £500,000 in setting up ranges at various centres throughout the country—with, it is hoped, camping grounds attached to them—at which it will be the duty of the General Officer Commanding to see that every description of troops has the opportunity of firing during the year. ["Hear, hear!"] I am sure the Committee will agree that that is the only way in which we can meet this great national dilemma in regard to the provision of ranges. ["Hear, hear!"] I cannot, of course, indicate localities, but I can assure the House that cheapness and ease of access will be the primary considerations. The Military Authorities have also pressed upon the Government a further step which, subject to the assent of Parliament, we propose to take without delay. The difficulty experienced in training the troops owing to the absence of manœuvres was brought before the House last year. We have in all 400,000 infantry, cavalry, and mobile artillery in this country. In case of war a General would have to handle at least 100,000 men. But there is no ground at present in this country where a General can learn the tactical command of more than 10,000 men. We are therefore asking our Generals to go into action, each with one of his arms tied behind his back—["hear, hear!"]—and the fact that the House of Commons did not see its way last year to pass the Military Manœuvres Bill has rendered it more necessary that we should take steps to rescue our troops from their present hampered position as regards effective manœuvring. ["Hear, hear!"] Representations on this subject have been showered upon us by the Military Authorities. Lord Wolseley, the Commander in Chief, writes to the Secretary of State for War:—

> "The regiments drill well and march past admirably, but neither the Generals, the Staff, nor the regimental officers are as well instructed in the practical side of a soldier's training as they should be. Our best officers know the theory well, but are sadly in want of experience in practising what they have learned from books. That experience they cannot obtain under existing circumstances in England, and I can see no prospect of their being as efficient as the nation expects them to be until they are annually given an opportunity of learning their work practically over a sufficiently wide extent of country. I think it my duty to impress on your Lordship, once more, the urgent necessity of purchasing a large and sufficient manœuvring area for the instruction of the home Army in the art and method of war."

Lord Roberts, than whom there is no officer who has had greater experience in India, and who is now Commander of the Forces in Ireland, writes in a similar strain of the absolute necessity for instructing the troops in manœuvring. Sir Evelyn Wood, Quartermaster General, writes of the difficulty at present of training the Transport Service, which is not the least important of the services of the Army. He says that extended manœuvres are absolutely necessary if transport is to be trained. The Duke of Connaught, who commanded the manœuvres this year at Aldershot, reported to the War Office that the space available at Aldershot in August was such that manœuvres were impossible, and that only tactical instruction could be given. Finally, I quote the opinion of General Luck, Inspector-General of Cavalry, who has had immense experience in the handling of cavalry, which no man in Europe or Asia understands better than he. General Luck says:—

> "Nowhere in the United Kingdom where Cavalry are quartered is it possible to even drill a Cavalry division; to manœuvre one is quite out of the question. At Aldershot and the Curragh there is barely room to drill a weak Brigade; no room to manœuvre one. At none of the other stations is there even room to practise a Regiment so as to fit it to take part in a Brigade. To send a large force of Cavalry on a campaign under inexperienced officers would be simply courting disaster."

Lord Lansdowne, with these opinions before him, felt that it was quite impossible to take the responsibility of ignoring these demands. We feel the necessity of holding from time to time such large manœuvres as those for which we asked for a Bill last year. But we hold, beyond this, that we ought at all times to be able to manœuvre our cavalry, and to give a reasonable force of infantry an opportunity of training. Having regard to the fact that at Aldershot and in the neighbourhood the value of land since our occupation of it has gone up four or five-fold, and that we cannot purchase land round there at anything like a reasonable price, we have been obliged to seek some manœuvring ground in some other quarter. For this purpose my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary (Mr. Powell-Williams) early in the autumn entered into negotiations for the purchase of a tract of land with a considerable number of landowners, with a view of obtaining a provisional agreement in case the step proposed should be approved by Parliament. We have commenced to enter on those agreements, and we have every hope that, as a considerable number of them are concluded already, we shall be able to purchase a tract of land amounting to 40,000 acres, or about 60 square miles, on Salisbury Plain—[Cheers]—a proceeding which will, at a cost of less than £450,000—not more, that is the extreme amount required—give us a manœuvring ground three times the size of any available at Aldershot. This site is pronounced by the military authorities to be admirably fitted for military purposes; it will give us a good rifle range, and may also enable us to do our artillery shooting there instead of at the present distant ranges. As regards price, if it be thought that we are asking for a large sum, I should like to remind the Committee that the State of Wurtemburg alone about two years ago spent a larger sum in providing a manœuvring ground for cavalry. We should, therefore, be making a good bargain for the nation, and I think it would certainly be an extraordinary thing if the British nation should refuse its troops the training which was pronounced necessary by all the military advisers simply because of this sum which we now ask for. I have desired to make it clear that the expenditure we ask for is of a permanent character. The fortifications which we propose to put up will be at places which always remain undefended; the barracks which we should substitute for these wooden huts ought to last for a hundred years; the land which we propose to buy will be a permanent and probably an increasingly valuable investment; and the sum which the Committee ask for for the whole loan will be repayable within 30 years. Therefore, we have not lightly entered upon this expenditure. There has been no time when the co-operation between Army and Navy has been closer than it is at the present moment. The heads of the two services are being constantly brought together, and the proposals, so far as they connect the two services, have the common consent of both. The Committee should remember that although large sums were voted for the Navy last year, we ought not to let our zeal thoroughly to equip the service on which we primarily depend prevent us from doing what is necessary to enable the Army to fulfil its functions. After all, an army besides its duties has its rights; every soldier who joins the service has the right to be housed fairly, and in a sanitary way—[hear, hear!"]—and every soldier has the right to get such training as will give him a fair chance with the soldiers of most foreign countries, and to know that he goes into action under Generals qualified to lead him. ["Hear, hear!"] We have asked for this expenditure because we think it is a sound and economical way of carrying on the work. I cannot conceive a worse economy than that we should vote 21 millions every year for the Navy, and not render impregnable the coaling stations on which the Navy depends for its utility, and in the same way I suppose we could not do a worse service to the country than to ask them to vote 18 millions for the Army and deprive our troops of the training which all foreign countries and every British officer considers necessary. Under those circumstances, having explained our motives, and having assured the Committee that we are asking for the minimum sum which is considered necessary for military efficiency and national safety, I can only say that I look with confidence to receiving a verdict of the House of Commons in our favour. [Cheers.] He moved the resolution authorising the expenditure of the money necessary for the purposes of the Bill.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said he should support the Resolution as a friendly critic. He felt regret that the Government were not able to proceed with the Military Manœuvres Bill of last year, and thought that, considering the importance of the interests involved, they were not quite stern enough in their desire to carry it. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought the present expenditure ought to have been entered upon as soon as it was considered necessary. He dared say that many of his hon. Friends on that side of the House might differ from him in regard to the present Bill, but he doubted whether they would see their way to oppose it as a whole. As to the proposal to proceed by way of loan, there was, of course, a great controversy as to this system applying to the Navy, but he thought there had never been any difference of opinion in regard to measures such as the present. There could be no doubt that fortifications, barracks, and coaling stations had been so dealt with on former occasions, and there could be no ground for a new departure on this occasion. He wished that for all proposals of this kind, for which the Defence Committee of the Cabinet was responsible, they could have an even stronger statement from the Government. He had noticed in Parliament this Session, and in speeches during the recess, signs that the authority of the Committee of the Cabinet presided over by the Duke of Devonshire was increasing, and was stronger than it was this time last year. It then seemed doubtful whether it had the authority it was desirable it should possess. The statement of the Under Secretary for War involved considerations of policy larger than the mere figures of some of the items. The first of the heads under which the right hon. Gentleman divided his speech concerned works which, although technically military, were, in fact, naval works for the benefit of the fleet in its maritime defence of the British Islands and the Empire. He himself shared with the former First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord George Hamilton) the opinion that we should follow the example of foreign countries by taking out of the hands of the Army, which did not manage them properly, stations intended for naval purposes. The Army should not have the management of what was intended for the Navy. The example of almost all the military Powers of the world was against us on this point. An American gentleman, who had recently made a careful survey of the coast defences and coaling stations of the various Powers, had reported that our arrangements were primeval and antiquated. The naval stations of the other Powers were under the control of their navies, and this gentleman thought it a much wiser plan than ours. It was shown last year how the Army and Navy had thrown backwards and forwards, like battledore and shuttlecock, the garrisoning of the naval bases of the country. All these bases should be under the control of the Navy, as was the case in Italy, France, and Germany. The second head of the Under Secretary's statement covered the question of barracks. It was a question as to which past experience should make the House careful and prudent. He did not complain of the expenditure or its amount. But where barracks were built sometimes had an undue effect on the disposition of forces. The localisation of our forces often depended on considerations which, when traced out, came to the accident of where barracks had been built under former loans. Therefore the policy of barrack loans should be carefully watched, that they might not continue the evil system former barrack loans involved them in. The building of cavalry barracks in town had been fatal to the efficiency of cavalry, and they should follow the example of Belgium by stationing them where they could perfect themselves in their duties. The Under Secretary seemed to think the proposal in connection with forts for the defence of London was a novelty. His chief reason for supporting the Vote of £96,000 asked for for this purpose was that it was not a novelty. The forts were begun under the last Government but one, and continued under the last Government. It was an extraordinary thing, considering the hundreds of thousands of Londoners who at least once a week walked about the hills where the forts were, that they should be unaware of their erection, but the policy of erecting the forts had never been discussed by the House of Commons. He did not believe a single word was ever said in the House of Commons on the point. On the panic argument alone the small expenditure the forts involved was worth incurring, for undoubtedly, if we got into a serious war the Admiralty would have to send the fleet about in a way that neither the public nor the Press would understand, and pressure would be brought upon them at a time when they would be unable to tell the public the reasons for what they were doing. The public would be more likely to keep their heads under dangerous circumstances of the kind if they thought there was something between them and invasion other than a fleet which might not be in the Channel at all. The defence of the country against invasion must always be, under any circumstances, a protecting fleet, and if the Channel should be clear in the sense of the seas being clear of the British fleet—not in the sense that it was a certain distance off attacking the enemy's fleet—than, he was bound to say he did not believe any military defence would save the capital from invasion. He agreed that it would be an improvement in our military system if the Volunteers were formed into brigade divisions and were placed under the command of men who thoroughly understood their work. One ground of objection that might be taken by some hon. Members to the Government proposal was that the cost of our military system of defence was enormous with an inadequate result, and that a great deal more might be done with the money. That was a point, however, that might be discussed more satisfactorily when the Army Estimates were under consideration. He, however, did not think that this particular Bill was open to attack upon that ground, and as he believed that most of the proposals it contained were sound he should be prepared to support the Measure.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth) said that he most heartily joined the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down in his appreciation of the clearness and frankness of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War. He was quite certain that there could be no misapprehension with regard to the right hon. Gentleman's statement. It was most unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman's speech should have been delivered at an hour when the House was nearly empty, because if the House had been full it would have facilitated the Debate and would have saved any hon. Member from entertaining any misapprehension in reference to the subject. With regard to the acquisition of land for ranges and military manœuvres it was clear that if we desired to have an efficient Army we must have the means of training, not only our soldiers, but also the generals who were to command them. The advance that had been made in recent years in the range of our weapons rendered it absolutely necessary that we should acquire land for the purpose of shooting ranges, and therefore he could not understand any persons raising objections to the purchase of the necessary land by the Government, unless they belonged to that class who objected to our having any army at all. He should be surprised if any arguments were put forward against that part of the Bill. With regard to the barracks which it was proposed to build, he did not think that the carrying out of the works should be intrusted to the Royal Engineers, who, able and cultivated men as they were, had not the experience necessary to enable them to properly construct such buildings. Indeed, the consensus of military opinion, rightly or wrongly, was that the Royal Engineers were the last in whose hands the carrying out of the arrangements and the spending of the money should be placed. Next in importance came the question of mobilisation in the neighbourhood of London. He thought that if it were necessary to spend this sum of £200,000 as a sort of soothing syrup to the nerves of the people of London to induce them to believe that if the money were expended they would be secure from attack, the expenditure might be justified. In his view, however, the scheme could not be regarded as forming any part of the general system of defence upon which we should have to rely. His right hon. Friend was most particular in emphasising the fact that in other matters the Naval and Military authorities were agreed. Under the present Administration a great advance was being made towards unification of policy of the Naval and Military authorities, and he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman who had preceded him that the Defence Committee of the Cabinet was beginning to show signs of life. They could not separate the question of defending London from the naval question—they could not do it. They could not have troops coming over from Boulogne without raising the question of transport, and that raised the naval question, before a foreign army could be placed on these shores. Therefore he should like to ask his right hon. Friend whether he had full and entire consent of the Committee of the Cabinet. They must have the whole subject and the numerous questions involved approached in a practical spirit, and practical conclusions come to before they could say whether invasion was a bugbear or whether it was not. He should not labour that point any more, but he should say they had wasted money enormously in the past from having no fixed principle whatever. They came down one night and passed votes for the Navy, altogether disregarding other factors; and then on another night they voted money for the Army, as if no Navy existed. They were now trying to improve on that, and he hoped they would get rid of those mixed and confused notions, which cost so much and which landed then in a sea of difficulties. When he looked at the military question he looked at it from the point of view of military operations carried on over sea; and the first thing they had to see to was the efficiency of the British Army in connection with sea transport. If they were going to incur a large expenditure for the purpose of training their army, he did not see why they should not kill two birds with one stone, and give their soldiers transport training. He should have thought they could have got land, less costly than land near London, on the coast of Wales, Scotland, or Ireland, where the land was much less valuable than land in England. What he contemplated was organising a brigade every year, and landing it on some of these coasts, the land to be acquired by the State; then, after the training in transport and other duties, bringing the brigade back again. He doubted whether the difference of cost would be very much, and he questioned whether the saving in land would not go a long way towards the cost of the sea transport. That very question of sea transport they could not get away from. It appeared in this matter they were still very much in the old rut. They looked on the Army and the Navy as abstract quantities, and until the Committee of the Cabinet came to be masters of the position and exercised that influence which they ought to exercise on the Admiralty and the War Office they could not say that they had arrived at a better state of things. One more point he wished to refer to—the amount demanded for fortifications by the Admiralty. He believed that if the Admiralty were responsible for the naval bases they would find that the naval bases could be secured from attack by a less amount being expended on fortifications than the military authorities thought necessary. They had the authority of the Defence Committee to say that the Navy undertook to secure all possessions abroad from organised invasion from the sea. That being so, all we had to protect our naval bases and coal stations against was predatory attack of a limited character. He was most anxious to know what increased garrisons this contemplated Vote would involve. He remembered hearing a Debate in the House of Lords when the programme was put forward, as a result of Lord Carnarvon's Commission, and the Duke of Cambridge then warned the country that they should be cautious as to what they did in regard to enormous fortifications, for, he said, they were making no provision respecting garrisons. He asked his right hon. Friend to say distinctly whether the £1,200,000 would be spent on fortifications, and what his estimate was of the increase of garrisons. If an increase of garrisons was intended, that meant an increase of the Army, and an increase of that portion of the Army which he believed was too big already—namely, that portion that was to sit down and wait until it was attacked. Every pound spent upon garrisons must be taken from the striking force of the Army, the part which had to go abroad to fight. He trusted the Measure would pass speedily through the House, but confessed that, while he approved generally of the Bill, he should feel it his duty to vote against the proposals in regard to the fortification of London.

MR. LOUGH viewed the proposals of the Government with considerable alarm, and thought such far-reaching suggestions as those laid before them somewhat suddenly might have been printed so that they could have considered them and been able to take a more intelligent part in the discussion than they could under present circumstances. When he read in the Queen's Speech:—

> "Your consent will be asked to provisions which, in the judgment of the military authorities, are required for adding to the efficiency of the military defences of the Empire,"

he did not anticipate that those provisions would be introduced at so early a period of the Session, and he did not expect anything so bad as the reality proved to be. They were asked for 5½ millions sterling, one million of which was to be spent on making certain of the most remote harbours in the United Kingdom impregnable—that was the word used by the right hon. Gentleman—three millions on barracks, and 1¼ million on proposals which the right hon. Gentleman very properly described as novel. He objected to each one of those proposals. [Ironical cheers.] They were told there were only two men in favour of economy, the Leader of the Opposition and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Leader of the Opposition was not present—[Ministerial cheers]—indeed there was no one on the front Opposition Bench—[renewed cheers]—to give any guidance to those who sat around him. He was sorry to say, too, that the Opposition Benches generally were comparatively tenantless—[Ministerial cheers]—and that the Irish Benches were absolutely deserted the whole time the right hon. Gentleman was speaking. He was glad, however, to see present one of the two ceonomists, the Chancellor of the Exchequer—[Ministerial cheers]—and he hoped they would hear a word or two from him. He objected to the effort to make the remote harbours impregnable. Hundreds of years ago martello towers were erected in remote parts to make the country impregnable. The attempt did not succeed.

If the attempt to make the coast impregnable did not succeed, the Government would merely say, "We must make another effort." He wished the proposals of the Government had not been so large. For instance, they asked for no less a sum than three millions for barracks. It had been said that they had their duties as well as rights in respect to the soldier, and he sympathised with the remark, and thought they ought to make the soldier as comfortable as possible in his quarters. ["Hear, hear!"] But what he objected to was that the proposals were not put before the House on a more moderate scale. Had the Government come for a more moderate sum each year for barracks he should not have objected; but to ask for £3,000,000 at one stroke for the purpose seemed to him to be an extravagant demand. And what was worse was that, notwithstanding the large increase of expenditure, they had no security whatever of effectiveness. But the most novel and startling of all the proposals submitted was that referring to the fortifications of London. They had heard of 13 strong places to be erected round the Metropolis. To him the proposal was a startling one, and he should like to have some information as to where these fortifications were to be built.

*Mr. BRODRICK: I explained, on the line of hills round London. I am afraid I cannot make my meaning clearer to the hon. Gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUGH said that was not very definite. The line of hills round London embraced a circle of 120 miles; but what he wanted to know was where on those hills the 13 fortified places were to be erected. Was that the way the Government were going to expend money for the defence of the sea-coast? [Laughter.] Then it was proposed to spend half a million for rifle ranges although not a word of explanation had been vouchsafed to the House why the expenditure was necessary. ["Hear, hear!" and Ministerial laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite might laugh, but many hon. Members on his side of the House, and the public outside, would demand further explanation than had been given on the point. Another half million was to be spent on providing training grounds for the troops, and it appeared that little heed had been taken of the fear expressed by the people last year when the Military Manœuvres Bill was before Parliament, lest the country was going to be turned into a vast camping-ground for military purposes. ["Hear, hear!" and Ministerial laughter.] Again hon. Gentlemen opposite laughed, but the Bill was not passed. ["Hear, hear!"] The objection he wished to make was that this proposed expenditure was on too great a scale. For years they had been spending large sums on increasing the Navy, and many hon. Members had been induced to vote for this expenditure on the ground that by doing so they would save in that on the Army. He confessed that he was disappointed with the tone that had been taken by the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean on this point. The right hon. Gentleman had always supported proposals for strengthening the Navy, but he had always thought that the right hon. Gentleman did so on the ground that the Army was much too costly, and that they might save on the Army a very large portion, at least, of the extra sums spent on the Navy. ["Hear, hear!" and Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] The expenditure on the Navy was now £21,000,000 a year, instead of £12,000,000 twenty years ago. Now, the Government having wrung some money out of the country for the Navy, turned round in the other direction to get more for the Army; contending, notwithstanding all that had been spent extra on the Navy, and the vast sums already spent on the Army that the country was still defenceless. At the present moment the amount expended on the Army was about £20,000,000 a year, and yet they had only a little army of 100,000 men—[Ministerial cries of "No, no!"]—he meant only an effective army of that number. France spent £25,000,000 on her army, but for that expenditure she secured an effective army of 600,000 men, with a practical reserve of over 2,000,000 men. He repeated that no security was given that, even if this large increase was granted, the country would have a thoroughly effective force. If judicious economy had been exercised the large sum granted for the Army last year might have been made to go much further than it had done, and in no administrative work of the Government was the hand of economy needed more than in that of the Army. ["Hear, hear!"] In 1860 the total Vote for the Army was £14,750,000, and the force was 5,000 more than at present. It seemed to him, therefore, that the more they spent on the Army the less effective it became. ["Hear, hear!" and Ministerial laughter.] He looked with suspicion on such serious proposals of increased expenditure at so early a stage of the Session, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would adopt a suggestion which had been made and provide hon. Members with a paper giving adequate information, and would give them an opportunity of considering it, before launching definitely on this increased expenditure. ["Hear, hear!"]

General LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) said that in the matter of the proposed fortifications round London the Government were either going to do too much or too little. If they were going to build a few blockhouses round London they would lead the people to believe that there were fortifications on which they could depend. The experience of Paris did not commend itself as an example to be followed. He was very much afraid that they would be placing their dependence on these fortifications, and considering them rather than increasing the efficiency of their active forces. It seemed to him much more important to increase the efficiency of their Army than to devote themselves to fortifications. With regard to the proposal as to barracks, he must say he thought it was high time they did spend some money on them. The hon. Gentleman opposite complained that they were going to spend £3,000,000 at one time upon barracks, but he would point out that that was because they had been neglecting to spend money for so many years past. They had now to meet the neglect of all those years. He could not help thinking it was very desirable that they should purchase and own a ground for manœuvring. It was one of the great objections to Aldershot that after three or four years had been spent at that station everyone knew the ground and there was nothing fresh about it. If that was so, was there not the same danger if they purchased and had one fixed ground for training. While it was desirable to have a ground of their own for training, was it not important that their troops should go over new ground every year, and that they should be trained on ground which was unknown to them. He was thoroughly with the Under Secretary in the matter of decentralisation. He had seen great confusion arise simply because instead of decentralisation, instead of the officer commanding the troops being able to make his own arrangements for his stores, separate and independent bodies dealt with those stores. Let them have decentralisation and their Army would be much more efficient.

Mr. WILLIAM ALLAN (Gateshead) said it seemed to him that this money was requested on the assumption that forts were required for London. He held that the insular position of Great Britain rendered Great Britain practically invulnerable. Provided they could hold the seas, provided they could smash any fleet in the Channel or elsewhere with their fleet, there need be no fear of invasion. Then there was this point. No nation, he cared not what nation it was, could invade this country for the simple reason they had not got transport enough to carry the troops. Granted that their fleet was smashed up in the Channel what was their position? There was no need to invade the country at all. All the enemy had got to do was to block their ports and they would be "end up" in six weeks. They would be brought down to their knees by starvation. Grant that London was invested. He asked in all seriousness how long could they feed the population? He should have liked to see the Under Secretary bringing in something more practical. He quite agreed with the necessity of fortifications, but there was something far and away beyond that. Where were their national storehouses of food to feed their soldiers and their millions of inhabitants? They were beginning at the wrong end of the stick. He cared not for the money so long as it was for the safety of the Empire, but he held that a nation would go down if it could not feed its population and defend itself. He would have liked to see the advisers of the Under Secretary lay down a plan of large storehouses from which in case of invasion, they could feed the population. If they could not feed the population what was the use of their forts?

There would be no fear of invasion so long as we kept up a strong Navy and ample Naval reserves, though if it should come to pass that the nation generally had to take to soldiering, each man would shoulder his rifle and certainly make as good a soldier as the French conscript. But the weakness of Great Britain was that she could not supply national food for two months. What, then, was the use of spending all this money for forts around London? He did not object to spending money for necessary military works and barracks; he did not object to fortification of our coaling stations; indeed, he had advanced this in the House, and still thought that in the want of fortifications for our coaling stations was a source of weakness. But the military advisers of the Department were shortsighted in paying attention only to the southern coasts of England and Ireland. Why neglect the west coast of Scotland? Why not fortify some of those natural harbours we had—for instance at Mull, where a whole fleet could be hidden? Did not history tell of the not unsuccessful exploits of Paul Jones? As he had said before he said again—he knew no Party in this matter. ["Hear, hear!"] He had no objection to spending money to maintain the greatness of the Empire—he was a Radical Imperialist. ["Hear, hear!"] But the problem he commended to the consideration of the Department was how to provide national storehouses, how to feed our population in the event of a great war. ["Hear, hear!"]

Colonel WELBY (Taunton), as a practical soldier, realised the value of the announcement made by the Under Secretary and the grasp the right hon. Gentleman had shown of the requirements of the Army. Whether it be on his own initiative or as the mouthpiece of the Defence Committee, every practical soldier would be indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for his statement. ["Hear, hear!"] In his criticism of some of the details the hon. Member (Mr. Lough) seemed to have forgotten that new weapons had been invented that would carry three or four miles, and if the hon. Gentleman had any doubt of the range, let him spend his summer holiday two miles from these new weapons. As to the hon. Gentleman's remarks about martello towers, he should be aware that these were never intended for more than the prevention of the landing of a small foreign force, and no more intended to make a coast impregnable than the military canal through Romney Marsh was intended to make New Romney impregnable. He was glad to find it was intended to use a large portion of Salisbury Plain for the manœuvring of troops. Undoubtedly it would be better to manœuvre on fresh ground each year, but the objections and difficulties in doing this were well known. They must get what they could, and though it might become well known, a space of 40 miles square would be a useful ground.

*Mr. BRODRICK explained that he spoke of 40 square miles, not 40 miles square.

Colonel WELBY said the hon. Member for Great Yarmouth wished to have money spent in embarking troops, but in his experience this did not require much training. It would be well if it were possible to train troops not to suffer from sea-sickness. The hon. Member for Gateshead had dwelt upon what no doubt was the great difficulty in defending London, the finding of food for the population. If London were completely encircled and the port closed by a fleet, London would be starved, perhaps in a fortnight, being such a large place. But he would point out that there was a strategical possibility of the invasion of this country. There might be a fleet or combination of fleets sufficiently strong not to hold the whole of the seas, but to block the two ends of the British Channel. With a fleet at each end the waterway would be free, and an army could pass from France into England and an invasion might take place, while the rest of the sea might be sufficiently open for large convoys of provisions to come in which would enable this country to struggle against the invaders for a few weeks. The result of that struggle, he believed, would be that the foreigner would be hurled back across the seas. He thought, with regard to the item for barracks, that the words which had fallen from the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, should be considered by everybody. He did not know that there was any other Member in the House who had such a wonderful and intimate knowledge of the details of the army and navy, and of foreign armies and the larger principle of organisation. The right hon. Baronet had pointed out that this money, which was to be devoted to the defence of London and the building of barracks, should be expended in a systematic way. They had got no organisation at the present time. Surely it could not be that in this country they had got no organiser of sufficient capacity to work out a scheme to which they could look forward in the future. They could not perhaps, find all the money for carrying out the scheme immediately, but they could have the details and principles of it and work up to it. With regard to the spending of money on the fortification of London, the Under Secretary said that he looked upon it as part of a large scheme of decentralisation. He seemed to look upon it as a system of building some fortified camps round London which were going to be centres of organisation, and therefore, decentralisation of the present system. It seemed to him, however, not so much decentralisation as extension of the centralisation which existed at the present time. Whatever it be, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would look carefully into the question and see whether the money to be devoted to the defence of London and the building of barracks could not be spent in a systematic way. The problem of organisation was a difficult and complicated one to face, but there must be military advisers of the Crown who could work out a real system to which they could look forward in the future. If the money was spent with regard to such a scheme as that, he could only say that any objection which he had to this small amount of money being spent on the defence of London—he believed insufficient because it would only repel a very small invasion—would be instantly removed.

*MR. WEIR, while congratulating the right hon. Gentleman on his statement thought it would have been much better had it been published and placed in the hands of hon. Members some time before the discussion came on. He complained that the right hon. Gentleman and his advisers had not paid sufficient attention to the West Coast of Scotland, which was in need of more adequate protection. An enemy's ships at the present time could very easily make an entrance through the North West Coast of Scotland. At present there was nothing to prevent an enemy's ships from gaining access to the Pentland Firth, and steps ought to be taken to strengthen the ports on the north west side of Scotland, so that they might be available for naval purposes. He was glad that provision was to be made for the erection of better quarters for our soldiers than wooden huts. Too many of the existing huts were insanitary, rotten, and worm-eaten. It was also well that there should be an improvement in married soldiers' quarters. He approved of the proposed expenditure on rifle ranges. Ranges for the new Lee-Metford rifle were wanted all over the country. If there were only a few such ranges, the cost of conveying men to the places where the ranges were situated would in the long run cost more than the £500,000 now asked for. The item of the proposed expenditure which was open to criticism, was the sum allocated to the defence of London. It was too small for effective purposes, and, instead of their present plan, the Military Authorities might just as well surround London with a number of ginger beer bottles filled with powder. To expend only £96,000 on the defence of London would be simply playing with the question. Effective defences would cost eight or nine millions. To prepare defences for London similar to those that existed round Paris at the time of the German siege would be of very little use.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

LAW OF EVIDENCE (CRIMINAL CASES.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st January], "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases."—(The Attorney General.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) asked what were the intentions of the Government with regard to Ireland in these cases?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight) said he would consult the Attorney General for Ireland and the Chief Secretary as to whether any exception could be made in the case of Ireland.

Question put, and agreed to; Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Attorney General, Secretary Sir Matthew White Ridley, and the Solicitor General.

Bill presented accordingly, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Monday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 101.]

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (IRELAND) ACT (1885) AMENDMENT BILL.

MR. T. M. HEALY, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, explained that it was intended to settle a difference which had arisen between two Judicial Commissioners of great eminence in Ireland as to certain intentions of a pious founder in an educational endowment. As the Act was at present drawn there were no means of settling this difference and bringing it to a close. He was quite willing to accept the suggestion that the difference between the two Judges should be remitted in the first place to the Irish Privy Council, a body which would have to settle the scheme finally. But in any case it was absurd to allow the Act to remain a dead letter. He moved that the Bill be now read a Second time.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central) said the Government were not opposed to the principle of the Bill. He was by no means certain that the method proposed for settling the question was the best that could be suggested, and he should reserve on the part of the Government the right after Second Reading to move extensive Amendments, and, if it should turn out that the Bill as it stood could not be amended in the sense the Government desired, he should further reserve the right to oppose the Bill at a later stage.

*MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) was sorry the Government had given its assent to the Second Reading. This was another attempt to meddle with Protestant endowments in Ireland. Erasmus Smith made a certain endowment for a number of Protestant children in Ireland, and the matter was before two eminent Judges, the Protestant Judge taking one view and the Roman Catholic Judge another view, and the result was that the endowment remained as it was originally intended by the will of the founder. He trusted the Government would pause before they inflicted another blow upon, and fresh discouragement to, the loyal people in Ireland who had done their utmost to uphold the union and integrity of the Empire.

Bill read a Second time and commited for Monday next.

UNLAWFUL POSSESSION BILL.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question proposed [26th January.] "That the Bill be now read a Second time."

Question again proposed.—Debate resumed.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid) said the Bill contained a dangerous principle, because it proposed to change the Criminal Law, and that without discussion in the House. It introduced for the first time, with perhaps one exception, the principle that a man must prove his innocence; whereas the cardinal principle of the English Criminal Law was that every man charged with crime must be taken to be innocent until his guilt had been proved by process of law. The possible exception to this cardinal principle was a recent decision of the Judges to the effect that once it has been proved that any property has been stolen, then if anybody is in recent possession of it, the duty is cast upon him of showing how he came into such possession. That was a sufficient safeguard against any crime on the part of a receiver, but here it was proposed, not by the Government but by a private Member, that before anything was proved to have been stolen at all, anybody might be charged, with having in his possession or conveying anything which might be reasonably suspected of being stolen or unlawfully obtained, and without appeal, sentenced to a term of imprisonment. The Bill also imposed a penalty on anyone who might be reasonably suspected of having "unlawfully obtained" goods. Where were those words to be met with in the criminal law? It was only under the game laws that a man could be punished under suspicion; and it was too much to ask the House nowadays to extend the principle of legislation passed when every Member of the House was a game preserver. To read the Bill a Second time would be to affirm an objectionable principle, which could not be eliminated in Grand Committee. He hoped the Attorney General would say that this dangerous amendment of the criminal law ought not to be made on the motion of a private Member.

SIR BENJAMIN STONE said that this was not a new enactment. The provisions of the Bill were already in force in Manchester, Liverpool and other large towns. It was simply convenient to make the law of general application.

MR. REES DAVIES (Pembrokeshire), said that he had been asked by the chief constable of his county to communicate with the hon. Gentleman as to the provisions of the Bill. But unless the Bill received the assent of the Attorney General it would be extremely dangerous for the House to give to it a Second Reading, as it involved a serious change in the Criminal Law of the Country. The onus of proof was shifted from the Crown to the prisoner. It would very much enlarge the powers of the police, and might render possible a system of police espionage—he invited the Attorney General to give his opinion on it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said that he was not satisfied that this was an amendment of the law which ought to be made at the instigation of a private Member. He had always held that alterations of the criminal law ought to be made on the responsibility of the Government. But, on the other hand, what the Bill proposed was already the law in London, Liverpool, and other towns, and it was supposed by the promoters that there was a need for the extension of that law. He did not approve of the drafting of the Bill; but the Home Secretary had promised to consider this subject to see if an alteration of the law were desirable; and certainly, by reading this Bill a Second time the Government would not be bound to assent to the principle of the Measure.

MR. W. E. M. TOMLINSON (Preston) thought it startling to be told that in London and other towns, by means of private Acts, clauses had been inserted which really gave a scope to the criminal law wider than that of the general law of the land. The introduction of a Bill of this kind showed the need that existed for exercising a close watch over the Bills introduced by private Members which proposed to make changes in the law. Unless that strict scrutiny was observed it might happen that different towns would have different codes of law.

MR. LOUGH thought that hon. Gentlemen opposite ought to take care that their Bills were in a proper shape before they submitted them to the House. But the Attorney General had not only condemned the bad drafting of the Bill, but laid down two propositions—first, that the principle of the Bill was one that the House should not be asked to accept hastily; and secondly, that it was not right that a Bill proposing a change in the law should be introduced by a private Member. These were weighty pronouncements, and he wondered they had not led to the immediate withdrawal of the Bill. They had had some experience in Ireland of persons being prosecuted on suspicion. It was now proposed to introduce that principle into England and Wales. It was very difficult for anyone to get through life without being suspected of something or another. [Laughter.] Even hon. Members were constantly suspected of having bad motives behind everything they did. [Laughter.] He therefore thought the Bill was one that should never have been introduced.

MR. REGINALD McKENNA (Monmouth, N.) said the only point that had been made on behalf of the Bill was that it would make the law uniform all over the country—that the main clause of the Bill already existed in many local Acts. But that was not quite correct. When the Committee on Police and Sanitary Regulations passed the clause in respect to London, they knew that any cases that might arise would come before the police magistrates. In this Bill the authority was not a police magistrate, or a stipendiary magistrate, but it applied to all cases which might come before an ordinary justice of the peace. By it a working man who was walking along a country road with a hare in his hand might be suspected by a policeman of poaching, and taken before a justice of the peace whose property had recently suffered from poaching depredations. In this way the workman, who might have bought the hare from a friend—[laughter]—might be unjustly and summarily convicted and sent to prison.

*MR. PATRICK M'HUGH (Leitrim N.) said it appeared to him this Bill introduced a rather extraordinary innovation in criminal law.

MR. DUNCOMBE rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but MR. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put the Question.

Mr. Lough.

*MR. PATRICK M'HUGH said the hon. Member for South Tyrone, in last October, told them that he would not like to see Ireland in the position of Lazarus, appealing for crumbs at the gate of Dives. Was this crumb to be refused to Ireland? If it were as good as its supporters said, why not extend it to Ireland? He held it was a bad Bill. They knew a great deal about reasonable suspicions in Ireland, and many people in that country had been unreasonably suspected and had served long terms of imprisonment under the Coercion Act. What was unjustly enforced in Ireland might be unjustly enforced in England. Many people would not be able to explain how they got possession of certain articles which were found upon them. It would be impossible for the people of this country to be sure that great injustice would not be done in many instances, as they would have to rely on the discretion of the policeman. The discretion of the police in Ireland was sometimes very small, but small as it was it was superior to that of the police in this country, as the Celtic race was admittedly superior to the Saxon in intelligence. [Laughter.] He ventured to think that some of the rural justices before whom these cases would come were rather stupid and they were a selfish class. He appealed to the hon. Gentleman opposite not to do away with the right of a citizen to be tried by twelve of his peers. [Ministerial laughter.] It was the right of every freeborn citizen to be deemed innocent until he was proved to be guilty. It was not a right they had always enjoyed in Ireland. But a discussion of affairs in Ireland would not be germane to the Motion. [Ministerial laughter.] It would be a fatal blow to the recognised rights of citizens of this Empire if, by a Bill of this kind, the liberty of the subject were left to the discretion of a policeman or a rural justice. He was surprised that a Member of the Party which were supposed —wrongfully in his own opinion—[laughter]—to be the bulwark of law and order should get up and try to force through a Bill like this in opposition to the opinion of the English Attorney General. What was the good of having an Attorney General—[loud Ministerial laughter]—and paying him a large salary; also a Solicitor General? [Renewed laughter.] Why should the country be asked, and the Irish people especially, to contribute to the sustenance of these gentlemen, when they found, on a grave and vital question such as this, the opinions of those grave and learned seignors—[loud laughter]—were not accepted by their followers?

MR. FORTESCUE FLANNERY (Yorks, Shipley) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put," but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.—Debate resumed:—

*MR. PATRICK M'HUGH said that, supposing he had in his possession a box of cigars or cigarettes he did not wish to account for—[laughter]—was he to be hauled before a magistrate because a policeman took it into his head to unreasonably suspect him? [Renewed laughter.] The policeman might not be able to understand the position in which he found himself, and he might be sent to the common gaol. If this Bill were passed many respectable men and ladies—[laughter]—might be sent to the common gaol, and—

MR. J. W. MACLURE (Lancs, Stretford) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put," but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.—Debate resumed.

*MR. PATRICK M'HUGH: And compelled to associate with burglars and wife beaters. It would be a disgrace to the House and to the party of law and order if such a Bill were passed.

The hon. Member was speaking at Twelve o'clock, when the Debate was adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Monday next.

SHOPS (EARLY CLOSING) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

KITCHEN AND REFRESHMENT ROOMS (HOUSE OF COMMONS) COMMITTEE.

SIR WILLIAM WALROND (Devon, Tiverton) moved:—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to control the arrangements for the Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, in the Department of the Serjeant-at-Arms attending this House; that the Committee do consist of 17 Members; that Mr. James Bailey, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Richard Cavendish, Mr. Cochrane, Mr. Thomas Curran, Mr. Horatio Davies, General Goldsworthy, Mr. Jacoby, Mr. Kearley, Mr. Lafone, Mr. Llewellyn, Colonel Lockwood, Mr. Macdona, Mr. Lloyd Morgan, Mr. P. J. Power, Mr. William Redmond, and Lord Stanley, be Members of the Committee."

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said that he wished to put a question to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General with regard to what the hon. and learned Gentleman himself had declared to be the illegal practice of selling intoxicating liquors at the bars in that building. He wanted to know what had been done with regard to the matter since the hon. and learned Gentleman had made his statement on the subject, when he informed the House that he had looked into the law relating to it, and had found that the sale of drink at the bars was thoroughly illegal. That was a week ago, and yet he had not heard of anybody having been arrested and taken before the Court. Neither had he heard that the Inland Revenue had taken any proceedings in the matter. It was not right for this sort of thing to be allowed to go on without there being any legal right to sell drink in the building. He wished to know what was going to be done in the matter.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight) said that the statement of the hon. Baronet was quite correct, and he could only repeat what he had already said—namely, that as the sale of liquor in the House was now carried on it was not according to law, but he said it was obvious that no action could be taken in the matter until the Kitchen Committee was appointed. Several courses would be open to them. They might say it was desirable to confine the sale of liquor in the House solely to Members of the House, in which case a very large question would arise in point of law. They might, however, think it convenient that liquor should be sold to witnesses and others attending the House, and come to the conclusion that the existing practice, which had been working for upwards of 60 years, should be legalised. And again, they might decide to make a change with regard to the way in which the sale was carried on. The matter had not been overlooked, and he was in communication with the Home Secretary, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and some of the proposed members of the Committee with regard to it.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to control the arrangements for the Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms in the department of the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of seventeen Members.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of,—Mr. James Bailey, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Richard Cavendish, Mr. Cochrane, Mr. Thomas Curran, Mr. Horatio Davies, General Goldsworthy, Mr. Jacoby, Mr. Kearley, Mr. Lafone, Mr. Llewellyn, Colonel Lockwood, Mr. Macdona, Mr. Lloyd Morgan, Mr. P. J. Power, Mr. William Redmond, and Lord Stanley.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.—(Sir William Walrond.)

Attorney General.

INDUSTRIES (IRELAND).

Bill to afford facilities for the establishment and development of Industries in Ireland, Ordered to be brought in by Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Patrick Aloysius M'Hugh, Mr. Lough, and Mr. Knox; presented accordingly, and read the First time; to be read a Second time upon Wednesday, 10th March, and to be printed.—[Bill 102.]

BRITISH TRADE AND FOREIGN COMPETITION.

On the Motion for the Adjournment of the House,

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked the President of the Board of Trade how it was that the Report on British Trade and Foreign Competition, prepared by Sir Courtenay Boyle, the Permanent Secretary to the Board of Trade, on "The Comparative Statistics of Population, Industry and Commerce in the United Kingdom and some leading foreign countries," which was laid yesterday upon the Table of the House, had appeared in The Times of that day, while hon. Members were unable to obtain a copy? He wished also to know when the Report would be in the hands of hon. Members.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon) said that he did not know how the Report came to be published in The Times. Had he sent out the Report he should have seen that it was sent to all the newspapers. He was unable to say when the Report, which was in the hands of the printers, could be furnished to hon. Members, but no time would be lost in the matter.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at Ten minutes after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, 1st February 1897.

ROLL OF THE LORDS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House that the Clerk of the Parliaments had prepared and laid it on the Table; the same was ordered to be printed.—[No. 5.]

THOMPSON'S DIVORCE BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to dissolve the marriage of Agnes Weir Thompson, the wife of Abraham Thompson, of Belfast, in the county of Antrim, solicitor, with the said Abraham Thompson, and to enable her to marry again, and for other purposes: Presented (on petition), and a copy of the proceedings in and of the decree of divorce of the Probate and Matrimonial Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland, delivered (on oath); Bill read 1ª; and to be read 2ª on Tuesday the 2nd of March next. The usual orders were made.

COMPANIES BILL [H.L.].

A Bill to amend the Companies Act was presented by the Earl of Dudley; read 1ª; and to be printed.—[No. 7.]

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE (WOMEN) BILL [H.L.].

A Bill for extending the Parliamentary franchise to women, was presented by the Viscount Templetown; read 1ª, and to be printed.—[No. 8.]

INDIAN FAMINE.

*LORD KINNAIRD rose to ask Her Majesty's Government what were the number of relief camps at present established in the famine districts in India, and at what distance they were situated apart; whether the Government could state how often each relief camp was visited by a British official or other European member of committee; whether they could furnish statistics showing the increase of mortality in the famine districts during the past few months; whether the Indian Government were taking any measures to store grain in remote districts more than 30 miles from a railway or large navigable river; whether the Government still declined to store and sell grain, and resolved to leave the safety of such remote tracts to the action of private individuals; whether such a policy of abstention was not essayed both in Orissa in 1866 and in Southern India in 1877; and whether the result was not in both cases that the price mounted to five and, in some cases, ten times their ordinary figure, followed by uncontrollable calamity and hundreds and thousands of deaths. He said that he wished to refer shortly to the experience gained in past famines, especially in the famine of 1877. In that year it appeared > "that prices were quoted week after week at five and six times and even eight times those ordinarily current, yet the same cold meaningless formulas were week after week published, 'supply sufficient,' 'supply middling,' 'supply fair,' 'supply plentiful,' 'supply enough.' As if this could by any possibility be the case contemporaneously with a continuation of such prices. In only one district, Kaladgi, was it occasionally hinted that the supply was defective. Early in January, 1877, the prices there were quadrupled."

Yet no steps were taken by the Government to import food.

> "The month of August found the Viceroy officially announcing that the price of food averaged five times, in many parts eight times, that of ordinary years; it was admitted that success had not attended the efforts to save life. Success indeed had become impossible in the face of that one cardinal error of non-importation. The Madras Relief Committee was then telegraphing to the Lord Mayor. 'Middle classes exhausted, owing to famine prices,' and even in towns and centres of civilisation, those below the middle classes were dying in thousands. In the one district of Salem half-a-million persons were missing, the greater majority of whom had perished from starvation. In the more distressed parts of Madras it was officially admitted that probably about 20 per cent. of the population had disappeared, and in those of Bombay about 12 per cent. It was, at the close of the famine, officially recorded that in 25 distressed taluks: 10 in Bombay, and 15 in Madras—855,000 persons out of a population of less than five millions were missing."

These records showed that the questions standing in his name on the Paper, referred to a subject which called for immediate attention. In paragraph 42 of the Famine Code, it was laid down that—

> "Only in very exceptional cases, and in the last resort, will Government take direct action to import grain, and Government will not interfere with private trade, so long as that trade is able and willing to place food at reasonable prices, within the reach of the distressed people. If compelled to interfere because grain is not in, or is withheld from a local market, Government will do so only until the ordinary course of trade is restored."

It seemed that Government did not contemplate taking any steps merely on the ground of high prices. Thus, if again, as in 1877, prices should rise to five or six times that of a good year, and should be impossible for the great majority, and if at the same time, as in 1877, supplies should be officially returned as "sufficient, plentiful, fair," no action would be taken. Nor did it seem that Government would take action in any case save in "very exceptional cases and in the last resort." If Government was to wait for that stage, and only then to set about making purchases in distant lands, how were the people to subsist during the month or six weeks that would certainly elapse between the inception of Government action, and the arrival of the grain in remote parts? Those parts would always be the ones most difficult of access, to which transport would take longest. It was only by being already prepared, by having stores available in remote parts to be drawn upon at once on the occurrence of such a condition of things, that a disaster could be averted. And high prices should be an essential element in deciding Government when to open its stores. If it were when importing to declare that its price would be 18 lbs. per rupee (a price never yet exceeded for long without a grievous calamity) and that it would never move from that, private trade would have a degree of security and certainty concerning its operation which now with "corners" and "rigging" it had not. So much merchants admitted; but they were terrified at the idea of Government changing its rate from time to time—a fatal policy. Government had, in accordance with the policy thus laid down in its Famine Code, refrained from importation and sale. It had at the same time assembled huge masses of people on to its works—in some cases about 30,000 on a work of no very great extent. The only provision the Code made for securing that the money wage paid these workers could procure grain, was this:—

> "One or more contractors may be appointed for each circle by the collector."

But this contractor was not a salaried servant, and he, himself a local grain dealer, could surrender at a moment's notice. There was nothing to prevent him from breaking his contract, and leaving the labourers one morning with nothing to eat. There was nothing to prevent him from doing this at any moment in case of a combination among dealers. Of course he might be proceeded against in the Civil Courts, but of what avail would litigation of that sort be in saving life? Two mornings ago, Reuter's agent reported from Bijapur, a work with 5,000 persons on it where no provisions were supplied, the labourers having to come into Bijapur, six miles, to effect the necessary purchases. And so far, we were only at the beginning of the difficulties. The Secretary of State in his Dispatch of 15th Jan. 1897, recognised that, in October last, in 74 districts the cheapest kinds of grain were dearer than 20 lbs. per rupee. He anticipated that distress would increase till April, possibly to the end of May, and would not subside till August or September. He approved the decision of the Indian Government "to abstain from any interference with the operations of the grain trade," and added—

> "its operations, so long as they are effective, must not be subjected to competition by Government agency."

No one would for a moment suggest anything else than what was contained in this last sentence; but it was where, by absence of supplies or by impossible prices, private trade showed that its operations were not effective, that Government must sell if a whole population was not either to starve or to be brought on to the relief works, and the calamity was to be checked from becoming uncontrollable. If that was so, it followed necessarily, that Government must be already prepared with its stores on the spot, which stores it must have already imported from distant lands. As yet, no steps had been taken in that direction. The supplies of these distant lands had apparently not yet been drawn on for the wants of India.

> "I don't gather that supplies of food are yet coming into the distressed districts from Burma, Madras or Siam," wrote the Secretary of State on the 15th January, 1897. The reason was natural enough. Prices in those parts had already, owing to demands which India was ordinarily wont to supply, risen much; they left but a narrow margin for the private traders' profit after damage and freight had been paid; and then there were the further risks of the grain not proving popular (a risk which the intimate knowledge of Government officials would go far to obviate), the difficulty of carriage into remote parts, and a hundred other difficulties which it required a very large possible profit to encourage a private trader to face. The results so far of the present policy on this point had been that, in accordance with the prophecy of the Lieut.-Governor of the North-West Provinces on the 30th September, prices had been—

> "driven up altogether out of the reach of large numbers of the poorer ryots (cultivators with holdings of their own), agricultural labourers, artisans and others."

They had been thrown on the hands of the Government for relief. Others would gradually be swept into the spreading vortex. On the 23rd November he reported "prices phenomenally high, and prices of coarsest and best food grains approximating as they do in famines." Prices had in many parts of the afflicted districts for three months not been more favourable than 16 and 17 lbs. per rupee. These presumably were the official prices of the grain markets; in the remote parts they would, if that were so, be much higher. The numbers on relief had risen to two millions, showing thus early great and widespread exhaustion among classes who should have stood out much longer. On the 28th October 1896, the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces wrote:—

> "With exhausted stocks deficient harvests, and the pressure of a load o lebt, which had steadily grown during the succession of unfavourable years, it is not surprising that the feeling of the agricultural population should be one of great despondency, almost of despair, and that the position of the landless classes should cause the gravest anxiety."

From Behar in October, combinations of grain dealers were reported—they withheld supplies for some days. The Lieut.-Governor of the Punjab in November reported combinations of grain dealers and rising prices. The Lieut.-Governor of Bengal on November 18th sent a long report to the Government of India, dealing more especially with the condition of Behar. Contrasting it with the Behar of 1874, when there was the famine, he pointed out the enormous spread of railways throughout the province of Behar in the last 20 years (589 miles as against 147) and added—

> "But though there are many grounds for confidence which did not exist in 1873-74, the fact cannot be overlooked that there are also fresh grounds for anxiety. Prices of food grains have steadily risen during the past two years, and are now higher than they ever have been before; this fact, coupled with the facts already mentioned, that wages have not risen proportionally to prices; that the purchasing power of the poorer classes has therefore, been steadily diminishing, and is now less than ever it was; that whereas in former years of scarcity prices were kept down by importation from the North Western Provinces and lower Bengal, in the present year, supplies from these sources cannot be confidently relied upon—are all circumstances that give fresh cause for anxiety, which had no existence in 1873-74."

The Lieut.-Governor proceeded to remark that it was estimated that there was a deficit of 550,000 tons of grain in Behar for the year's provision, and while hoping that this estimate might prove exaggerated, he added—

> "if private trade does not step in in time to supply the deficit, there may be at any time a panic, and a sudden rise in prices. The question whether private trade will do all that is required is in reality the crux of the situation."

He pointed out, that to relieve the situation, the importations must come from beyond the sea (this, two months later the Secretary of State said, had not been done)—

> "Because the high prices in Eastern Bengal, and the indications of distress already existing in districts that were always considered free from risk of scarcity, show that little reliance can be placed on supplies from within the province of Bengal."

He laid great stress on the loophole in the Famine Commissioners' Report :—

> "A resolution to rely on the ordinary operations of trade to meet the wants of the country, unquestionably rests, not only on the activity of traders, but also on the probability of the requisite supplies of food being forthcoming at the critical time."
>
> "They admitted—" he added—"that there may be cases in which Government interference is admissible, such as for the purpose of providing food required for payment of wages on relief works, and distribution of gratuitous relief stimulating trade when it is sluggish or fails to act, or grain dealers combine and refuse to sell."

The conclusion he arrived at was—

> "That there is ground for confidence that the food wants of the provinces will be met by private trade."

These hopes he built on anticipated importations from Burma, importations which two months later the Secretary of State pointed out had not taken place. He added—

> "It is necessary to repeat that, in view of the unparalleled highness of prices, and of extent of the area over which there has been shortness of crops throughout India, the situation as regards the food supply is not free, even in Bengal, from elements of doubt and anxiety."

These doubts should now have become intensified. It appeared that in parts of three of the Behar districts, Champaran, Mozuffirput, and Darbhanga, communications were still defective. These were generally large exporting districts, and were therefore without any native machinery for import. Exports, arranged for beforehand in all probability, were in November still going forward there, though it was in these parts the failure had been greatest, and prices were between 15 and 18 lbs. per rupee. The planters of Mozufferpur were arranging for importing 1,500 tons of rice from Rangoon for sale on easy terms to their villagers. The Maharaja of Darbhanga was similarly arranging for 5,000 tons for sale on favourable terms to his tenants ; but inasmuch as this was being bought locally, it might have had the undesirable effect of shortening supplies in the markets and raising prices. These gentlemen, so intimately acquainted with the wants of the peasantry on their estates acted thus so far back as November, and they could only have done so from the knowledge that private trade was not, and would not place grain in the market at possible prices. They knew, as all experience showed, that to store and sell grain to the peasantry at possible prices was the best, and indeed the only way of staving off an almost universal destitution. The Government, who in India was more emphatically than in any other country the one great landlord still declined to move in this direction. These gentlemen were no more grain dealers than the Government was ; but close acquaintance with the necessities of the case compelled them to turn to. Of one district, Khulna, in Lower Bengal, the Lieut.-Governor, on the 20th November, reported that he had just heard from the Commissioner that relief must be started in one sub-division, that the price of rice in the bazaars was 12 to 14 lbs. per rupee, and that these were merely fancy prices as the grain was not forthcoming in any quantities even at that price :—

Lord Kinnaird.

> "If the state of things is so bad in Khulna, with its abundant waterways and its proximity to Calcutta, it is only probable that the condition of things in more distant places may be equally bad."

As to the chance of private trade doing all that was required, which was to keep prices down, even in the most out-of-the-way parts to a rate not dearer than 18 lbs. of common food per rupee, which all experience showed must not be passed, and cannot long be passed, without an uncontrollable calamity, the following are not unimportant considerations. Wheat and rice were probably the main food stuffs in question—rice in the more eastern and southern of the affected districts, wheat in those more to the north-west. The Lieut.-Governor of Bengal, with the best information before him, wrote to the Government of India on the 18th November as follows :—

> "Cargoes of Californian wheat of 4,000 to 5,000 tons each can be landed in Calcutta at Rs. 5 to Rs. 5.1 per maund. Offers for such cargoes to arrive in two months or more are not higher than Rs. 4.10 to Rs. 4.11 a fact which indicates, in the opinion of merchants, the price of wheat will not in Calcutta rise beyond Rs. 4.10 to 4.11 within the next two months."

But these were wholesale and not retail prices; the retail price in Calcutta, to admit of any profit at that time, would be quite Rs. 5 per maund, or 16 lbs. per rupee. It appeared from the above that Californian wheat could not be imported at a less cost than Rs. 5 per maund at the seaboard, which would mean quite Rs. 5. 8. before reaching the railway stations in the North West, and Rs. 6 before penetrating into the remote parts. Then a profit would have to be made by the retail vendor, and his risks had to be covered, so that Rs. 6½ was probably the price at which private trade could afford to import and retail wheat in the interior of the North West Provinces. This would mean about 12 lbs per rupee. As to rice, the same authority on the same date wrote that new coarse Burma rice (which was not much in favour) could be obtained at Rangoon (for delivery in two months or later) at Rs 3. 8. per maund, or Rs. 4. 8. at Calcutta. This would mean quite Rs. 5 at any central railway station in Behar, and quite Rs. 6 before the retail vendor in remote parts could hope to secure a profit. That would be about 13½ lbs. per rupee. Thus, so far as he could see, there was no chance, and since November there had been no chance, of private trade being able to import and retail the grain in common use at such a price as was possible for the people, or as could possibly hope to stave off the spread of a calamity which threatened to become almost universal. In this connection too it must be remembered that, as Sir Lepel Griffin pointed out the other day in a letter to The Times, the savings of the cultivators of India were always largely invested in the silver ornaments of their women. These formed their savings bank. Hitherto, in all famine times, these had been turned into rupees for the purchase of grain. The price they had fetched in rupees had been the value of the silver. Now things were different. The Government by closing the mints had put the rupee 25 p.c. above the value of the silver it contained, and the cultivator now, in order to get 4 rupees, would have to sell the silver of five. His means of purchasing were thus materially reduced, and the 18 lb. price of which he had spoken as one which previous experience showed could not be materially passed, became now, owing to the above circumstance, all the more emphatically so. The Secretary of State, in his Dispatch of January 15 to the Viceroy, stated :—

> "I do not gather that supplies of food are yet coming from Burma, Madras, or Siam," but added, "I question if Indian prices are as yet high enough to attract wheat or corn maize from the West."

Thus it would seem certain that private trade would not in the present distress move to help materially by importation of foreign grain except prices for common grain in the interior rose to about 12 or 13 lbs. per rupee. But this was a price which must at all hazards be prevented. It could only be prevented at a loss to the importers; and Government was alone the importer who could afford the loss, and who was bound to incur it.

*The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (The Earl of Onslow) said he was sorry that he could not give the noble Lord any information as to the exact number of relief camps in existence. He could say, however, that each relief work was under a responsible officer who visited that relief work constantly. The numbers engaged on the relief works varied from 100 or 200 to 28,000 or 30,000, and some of those works were under the charge of the local zemindars, who did most excellent service in a recent famine. The Government had certain statistics as to the mortality in certain districts of the Jabalpur division, and these showed that there was a large mortality in some of the autumn months of last year due mainly to cholera or fever, but that mortality had been decreasing. They had desired the Government of India to supply information, shortly and roughly as it must necessarily be, from time to time whenever there was any considerable increase of mortality above the normal. As to measures for the storage of grain, it was perfectly true that it was the policy of former Governments for a short time to import themselves grain into the distressed districts, but the result of that was found to be unsatisfactory in the famine of 1876. Towards the close of the year—the Government ceased to import grain into the districts, and the consequence was that as soon as Government competition had disappeared the private traders were encouraged to take up and continue their operations, and at one time no less than 4,000 tons a day were poured into the famine districts until the railways were carrying as much as it was possible for them to carry. With the experience which the Government of India had of several famines they had determined to lay down the principle that they would not interfere with private trade so long as private trade was able to supply the necessities of the people. Cases were described as exceptional in the Famine Codes, one of which was published in the Blue-book in which it was the duty of the Government, and one which they recognised, to intervene. They recognised that food must be provided at relief works, that trade must be stimulated where it was sluggish by guaranteeing prices or advancing money to traders, and where there was a combination among traders not to sell at normal prices the Government might intervene, but save in those exceptional cases the Government of India were satisfied that the requirements of the situation could be met, as far as could be seen in the immediate future, by the action of private traders. The noble Lord was, no doubt, aware that the Local Governments in the different provinces had full power to act in those exceptional cases whenever they arose within their districts. The noble Lord had stated that the present famine was of exceptional severity, and that it had spread over a wider area than any previous famine. It was perfectly true, at any rate so far as the extent of the area was concerned; but he thought the noble Lord would agree that upon no former occasion had the Government of India been in so favourable a position owing to the wise foresight of those who laid down the Famine Codes for dealing with so widespread a calamity. He assured the noble Lord that, although a new condition of affairs had arisen inasmuch as the stocks of grain in India were likely to be drawn upon to the fullest possible extent, and it was possible that it might be necessary to import grain from outside, the Secretary of State and the Government of India were giving the most careful attention to the whole subject, and the remarks of the noble Lord would not be lost sight of. The Government of India would be the last persons to desire that their lordships should refrain from criticism of their action, but he expressed a hope that in this unexampled and double calamity which had fallen on India the Viceroy and his advisers might have the support of their lordships on both sides of the House. He was satisfied that if they were successful in combating this great evil they would establish a greater claim even than the remembrance of our military prowess or naval supremacy on the loyalty and affection of the people of India. ["Hear, hear!"]

*THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: I am sure my noble Friend who introduced this subject was quite justified in doing so, because there can be no doubt of the magnitude of the calamity which affects our Indian Empire, and of the great difficulties with which the Government of India has to contend in meeting it. The question whether it is desirable or otherwise for the Government to interfere with trade for the purchase and storage of grain in affected parts of the country, is perhaps one of the most difficult administrative questions with which any Government can have to deal. Speaking generally, the more trade is left untrammelled the greater the probability of meeting the demand for grain or any other article in any country, and that general principle undoubtedly applies to India. The greater extent of railways, which now exists makes it far more easy for trade to meet the demand in different parts of India than was the case 23 years ago. At that time it was necessary to import considerable supplies of rice into the northern parts of Bengal. That was done by the Government of the day because, from the best information they could obtain, there was no probability whatever of trade dealing with the difficulty, and the result was satisfactory. It did not interfere with trade in other parts of the country, and the people were supplied with food. But what I wish to say on the present occasion is that I conceive this to be a matter which may be confidently and safely left to the discretion of the Government of India. ["Hear, hear!"] They have a great, an almost overwhelming, responsibility placed upon their shoulders. It seems to me, having read the Blue-book, that they have taken every precaution in their power to obtain the fullest information as to the food supplies, and that they are prepared to act with promptitude supposing it becomes necessary to take steps by the Government for the importation of food supplies into any part of the country. I happen to be personally acquainted with the Lieutenant-Governors of Bengal, of the North-West Provinces, and of the Punjab, three districts in which the greatest distress is anticipated, and I can assure your lordships that no three officers in the service of the Crown can be better able to cope with a difficulty of this or of any other description, and I have the most complete confidence that they will act with energy and promptitude. I desire also to express my opinion, as far as I am able to judge, that the full confidence of the people of this country may be placed in Lord Elgin and in those who are assisting him, and I do not think that any action of your Lordships is required by the circumstances of the case or is in any respect desirable. [Cheers.]

*LORD WENLOCK said that although he had lately returned from a part of India where, he was thankful to say, there was at present very slight distress, yet the noble Lord who introduced the subject had raised a question on which he thought he was able to throw a little light. In 1891-92, in the Presidency of Madras, they were threatened with a very serious state of affairs, arising from great scarcity of water, and naturally at that time the Government's attention was drawn most particularly to the question of the supply of grain to the impoverished districts. From all quarters the Government was constantly asked to take up the question itself and deal with it; but the conclusion it arrived at was that any interference with the food trade would be more likely to work harm than good. He often came across cases where "rings" or "corners" were made by the grain merchants, not only to keep up the price of grain, but to hold it back till prices reached a much higher figure, and on every occasion it was found that some private individual, or perhaps a syndicate of philanthropic and charitable persons, merely by sending up a truck or two of grain, was able at once to restore the balance of prices and to keep them steady throughout the whole country. That was by for the soundest course that could be adhered to. He was convinced the Governments of the various provinces were watching those points most narrowly, and if at any time it was found that private trade was not able to meet the requirements of the case, then and then only would the Government step in and do the work which the noble Lord wished them to do at once. He mentioned these facts because his experience was a recent one.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I cannot speak at all with the experience of my noble Friend Lord Northbrook, or that of the noble Lord who has been Governor of Madras, but I merely wish to echo the feeling which Lord Northbrook has expressed—that in this great calamity we must trust to the Government of India to take the necessary measures. [Cheers.] All those who have been connected with the administration of Indian affairs must be aware that there is no subject which has received more close and continuous attention than the dealing with famine, and never has the Government of India been so well prepared as it now is to cope with a calamity of this kind. Not only has a most elaborate code, founded upon experience of former famines, been drawn up, but, what is most material, in the course of the long period during which there has been no serious famine in India, there has been created a number of railways, generally known as famine lines, and by these means, to a great extent, the very serious difficulties which formerly existed in the way of carrying food to the people, because of there being no means of transport, have been overcome. I am sanguine that everything will be done that can possibly be done, although from the very magnitude of the calamity it will be impossible to prevent much privation and terrible suffering. I greatly lament that so great a calamity should be accompanied also with a threatened extension of the bubonic plague which has broken out in Bombay. If that plague should, unhappily, extend itself into the country, then indeed it will require all the energies which can possibly be displayed by the Government of India to cope with it. With regard to the statistics promised by the noble Lord, I do hope that in a crisis of this kind the not too numerous Civil Servants of the Government in India will not be vexed by being obliged to spend their time in making too elaborate returns.

["Hear, hear!"] Perhaps one of the greatest curses of the administration of India is the enormous amount of paper work now imposed upon the servants of the Government—["hear, hear!"]—and in a visitation of this kind, when every man will be employed to his utmost capacity and energy in connection with the relief works, I hope they may be allowed to pursue the more urgent work of looking after the distress and not be required to furnish too elaborate statistics of what is going on until after the calamity has been overcome. [Cheers.]

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW: That has not been lost sight of by the Secretary of State. All that has been asked for is a rough calculation, and returns such as can be prepared from the local registers of deaths will suffice for the purpose, provided the information is prompt and is telegraphed.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not make the least complaint, but what I meant to deprecate was the pressure upon the Government which may come hereafter for more and more information. ["Hear, hear!"]

House adjourned at a Quarter past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a Quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 1st February 1897.

STATIONERY OFFICE (PARLIAMENTARY PRINTING).

Copies presented, of Four Contracts entered into by Her Majesty's Stationery Office affecting Printing ordered by the Houses of Parliament, viz.: (1) with Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode, dated the 12th January 1897; (2) with Wyman and Sons, Limited, dated the 13th of January 1897; (3) with Wyman and Sons, Limited, dated the 13th of January 1897; and (4) with Wyman and Sons, Limited, dated the 13th of January 1897 [by Command] to lie upon the Table.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE ACT 1888 (PORTS AND COALING STATIONS).

Account presented, prepared under Part II. of the Act, showing the money raised and issued out of the Consolidated Fund, the securities created in respect thereof, and the amount expended for the purposes of the Act to 31st March 1896, together with the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General thereon (by Act); to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.—[No. 42.]

QUESTIONS.

SHIPPING MASTERS AT ANTWERP.

MR. T. P. WHITTAKER (York, W.R., Spen Valley): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that serious allegations, involving charges of systematic fraud, have been publicly made against the four shipping masters attached to Her Majesty's Consulate General at Antwerp, for discharging and engaging British seamen at that port; that it is understood that an intimation was conveyed to these shipping masters that they must immediately take steps to clear themselves of these charges by taking legal proceedings against their accusers; that they have taken action in a closed court, where witnesses and necessary documents cannot be produced; and whether, under the circumstances, and in view of the fact that the accusers insist upon the truth of their charges, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will instruct Her Majesty's Consul General at Antwerp, or some other competent official, to demand or compel a full investigation into the truth, or otherwise, of the allegations?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): It is the case that serious allegations were preferred against the shipping masters referred to in the Question by members of another firm of shipping masters, Messrs. Tate, Burton and Company, in a series of letters addressed by the latter to the Consul General at Antwerp, and by printed circular distributed amongst the shipping community both there and in the United Kingdom. Her Majesty's Consul General thereupon informed the shipping masters impugned that they must take measures to clear themselves of these allegations, and that, failing to do so, they would be excluded from the Consular Office. Upon the recommendation of their legal advisers, they accordingly brought an action against Messrs. Tate, Burton and Company in the Tribunal de Commerce, which is presided over by judges specially selected as being the highest experts in commercial and maritime matters. No witnesses can be heard in that court; but it is open to the public, and affidavits are admitted, every facility being given for bringing them forward, and the advocates on each side mutually supplying one another with copies of all documents which are to be produced in evidence. In the case under consideration the hearing was three times adjourned to give Messrs. Tate, Burton and Company the opportunity of bring their case before the Public Prosecutor, and of affording their advocate further time for preparation, and for procuring documentary evidence. In the meantime, while the case was still proceeding, Messrs. Tate, Burton and Company preferred two charges of extortion against the shipping masters before the Public Prosecutor. This functionary caused those charges to be investigated by the Chief of the Police, who pronounced them to be frivolous and untenable, and they were summarily rejected. I have this morning heard that the judgment of the Tribunal de Commerce has been given. Messrs.Tate, Burton and Company have been condemned to pay to the four British shipping masters, as damages for defamation of character, the sum of 1,600 francs, and they are further ordered to defray the costs of the trial, and to publish the judgment in the Antwerp newspapers. The complete falseness of the accusations having been conclusively established by this trial, and the character of the British shipping masters having been effectively cleared, there is no cause for further investigation.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS (WEST CAVAN).

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, (1) on what grounds the hours of posting at Arva were recently changed; and (2) did the Department order any inquiry into the general mail arrangements for the West Cavan postal districts with a view to insuring quicker delivery and later hours of posting in Arva, Belturbet, Ballyconnell, and Swanlinbar?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The earlier dispatch of the night mail from Arva by 30 minutes was recently rendered necessary in consequence of the train by which the supplementary night mail from Cavan is forwarded being started half an hour earlier. The department has no control over the working of that train. The dispatch from Arva is still, however, as late as 6.15 p.m. The second part of the hon. Member's Question presumably relates to a proposal put before the Department some time ago for using the Cavan Leitrim and Roscommon Railway for the conveyance of mails to and from Belturbet, Swanlinbar, &c. Inquiry showed, however, that the suggested service would afford on the whole inferior accommodation to that already provided, and the Department was therefore unable to entertain the proposal.

POOR LAW SCHOOLS.

MR. GEOFFREY DRAGE (Derby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has come to any decision on the subject of the Report of the Departmental Committee on Poor Law Schools which he can conveniently communicate to the House?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford), who was cheered, on his return to the House after illness, said: I am afraid it will be difficult to reply fully to the hon. Member within the ordinary limits of an answer to a question; but I will make as brief a statement as I can. I have carefully considered the recommendations in the Report of the Committee on Poor Law Schools and have come to the following decision. We propose to avail ourselves of the powers we possess under the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867, and to carry out the changes we contemplate by an Order of the Local Government Board instead of coming to Parliament. In doing this we give effect to some of the principal recommendations of the Committee. We propose to create a central body for the metropolis who will be responsible for the charge of certain classes of children. The classes of children for whom this authority will provide are:—(a) Those suffering from ophthalmia and other diseases of the eye; (b) those suffering from certain diseases of the skin or scalp; (c) those requiring either special treatment during convalescence or the benefit of seaside air; (d) those who by defective intellect or physical infirmity cannot be trained in association with children in ordinary schools; (e) children who are remanded to the workhouse by justices before being sent to industrial schools. For these classes of children I am satisfied that special provision must be made, and the arrangement proposed will have amongst others the following advantages:—The provision required can be made by an authority acting for the whole of London at less cost than would be entailed by each district making separate provision for this purpose; it will greatly benefit the children themselves; it will render unnecessary the detention in workhouses of classes of children whom it has been the practice to temporarily detain there; and, further, it will set free some of the accommodation in the existing schools, a result which is greatly to be desired. The members of the central body will be elected by the guardians of the several unions, but not necessarily from their own body. The Local Government Board will also have the power to nominate members. A draft Order has been prepared for this purpose, and dealing as it does with a matter of great importance to the metropolis, I have thought it right to communicate it to the various boards of guardians and the managers of the district schools for their information, and thus to afford them the opportunity of making suggestions to the Local Government Board if they desire it. Much objection has been made to the massing together in one institution of great numbers of children and we fully concur in this objection. In accordance with the practice of the Board for some years past we are declining to sanction proposals which would have the effect of extending the large schools in the metropolis, and we shall most readily entertain any proposals for applying to other purposes any of these large buildings, subject to other provision of a suitable character being made for the children. There are other recommendations of the Committee to which the Board are desirous of giving effect. We are in communication, through the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with the Canadian Government, with a view to arrangements for the more frequent visitation by officers of the Dominion of children sent out to Canada at the cost of the rates; and we have made special appointments of inspectors to inquire as to the prevalence of ophthalmia in the schools and also to the ventilation and warming of the rooms in these institutions as a preliminary step to determining the question of cubic space. Other matters, which can only be dealt with by legislation, are receiving the attention of the Board. I apologise to the House for the length of my reply, but it was impossible to make it shorter. [Cheers.]

MR. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) asked whether the other children would be left as now with the guardians?

MR. CHAPLIN: We are not prepared to accept the main recommendation of the Committee, which was to hand over the charge of all children maintained out of the rates to a central body.

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.): Is provision to be made for the various classes of children in a large institution or in small and scattered institutions, and if in a larger institution will not that tend to increase the evil?

MR. CHAPLIN: I have already stated that it has been the practice of the Board to refuse their sanction to any further extension of these large institutions, and it will be their course in the future.

TROOPSHIPS (BALLASTING).

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War (1) whether it has been brought to his knowledge that the Union Steamship Spartan, which left Southampton on the 15th December last, carrying troops to the Cape, was insufficiently ballasted, and consequently rolled to a dangerous point, namely 40 degrees; and (2) whose duty it is to ascertain that vessels carrying troops are properly ballasted?

The SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Mr. W. E. Macartney, Antrim, S.): The answer to the first paragraph of the Question is in the negative. The Spartan left England with 1,650 tons of coal on board and 847 tons of cargo, besides 500 troops and their baggage. After passing Finisterre she encountered a severe gale and heavy sea, which caused her to roll considerably and induced the Master to lie to for 12 hours until the gale abated, a not unusual incident at this season of the year. The rolling was in no way due to insufficient ballasting, and the ship is reported to have sailed in exceptionally good trim, having in addition to the cargo and coal, 731 tons of water and permanent ballast. As regards the second paragraph, the Admiralty assume the same responsibility in respect of the ballasting of Troop Transports and Troop Freight Ships as devolves on the Board of Trade in the case of Emigrant Ships.

WRECK (INDIAN TROOPSHIP "WARREN HASTINGS.")

Mr. VICARY GIBBS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what was the cause of the disaster to the Warren Hastings, on or about the 13th January, when carrying troops to the Mauritius; and whether compensation will be paid to the regiment, or to individual members of it, for loss of property?

*The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for WAR (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): It is not yet known what was the cause of the wreck of the Warren Hastings. A full Inquiry will no doubt take place. The allowance regulations provide for compensation within certain limits to all officers and men losing property under such circumstances, and any claims submitted to the War Office will be duly considered.

SLIGO POST OFFICE.

Mr. PATRICK M'HUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the Postmaster General has yet decided on a site for the proposed new post office in Sligo; how long have the Post Office authorities been inquiring and inspecting in regard to a site for said office; and will provision been made in the Estimates for the building of the proposed new post office premises in Sligo?

Mr. HANBURY: The Postmaster General regrets that he has not yet been able to obtain a site for a new post office at Sligo. In response to advertisements issued nearly two years ago, several offers have been received and considered, but none of them have proved to be in all respects suitable. None is to be obtained in the centre of the town at a cost which the Department would be justified in entertaining; and one in Wine Street, which could be obtained at a moderate price, is objected to by the Municipal Council as not being sufficiently central. Under these circumstances it would not be in accordance with the usual practice to make any specific provision for the building in the Estimates for 1897-98.

PURCHASE OF HOLDINGS (IRELAND).

Mr. JAMES O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that agreements for the purchase of their holdings were entered into by the tenants of Miss French, of Riversdale, county of Roscommon, so far back as the year 1892, and have not yet been carried out; and, if so, what is the cause of the delay?

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Gerald Balfour, Leeds, Central): The Land Commissioners are unable to trace the matter referred to in the Question, as it does not appear that any purchase agreements have been lodged in a case where Miss French is owner.

LANARKSHIRE MILITIA.

Mr. JOHN WILSON (Falkirk Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if it is under consideration or arranged that 1,500 or 1,800 men of the Lanarkshire Militia are to be taken to Aldershot for a course of three to four weeks' training there instead of at Lanark as at present, a course involving an additional expenditure of probably £3,000; and if he will reconsider the proposal, seeing that it would involve a great loss to the town?

*Mr. BRODRICK: Two of the Lanarkshire Militia battalions will be trained this year at Aldershot, as they form part of a Militia Brigade which, for military reasons, it is proposed to train together. I may, perhaps, remind the hon. Member that, with every desire to consult local interests, the military efficiency of a corps must be the paramount consideration in deciding where its training shall take place.

Mr. J. WILSON (Falkirk): May I ask if the hon. Gentleman will exchange an English for a Scottish Regiment, in order that they may get the benefit of the fresh air of Lanark moor? [Laughter.]

*Mr. BRODRICK: It is not a question of giving the militiamen fresh air, but of military efficiency. ["Hear, hear."]

COLOUR-BLIND TESTS (SAILORS).

Mr. W. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, of the number of persons (sailors) rejected by the Board of Trade as colour blind, as appears from the Board's Report, 1896, 38 per cent. of those that were rejected and appealed were, on appeal, passed; and whether the Board of Trade propose to take any steps to revise their tests?

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. C. T. Ritchie, Croydon): 6,680 candidates were examined during the 16 months ended December 31st, 1895, in colour vision. 101 failed, but of these 21 availed themselves of the right to appeal, and eight passed on appeal. The present system of sight tests is based upon the report of the Committee of the Royal Society specially appointed to inquire into the subject, and I am advised that no case has been made out for revising it.

Mr. G. W. WOLFF (Belfast, E.) asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he would allow all boys of five years' apprenticeship to be examined, so that, after having learned the trade of a seaman, they might not at the end of their term possibly be put aside.

Mr. RITCHIE said that anyone who desired to present himself for examination could do so, and he would be examined. The only difference was that the examination was not compulsory in the case mentioned by his hon. Friend.

Mr. WOLFF asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would make the examination compulsory in the case of boys.

Mr. RITCHIE replied in the negative, observing that in the case of boys it would not be sufficient, for large numbers of men became officers who did not enter the service in the manner suggested.

CAB LICENCES (METROPOLIS).

Mr. T. G. FARDELL (Paddington, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can inform the House at whose instance a considerable quantity of number plates have been removed from cabs since the commencement of the cab strike and before the expiration of the year for which the licences of the cabs in question were granted; and, whether such removal is permissible under the orders made by him under The Metropolitan Public Carriage Act, 1869, which came into force on 1st September 1896; and, if so, under which of those orders?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir Mathew White Ridley, Lancashire, Blackpool): Number plates are removed before the expiration of the year if proprietors wishing to surrender their licences desire it. There is nothing in the Acts or the Order to prevent this being done.

MOUNTJOY PRISON (HEALTH OF PRISONER).

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) will he explain why a letter written by Martin Malony, at present confined in Maryborough Prison, to his parents from Mountjoy Prison on the 8th of December last, in which he describes the dangerous state of his health, was suppressed by the prison authorities; (2) whether Malony had been for many months in hospital in Mountjoy Prison before his removal to Maryborough, also why the Maryborough Prison authorities refused Malony permission to describe the state of his health in a letter to his parents written on the 8th instant; (3) what is the present condition of Malony's health; and (4) on what grounds or by what prison rule was a good conduct prisoner refused permission to make known to his parents the dangerous condition of his health?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The letter referred to in the first paragraph was not forwarded because it contained a passage which was directly at variance with the fact regarding the condition of Malony's health. The prisoner was told he could write another letter instead, and he did so. He was in hospital in Mountjoy Prison for about four months before his removal to Maryborough, and the authorities of the latter prison gave him permission to describe the true state of his health in the letter written by him on the 8th January. The condition of the prisoner is in no way dangerous. He is suffering from dyspepsia, but not of an aggravated type. He has no organic disease, and his appetite is good. The rule under which action was taken in reference to the letters of this prisoner, prescribes that every letter to or from a prisoner shall be read by the Governor and Chaplain, and if the contents be objectionable it shall not be forwarded, or the objectionable part shall be erased according to discretion.

DOG LICENCES.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he is aware of the general dissatisfaction felt amongst petty sessions clerks in Ireland with the form Schedule B, Registry of Dogs Licence, which requires the signature of the petty sessions clerk to be appended in four places; and, whether he will have provided a more simple form of licence, such as is in use in England?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The body of the licence referred to is in conformity with the form prescribed by the Dogs Regulation Act of 1865, and although I am not aware that general dissatisfaction is felt by petty sessions clerks as alleged in the Question, it appears to me that the form of licence is somewhat complicated. If a suitable opportunity should present itself hereafter to simplify the body of the form by legislation, I will be prepared to substitute a form for that now in use. I may add that the signature of the Clerk is really required in two places only on the existing form, and that the note on the form requiring the cancellation of the stamps by signature will be modified.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

MR. PATRICK M'HUGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord lieutenant of Ireland, whether he intends during the present Session, to institute an inquiry in regard to technical education in Ireland and, if so, can he inform the House as to the manner in which the inquiry will be conducted?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: A Commission has been appointed by the Irish Government with a view to determine how far and in what form manual and practical instruction should be included in the educational system of the primary schools under the Board of National Education in Ireland. As regards the question of technical education in Ireland generally, I do not, as at present advised, propose to institute a public inquiry on the subject.

INCORPORATION (METROPOLITAN DISTRICTS).

MR. T. LOUGH: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether he is willing to confer charters of incorporation on districts of the metropolis, under the Municipal Corporation Acts; and, if so, whether he will deal with any particular locality that may apply to him, or with all the districts of London at once; and, whether the existing form of municipal government of the metropolis can be altered otherwise than by Act of Parliament?

MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member asks me whether I am willing to confer charters of incorporation on districts of the metropolis. The answer is very simple. I have no power to do so. Applications for charters are made to the Privy Council.

MR. LOUGH asked if the right hon. Gentleman would say what advice he would give to the Privy Council in the case of such applications.

MR. CHAPLIN: My advice has never been asked.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF IRELAND.

MR. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade can anything be done to induce the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland to erect a bridge over the level crossing at the town of Clones; and is he aware that this crossing is a cause of grave inconvenience to farmers, who bring their cattle and agricultural produce to the fairs and markets of Clones for disposal, as well as to the general public; also that the closing of railway gates, owing to shunting operations, on Sundays and holidays, often delays Catholics on the way to worship, the only passage, when the gates are shut, being a narrow tunnel too abominably filthy to admit of description?

MR. RITCHIE: The Board of Trade have further communicated with the Great Northern Railway of Ireland on the subject of this Question, and I shall be happy to show the hon. Member the reply I have received. While it gives no hope that a bridge will be constructed and combats the allegation of inconvenience, a promise is made that the charge with reference to the subway shall be further looked into.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the expediency of bringing in a Bill to abolish the Great Northern Railway in the interests of the Roman Catholics of Ireland?

[No answer was given].

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, will an inquiry be ordered into the allegation that a special train was run on a single line from Newbliss to Clones on 27th August without safety staff; and what steps will be taken to prevent the repetition of a neglect so dangerous to travellers?

MR. RITCHIE: I find that it is true that a special train was allowed to leave Newbliss for Clones on the day referred to without the train staff. The staff had been removed from the magazine, but by inadvertence the train left without it. It is not a case for an inquiry, but a letter shall be addressed to the Company expressing a hope that the necessity for great care in such matters will be enforced on their servants.

POLLEN FISHERY (LOUGH NEAGH).

MR. P. C. DOOGAN (Tyrone, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether it is a fact that, owing to the present state of the Law affecting the fishing for pollen in Lough Neagh, great quantities of fish fit for food are not legally saleable and consequently allowed to rot, affecting the industry of about 300 families of poor fishermen; and whether he can see his way to introduce a short Bill making it lawful to sell pollen of a length of seven inches and upwards?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Under the existing law (54 & 55 Vic., cap. 20) it is illegal to capture pollen of less size than eight inches. Experiments have been made with the view of ascertaining the condition of pollen less than that length, and apart altogether from the consideration, whether a fish of less than eight inches in length would be useful as a marketable commodity, the results of the experiments appear to clearly show that to reduce the size limit, would be injurious to the pollen fisheries.

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, S.) asked whether it was not the fact that with the present legal net, great quantities of pollen were caught between seven and eight inches, and whether as a result of the law as it stood these fish, though caught, were not allowed to be sold, and were consequently rendered useless and allowed to rot?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I can give the hon. Member this further information, which I think will practically answer the questions he has put to me. It appears that a number of undersized pollen are taken. This seems to be unavoidable, because the present size of the meshes of the net used is calculated to retain pollen of eight inches, when the net is in its normal condition. But when the net is being drawn with a string on the meshes these close up to a certain extent, and this would also be the case if even the mesh were larger than at present. A certain waste, therefore, does take place, some being eaten by the fishermen and others given to the pigs.

MR. DILLON asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he did not think it would be fair to allow the fishermen to sell all the fish that was caught by the present legal net.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR was understood to say that he did not think so.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING (IRISH COAST).

MR. JAMES GILHOOLY (Cork, Co. W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that owing to stress of weather a number of fishermen residing on the shores of Bantry Bay were unable to haul their trammel nets, and that English trawlers when trawling on Sunday destroyed and carried away a number of those nets; and, whether a prosecution will be instituted against the trawlers referred to?

MR. MACARTNEY: No information as to the circumstances in question has been received. Last October, in consequence of numerous complaints of illegal trawling and damage done to nets in Bantry Bay, H.M.S. Leda was ordered to the locality and remained there from November 18th to the 11th ultimo, but the commanding officer found it impossible to substantiate the complaints made to him on one or two occasions. The question of prosecution in such cases is not one for the Admiralty to deal with.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that English steam trawlers are in the habit of constantly visiting the fishing grounds off Ballycotton, county Cork, and are seriously injuring these grounds by incessant and indiscriminate trawling; and, whether, in view of the fact that this practice interferes with the livelihood of a very poor class of hard working men, steps will be taken to prevent the destruction of an important Irish industry?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: A public Inquiry was recently held at Ballycotton by the Inspectors of Fisheries relative to steam trawling in the bay, and as a result of the Inquiry a bye-law has been prepared with a view to protect the local fishermen from the operations of the steam trawlers.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: May I ask whether the bye-laws permit steam trawlers working on Sunday?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot answer that without notice.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): Is there not great difficulty in overtaking these steam trawlers?

[No answer was given.]

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENTS.

MR. C. E. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is now able to lay the Report of Lord Tweedmouth's Commission upon the Table of the House, and to afford facilities for its being printed?

MR. HANBURY: I answered a similar Question of the Hon. Member on the 21st January. The Report is now under the consideration of the Treasury and Postmaster General. As soon as a decision has been arrived on the several questions raised in the Report, it will be laid before the House.

PATENTED INVENTIONS.

MR. W. O'MALLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether Great Britain is the only country which grants letters patent for inventions without any stipulation that the articles so patented must be manufactured within the country?

MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir. The Patent Laws of the United States, of India, and of the princidal British Colonies do not stipulate that the articles must be manufactured within the country.

PAYMENT OF COMMON JURORS.

MR. J. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will consider the question of introducing a Bill during the course of the Session to provide for the payment of the expenses of common jurors while attending assizes and quarter sessions; and to give them reasonable remuneration for loss of time necessarily incurred?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I am afraid I cannot promise that the Government will be able to deal with this question during the present Session. I think, however, that, at any rate so far as out-of-pocket expenses are concerned, some such proposal is worthy of consideration. As the expenditure involved would have to be met out of local funds, I suggested to a deputation which saw me last year, and of which the hon. Member was one, that steps might be taken to ascertain the feeling of the local authorities on the subject. Up to the present time, however, I have had very few representations on the subject.

IRISH LIGHTS BOARD.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: On behalf of the hon. Member for North Wexford (Mr. Thomas Healy), I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if sailors and tradesmen, employed by the Irish Lights Board are held entitled to retiring allowances in old age; and, if so, why are the workmen who act as gasmakers to the Irish lighthouses not similarly treated?

Mr. RITCHIE: Seamen, and certain foremen tradesmen in the service of the Commissioners of Irish Lights, are entitled to pensions. Gasmakers are qualified for gratuities on retirement after fifteen years' service, but not for pensions, as they are not on the permanent staff.

Mr. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he intends to bring in a Bill for the more efficient management of the Irish Lights Board?

Mr. RITCHIE: No, Sir.

WARDEN ESTATE, COUNTY KERRY.

Mr. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether his attention has been directed to the condition of things which exists on the Warden Estate at Sneem, in the county Kerry; (2) whether he is aware that on that estate, old arrears of rent, outstanding for many years, have been used to deprive a great number of tenants of all rights under the Land Acts; and, whether, under the law as it now stands, the tenants have any remedy; and, (3) if not, whether he can undertake to introduce during the present Session, a Measure dealing with the subject of arrears of rent in Ireland?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: My attention has been drawn to the condition of things on the estate mentioned in the first paragraph. I have been informed, though I cannot say how far accurately, that the purchaser of this property has also purchased all arrears, as he was entitled to do; that he is taking the arrears from the tenants in instalments on easy terms; and that he is affording employment to a number of the tenants and their sons, at an expenditure of about £27 weekly. I am also informed that the purchaser has, in some instances, obtained mortgages from the tenants of their interest in their holdings to secure the arrears. This, if true and bonâ-fide, would prevent them from applying to have a fair rent fixed while this mortgage by assignment exists, except with the consent of the mortgagee. The tenants whose tenancies were determined before the passing of the Act of last year are unaffected by its provisions, and, therefore, they could not have redeemed except upon payment of all the rent and arrears due by them, the purchaser having purchased the old arrears, and having thus been placed in the same position as the former landlord. It was open to the tenants on the occasion of the ejectments having been brought against them for non-payment, to have appealed under the 6th section of the Land Act of 1887 to have a fair rent fixed, if it had not been fixed already, or to have the arrears made payable in instalments under the 30th section of that Act. This they apparently omitted to do. The case does not seem to call for special legislation.

Mr. DILLON asked if the right hon. Gentleman had made any inquiry as to the date from which these old arrears had accrued due and how long they had been hanging over the tenants? He would also remind the right hon. Gentleman that he had not answered the last paragraph of the Question—whether the Government, in view of this position of affairs, would introduce a Measure dealing with this question of arrears?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: Yes; I did answer that Question. I said it was a matter which did not appear to me to require any special legislation.

TELEGRAPH CABLE (WEST INDIES).

MR. W. E. M. TOMLINSON (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can give an approximate date on which it is likely that the sanction of Her Majesty's Government will be given to the construction of a cable giving telegraphic communication with the West Indies which shall be under British control; is he aware that a cable of three words from Antigua to Great Britain costs at the present reduced rates 19s.; and, is he aware that, whilst the Colonial Office are considering the question, the French and American lines are being pushed forward, and that when completed they will tap the principal sources of revenue, which would otherwise be secured to British enterprise?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I cannot state the date at which an agreement for the construction of the cable referred to will be completed. Negotiations on the subject are in progress. A cable telegram of three words to Antigua costs 22s. 3d. A French cable has recently been laid by a French company in conjunction, as I understand, with an American company, which will compete for the West Indian traffic with the proposed British cable. I imagine this cable would have been laid in any case.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that both the Canadian Government and one or more of the West India minor Governments were so anxious that this cable should be constructed, that they had already voted or arranged for, subsidies to be granted for the purpose?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I think if the hon. and gallant Gentleman requires precise and definite information he should put his Question on the Paper.

SAMPLE POST (BUTTERFLIES).

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster-General, whether he can explain the action of the Post Office authorities under any existing rule in refusing to deliver by sample post samples of species of butterflies sent from residents abroad to an eminent entomologist and dealer in natural history specimens residing in Eastbourne, with a view to a guidance of future commercial relations with persons abroad; whether he can state under what rule the Post Office acts in demanding from the gentleman in question, an increased postage or the return to place of origin of the aforesaid packets, thereby seriously damaging the business of the said entomologist; and whether cut flowers are allowed to pass through the post as samples under Rule 7?

MR. HANBURY: In the matter to which the hon. Member's first Question refers the Post Office is only carrying out, as it is bound to do, a deliberate decision of the Postal Union, that natural history specimens are not entitled to be sent by the sample post, which is intended for bonâ fide samples of merchandise, of no saleable value, and for nothing else. In strictness, packets improperly sent by parcel post should be stopped and returned to the senders; but in the present instance, at the naturalist's own request, the concession was made that packets of butterflies addressed to him should be transferred to the post by which they might have been sent, if he would undertake in all such cases to pay the charges incurred. He ultimately declined to take advantage of the concession, and the strict rule is therefore being acted on. As regards cut flowers, I presume that the hon. Member is referring to rule 7 of the Foreign Sample Post Regulations in the Post Office Guide, which embodies the Postal Union Regulations excluding from the sample post articles of saleable value. If cut flowers have no such value and are sent by a dealer as a bonâ fide trade sample they are entitled to pass by sample post. I would refer the hon. Member to the answer given to a similar question put by the hon. Member for Canterbury on the 5th of June last. There has been no ruling of the Postal Union on the transmission of cut flowers as there has been on that of natural history specimens.

PAROCHIAL BOARD OF SANQUHAIR.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the case of Patrick Reddy, whom the Parochial Board of Sanquhair, Dumfries-shire, propose to remove to the Union of Cavan without incurring the cost of the usual order for so doing; and, whether this action has been sanctioned by the Scotch Office?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I am informed by the Local Government Board for Scotland that the Parish Council do not propose to remove Patrick Reddy to Ireland without the usual order.

MAIL CONTRACT SUBSIDIES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, in view of the importance of securing the most rapid and perfect transmission of the mails, and in view of the complaints made as to the restriction of competition, he will consent to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the whole subject of the contracts for conveyance of mails by sea and the payment of subsidies to British steamship companies?

MR. HANBURY: The Government do not at present see sufficient reasons for the appointment of such a Committee, but my hon. Friend will no doubt find an opportunity of bringing forward in the House the facts and arguments upon which he bases his suggestion, and if they should appear to be sufficient, the Government will be prepared to consider the appointment of a Committee.

MERCANTILE MARINE (CLASSIFICATION).

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when he will be able to place before the House a Return showing the classification of persons employed in the Mercantile Marine, similar to the tables compiled by the Registrar General of Shipping and Seamen in 1893?

MR. RITCHIE: The preparation of the Return to which the right Hon. Baronet refers is being expedited as much as possible, but, having regard to the fact that many of the particulars necessary for its compilation will not reach the Registrar General until next month, I fear the Return cannot be placed on the Table before July.

DOG MUZZLING (METROPOLIS).

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture how many cases of canine hydrophobia have been reported in the Metropolitan district during the last six months; and whether there is any chance of the muzzling order being repealed or relaxed?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. WALTER LONG, Liverpool, West Derby): Twelve cases of rabies have been reported in the County of London and 22 in the five home counties during the last six months. I am informed that the Public Control Committee of the London County Council propose that the present muzzling regulations should now be so far relaxed as to give exemption to dogs under proper control, and wearing a collar bearing the name and address of the owner. In this connection, I may perhaps be allowed to point out, however, that it will be necessary for the whole subject to be further considered in the light of the report of the committee which has been sitting for some time past to inquire into the working of the laws relating to dogs. I understand that the committee propose that a determined effort should now be made to rid the country of rabies once and for all. If this could be accomplished, the necessity for the issue of intermittent muzzling regulations by particular local authorities would disappear. I am under the impression that the owners of dogs and the public generally would support a well-considered scheme which promised to secure the complete extirpation of rabies in these islands—a result which is never likely to be secured under the existing system.

SIERRA LEONE RAILWAY.

MR. CHARLES BILL (Staffordshire, Leek): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies what progress has been made during the past year with the Sierra Leone Railway; and what time is likely to elapse before any portion of the line is open for traffic?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: This work was commenced at the end of 1895. Since then the terminal depôt at Freetown, with landing pier, workshops, and quarters, has been completed, 21 miles of the line have been surveyed, the earthworks and bridges for a length of $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles have been finished, and the permanent way laid for three miles. The unfavourable climatic conditions make it difficult to form estimates of progress, but it is expected that a considerable section of the railway will be open for traffic in June, 1898.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION (BUCHANNAN v. COWELL).

MR. RICHARD M. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the reasons why the Court of the Irish Land Commission upon Tuesday last refused the application of the tenant under the Redemption of Rent Act, in the case of Buchannan v. Cowell; and whether he will procure the shorthand writer's report of the judgment of Mr. Justice Bewley, and lay it upon the Table of the House?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am informed that the reasons for the decision of the Court of the Land Commission in the case referred to appear to have been fully stated by Mr. Justice Bewley when delivering the judgment of the Court. To lay the judgment on the Table of the House would be without precedent, and I see no sufficient reason for taking the step.

PRISON SERVICE (IRELAND).

MR. DANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of officials of the Presbyterian religion in the Irish Prison service holding the positions of governor, deputy governor, or chief warder, respectively, exclusive of bridewell keepers in old reduced county prisons; and whether it is the fact, as stated in The Belfast Northern Whig, of the 16th and 22nd inst., that the Irish Prisons Board have declined to appoint Presbyterians to such positions in the ordinary prisons; and, if so, has such a course the sanction of the Irish Government?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am informed that there are no governors or deputy governors in the Irish Prison service professing the Presbyterian religion, but that one chief warder and some 28 male subordinate officers in the service belong to that denomination. There is absolutely no foundation for the allegation in the second paragraph of the question.

LABOUR DEPARTMENT (LOCAL CORRESPONDENTS).

MR. HARRY H. MARKS (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will grant a Return, giving the names of the local correspondents of the Labour Department, the remuneration paid to each of them, and the names of the persons on whose recommendation they were appointed?

MR. RITCHIE: If the hon. Member will move for a return similar to that presented in June, 1893, of which I have handed him a copy, I will agree to it.

COMPANIES LIMITED LIABILITY ACTS.

MR. JAMES ROCHE (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will cause to be published and circulated the proceedings, which are in print, of the Departmental Committee which sat last year to inquire into the state of the Companies Limited Liability Acts as they are at present enforced?

MR. RITCHIE: I presume the hon. Member refers to the Departmental Committee which sat in 1895. The appendix to the report contains all the evidence taken by the Committee. It is not proposed to lay on the table the Minutes of Proceedings, as this is not usual in the case of Departmental Committees. Moreover, the discussions of the Committee were to a large extent of an informal character.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND).

Mr. JAMES O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he intends during this Session to introduce a Bill for the local government of Ireland?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No, Sir; it is not the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill for the purpose stated during the present Session.

VACCINATION OFFICERS' FEES.

Mr. L. R. HOLLAND (Tower Hamlets, Bow and Bromley): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the fact that vaccination officers are paid only by fees upon successful cases of vaccination, and that therefore their incomes have been largely reduced in a great number of districts by the non-enforcement of the Vaccination Acts by boards of guardians while their actual work is in no degree diminished thereby, the Local Government Board will sanction boards of guardians paying the vaccination officers by fees based upon birth returns as well as upon successful cases of vaccination?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Experience has amply shown the importance of payment of vaccination officers by results as a principle of general application, but I will consider whether any modification in the existing rule can be made under which the payment to the vaccination officers shall not wholly depend on fees in respect of the certificates of successful vaccination registered.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

Mr. W. F. B. MASSEY-MAINWARING (Finsbury, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if this year the funds will be provided necessary to complete the frontage of the South Kensington Museum; and, if so, will it be a condition that the extra space shall be available for the exhibition of objects of art, and not for any increase to the present number of offices.

Mr. MASSEY-MAINWARING also asked the Secretary to the Treasury if the necessary funds will be provided so that the National Gallery, the National Portrait Gallery, and the Natural History Museum may be lighted with an electric installation?

Mr. HANBURY: These questions should more properly be addressed to my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works, but if the hon. Member will refer to Class I. of the Estimates for 1897-98, issued last week, he will see for himself that it is not proposed to ask Parliament to provide funds for the purposes mentioned during the coming year.

KHAMA'S TERRITORY (LIQUOR LICENCES).

Sir MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has seen a copy of a letter addressed by Khama to the Native races and the Liquor Traffic United Committee protesting against refreshment rooms in which intoxicating liquors will be sold being opened on that portion of the railway which will pass through his territory; whether in the event of refreshment rooms being opened on the railway passing through Khama's territory, licences would be granted for the sale of intoxicating liquors; and whether the granting of such licences is in contravention of the pledges given to Khama by Her Majesty's Government on the occasion of his visit to England in 1895?

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have seen the letter referred to. The question of granting licences for refreshment rooms on the railway, within Khama's territory has not yet been mooted and, when it is, I will consider it in the light of all the circumstances of the case including of course the promises made to Khama.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE (VISIT OF COLONIAL PREMIERS).

*Mr. J. F. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in the event of a majority of the Premiers of the self-governing colonies finding themselves in a position to accept his invitation to participate in the celebration of the 60th year of Her Majesty's reign, advantage will be taken of their presence in England to hold an Imperial Conference with a view to the discussion and determination of contemporary questions of common colonial concern, and the completion of the work entered upon by the Colonial Conferences of London in 1887 and Ottawa in 1894?

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The matter referred to in the Question of the hon. Member will be taken into consideration.

ARMY MEDICAL SERVICE.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War how many civilian medical practitioners have been employed during the past year to give professional aid to the troops in Great Britain and Ireland owing to vacancies in the Army Medical Staff; and what were the actual number of vacancies in the Army Medical Service up to 31st December 1896?

*MR. BRODRICK: The number of civil practitioners specially employed during the past year was 77. It is not possible to associate the engagement of individual practitioners with particular vacancies in the Medical Staff, but there were on the 31st of December last 39 vacancies, and, although 13 surgeons were on probation at Netley, the number of private practitioners engaged was somewhat larger than would otherwise have been the case. There may, therefore, be some connection between the number of private practitioners engaged and the number of vacancies.

CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY (IRELAND.)

MR. P. M'HUGH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can inform the House whether a Measure for the establishment and endowment of a Catholic University in Ireland will be introduced by the Government this Session: and has he taken steps to ascertain the views of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy of Ireland, and of theParliamentary representatives of Ireland, as to the establishment of an Irish Roman Catholic University; and if not, will he be good enough to inform the House what practical steps, if any, he proposes to take during the present Session to meet the claims of Irish Catholics in regard to University education?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not think it is desirable for me in the shape of an answer to a question to add anything to what I said the other night rather fully in debate upon this subject.

SHIPPING AND MARITIME PROPERTY (COMPENSATION FOR INJURY).

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is a in position to state what course Her Majesty's Government propose to take in order to remedy defects in the law, so as to afford shipping and maritime property the same protection as is accorded to property on land in respect of compensation for injury and damage done under circumstances of riot and civil disturbance?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: In answer to the Question of my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to say that we find great difficulty in merely extending the existing law which operates on land to cases contemplated in his Question, but I am in communication with the Attorney General to find a way out of the difficulty.

MILITARY LANDS ACT (1892) AMENDMENT.

Bill to amend the Military Lands Act, 1892, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brodrick and Mr. Powell-Williams; presented and read the First time, to be read a Second time on Thursday; and to be printed.—[Bill 103.]

BERRIEW SCHOOL.

Bill to annul an Order in Council confirming a scheme relating to the Foundation known as the Berriew School, ordered to be brought in by Sir John Gorst and Mr. Hanbury; presented, and read the First time; to be read a Second time upon Thursday; and to be printed.—[Bill 104.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS (AID GRANT, ETC.).

Considered in Committee.

[The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, in the Chair.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) moved "That it is expedient—

(a) to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of an aid grant to Voluntary Schools, not exceeding five shillings per scholar for the whole number of scholars in those schools;

(b) to repeal as regards day schools so much of section nineteen of The Elementary Education Act, 1876, as imposes a limit on the Parliamentary grant to elementary schools in England and Wales; and

(c) to make provision for the exemption from rates of Voluntary Schools."

The right hon. Gentleman, who was received with cheers, said:—Mr. Lowther, among the manifold blessings showered upon us by the Opposition during the course of the Debates upon last year's Education Bill was a plentiful stock of good advice. The Members on the Front Bench opposite and Gentlemen sitting in various other parts of the House—["hear, hear!"]—told the Government that if they had confined their Measure to what was mentioned in the Queen's Speech last year, namely, the relief of Voluntary Schools—if they had checked their vaulting ambition, if they had consented to bring in a brief and simple Bill, that Bill might have received some small amount of criticism and opposition, but would have found something like general acceptance in its main principles from both sides of the House. I do not think I misrepresent the views laid before us, especially by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fife, when I say he was peculiarly insistent on the wisdom of the policy of bringing in a short Bill rather than a comprehensive Bill. When the Opposition give you advice in regard to the length of time a particular discussion will take, one has to regard that more or less as the advice of experts—[laughter]—and when they prophecy that any particular Measure will last a very long time they have the satisfaction, which few prophets have, of being in the position of seeing their own prophecy adequately fulfilled. [Laughter.] Under these circumstances, as early as last July—indeed, I think earlier—in the Debate in which I announced that the Bill of last year was dropped, certainly if not then in a public speech which I made shortly afterwards, I announced to all to whom it was of interest that when the Government brought in the Measure they were resolved to bring in for some relief to Voluntary Schools out of Imperial resources, that Bill should be so carefully restricted in its scope that there should be no danger of its defeat merely through lapse of time or through the multiplication of the subjects of debate which Gentlemen opposite are so ingenious in discovering. [Cheers.] That pledge the Government had adhered to. ["Hear, hear!"] The Bill we bring in to-day is a Bill not in any sense covering, or attempting to cover, the field of educational reform. Last year we brought in a Measure designed not merely to give some relief to Voluntary Schools, but also to give relief to necessitous Board Schools, to decentralise the work of the Education Department, to deal with the special questions of secondary education, and to set up such an educational machinery in the country as would unify the system of primary education with the system which exists or ought to be set up with regard to secondary education. That was a comprehensive scheme; I think it was a good scheme. [Cheers.] But it is manifest, if it is to be accomplished—and I think it is—it must be accomplished piecemeal, and not in the shape of one Bill embracing these large and critical subjects, and lending itself, by the very fact that it does embrace them, as a helpless mark to the arrows of obstruction. We have taken, therefore, what is a fragment of a great subject, but it is a fragment very clearly defined in its scope and very urgent in its character. I admit the temptation to add to the question of the relief of Voluntary Schools the question of the relief of necessitous Board Schools was a most tempting one—tempting, at all events, to Gentlemen on this side of the House. That was part of the scheme of last year. It is undoubtedly an object which ought at an early date to be dealt with, in our judgment, by the Imperial Parliament. ["Hear, hear!"] But the problems which it raises are different in many vital particulars from the problem raised by the relief of the necessitous Voluntary Schools. The scheme which applies to the one does not apply to the other, and we feel we were right in adhering to the policy announced last year—namely, that we would not weight our Bill, in so far as it dealt with Voluntary Schools, by extraneous matter, however important and however urgent that extraneous matter might be. ["Hear, hear!"] Those are reasons which will, I trust, satisfy my hon. Friends on this side of the House. They will see that if, as is possible, though I fear it is hardly probable, the Bill we are introducing slips rapidly through all its stages, in that case there will be no difficulty in bringing forward the further Measure to which I have referred. [Laughter and cheers.] But if, on the other hand, so far from finding in a Bill restricted to the relief of Voluntary Schools a simple Measure on which all sides may be agreed, hon. Gentlemen find in such a Bill an endless theme for discussion and Debate, then there is not a man on this side, I venture to say, who will not thank the Government for the foresight they have shown in this matter and will not be obliged to them for not having imperilled one great subject by allying it with another great subject. [Cheers.] So much for the feeling of Gentlemen on this side of the House, and I hope the reasons I have just ventured to give them will satisfy them. But no reason can surely be required to satisfy hon. Gentlemen opposite that the course we have taken is the right one. I admit I have seen in the public Press a great many statements and speeches made by persons in authority to the effect that hon. Gentlemen opposite were anxiously desirous that in this Bill should be included provisions for aiding ratepayers in the districts of necessitous Board Schools. I have never been able to attach any credence to those statements. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said so in the Address—I hear him whisper. I am always ready to accept his statements, but even that statement slipped from him, it seemed to me, in a moment of incaution. [Laughter.] But, after all, what are we to do? We are asked by the right hon. Gentleman and by those who wish to include provision for necessitous Board Schools, to relieve the most hard-pressed and the most deserving class of ratepayers. On this side of the House we have always been in favour of relieving the hard-pressed ratepayers. [Cheers.] It is quite new to me that that is the favourite doctrine of the other side. ["Hear, hear!"] Why, Sir, not only did the right hon. Gentleman the late Minister for Education do nothing in this direction when he was in office, but how did we occupy a large part of last Session? We occupied it in listening to denunciations from the other side of our efforts to relieve ratepayers. [Cheers and Opposition cries of "Landlords!"] Wait a moment, I am coming to that. There was especially one eventful week in which we were discussing in Committee the Bill of my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, whom we are all so glad to see back amongst us—[cheers]—in which it is safe to say there was not one hour of the day or night in which you had not a good prospect, if you came within the walls of this House, of hearing the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition explaining at great length—[laughter]—that all the attempted relief of ratepayers went into the pockets of the landlord. No reiteration appeared to dull the pleasure which he gave us, custom never staled him, he went on with a splendid and persevering uniformity, and so enamoured was he of the topic that when the opportunity was unfortunately taken from him in this House by the conclusion of our Debates on the Bill, the whole staple of his speeches in the country through the autumn consisted in dwelling again upon that well-worn theme. [Laughter and cheers.] And are we to be now told that, as we were kept up night after night in 1896 to prevent relief from going into the pockets of the landlords, we are to be kept up night after night in 1897 in order to prevent relief from going to the ratepayers? [Cheers.] Are we seriously to be told that the laws of political economy which we were said then to have disregarded are to be miraculously suspended in the particular case of elementary education? I will not dwell longer upon this aspect of the question. I have stated, I hope not in immoderate language, the difficulty I find in believing that hon. Gentlemen are going to take the course which is threatened. I wait their reply on the particular aspect of the question. I may say I look forward with the greatest confidence to the opportunity which I shall have of dealing with the subject on future occasions. I have now explained to the House what we do not propose to do in this Bill, and why we do not propose to do it. I pass now to a very brief survey of the provisions which the Measure will actually contain, and I am glad to think in this matter I have, or I hope I have, no surprises to spring on the House. The statements which have been made by Members of the Government in the country, and, indeed, in this House, have led the majority of those interested in forecasting the legislative future to foresee that we should limit our efforts in this Bill to the three questions of relieving Voluntary Schools from the pressure of the rates, of dealing with the 17s. 6d. limit, and of distributing the aid grant. On the first of these topics—that of the relief of schools from the pressure of the rates—I think it will be universally admitted by those who have given any study to the question that the present position of Voluntary Schools in relation to the rating authority is one of great inequality, and not only inequality but uncertainty, and in our opinion the inequality and uncertainty should both at once be put an end to. [Cheers.] In the majority of cases throughout England and Wales, I believe that practically no rates are levied on Voluntary Schools. In London and some of the great towns there are rates, but they are levied on no uniform principle, and it is impossible for the managers to foresee from year to year what demands may be made on their resources for the purpose of meeting the requirements of the overseers. In some cases in London, where the chief difficulty arises, there are no rates levied on these schools at all. In other cases the rates levied are merely nominal in amount. In the third class of cases, again, the schools are rated below their value, while in the remainder the full rating permitted by law is exacted. Now, a system so different in its principles and so uncertain in its incidence is one which really cannot stand criticism, and we propose, by a simple enactment, to put Voluntary Schools in the position already occupied by scientific and learned institutions, and say that they shall not be liable to rates at all. [Cheers.] It may be said, and I dare say it will, that to relieve Voluntary Schools from rates is in effect equivalent to giving relief out of the rates. It will or may be said that, inasmuch as the total rateable value of a parish in which the Voluntary School is situated is diminished thereby, the rates must be augmented, though it probably is only to a very slight extent, by the other ratepayers, and that this is in effect equivalent to a system of relieving Voluntary Schools out of the rates. I do not at all propose to quarrel with words. If anybody likes to maintain that thesis he will not find me a violent opponent. But let it be understood that if that be regarded as allocating support to Voluntary Schools out of the rates, it is so to the same extent, and not to a greater extent, that the rates are allocated now in aid, let us say, of Nonconformist chapels; and if you say we are going to propose rate aid, then you must admit that it is already given, not only to churches and scientific institutions, but to all places of religious worship, Nonconformist or otherwise, which are used exclusively for this purpose. When that fact has once caught hold of the general mind of the House I do not think any great objection will be raised, or, indeed, be anticipated, from either side to this relief, which is very material in certain parts of the Metropolis, but which will not, in fact, bear heavily at all upon any portion of ratepayers either in town or country. The total amount of rates now levied from Voluntary Schools in the vast and wealthy metropolitan area is little over £10,000 a year; and little as it is, relatively speaking, in London, it is still smaller in some other parts of England and Wales. So much for the first of the three provisions which the Bill contains. The second to which I must refer is that which relieves Elementary Day Schools from the 17s. 6d. limit. This provision, and this provision alone, in the Bill extends beyond the province of Voluntary Schools, and includes within its scope Board Schools also. I do not know that I need expend very much time in defending this provision of the Bill. The 17s. 6d. limit, though as it was originally passed it was a great boon to Voluntary Schools, conferred upon them by the Conservative Government of 1874, has long been regarded as a fragment of an ancient system which is scarcely capable of further defence. It is extremely unequal in its operation and extremely arbitrary. As the House knows, a school may earn 17s. 6d. from the Exchequer without expending a single penny upon maintenance from any other source, but it cannot earn 17s. 7d. without finding a contribution of 17s. 7d. to meet it. That is not a state of things which can be defended, and, observe, it is felt most by the very class of schools we most desire to assist—I mean the schools which are so efficiently conducted that they could earn a greater grant, but by the poverty of their surroundings and the circumstances in which they find themselves are debarred from obtaining that advantage which is given to their richer brethren. ["Hear, hear!"] I feel that in a Bill to relieve necessitous schools the omission of the 17s. 6d. would be a serious blot, and one it would not be in my power to defend. I now come to the only remaining provision of the Bill which requires any explanation from me; it relates to the aid grant and to the mode of its distribution. It will be in the recollection of the House that when I withdrew the Bill of last year I made a promise to the Voluntary Schools that whatever else happened in consequence of that withdrawal, they and their interests at all events should not be allowed to suffer. That pledge, Sir, we have fulfilled in the present Bill. Whereas the Bill of last year only allocated 4s. per child in average attendance to the Voluntary Schools, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has permitted me to raise that amount to 5s.—[cheers]—the result of which will be that whereas the most that would have been spent last year upon Voluntary Schools had the Bill become law would have amounted to £489,000, the amount that will be spent in the next financial year when this Bill becomes law will be £616,500, a large increase, partly, no doubt, due to the increasing number of children in Voluntary Schools—["Hear, hear!"]—but due in a still larger measure to the additional 1s. grant which my right hon. Friend has sanctioned. Therefore, Sir, that pledge, at all events, has been, as I think will be admitted on all sides, amply satisfied by the Government. ["Hear, hear!"] But that is not, in my judgment, the greatest improvement, the only or the greatest improvement with regard to the allocation of the aid grant which has been introduced into the new Bill. It will be remembered that the Bill of last year turned entirely upon the local authority. It was through the local authority and it was in the area controlled by the local authority that the aid grant was spent, and the invariable result of that must have been that money would not have gone so far or have been so effectively used in dealing with the worst cases as it may be under a more flexible system dealing probably with larger areas than those the country authority proposed to be set up had under its supervision. Of course, every 1s of this total sum of £616,000 which goes to a school which does not require it, or goes to a school which requires it less than another school, is pro tanto not used to the best advantage, and we have been most desirous of devising some scheme by which, as far as human ingenuity can contrive it, every penny of the money shall be used to the greatest possible benefit of the schools. The authority responsible for the distribution under this Bill must necessarily and obviously, as we think, be the Education Department. As the money is money provided by the central Treasury, the body which is to deal with the distribution of that money must be responsible to the Imperial Parliament—it must, as we think, in the ultimate result, be a Government Department responsible to Parliament through the Minister at the head of that Department, who is to have the responsibility of distributing that very large sum of public money; but to ask the Government Department to make a comparative estimate of all the schemes for Voluntary Schools in England and Wales without any assistance appears to us to throw upon that Department a burden which it can hardly be asked to bear. For that reason and other reasons, to which I shall refer immediately, we propose to encourage to the best of our ability the formation of associations of Voluntary Schools—["Hear, hear!" and "Oh, oh!"]—who shall have the right, not indeed to control the distribution of this money amongst the schools forming them, but to advise the Department how the money may be best expended, to frame schemes—in other words, for its distribution amongst the various schools of which the associations are composed. I frankly say the beneficial working of this Bill largely depends upon the manner in which those interested in Voluntary Schools use the power of association given them. If, as I most earnestly hope, they use it largely, if the great body of Voluntary Schools in this country are brought into organisation, I think that the result will not merely be that the money which is placed at their disposal will be probably better spent for the promotion of education and the support of the schools than it could be under any other plan, but there will be a common feeling aroused and common machinery brought into existence which will have the very best effect upon the educational and religious efficiency of all schools which take care to join an association. Any association approved by the Education Department will have a right to that definite share of the aid grant. Having a right to that definite share it will have the power to frame a scheme for its distribution, which the Department will, of course, have the power to reject or modify, but which will, I anticipate, in all probability usually guide the Department in the discretion vested in it by the Bill. In this case the interests of the Education Department—that is to say, of education—and those of the associations are, from the very nature of the case, and must be, identical. The associations have, and can have, no other object than the promotion of the efficiency of the schools which form them. Individual managers isolated, it may be, from the operation of public opinion other than that of a small secluded parish may in certain cases allow these questions to slide, but an association must have those interests ever before its mind. The associations will be able to give not merely pecuniary assistance, but assistance in many other ways to their constituent units, and, unless I am greatly deceived, if the Voluntary Schools take full advantage of the liberty to form associations which they are encouraged to take, I think that every friend of education, let alone every friend of the Voluntary system, will have every reason to congratulate himself upon the result which this Bill is likely to produce. I ought to say that so strongly do we believe in the importance of association that we have put in a special provision enabling the Education Department to refuse any assistance out of the aid grant to any school which unreasonably refuses to join the association—["Oh, oh!"]—provided always that no school shall be required to join the association where the majority in the school belongs to a different denomination. There is one other point of great importance which I am most desirous of making very clear to the Committee. In the Bill the Education Department have the right to draw a distinction between town and country, and while the total amount given to the Voluntary Schools over England and Wales is determined by the rate which I have just indicated—namely, 5s. per child on the average attendance—the Education Department have a right to say that town schools, or rather associations containing more town schools than other associations, shall get a larger proportion of grant. Let the Committee not suppose that that means a country school is to get less than a town school. There are many town schools which ought to get much less than 5s., and I hope that under the Bill they will get less. But undoubtedly those districts in which there is a large urban population have greater need than the Voluntary Schools in rural districts, and this for more than one reason. In the first place, the urban schools, especially in the North, suffered very much by the Free Education Act. [Ministerial cheers.] The schools in country districts benefited by the Free Education Act. There is one county in England which gained as much, I think, as 7s. per child in average attendance by the 10s. fee grant which freed Voluntary Schools. While there are counties in that position, there are urban districts where Voluntary Schools were largely supported out of fees, which fees they no longer pay, and which amounted to more than the inadequate 10s., and which they were to be recouped out of the central Exchequer. If that reason is not enough it is manifest that the educational needs of urban districts and the expense of satisfying those needs must, on the whole, be greater than the corresponding needs of rural districts. You have only to look at the expense to which Board Schools go in the education of urban children to see what their view of the situation is. Though I am far from denying that there are, indeed, some Board Schools which are culpably extravagant, the broad fact remains that urban education is more costly than rural education, and the urban power of getting subscriptions does not keep pace with it. Therefore, this general provision of the Education Department is one which I am convinced will greatly add to the utility of the Bill.

Mr. LEONARD COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): Will the right hon. Gentleman say what the provision is?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Hon. Gentlemen opposite found t so clear that I felt I was understood by the Committee. Let us suppose the Bill in full operation in the manner in which the Government hope it will work, should then conceive that the greater part of the Voluntary Schools of the ountry would organise themselves into ssociations. There will no doubt be a nargin of schools which cannot be so rganised. They will not be penalised or not forming themselves into an organisation. Of those in association each ssociation will receive an amount of noney corresponding to the number of cholars in average attendance in the chools composing it, subject only to the act that if there be many urban schools hey will get more than the average 5s., nd if many rural schools they will get ess. [AN HON. MEMBER: "How much?"] That is left to the Education Department. [Opposition murmurs.] These vill manifestly remain over the non-associated schools. They will have available or distribution among them an equal mount of 5s. each, subject to the distinction of town and country. It is very ikely that the whole of the money will not be distributed by the Education Department, because, presumably, the chools that will refuse to associate will be the rich schools, and possibly certain ther schools may, for adequate reasons, efuse to associate themselves, and thus be deprived of the grant. It is possible, herefore, there may be a margin over n that account. That will be again distributed by the Education Department mong the associated schools.

MR. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Will the schools not associated be ealt with directly by the Education Department?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Yes, they will have to make the est estimate they can of their needs naided by the advice of the association. t is, perhaps, unnecessary for me to say hat we do not propose to alter or interere in any way with the management of he Voluntary Schools. That is altoether outside the scope of our desire. We provide that any school receiving he grant shall have its accounts audited the satisfaction of the Education Department, and we consider that that proision with regard to associations will do a great deal not merely to support the schools which are necessitous, but to improve the inefficiency of those which are inefficient. I think I have now made the general scope of the Bill clear. Let me say the Bill is not a difficult Bill to understand. If hon. Gentlemen will allow it to be read a First time and printed there will be no obscurity surrounding it. It only remains that I should give the general connection which, in our view, subsists between this scheme and the present position of the education controversy.

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.): Will the grant in aid take effect during the present financial year?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I doubt whether it will be possible to get the Bill through in time.

MR. DILLON: A pledge was given that the grant in aid should take effect during the present financial year, and that the Voluntary Schools should lose nothing by it.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The Voluntary Schools will lose nothing by this Bill not being passed last year. On the contrary, they will have gained immensely. If the Bill of last year had passed they would have got a sum estimated at about £100,000 in the last quarter of this year, and they would have gone on getting money at the rate of £480,000 a year. They now get £618,000 a year for ever—[Opposition laughter]—or, if not for ever, until some right hon. Gentleman opposite has the courage to take the money away from them. ["Hear, hear," and a laugh.] There remain only one or two words for me to say as to our view of the relation of this Bill to the present position of the education controversy which has raged with so much warmth, I might almost say bitterness, during the last year and a-half. Let it be noted that the Bill rests entirely on the substructure of the Bill of 1870. That Bill came from its Parliamentary ordeal battered out of recognition by its original framers by the conflicting forces of the two sides, and the result is that we have in England at this moment a system of education which has indeed its merits, but which no human being pretends is symmetrical or logical. The Irish system is a symmetrical and logical one; so is the Scotch. The Scotch system, let me remind hon.

Gentlemen opposite, gives power to the education authority of each parish to teach any religious symbol which it desires—[Opposition cries of "Oh"]—a right which is availed of in nine-tenths or ninety-nine hundredths of the parochial schools in Scotland. While Ireland and Scotland have systems capable of logical defence, we in England undoubtedly live under a system the inconsistencies of which a child can point out. Nothing can be more absurd than the compromise which has worked not unsatisfactorily for these last 25 years. Can anything, for example, be more absurd than to have in one parish where there happens to be a Voluntary School with rich subscribers, but where, it may be, the great mass of the population are Dissenters, the children of the latter compelled to go to a school where there is religious teaching of which the mass disapprove, and yet the latter are prevented from getting any funds out of the rates to build a school of their own, while in the next parish you may have an equal injustice on the other hand? ["Hear, hear!"] You may have a large population of members of the Church of England too poor to obtain a Voluntary School and with a School Board school thrust upon them where they are absolutely precluded from teaching the symbols of the religion they profess. ["Hear, hear!"] That is absolutely indefensible. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not know that anyone tries to defend it. ["Hear, hear!"] This is an inconsistent system which has such strange doctrines advanced as that in the abstract it may be right and is right to spend the taxpayers' money upon undenominational education, but in the abstract it is wrong to spend that money upon denominational education. ["Hear, hear!"] These are anomalies which no one can defend. I might go on, but there are too many of these cases. There is the case of the unfortunate clergyman or priest in a very poor district of some manufacturing town who is hardly able to scrape together the pence which enable him to keep going his Voluntary School which he thinks necessary for the proper religious education of his flock, and at the same time you oblige him to pay a rate to a School Board of which he disapproves —a rate amounting to comparatively an immense sum out of the wretched income he enjoys. ["Hear, hear!"] If that is a grievance to the Church, surely there is the grievance also of the Nonconformists in cases where, because the ground is already occupied by a denominational school, it is impossible for those who do not like the religious teaching given there to get any assistance for any other school out of the public funds. ["Hear, hear!"] None of us can pretend that this is a good system or one which will bear argument, or that it is symmetrical in design. But it has this one immense advantage—it does allow scope both for a system of denominational religious teaching on the one hand and teaching which is not denominational on the other. ["Hear, hear!"] And it is because the system is big enough and roomy enough for both these methods of education that so far it has not been found unworthy of the general favour of the English public. ["Hear, hear!"] I am not going to argue as to the necessity or advantage of denominational religious teaching. I hold and have publicly expressed very strong personal views upon this subject, and I shall not trouble the House with them again. But I want the House to remember that it is really folly to suppose that if the denominational schools are starved out of existence the people of this country will ever consent to acquiesce in the undenominational teaching they tolerate in the Board Schools— ["hear, hear"]—as long as a denominational system stands side by side with it. ["Hear, hear!"] If anyone chooses to say that matters in which Christians are agreed are infinitely more important than those in which Christians differ—if they say "You ought to be able to found a system of doctrine common to all religious denominations"—I point to the historic fact that all through time and by the necessities of human nature you can only get religious education of adults or children taught by a religious organisation, and that all religious organisations have been associated with a definite doctrinal basis. ["Hear, hear!"] There is no use arguing against facts like these. ["Hear, hear!"] I am convinced that there is no hope of educational peace in this country if at any moment the Board School system were to succeed in squeezing out the voluntary system. But there is a real danger that this may take place. I am not going through the well-worn history of the 3d. rate. Everyone who has any tincture of the knowledge of this subject is aware that no one can be expected to see the great cost and the extravagance of education as conducted by the School Board. [Cheers and cries of "No!"] I make no general charge. I say that the great cost and occasionally great extravagance—[cheers and cries of "No!"]—well, I do not wish to be controversial, and therefore I will say simply the great cost of School Board education, which is all that is necessary for my argument. The result of that has been to throw an ever increasing strain upon the not illimitable resources of the Voluntary Schools. That is a familiar story known by everyone. It is not merely in the interests of those hon. Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House, who are attached as I am to a system of denominational religious teaching, but in the interest of those who are attached to the undenominational system, that I say that both Parties should try to make this Bill a workable success. [Cheers.] I have seen symptoms in more than one Party of desire to use the present crisis in education for the purpose of upsetting the Act of 1870 and to build a new educational building upon new foundations. Some hon. Friends of mine upon this side of the House wish that there should be a general system introduced which should place denominational teaching upon a very different basis from that on which it now rests. With every sympathy for their aims I may say that, in my judgment, they are unwise for two reasons—in the first place, because I do not think the public opinion of this country is ripe, or will be ripe for many years, if ever, for the sort of change which they desire. ["Hear, hear!"] At all events, it is not ripe at the present time. ["Hear, hear!"] A Government which should attempt to pass such a gigantic measure would not have at its command a sufficient force to carry it through. [Cheers.] There are some of those friendly critics who say, "You have an enormous majority at your back. Do you mean to say that with such a majority you cannot carry any Bill you desire to pass?" Friendly critics who make that observation are at liberty to deal as they please with Government proposals, but the liberty they ask for themselves is one which they can scarcely refuse to others. ["Hear, hear!"] While I do not doubt that they will be found zealous supporters of the Government policy if it squared with their own views, they can hardly seek to impose a discipline upon others of our followers which these Gentlemen themselves are the last to accept in their own case. [Cheers.] I have a second objection to this attempt to repeal the whole scheme of our voluntary education, and it is this—no human being can tell what would be the issue of such an attempt. [Cheers.] I do not mean the issue to the Government—for that is a small matter—nor to the Party, for they exist for the community—but my belief is that it is impossible for any man to foresee what system of education would issue from a general controversy in which the whole subject of the Act of 1870 would be thrown into the melting pot. ["Hear, hear!"] Until I can see my way more clearly I shall regard such a policy with some mistrust. If those who wish, in the interests of denominational education, to upset the Act of 1870—or those who wish to keep intact that Act of 1870, see with pleasure the gradual operation of those laws which at the present moment are starving out of existence Voluntary Schools—their error from their own point of view, it seems to me, is profound. If their wish could be fulfilled and it were even possible for Voluntary Schools to maintain the struggle for a long period, and we were to introduce the system of undenominational schools, then the whole educational compromise under the Act of 1870 would come to an end. A new state of things would be brought into existence, and it would be impossible for this or any other Government to allay the educational storm which would sweep the country from one end to the other. [Cheers.] It may be said that the Bill is an attempt to patch up a rotten system—the system of 1870. It may be said that the building was never well planned or symmetrical, and that it never satisfied the taste of its legislative architects. All that is true—[cheers]—but I confess that it is no reproach to a practical statesman to say that he endeavours to make the best of the building in which he lives. ["Hear hear!"] If the Voluntary Schools will take full advantage of the present Bill, which I hope will pass, I believe that they will be placed in a position of security that they have not previously occupied. ["Hear, hear!"] But I admit that I may be wrong, and if the Voluntary Schools will not make the best of the opportunity now offered to them, in that case our Bill will fail—in that case the subject will again come up for discussion and treatment in this House. If the signs of the times which meet one in every country in Europe are of any significance as to the future of this country, then I say we shall be in that case involved in religious discussions which certainly will not add to the charity of our public life or to the ease of the Legislature. ["Hear, hear!"] As I have intimated, it is beyond the power of prophecy to say what will happen if everything has to be refashioned from the beginning, and if an attempt is made to meet the views both of those who like the present School Board system and those who like the denominational system. In any case, even if the Bill does fail, I, for my part, shall feel that the Government will have done well to introduce it and try to pass it—as pass it I hope we shall. [Cheers.] We shall have done well, because it is our duty to make the best of what we have got. We have done well, because it is our duty to attempt, at all events, without unnecessary controversy, to settle a great controversial question. I shall not regret it, because, after all, the man who prefers, even for a few years, to live out the bitterness of religious disputation and settles, even for a few years, a subject by which the passions of men are so easily moved, may at least accomplish some good by doing his best to settle and set at rest this burning question. The effort, I say, deserves well, not merely of those who support us in the country, but of our bitterest opponents who profess to maintain the present School Board system, and who, if they believe me, will only be rushing to its destruction if they do anything to hasten the decay of the voluntary system, which is part of the great settlement of 1870. ["Hear, hear!"] If there be any obscurity in my exposition, and obscurity I doubt not there has been, it will, I am sure, be remedied by the first glance at the very short Measure I have to introduce, and I would earnestly deprecate any elaborate discussion upon the provisions of a Measure which hon. Members have not seen, and which cannot, in the nature of things, be seen until the Bill is read a first time. I have not the slightest desire to limit the discussion which the House may desire to have on the Measure, but I venture to think that that discussion would be much better taken at a later period than on the motion that the Committee do now assent to this resolution, which I now beg to move:—

"That it is expedient (a) to authorise the payment out of moneys to be provided by Parliament of an aid grant to Voluntary Schools not exceeding 5s. per scholar for the whole number of scholars in those schools; (b) to repeal, as regards Day Schools, so much of Section 19 of the Elementary Education Act, 1876, as imposes a limit on the Parliamentary grant to Elementary Schools in England and Wales; and (c) to make provision for the exemption from rates of Voluntary Schools." [Cheers.]

MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham) said there were some things which, in view of the speech they had just heard, and in view of the method by which they were about to engage in discussing what had been laid before them, should be said at once. Now, the method in which the matter had been brought before them was somewhat remarkable. They were under the impression last year that a certain portion of the surplus of 1896 must be assigned very early in the present Session—before March 31—and that was why the House of Commons was being called together so early. [Cheers.] They were under the impression that haste was so great that this matter of including Voluntary Schools and excluding Board Schools must be approved before March 31. But now, for the first time, they discovered that the Bill need not be through by March 31. That affected the whole position which the House ought to take up towards the question. What was the question before them, and what was the 4th clause of last year's Bill? It proposed to give part of last year's money to Voluntary Schools and part to Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] Some of the Voluntary Schools, as was indicated in the Queen's Speech of last year, were in a precarious position, and in view of the increasing demands upon them it had been admitted that hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House were not hostile to a certain amount of increased grant from Parliament, under reasonable conditions, to necessitous schools, whether Voluntary or Board Schools. Then there were, on the other hand, ratepayers' schools—the Board Schools. What was the genesis of those schools? Some Gentlemen spoke of them as if they were the product of the fancy of certain groups of individuals. They were the schools erected by the community in those poorer parts of the country parishes and in those poorer parts of towns where no rich people resided. They represented the effort of the community to supply education where voluntary effort could not supply it, and to make up, during the last quarter of a century, the terrible arrears of education in the country. What was the policy of the right hon. Gentleman with all the Session before him? Had not the Government encouraged expectations with regard to the poor Board Schools? They had done so, and he hoped to show that those expectations had been greatly increased by them ever since last Session. But what was the attitude which the right hon. Gentleman had taken up? He said that there was this year a considerable surplus, and that he was dealing with money he had now in hand. But were they to be blindfolded in this matter? The House was, it appeared, to pass the Bill for the Voluntary Schools, but it was to be left absolutely in the dark as to what portion of money was going to be assigned to the Board Schools, or what were called necessitous Board Schools. He should have thought that to introduce two separate Education Bills would be calculated to create more friction and waste more time than to introduce one Bill dealing with the whole question. [Cheers.] But the Government reserved to themselves the opportunity of having no Bill for the Board Schools at all, notwithstanding the general understanding. [" Hear, hear! "] The result of that would be that the Board Schools to which the Government pledged themselves by last year's Bill to give something out of last year's surplus would, perhaps, get nothing even out of this year's surplus. [" Hear, hear! "] What he wanted to show to the House was what the positon of the Government had been with reference to the ratepayers and their schools during the past 18 months—what promises they had made and undertakings they had entered into which, on this occasion, at any rate, they were absolutely going to disappoint. [" Hear, hear! "] He had observed that when his hon. and learned Friends were conducting a breach of promise case they made a great many quotations from letters and documents concerned. The present case was remarkably analogous to a breach of promise case, and, therefore, he proposed to read a few extracts from documents. [" Hear, hear," and laughter.] After the few months available for consideration during the autumn following the General Election, Lord Salisbury spoke one day and the Duke of Devonshire the next day on this subject. That was in November, 1895. Lord Salisbury met a great gathering of Conservative Associations and spoke to them in the following manner:—

> " I wish to point out to you that there are two educational problems. One is to enable those who are educating the people of this country to educate them according to the religious belief of their parents. I believe that to be an essential object, and one of which we ought never to lose sight."

That policy was embodied in Clause 27 of last year's Bill; but that clause was no longer before the House, although, with reference to it, the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich said that it was the only part of last year's Bill which aroused anything like enthusiasm among the friends of religious education. Lord Salisbury continued his speech thus:—

> " The other question is this—How are we to diminish the tremendous burden—and the increasing burden—which the education rate is laying upon many communities in this country?"

The present proposals did nothing directly, and very little indirectly, to diminish these tremendous burdens. [Cheers.] The day after Lord Salisbury made this speech, the Archbishops and Bishops, as a deputation from the Church, went to the Duke of Devonshire, as the First Education Minister of this country. He called him " the first Education Minister " because at present there were three Education Ministers. [Cheers and laughter.] In replying to the deputation, the Duke of Devonshire said:—

> "Probably it is the opinion of many of you that an addition of 5s. would not be an adequate or sufficient sum. But you must remember that a grant of 5s. all round"—[cheers]—"would amount to a million of money. What, I presume, is intended by this demand, is a fixed grant all round. I do not conceive that it is proposed by any legislation to depart from the principle of statutory equality as regards State aid to Voluntary and Board Schools." [Loud Opposition cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: There is no statutory equality.

MR. ACLAND: Is there none now? [Cheers.] I am sorry that the new Education Minister has not followed the methods on which the Parliamentary grants are made. [Cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I am sorry that the old Education Minister has not followed Section 97 of the Act of 1870.

MR. ACLAND said that of course he was not alluding to certain small grants to schools in poor districts. He was alluding to the £7,000,000 which were voted every year in the Estimates under Class 4. [Cheers.] That was what the Duke of Devonshire was alluding to, and that money was allotted on principles of statutory equality between Board and Voluntary Schools. [Cheers.] That was the principle on which the Duke of Devonshire evidently conceived that the whole of this matter ought to be treated; but when the Bill of last year was brought in, it was found not to observe that principle, though it was more generous in admitting the principle of relief and help to Board Schools than the present proposals, which had no time limitation whatever. The provisions of last year's Bill admitted two broad principles, which lay quite outside the present proposals. They admitted Board Schools to a share of the Parliamentary grant, and they admitted the principle of representative control. [Cheers.] Shortly after the introduction of that Bill, one of the staunchest supporters of the Unionist Government, the hon. Member for the Edgbaston Division of Birmingham, said:—

> "The grant should be a grant all round, and if a clause not giving a grant all round remained in the Bill when it became law, he should vote against the Third reading."

Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland.

The hon. Member should find it easy to vote against the Second Reading of the present proposals, which did nothing at all for Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] The fourth clause of last year's Bill gave only £50,000 to Board Schools; but it was hoped that the question would be fully debated, and that it could be shown that, even from the point of view of the Government, it was not a reasonable way of treating necessitous Board Schools. This hope was encouraged by a letter which the Colonial Secretary wrote to Mr. Ansell, a member of the Birmingham School Board, who objected to the differentiation between Board and Voluntary Schools in the special aid grant. The right hon. Gentleman said:—

> "I feel that there is, prima facie, much to be said on the matter, and I have no doubt that these questions will receive the fullest consideration in the Committee on the Bill."

[Ironical cheers.] The Government had taken very good care that questions of that kind should not, as far as they could help it, receive any consideration at all. [Cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken. He seems to think that I have adopted a Parliamentary procedure to assist an attempt to exclude something from the consideration of the Committee. All I have done has been done because I could do nothing else under the rules of this House.

MR. ACLAND said that his contention was that if the Resolution now submitted to the House had contained a proposal to give a certain amount of money to certain poor schools, there would have been no objection on this ground whatever. Then the right hon. Gentleman would not have been "fettered and bound." [Cheers.] Then the Opposition would not have been "fettered and bound." [Cheers.] If the word "elementary" had been substituted for the word "voluntary" in the Resolution, the Committee would have had the discussion which they ought to have, and which they would have had last year if Clause 4 had been reached. When last year's Bill was being discussed a very remarkable speech was made by a former Education Minister, the right hon. Member for Dartford. With reference to Clause 4, which proposed to give only £50,000 to Board Schools and nearly £500,000 to Voluntary Schools—

> "he thought some change would have to be made with regard to this grant and its distribution. If this was to be a fair and just Bill it must not help the Voluntary Schools and pretend, up to a certain point, to assist the Board Schools, and then secure the one and leave the Board Schools out in the cold."

[Cheers.] That would be a good motto for the present procedure. The Government were determined, whatever else happened, to secure the Voluntary Schools, and then, if time permitted—[laughter]—they would see whether or not they would leave the Board Schools out in the cold. [Cheers.] The right hon. Member for Dartford added, in the same speech—

> "Unless this was a fair and just, it could not be a lasting, settlement, but would lead to future controversies and struggles in the House."

[Cheers.] So much for the expectations created at the time last year's Bill was withdrawn.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I distinctly stated in July that this Bill would be restricted to Voluntary Schools.

MR. ACLAND said that he would not deny that the right hon. Gentleman had said so, but at that time Clause 4 was so fully in the mind of everyone that there was no thought of nothing being given to the Board Schools in the present Measure. During the Recess there were some remarkable utterances which encouraged the belief that the position of the Board Schools, and of the ratepayers who supported them, was likely to be much better in the new Bill than in that of last year. He would now quote from the second Education Minister. [Cheers and laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, writing in The North American Review in October 1896, said:—

> "In the country the Voluntary Schools are better off than the Board Schools. There is no competition and no necessity for levelling up as in the towns. The Voluntary Schools can hold their own without further pecuniary support." [Cheers.] "The rates levied in School Board districts are a greater burden upon the people than the subscriptions in parishes which have Voluntary Schools." [Cheers.] "It is rather, indeed, the Board Schools which require financial assistance to enable the instruction given in them to be levelled up to the same efficiency as that given by their rivals."

After such a statement from the Vice President, what was the Government doing? Were they aware that out of 2,500 Boards in this country no less than 1,750 were in districts with less than 3,000 inhabitants? And for these School Boards, which needed levelling up rather than leaving out in the cold, the Government were, for the present, going to do absolutely nothing. [Cheers.] Then the right hon. Gentleman wrote an article in the November issue of the Nineteenth Century, in which he said that in rural districts where the Board School system was not spreading there were many parishes in which the Voluntary Schools were in no danger of extinction, and he added:—

> "In any grant made by the Exchequer to country schools it would be difficult to defend upon any principle of justice its restriction to those under Voluntary management."

[Cheers.] Did the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House wonder after that that the country had expected that something was going to be done for country Board Schools? [Cheers.] The Vice-President of the Council then went on:—

> "Two parishes may exist side by side, in which there is equal need of additional funds to make the village school efficient. The parish which is under School Board management is probably the poorer of the two, lacking the wealthier residents whose subscriptions help to keep up the Voluntary School. It has greater burdens, for it has to pay for elections and management as well as for schools. It would be impossible to give a grant from the Exchequer to the richer parish and leave the poorer out in the cold."

[Cheers.] But what the head of the Education Department in this House first said would be difficult and then said would be impossible the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury had found himself able to do that day. [Cheers.] On another occasion, speaking to the metropolitan division of the National Union of Conservative and Constitutional Associations, the Vice-President of the Board of Education made the same remark about the two country parishes side by side, one with a School Board and the other without a School

Board, and pointed out that the one without the School Board would get a substantial grant, while the other, although the poorer parish, would get nothing. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to deal with the towns. He said:—

> "In the towns there would be this difficulty—that a town which bore very little burden now, because most of the children were educated in Voluntary Schools, would get a very large grant from the Government, whereas a neighbouring town which had a large number of children in the Board Schools and had only a few Voluntary Schools, would get very little indeed out of the Government; and when the different towns in the kingdom came to examine how much they would get out of a grant of that kind, strong representations would come from many quarters that they were not being treated with justice."

[Cheers.] After reading such speeches the friends of the Board Schools believed they had the voice of the Government encouraging them to hope that the case of the Board Schools, instead of getting weaker, was getting stronger and stronger; but now they found that they were on that point entirely mistaken. ["Hear, hear!"] There was a remarkable gathering held at the Church House, Dean's Yard, in November, to consider the education question. What that meeting recommended was an equal grant from the Parliamentary funds to all schools alike—Voluntary and Board—of 6s. per child, and they added, as an essential and vital part of their scheme, a rate-aid grant for children in Voluntary Schools within Board School districts. The Church Conference might fairly say that if rate-aid in Board School districts was withdrawn their whole scheme fell to the ground. He therefore did not want to draw any unjust conclusions from the recommendations of that meeting; but he would point out that there were 4½ millions of children approximately in average attendance in all schools. Of those, approximately, two milions were in Board Schools and 2½ millions approximately in Voluntary Schools. Voluntary Schools might be divided roughly into halves—one-half in Board School districts where there was a Board School rate, and the other half in non-Board School districts where there was no such rate. If the Church Conference could have obtained from the Government a grant either from the rates or from the State, which would be a grant to the extra necessitous in the Board School districts, then on that assumption the Church Conference were willing to treat all their children in non-Board School districts on an equality with Board School children, and give them an equal grant from the Imperial fund. It seemed to him that that tended to show that the Church Conference, if their own case had been met, were willing to take a more generous view of grants of Imperial aid, whether to Board or to Voluntary Schools, than the Government themselves took. ["Hear, hear!"] But without pressing that point too far, he would come to the methods of giving and distributing the money as proposed by the Government. The proposition this year was that £620,000 was to be given to the Voluntary Schools, or £125,000 more than last year; whereas, in the case of the Board Schools, instead of an increase, there was nil—a reduction of £50,000. That meant that when they took the equivalent grant for Ireland and Scotland—

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): This is not a case for an equivalent grant at all.

MR. ACLAND: Surely there will be an equivalent grant, for some purpose or another, to Ireland and Scotland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The question of education has not been treated in the way of equivalent grants at all. Ireland has more than her equivalent grant.

MR. ACLAND: Then do I understand that Ireland is to receive no equivalent at all for this gift of over half-a-million to a certain portion of the English community? Do I understand also that Scotland, which has been so long in the van of education, will receive no equivalent? [Cheers.]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The right hon. Gentleman misunderstands me. Of course the question of primary education both in Ireland and Scotland will have to be considered. What I meant by saying that there would be no equivalent grant to Ireland or Scotland is that this question is not to be treated as contributions have been treated in relief of local taxation.

Mr. ACLAND admitted that what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said had somewhat changed his position on that point. What he had meant to say was that if Ireland and Scotland were given equivalent grants the sum which it would be necessary to pay out for the purposes of education or for similar purposes to the three countries would have considerably exceeded three-quarters of a million. However, £620,000 was about to be voted in aid of Voluntary Schools, and that was enough for his purpose. He should like to know in what way was the contribution to be made in this country. Two-thirds of the population of this country who were in School Board districts paid rates for School Boards; and the other third, who were mostly in country districts, did not pay School Board rates. But what did the Government propose to do? They were going to take two-thirds of the money from districts largely urban, where School Board rates were paid, and to hand over a very considerable portion of it to districts largely rural where no School Board rates were paid at all. So far as that was the case, it was the policy of the Agricultural Rating Act of last year. [Cheers.] He agreed with the First Lord of the Treasury that in a complicated matter of this kind it was hardly advisable at present to attempt an analysis of the particular method of distribution. But he thought he might assume that Lancashire was not going to suffer under the Bill of this year as compared with the Bill of last year, and also that the Voluntary Schools of Lancashire would get on an average not much less than 5s. per child. Then, assuming that in the case of Lancashire there would be a 5s. grant all round and in the case of London a 5s. grant all round, what would be the position of the taxpayer in London as compared with the taxpayer in Lancashire? Lancashire would get on that basis about £114,000, while London, which had almost exactly the same number of children all told, Voluntary and Board, in average attendance, would on the same basis only get about £44,000, or £70,000 a year less than Lancashire. [Cheers.] He commended that to the attention of the London Members. [Cheers.] The London ratepayer, who paid a rate twice as high as did the Lancashire ratepayer, instead of getting twice as much money was going to get £70,000 a year less. He wished to plead the case of Manchester before the right hon. Gentleman. [Ironical cheers.] He would contrast Manchester with some other towns which had not such poor districts as Manchester, and where the community had not been obliged, in order to provide education for its children, to build schools at a larger expense to the ratepayers. He would take the case of three Lancashire boroughs which got about the same number of Voluntary School children as Manchester—Bury, Preston, and St. Helens. He found that they had something like 40,000 children in Voluntary Schools, while so had Manchester. If Manchester had no other children to look after, then Manchester would be on an equality with Bury, Preston, and St. Helens; but then there was the case of all the remaining Manchester children, to the number of 33,000, who were in Board Schools and who were not getting a penny out of this Bill. The Manchester ratepayer paid certainly a sixpenny rate, if he were not mistaken, and a very considerable amount—he thought 17s. or 18s. per child—to the Board Schools. But the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do nothing whatever towards all these Board School children in Manchester, although there were 33,000 more of them to deal with than in those three boroughs which were going to get 5s. for every one of their children. His surprise was that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Manchester should treat the Manchester and Lancashire ratepayers in this way. [Ironical cheers.] He had in his hand an interesting card which was sent out to the constituents of the right hon. Gentleman at the last General Election in Manchester. On one side it had two trumpeters and a crown—[laughter]—over the two trumpeters, who carried flags on their trumpets, were written the words, "Security and prosperity." [Laughter and Ministerial cheers.] Under the crown is written the word "Progress," and at the bottom of this picture—

> "Your vote and interest are respectfully solicited on behalf of the right hon. Gentleman, Arthur James Balfour, Unionist candidate for East Manchester."

Then followed the name of the printer and publisher in Manchester, and the words "See over." He saw over, and there he found the words at the top, "The programme of the Unionist Party under 15 heads"—[laughter]—and between the "exclusion of pauper aliens" and "Church Defence"—and he was certain there was not a word in this programme as to assistance to Voluntary Schools—he found these remarkable words, "Poor Law and School Board rates to be charged on the Imperial Exchequer." [Laughter and ironical cheers.] Here they were in Committee of Ways and Means, dealing with the funds of the Imperial Exchequer, and the present time he should have thought an eligible opportunity for dealing with the matter. He commended that view of the right hon. Gentleman to some of the boroughs in Lancashire which paid School Board rates besides Manchester. Then there was the case of Birmingham, five boroughs at least in Staffordshire, the large boroughs in the West Riding—Leeds, Halifax, Sheffield, places like Yarmouth, Norwich, and even in the South like Croydon and Brighton. If these cases were looked into it would soon be seen what a large share of the taxation might be given to them if they were dealt with on the Duke of Devonshire's principle of statutory equality, and what a very small portion they would get under this proposal. He left out of sight the whole question of what were called the poor Board School districts, places like West Ham, Walthamstow, Romford, and Tottenham—all of these were to be dealt with this Session on the principle, probably, of nothing for most of them, and, if time permitted, a little for some of them. So far as he could discover there was nothing whatever to guarantee that the voluntary subscriptions to Voluntary Schools were to be maintained, although it had often been asserted by Leaders of the opposite side, and by Archbishops and Bishops, that they ought to do everything in their power to keep up voluntary subscriptions in order to preserve the very name of Voluntary Schools. The late Archbishop of Canterbury said that the North was not qualifying—qualifying, he said, meant paying subscriptions; and, he added, he had never got an answer to the question why the people of the North should get admission to all the rates for a subscription of 3s. 6d. for each child, when their subscription in the South was 10s. 6d. There was nothing in what the right hon. Gentleman said which appeared to give any guarantee whatever that a good deal of this money might not be poured into the Voluntary Schools—no doubt for an excellent purpose—and a good deal of it be wasted by coming out of them again at the other end in the form of a reduction of subscriptions. No doubt they should hear more about that before this Bill had passed, but he would take this opportunity of saying that the State abandoned any encouragement of the idea of local support. The 17s. 6d. limit, which they called so wicked, and which was an invention of the Tory Government of 1876, was now to be abolished, and the State laid down principles for the future that demanded no local support whatever to meet the support which came from the Exchequer.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The right hon. Gentleman has no right whatever to say that; he has not seen the Bill.

MR. ACLAND said he should, of course, be glad to hear if there was some provision which the right hon. Gentleman had not mentioned, but the abolition of the 17s. 6d. limit was generally supposed to mean the abolition of any condition remaining on the Statute Book by which local subscribers were expected to contribute something to meet the grant. ["Hear, hear!"] With reference to the rating of school buildings there was no doubt that there were some districts in London and other places where he did not think the ratepayers would be afraid to say that to some extent this proposal was a giving of rate aid to Voluntary Schools. He quite agreed that in many country places the amount which would be laid upon the ratepayers would be very small. He thought, however, he was bound to give, at any rate, one case—that of the parish of St. George-the-Martyr in Southwark—where Voluntary Schools were very moderately rated, much more so than the Board Schools, and yet in that parish the Voluntary Schools would not in future pay the £165 which they had been in the habit of paying. That sum broken up among the children in the Voluntary Schools came to 1s. 6d. per child, so that these children would receive not only 5s. each from the Exchequer, but also 1s. 6d. each from the ratepayer. There was not to be a word in the Bill as to any change of management in the Voluntary Schools. Last year, according to the evidence of the noble Lord the Member for Rochester, and other Members, the Bill gave control to the ratepayers in a form which did not prove satisfactory to the House; it could not be laid merely to their account that the scheme broke down, when they remembered the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for the Honiton Division of Devonshire. Now they had withdrawn any control scheme whatever. They must bear in mind that this subject was growing more and more important in the feelings especially of the people in the country districts. Would it not be well to listen to the moderate counsels of Lord Northbrook, who was chairman of his county council and knew the county districts in the South of England well, who, writing to the Bishop of Winchester, said that in his opinion there ought to be on the management of country schools representation of the parents, or representation of the parish council? ["Hear, hear!"] He thought that if they knew the minds of some hon. Gentlemen opposite they would say that they were not themselves in favour in many country districts of the extremely limited clerical control which in many places alone held sway. ["Hear, hear."] He thought they would say they would like to see all country schools follow the example of some of the best Voluntary country schools where parents were represented, and sometimes even the Parish Council or the parish meeting. It seemed to him a source of great regret that, having given them some idea that the Government believed in the principle of control, and were not afraid of it last year, they asked for this enormous sum to Voluntary Schools this year, and withdrew entirely from any position they might have taken up with regard to the representation of either parents or inhabitants on the management of Voluntary Schools. Looking at the general educational aspects of the proposition laid before the Committee, he had to say that the administration from the centre was difficult in any case. It was more difficult, as the Leader of the House suggested, than the system either of Ireland or of Scotland. The subject stirred some of the deepest and strongest feelings they could find in man. By the present proposal, on the one hand, they were embarrassing and making more difficult the administration at the centre and in the country at large; among those who were interested in the cause of the ratepayers' schools they were raising a feeling, by keeping them out in the cold, of irritation and exasperation which they could not expect easily to allay. All this was injurious to true education. [Cheers.] It was going to make their progress in the uncontentious matters of education, which were so important to this country, more difficult than it was before. It was going to raise, in a form which never had been raised, an antagonistic spirit with reference to the way in which the Government dealt with elementary education. The hon. and learned Member for Warwick and Leamington, in seconding the Address to the Speech from the Throne, urged them to take a very moderate line on educational questions. But it was not quite so easy to take a moderate line when the question was treated in the way in which it was to be treated now—["Hear, hear!"]—when one Party to the bargain, one strong claimant for help, was left absolutely outside. As to the Act of 1870, did the Government think they were preserving it by the methods and the proposal now laid before them? They were trustees there for all those who bore the burden in regard to education, whatever kind of school they supported. They must do their best, and he hoped some hon. Gentlemen on the other side would help them, to fight out what were really the broad issues of this question. [Cheers and counter-cheers.] The principles of the Act of 1870 were the principles of equality. [Opposition cheers and Ministerial cries of "Rates."] He did not wish to say one word of threat, but he would quote the words of the Duke of Devonshire when he met a clerical deputation at Birmingham:—

> "Where once the principles of the Act of 1870 had been departed from," he said, "it is of course open to your opponent to regard the settlement then arrived at as completely at an end. I think it will be prudent on the part of the managers of Voluntary Schools to remember that the existence of Parliament is not perpetual."

[Cheers.] The Government had had a great opportunity. They had a huge surplus last year; they would have a great surplus this year. They had an immense majority in the House of Commons, and they had had—he said it without hesitation—on many points a not unreasonable minority. With all these advantages, and with no limit of time to hold them back, he thought it was a matter of profound regret that they had taken such a Measure, and that they had selected such a manner to put their Measure into force. [Cheers.] The Government had laid before the Committee a Measure which went back upon the expectations which they had created in the minds of those who were interested in the Board Schools of this country. They had put them in a position in which only half the case could be fully dealt with, and they had deliberately shut out the Board Schools into the cold. They had chosen a method of dealing with this matter in the House of Commons which, he ventured to say, prejudiced even their own case, which was unjust to the ratepayers and taxpayers, and which was gravely unfair to their representatives in the House of Commons. [Cheers.]

MR. R. JEBB (Cambridge University) trusted his right hon. Friend opposite would pardon him if he ventured to express the opinion that, while he devoted a large portion of his speech to details, he did not altogether succeed in presenting a fair general view of the circumstances under which this Bill had been produced or of the intentions of the First Lord of the Treasury. [Cheers.] The Bill was confined to the object of affording a limited amount of relief, at as early a date as might be practicable, of an urgently needed kind. ["Hear, hear!"] As to the urgency he ventured to say there could be no dispute. [Cheers.] It was certain that, if such aid was not afforded at a reasonably early date, very large numbers of their Voluntary Schools would be threatened with extinction—["hear, hear!"]—and it was not disputable that if the Voluntary Schools were to perish there would be cast upon the ratepayers a new annual burden exceeding £4,000,000. ["Hear, hear!"] As to the amount of relief which the Bill proposed to give, he confessed that in his opinion it fell short of that which the supporters of Voluntary Schools might rightfully claim. ["Hear, hear!"] He held the view formulated by the meeting of the two Convocations at the Church House, and put forward on behalf of the Roman Catholics of this country by their hierarchy, that supporters of Voluntary Schools were entitled, not merely in return for what they had done and were doing, but simply as citizens and ratepayers, to share in that education rate raised within school districts which they helped to pay. [Cheers.] That, however, was not in question at the present time. It had been assumed throughout his speech by his right hon. Friend opposite that the Leader of the House did not really intend to introduce a Bill for the relief of the necessitous Board Schools. He submitted there was absolutely no ground for such an assumption as that. [Cheers.] The Leader of the House told them quite plainly and frankly that he did not intend to introduce such a Measure at an early date, and it might be in the knowledge of some Members that a few days ago there appeared in the Press a letter addressed by the First Lord of the Treasury to the hon. Member for West Ham in which a similar pledge was given in the most distinct and unequivocal terms. There was, therefore, absolutely no ground for asserting over and over again that the necessitous Board Schools were to be left out in the cold. ["Hear, hear!"] But it was impossible to discuss this Bill without touching on a question which lay at the root of the whole matter, and that was the policy of giving public money to denominational schools. There were two views of elementary education competing in this country, and that competition was at the root of all their controversies on this subject. One view was—and he desired to state it as fairly as he could—that education might be satisfactory, although it was very largely secular, or else tempered by religious instruction according to a standard which might vary in each municipality. The religious instruction might be such as to satisfy even some Church people. It might be such as to satisfy all Christians; it might be such as to be acceptable to all Christians plus the Unitarians; it might be such as to be acceptable to all persons who acknowledged the existence of a God; it might be such as to be accepted even by those who did not. That was the present state of the religious element in the Board Schools' instruction.

The other view was that since education tended to form character and to aim at forming character, and since religion was most potent for that purpose, education should be based upon its teaching, and that if this religious teaching was to have that fundamental place in education it must be definite. [" Hear, hear!"] It could not be denied that parents had a right to choose in which of these two views their children were to be educated —the Board School view or the Voluntary School view. [" Hear, hear!"] About three-sevenths, or, as his right hon. Friend said, four-ninths, at all events less than half, of the children of the country now receive elementary education in Board Schools, and more than half in Voluntary Schools. The State imposes elementary education on all. The State, therefore, has no moral right to penalise any of its citizens for preferring that view presented by the Voluntary Schools. [" Hear, hear!"] If the State does that it enforces on the community an arbitrary and a narrow idea of education, and fines them for not keeping to it. Before 1870 no one would have dreamed of such a thing. Board Schools were set up, not to supplant, but to supplement Voluntary Schools. [" Hear, hear!"] The doctrine that Board Schools should be universal and that education based on religious and sectarian caprice, in which eccentric persons chose to indulge, should be paid for as they would pay for any other expensive luxury, was not only a novel doctrine, but repugnant to common sense and common justice. [" Hear, hear!"] But it was very justly urged that when public money was given to denominational schools there should be representative control of those schools. [" Hear, hear!"] All recognised that. His right hon. Friend who had just sat down said the Bill would not give representative control. What was the form of public aid to be given? If it was to be a grant from the State, then the form of control correlative to State aid would be central control by the State; but if it was to be rate aid, then the correlative control would be local control. But they had not to do with rate aid, and therefore nothing to do with local control. What form of central control could be more complete and effectual than that the Bill proposed to give—the control of the Education Department? [" Hear, hear!"] Take the case of those schools which grouped themselves in association. Each such federation was to prepare a scheme which was to be submitted to the Education Department, and this scheme was to indicate how it was proposed to allocate the grant the federation would receive in its collective capacity among several schools belonging to it. The scheme would have to be submitted to the Education Department, and with the Department would lie the right to modify or reject the scheme. Suppose the Education Department had reason to know from the evidence of its inspectors that a particular school was in an efficient state, it would have the power to diminish or withhold that portion of the grant the federation proposed to apply to that school. Take the case of particular schools which did not federate for any reason, in regard to each of these the Education Department would have the right to withhold the grant on the ground of inefficiency. [" Hear, hear!"] But, moreover, it could withhold it simply on the ground that a particular school had unreasonably declined to join a federation; while it was provided that a school which was denominationally isolated should not be made to join a federation of which the majority of schools belonged to another denomination. If these guarantees that grants should not go to non-efficient schools were not adequate, he really did not know what guarantee could be so. [" Hear, hear!"] Then it had been urged outside the House, in anticipation of the Bill, and no doubt the topic would come up again in course of discussion before the Bill passed, that public money should not be given to any denominational school unless that school could meet the grant with a certain proportional voluntary subscription. [" Hear, hear!"] Evidently the friends of Voluntary Schools had the strongest of all possible reasons for earnestly desiring and strenuously endeavouring to keep up their subscriptions. And why? Simply for the reason that without that help they could not hope to compete on the strength of State aid alone with Board Schools, which had both State aid and rate aid. [" Hear, hear!"] Board Schools had hitherto had claims on the State; but, in addition, Board

Schools were spending nearly five millions a year on maintenance alone, the total expenditure of the School Boards of England and Wales amounting to about eight and a half millions. What had been done by the subscribers to Voluntary Schools? In 1870 the total amount of annual subscriptions was about £295,000, and at the present time it was more than double that—about £600,000. [" Hear, hear ! "] An hon. Friend reminded him these were Church of England Schools alone, so his argument was the stronger. Since 1870 Church of England Schools alone had expended about seven and a half millions. Then there were school buildings and endowments—what he might call the crystallised form of subscriptions. It was this assistance alone which had made it possible for Voluntary Schools to hold their own against Board Schools, which could respond to every new requirement of the Education Department by drawing on the bottomless purse of the rates. [" Hear, hear ! "] But the point to which he particularly desired to draw attention was this, that you could not fairly lay down the rule that voluntary subscriptions should everywhere and in every case bear a fixed ratio to the amount of State aid. Take the case of poor schools in the poorest parts of the great towns of the north, and as a good instance the Roman Catholic Schools. These, like many of our own Church Schools ministered to the very poorest of the poor. They had fewer sources of aid to which they could look outside the area of their own district and their own communion, and greatly to the honour of the Roman communion they had never yet surrendered one of their schools. Think for a moment what a sacrifice this simple fact implied, and how difficult it would be to raise subscriptions among the poorest populations of these northern towns, and what it meant to impose on these poor people in addition to the duty of providing daily bread for their young children that of saving them from starvation of mind. [" Hear, hear ! "] Those who had charge of these schools had to go far afield and make application to charitable persons all over the country and continually to renew efforts of the most laborious kind to make ends meet. In the case of such districts as these, where from the very nature of the case Voluntary subscriptions could not be merely local, but must be largely non-local, it would be unreasonable to place schools under similar conditions as to the ratio of local subscriptions as those situated in well-to-do districts where subscriptions could be raised with comparative ease. [" Hear, hear ! "] Before sitting down he added a few words on the general relations of the Bill to the prospect of future legislation on this subject. The Bill did not carry, and his right hon. Friend did not claim for it, the character of finality. [" Hear, hear " from The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY.] That was no reproach to the Bill. It would be very difficult to say how a final solution of the elementary education problem could be found until the country realised more widely and clearly than it yet had done the true relation of such projects to Mr. Forster's Act of 1870. Some of his hon. Friends had been accustomed to speak of Mr. Forster's Act as a settlement and a compromise. He was sorry to say that if it was once a settlement it had long been unsettled and not fairly to Voluntary Schools. [" Hear, hear ! "] If it was originally a compromise it had come to be a compromise in which the interest of one of the contracting parties was ignored. If it was still observed in the letter it had often been violated, and was often still violated in the spirit. [" Hear, hear ! "] Board Schools were set up not to occupy the whole field of elementary education, but to fill up vacant spaces in it. With diffidence he expressed his feeling that there were only two methods by which the problem of elementary education could be finally dealt with. One method was to give Voluntary Schools a share in the education rate levied in the School Board district, they in return having a fair amount of local control with those safeguards for preserving the distinctive basis and character of the denominational schools. [" Hear, hear ! "] He felt that with a little goodwill and a little trust and confidence on both sides this could be carried out far more easily than many of his hon. Friends supposed. [" Hear, hear ! "] The other method did not lie within the range of present politics. It was that the State should take over the maintenance of all the elementary schools, paying for them out of the taxes, leaving localities and denominations to find the buildings. This did not now seem to be within the range of practical politics, and he was aware that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could hardly be induced to entertain such an idea unless the country declared for it in an unmistakable manner, but he did not feel so certain that some such plan might not be heard of in years to come. Meantime one thing might be done which would largely facilitate the settlement of this elementary education problem, and that was to draw a line between primary and secondary education. ["Hear, hear!"] He earnestly hoped that Her Majesty's Government might be induced to consider the expediency of introducing legislation at an early date defining elementary education, not merely from the point of view of those solicitous for secondary education, but on account of its intimate bearing on the elementary education of Voluntary Schools. Meanwhile he recognised that this limited Measure was founded on plain and broad grounds of justice. It was to be supplemented at an early date by a Measure giving relief to necessitous Board Schools. While fully recognising the sincerity of the intentions of hon. Gentlemen opposite and the signal services many of them had rendered to the cause of education, he yet contended that those on his side of the House were no less earnest in their desire to promote educational efficiency, and in that spirit he approved of the present proposal. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) remarked that the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken had said that this was a limited Bill, founded on principles of justice, and about to be speedily supplemented by another Bill, which would deal with necessitous Board Schools. The Bill was, indeed, a limited Bill. [Opposition cheers.] Those interested in necessitous Board Schools never thought, until within the last few days, that it would be so limited; and it was a Bill wholly opposed to the principles of justice on account of that very limitation. [Opposition cheers.] Of course, if the Bill were to be supplemented in a few weeks, or even months, with a certainty of its passing in the present Session, by a Bill dealing with the necessitous Board School districts, they on that side of the House should only now ask why the two portions of the Bill had been dissociated, and why they should be given the trouble of fighting this Bill on the ground that the other matter was not included in it, and then have that other matter dealt with in the present Session by another Bill which they should all accept. The question of the procedure of the House was one of great importance in connection with this question. They were so tied up and limited by the Resolution they were asked to pass, confined as it was to Voluntary Schools, that they would be prevented in Committee from raising the claims of the necessitous Board Schools; and it was therefore necessary and most strictly relevant on this Resolution to discuss the claims of the necessitous Board Schools to equal treatment with that meted out to the Voluntary Schools. As he understood it would not be competent for them to move to extend the scope of the Resolution beyond the Voluntary Schools so as to include the necessitous Board Schools, many hon. Members would be driven to vote against the whole Resolution on the ground of its injustice. ["Hear, hear!"] The Leader of the House had said he was astonished that they should be surprised at the present Bill being limited by the word "Voluntary" in this way. Having been chairman of the conference on this very subject, which represented the Board School authorities in the country, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that it was never for one moment supposed that the Bill would be so limited. ["Hear, hear!"] Last year, when the right hon. Gentleman withdrew the Education Bill, he said, in reference to the Bill of this year, "We shall especially have in view the necessities of the Voluntary Schools." That was what the Government stated in the Queen's Speech of 1896, and when, on the first night of last Session, they were asked whether the necessitous Board Schools would be included, they replied in the affirmative. It was an absolute injustice to attempt to give this money to the Voluntary Schools without, at the same time, considering the poor Board School districts. Did the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Ham consider that the statement made that night by the right hon. Gentleman was equivalent to the assurances contained in the letter he had received from the right hon. Gentleman? Until that night they were all under the belief that the Education Bill was to be passed before March 31. [Opposition cheers.] Therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman said in his letter that the poor School Board districts were not to be dealt with in the first Bill, they supposed that it would only be a short Bill, which would be hurried through before March 31, so that, even during the present Session, there might be a chance of passing a further Bill dealing with the other portion of the subject.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I hope we shall pass it before March 31.

*SIR C. DILKE: I understood from the right hon. Gentleman earlier in the evening that that would not be so.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The length of time the Bill will take depends not upon me, but upon hon. Gentlemen opposite. I should have thought it would have easily passed before March 31. All I said was I was under no pledge to get it through before, although we would make every effort to do so.

*SIR C. DILKE understood that last year a pledge was given that the £100,000 should be voted in the course of the present financial year, and that the Voluntary Schools would get the money. From that promise he now gathered the right hon. Gentleman had gone back. The Bill which was promised was a simple one, but this, instead of answering that description, was a complicated Measure, and in its federation proposals would undoubtedly receive a good deal of discussion. What was offered to the poor Board Schools was that, if the Bill slipped rapidly through, then it would be possible to deal with their case. That was a very faint hope; it was one which would not be satisfactory to the districts concerned, nor would it meet what had been described by the Vice President of the Council as the crying injustice of the treatment of one-half of the case, without treatment of the other. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that the rise in the rates in certain districts was owing to extravagance on the part of some of the School Boards. There might have been extravagance in some cases, but he asserted that in the poor districts they had more guarantee against extravagance by the Boards than they had in districts which were not equally poor. The right hon. Gentleman had asked the late Vice-President whether he had done anything towards meeting these poor School Board district cases. The position of the Education Department under the late Government was that whenever a fresh Education Bill had to be brought in the grievances of those districts should be dealt with. That promise was renewed by the present Government, who said the matter should be dealt with and a more favourable treatment extended to the poor School Boards when they came to discuss Clause 4 of last year's Bill. Of course, they never reached Clause 4, but, from what transpired, they thought the Government would be prepared to make even a larger proposal, in this regard, than they did in last year's Bill. An attempt had been made by Government in 1876 to deal with this question, when Lord Sandon's Bill was discussed. That Bill proposed an improvement in the poor districts section of the Act of 1870, but the proposal was withdrawn because of difficulties connected with Voluntary Schools. It was a well-known fact that necessitous districts could not be picked out as far as Voluntary Schools were concerned, because some of the poorest Roman Catholic Schools were situated in the richest districts. He merely referred to this in order to show that in 1870, and again in 1876—in fact on every occasion, this question had been recognised as a pressing evil to be coped with, and they had had the promise of the late Government and the promise of the present Government, that it would be dealt with in the next Education Bill. Since last year there had been an aggravation of the case. There were a large number of small districts scattered all over Wales, which had within recent years, owing to their increasing poverty, become qualified to receive the small extra grant under Section 97 of the Act of 1870. Many of those districts had been unaware of the fact that they were entitled to assistance, and when they discovered it and applied for the money, the law officers held that they were not entitled to any money previously earned by them, and that they must start afresh.

The extent of this grievance was very great. The School Board rate in some districts against which he was certain extravagance could not be alleged—districts which came within the speech of the Vice President of the Council last year—had risen to over 3s. The Vice President himself last year picked out certain districts and distinctly admitted that no allegation of extravagance could be made against them. The position the right hon. Gentleman took up was that this was a crying case, that it must be dealt with by the House of Commons, and would be dealt with soon. A portion of the case was to be by itself in this Bill, and he asked hon. Members did they believe that if they parted with this Bill without a far more definite understanding than they now had, they would within the lifetime of the present Parliament see any attempt made to cope with the other portion of the question? 40 or 50 Members on the Conservative side represented necessitous School Board districts, and if they were content with the promise given them that night, they were very different from what he took some of them to be. No doubt stronger promises would be given, but he could see no reason, now that the absolute limit of time necessary for the passing of this Bill had been removed, why the two cases should not be dealt with together, seeing that the Government admitted that the two parts of the case were equally urgent. A suggestion had been made that the necessities of poor districts might possibly require very different modes of treatment. He ventured to assert that no system of dealing with them by an increase of area could meet the case. It could be met only on financial grounds. In his own constituency the area was enormous, and the rateable value was very low. In one parish it was very little more than £1 a head of the population, and, through the extraordinary Order of the Local Government Board under the Agricultural Rating Act, the small freeholders had been excluded from the benefits of that Act. There were districts in which the Voluntary Schools which would be assisted were hardly known to the population—where the Church had not been able to cope with the necessities of the districts, and where there was no Voluntary School system which could possibly take the place of the poor Board Schools. In his own district the Voluntary Schools which existed obtained virtually no subscriptions from the public, and that which was counted as a voluntary subscription was a gift from the Crown in another form. There was one case in which the grants from the Crown in one form and another were already as much as £418, while the subscriptions and sales of work, and income from all other sources were only £4. The fact was that such schools were out of sympathy with the feelings of the district. It was a Nonconformist district, and the public would not use and would not subscribe to the Voluntary Schools. To assist the Voluntary Schools where they no more than covered the ground as far as their own church population was concerned, and to refuse to assist the School Board rate, was to create a burning sense of injustice among the people. Of course he could understand the necessities of the Government with their own supporters. At the same time a great many of their supporters represented districts of the kind he had referred to, and they had recently been telling their friends that the Government intended to deal with their case. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had said that the Government intended to deal with it, but he confessed that he could not imagine that there was any dealing with their case in the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman that night. The right hon. Gentleman said that if their Bill slipped through quickly a further Bill would be introduced, but he gave nothing like an undertaking on which hon. Members could go to the people concerned and say that their case would be considered. The only opportunity hon. Members had of dealing with this part of the question was at this stage, and on the Second Reading. They were driven to object to this Resolution and to vote against it. There would undoubtedly be a rankling sense of injustice in the minds of those who inhabited poor School Board districts; yet where the rates were at an enormous height the Government were going to pick out and help Voluntary Schools, which were almost unknown to the population, and leave this injustice unredressed until a time which he believed would be outside the limits of the present Parliament.

MR. COURTNEY said that few positions were more perilous than that of the man who spoke on the First Reading of a Bill. He remembered well, when the Bill of 1870 was brought in, an hon. Member who made a speech in rapturous appreciation of Mr. Forster's proposal was very much twitted afterwards by a right hon. Member on his rashness in having done so. If it was rash to speak on a First Reading, it was still more rash to speak on a Resolution which was only preparatory; and if in these remarks he appeared to be condemning himself, he would point out that last year he showed no such indiscretion, for he did not open his mouth in the House at any stage of the Bill of last year, though it was true that he did write a letter to The Times, which was very much ridiculed at the time because he recommended that the Bill should be withdrawn. [Opposition cheers.] Why was he rash enough to speak on the subject now when he held back last year? But there had been a great change in the situation. He understood that the reason Parliament met some weeks earlier than usual was that something should be accomplished before the end of the financial year. [Opposition cheers.] He believed that impression was shared by the rest of the country. ["Hear, hear!"] In the course of the autumn a letter appeared in The Times from Sir C. Ryan, Comptroller and Auditor-General, pointing out that if the Bill were to be passed before the end of the financial year it was necessary it should be a simple one, and the money granted under it should be at once handed over to those who were entitled to receive it. Having that in mind, he himself was quite prepared to accept a Bill passed before March 31 restricted to the Voluntary Schools, because he thought it impossible to pass a more complex Bill within such a limited time. But now the effort to secure the money during the financial year had been abandoned, the position was entirely changed, and the ready acquiescence he was prepared to give the Bill under those circumstances he must now withhold. He approached the subject in no spirit of jealousy. He had come to recognise that they must pay deference to the wishes of parents where they were clearly expressed, and if they were followed it would be absolutely unjust to withhold public money from the school. Personally he was an upholder of unsectarian education. [Opposition cheers.] He should like to see Board Schools multiplied, but he had no right to impress his feeling on the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich or the parents of children in the country; and if they insisted upon having schools where their children could be sent and their faith safeguarded, our scheme of national education would have to be enlarged to take them in on equal terms. Therefore, although the Archbishops and Bishops at the Clergy House might have shown some ignorance of the conditions of Parliamentary life, he regarded their plan of action as a statesmanlike plan on the whole, and they were entitled to this meed of admiration—that what they proposed was absolutely just and equal to all parties. It was in the face of that confession that he approached the proposals of the Bill. The Archbishops and Bishops did not seem to realise how much the farmers and others in country districts hated the rates. Looking at the permanent forces at work in support of denominational schools, he was inclined to think that in the reasonable progress of time they would see, not perhaps the Government that now held office, but possibly the right hon. Member for West Monmouth introducing a scheme of rate-aided support of denominational schools. It was all very well to deride the Archbishops and Bishops for their ignorance of the conditions of Parliamentary life, but he was not sure that they were not miracles of political wisdom compared with the present Government —[Opposition cheers and laughter]— if they could see how the system proposed would work in the face of the conditions of political thought and life in the country. The scheme before the House was defensible only if accepted as a temporary measure and as a half measure. Had it been so restricted and the intention been to pass it before the end of the financial year, under some guarantee that there was to be further action hereafter, he should have supported it. But it came without such guarantees in its present naked deformity, and the House of Commons would find by contact with people out-of-doors that there were forces at work in the masses of the people which would be hostile to the permanence of such a settlement. [Opposition cheers.] In his constituency the parishioners in the moorlands would out of their poverty have to support their School Boards, while their richer neighbours over the border received assistance under this scheme. How could he go to such parishes and defend such a scheme? It was impossible. ["Hear, hear!"] If it were restricted under guarantees, he might have told them that it was only a temporary shift, necessary because of the House of Commons, which compelled certain things to be done by March 31, and other things would follow. They might say that many things were promised by the House of Commons, and what security had they that the task of completing the scheme would be undertaken by the present Government? The speech of the Minister who had introduced the scheme held out faint hope that during the time of the present Parliament anything further would be done to supplement the scheme. How should he defend the allocation which was to be made on the recommendation of committees at the discretion of the Education Department—a system which gave many parishes less than their neighbours? He strongly protested against any scheme which left the allocation of money more or less to the Education Department. Now, was the thing so hopeless that they were driven to vote against this Resolution? Could they not have a guarantee which would fix the Government to an engagement to complete the scheme? If so, hon. Members could go to their constituents and say this was only a partial Measure, and standing by itself it was unjust—[Opposition laughter]—but it necessarily came to an end in a limited time, and then they would find a complete programme fulfilled. The Bill proposed to authorise the expenditure of money in aid of Voluntary Schools. Why not insert the words "during the year ending March 31, 1898." If those words were inserted it would give the Government a whole year to see something of the working of this complex scheme, and if they gave the guarantee they had mentioned the Government would not be able to come next Session and say, "We are too busy to take up and complete the scheme." ["Hear, hear!"] Constituents were prone to be suspicious. If the Government would give some guarantee binding them next year at the latest to complete their plan, Members would not feel the same trepidation. But, if the subject was to remain as it had been introduced by the First Lord of the Treasury, the House, he thought, could not rest satisfied. It was for the Government to determine in what temper they should proceed, and he urged upon Ministers the necessity of doing something promptly, which would free some of their supporters from great embarrassment and themselves from some suspicion. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. C. A. CRIPPS (Gloucester, Stroud) cordially supported the proposals of the First Lord of the Treasury. He did so on the ground that matters of this kind should be regarded from the point of view of the interests of our educational system. The test was this—Were the proposals of the Government likely to inure to the benefit of the whole educational system of this country? If that test were applied, he thought it would be found that the proposals of the Government were such as would certainly be for the benefit of our educational system, as including both Board Schools and Voluntary or Denominational Schools. The right hon. Member for Rotherham had gone into the question of breach of promise, as he called it, and had attempted to show that as between various towns or boroughs the scheme of the Government might act inequitably and unfairly. But neither of these censures really went to the root of these proposals. What they had to consider was not whether certain Members had made certain promises in the past with regard to our educational system. They were not to be guided by the rival interests of Members representing town or country districts. They had to take a wider view, and to ask themselves whether these proposals were likely to improve the educational system of the country. In his opinion, the Government, by limiting their proposals for this Session within the smallest possible scope, had adopted the best means to initiate a reform which, in its ultimate results, would certainly benefit both the Voluntary Schools and the necessitous Board Schools. A Measure like this was undoubtedly necessary as a temporary palliative, but there was no doubt that in the final settlement of this education question, every school in the country must be treated in the same way, whether Voluntary or necessitous Board Schools, whether denominational or undenominational. But at the present time the pinch was felt in connection with the support of our Voluntary Schools, and it was good statesmanship to introduce a Measure which dealt in the first place with the immediate difficulty, with that which was known as the intolerable strain affecting the denominational and Voluntary Schools of this country. He admitted that hon. Members opposite could always bring to bear criticism of the following kind. If the scheme was too large then the Government could be taunted with the impossibility of carrying it within the limited time at their disposal; if, on the other hand, the scheme was limited in scope, the suggestion could be made that it ought not to pass because, forsooth, it did not deal with other matters of great complexity. He agreed most fully with what had been said by the First Lord of the Treasury, that one could not regard the educational system of this country from a merely theoretical and abstract point of view. One must consider it historically, and in connection with what had been done in the past, particularly since the Act of 1870. He did not believe that the country at large were ripe for such a revolution in our educational system as would upset or put on one side the settlement of 1870. He held that the settlement of 1870 ought to be supported, because that settlement, as explained by its great author, the late Mr. Forster, was intended to preserve denominational and undenominational schools side by side, so that the friends of each system might be satisfied. In connection with that settlement it was very essential to consider the question of local management. The distinction drawn in that matter by the Act of 1870 was rightly drawn, and had worked admirably. So far as State aid was given —and a large measure of State aid had been given ever since 1870—Parliament was satisfied that the funds were provided and used for the proper service of education by the system of inspection under the Central Department in Whitehall. And if on the present occasion the proposal was merely to give an increased measure of the aid to the Voluntary Schools, there was no ground for upsetting the settlement of the Act of 1870, or introducing any Measure of local management at all. The principle adopted in 1870 ought to be carefully preserved, there being no reason why they should rely on local control instead of on the control of the central management, exercised through the inspectors sent down from Whitehall. Where Parliament granted money it had a right to exercise control in order to make sure that that money was rightly expended. Where money was given by the State the State must see that that money was properly expended under a proper system of inspection. But where money was provided out of rates, and where as incidental to that there was local control—where assistance was given to our Voluntary Schools out of the rates—full control in respect of that expenditure ought to be given to the ratepayers. One of the reasons why he supported the proposal of the Government was that it was a proposal based on the principle of State aid, and that if they applied that principle to our Voluntary Schools they must apply it also hereafter to the necessitous Board Schools. When they should have developed the whole system they must give the same measure of State aid to all schools. In order to bring about ultimately a great reform of that kind it was a wise policy to introduce it in compartments, and to take the first step where the necessity was greatest, and our Voluntary and Denominational Schools were those which now needed help most. Why was it that the Voluntary and Denominational Schools wanted some additional and special aid? This point, he thought, was only half understood. There were three causes which were operating and making it necessary to relieve the Denominational or Voluntary Schools. They had in the first place to consider that the expense of education in this country, whether in Board Schools or Voluntary districts, had been very largely increased by the requirements of Parliament—he meant the code requirements which were framed by the Education Department, and which were laid upon the table of the House. If Parliament required a larger expenditure on our national primary education, Parliament, in the first place, ought to find the necessary funds and means. That was the principle which they were recognising that night. Voluntary Schools had suffered because Parliament had demanded that the expenditure on primary education should be largely increased. The House was merely recognising in this Measure what was in itself a Measure of Justice—namely, that Parliament, which had imposed this expenditure, should find the money in connection with the primary education of their Voluntary Schools. The second cause had been referred to—that of free education. He felt strongly that there was a special case as regarded Voluntary Schools in connection with some of the large towns, and particularly the large towns of Lancashire. The effect of free education, or the measures connected with it, had been different in different parts of the country, and whereas in many of their country districts free education operated so as to relieve the pressure on Voluntary Schools, on the other hand, in the larger towns, particularly in the Manchester district, the measure of relief given by Parliament had been nothing like sufficient to make up the deficiency from the absence of school payments. It was therefore only fair, right, and just that there should be some system of discrimination by which, if they looked to the reality of things, the Voluntary Schools in the various districts should be helped somewhat in the same manner. Something had been said as to what had been called the competition of the School Board in the School Board districts. He did not speak with any feeling of hostility to the School Board system in this country; on the contrary, he believed that it was as necessary to have a School Board system as to preserve the Voluntary and Denominational system; but he thought that this question of competition had been somewhat misunderstood. He did not object to a fair competition, but to a competition levelled at supplanting a rival. He did not think that what the Boards had done was to be laid at the door of the School Boards. He thought the fault was due to Parliament, because it had hitherto refused to draw a right limitation as between primary and secondary education. How could Parliament expect that these School Boards should know the limits of their power without some guidance was given to them by Parliament itself? If they were to lay down the true limitation between primary and secondary education, to bring forward a system of secondary education and keep within its due limits the system of primary education, then this so-called competition would not exist, or at any rate it would be a fair and proper one. He thought, therefore, that the Government had started from the proper point because it had recognised that assistance in connection with our national education should be given from the National Exchequer. It had recognised that this was an Imperial or National matter rather than a local one. It might be true, as had been urged by the right hon. Member for Bodmin, that in future the rates may be spread over a larger quantity of property than at present; but what can be more unjust at present than to throw the cost of our national primary education on a portion which represented about a half of the property of the country? If, however, the expense of education were thrown on the Exchequer, it was fairly spread over all the property of the country; if they threw additional expenditure on the rates it was borne by a portion only of the property in the country, and borne in such a way that the poorest districts must always suffer most. He hoped that consideration would be borne in mind in dealing with the present proposal, because if the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean, for example, desired that the Measure should be extended to necessitous schools, then the right hon. Gentleman must support the present proposal of the Government, because by no other means could relief be given. In any educational reform they ought to take care that the poorer districts were treated as well as the richer districts. He admitted that at the present time it was almost impossible to deal with the question of discrimination in distributing the 5s. grant as between the Voluntary Schools in the country; but he thought the principle was right. He thought that assistance ought to be given where it was most wanted. He hoped that when the House came to consider these Resolutions later it would be acknowledged that this at any rate was the first necessary step. It might also realise that if a larger Measure had been introduced it would only have been brought in with the liability of failure attached to it. The First Lord of the Treasury had introduced a Measure which was just, right, and equitable as far as it went. It was founded on the true basis upon which further Measures ought to be introduced, whether they referred to necessitous Board Schools or to all the Board Schools in the various districts of the country.

MR. CHARLES MORLEY (Brecknock) said that the proposals of the Government should be met with resolute opposition. What was the real object of the Government? They were proposing to make a grant of public money to a particular class of schools—for what object? Were they anxious merely to promote efficiency of education, or did they seek to increase and extend the teaching of theological and ecclesiastical dogma in our public Elementary Schools? If their object was the first it would be easy for them to insert some provision by which it would be made clear that this money was to be applied, not in saving the sensitive pockets of clerical supporters of Church Schools, but in promoting the efficiency of education which those schools provided. The House had been told that Voluntary Schools were in danger of extinction; was that the real opinion of the Government? He believed it was not the opinion of many of them. In the Nineteenth Century of November last, the Vice President of the Council stated that in the country districts, at all events, the Voluntary Schools, were in no danger of extinction. The Colonial Secretary last May stated that the right principle was to keep the Voluntary Schools on their legs. It appeared that one reason why the right hon. Gentleman had changed his mind and no longer wished to extinguish Voluntary Schools was that he found they could not be extinguished. But if that was so, why did the right hon. Gentleman say, in the course of the same speech, that the Voluntary Schools were being extinguished by unfair competition? The right hon. Gentleman talked about "rooting up" the system of Voluntary Schools. No doubt there was a good Radical ring about the expression which reminded one of other days; but who proposed to root up the Voluntary School system? No one, he believed. It was quite time the country recognised who in this matter were the attacking party and who attacked. It was the Board School system which was being attacked, and not the Voluntary Schools, and it was the present Government who were making the attack. They were now proposing a fresh departure from the settlement of 1870, which laid down equality of treatment for all classes of schools alike. The Leader of the House had acknowledged the enormous pressure to which ratepayers of places like Romford and Walthamstow and West Ham were subjected, but the result of the proposals before the Committee would be that the districts named would have to support their own schools at great sacrifice to themselves, and would be compelled to contribute to other schools where there was no School Board rate at all. He represented a county of which the large proportion of population were Nonconformists, and the amount of injustice which they now suffered would be largely increased if these proposals were carried out. Nonconformists were excluded not only from the management, but also from the teaching staff of more than half of the public Elementary Schools of the country. In many places children of Nonconformists were being compulsorily educated in Church Schools. In other words, parents were forced to forego what Lord Salisbury had referred to as an inalienable right—the right of the parent to have his child taught his own religion. Another hardship in connection with this allocation of public money was that while the money was drawn from taxpayers of all shades of religious opinion, it was to be given to schools which, while public in name, were under private management, and which were retained for the most part for the propagation of dogmas of one Church only. He contended that there was no justice in the proposals of the Government, and was certain they would not carry with them the approval of the country in general. It was the earnest desire of many hon. Members on both sides of the House to retain religious instruction in our Public Elementary Schools; but he warned the Committee that if the proposals of the Government were carried, it would inevitably tend to hasten the day when religious instruction would no longer be regarded as one of the duties of the State as Schoolmaster.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.), as one of the malcontents last year, the only one on the Ministerial side except the Member for South-West Ham who voted against the Bill, wished to say that he believed the majority of his constituents would gratefully accept the proposals of the First Lord of the Treasury, and he should support the Bill. He was glad the Government had not included in the Measure the proposal made last year of raising the age of compulsory attendance of agricultural labourers' children from 11 to 12. He was glad also they had decided not to be seduced by the Church Committee or the Convocation of Bishops sitting at the Church House in Dean's-yard into giving rate aid to Voluntary Schools. If the Government had not dropped that idea, the agricultural districts would have dropped them at the next General Election. [Opposition cheers.] He thought, however, the teachers ought to have got something in the shape of security of tenure. The money to be voted should be, to a certain extent, earmarked both for apparatus and for extra pay to the teachers. [Opposition cheers.] He had a resolution in his pocket from an important body of his constituents, in which they objected to relief not being given to Board Schools and Voluntary Schools alike. He held that the money should be paid to both alike, and should come out of one Imperial fund. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House promised, indeed, a supplementary Bill "if time permits." It lay entirely with the Government to say whether time should permit or not. If the Government would only limit the exuberant rhetoric of hon. Gentlemen on both sides—[laughter]—there would be ample time, and so everybody would be satisfied.

*MR. R. W. PERKS (Lincolnshire, Louth) said he was not surprised that the hon. Member had received a resolution from his constituents disapproving of these proposals. Before long Members who represented Nonconformist constituencies would have so many of these resolutions that they would have to increase the size of their pockets to hold them all. The Bill would meet with resolute opposition from Nonconformists all over the country. They were deeply dissatisfied with the working of the Act of 1870, which was framed in the interests of the Voluntary Schools and operated most unjustly against Nonconformists. That effect had been anticipated. Mr. Bright protested against that Act, which he said encouraged denominational education and only established Board Schools where such education was impossible. In 1872 the right hon. Member for West Birmingham said that the Act was > "bad in principle, made worse in practice, and remained a monument of the ingratitude of a Liberal Government and an intolerable injustice to Nonconformists."

There was a significant passage in the life of Mr. W. E. Forster bearing on the unacceptability of the Act of 1870 to Nonconformists. Mr. Forster had protested against some concessions in the interests of Voluntary Schools and against those of the Dissenters, and Lord Ripon wrote to him:—

> "Your business and mine is simply to try and get the Bill through. If Gladstone prefers to carry it with the aid of the Tories rather than by conciliating the bulk of Liberal opinion that is his affair, and not ours, and we must let him do what he likes."

Great changes had taken place since 1870. Then there were only 6,000 Church Schools; now there were 12,000. That extension of the voluntary system was foreseen by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who in 1872 said,

> "No School Boards could be established under the Act in those parishes, and Dissenters must accept in the education of their children such protection as the conscience clause afforded."

There were districts in this country with a population of no less than 9,000,000, where parents had no choice of schools at all. Dissenters must send their children to the Anglican Schools, conducted under the management of the parsons. It was said that the Voluntary Schools were popular. In 40 towns situated in 26 different counties, the Church Schools six years ago educated 21,387 children, while the Board Schools educated 27,706. These were towns where there was only a Board and a Church school side by side. To-day the figures were 21,934 for the Voluntary Schools, and 40,872 in the Board Schools. That showed the result where the parents had a choice. The Bishops did not believe that the schools were so popular, because one of the main arguments used by the Archbishop of Canterbury at Convocation in November last against rate aid was that it would bring with it popular control. A year ago the Secretary for the Colonies justified his changed attitude by saying that the Voluntary Schools had seized hold upon the popular imagination. What they were attempting to do was to seize hold upon the popular purse. Another great change which had come over them was that they were no longer Voluntary in the same degree as they were 25 years ago. The total cost of the Anglican Schools was £3,600,000; but the Voluntary subscriptions were only £640,000. That proportion was not large enough to justify resistance to popular control. To-night, as with the Bill of last year, Member after Member had said that he was in favour of the Bill while objecting to details. One of the great grievances of Nonconformists was that while out of 1,800,000 children in the Church Schools, 750,000, at least, were Nonconformists; the parents of those children had no voice in the management of the schools, and their children were excluded from the teaching profession. Yet the House was asked to vote this additional money to sectarian schools, without any guarantee for the protection of the Nonconformist children. In some towns there were none but sectarian schools; and as long as any denomination offered to supply deficiencies, it was impossible to erect a Board School. Next to the Church of England the largest religious community was the Wesleyan Methodist body; and they had completely turned round within the last few years in regard to their education policy. In 1870, when the Board School system was established they were unfortunately sitting on the fence. They supported a system of maintaining School Boards alongside of Voluntary Schools. But they had entirely departed from that attitude; and the strongest resolutions against the policy of the Government had come from that Church which used to be considered somewhat Conservative. The Committee had been told that this increased grant would be distributed from headquarters but with the advice of local associations, which, of course, would be clerical assemblies. The Government were undoubtedly to be congratulated on having rejected some of the most vehemently worded resolutions of the Church Conference last November; but their adoption of this system of federated associations showed that they had not completely shaken off their clerical advisers. He should like to know whether the extra grant was to be given to schools which were not free schools, and so be used for bolstering up those numerous schools in which free education was not given. They could not forget that the Prime Minister had said that a vigorous effort must be made to capture the Board Schools in the interest of the Church of England; and as this Measure was obviously intended to strengthen that Church in the rural districts, as it had been shaped largely by the clerical supporters of the Government, and as it made no attempt to remedy the grievances under which School Boards in necessitous districts laboured, he trusted that the House—supported by the Nonconformists, by all lovers of the School Board system of education, and he would add by every lover of fair play—would earnestly and resolutely oppose the Measure. [Cheers.]

On the return of the CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS, after the usual interval,

MR. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said that as one who had been a strong advocate of Voluntary or denominational Schools he acknowledged that the grant of £616,500 towards the maintenance of those schools would be of immense benefit to them at the present time when he knew that they were in a position of great financial difficulty. No one could doubt that the grant would be a very great advantage to them in a pecuniary sense. As far as this Bill went hon. Members must be satisfied that a great effort had been made on the part of the Government to place these schools upon a more sound financial basis than they had hitherto occupied. It was necessary, however, to look a little deeper into the matter than the mere pecuniary advantage which these schools would obtain under the Bill. They were bound to consider not only the immediate benefit to the schools which would flow from this Bill, but whether this large grant would afford a real solution of the problem before them, and whether it would place denominational schools upon a permanent financial basis. He should like hon. Members to look at this question from one or two aspects. In the first place would this grant place the Voluntary Schools upon an equal footing with the Board Schools. He thought that that was a very reasonable question to be asked. The relative cost of the maintenance of the two classes of schools had been gone into very fairly in the Report of the Education Department. He would not trouble the House with the details but this Report showed clearly that the cost of maintenance of the Board Schools was £2 10s. 2d. per head while that of the Voluntary Schools was only £1 18s. 11½d. per head. Even adding this large sum of 5s. per head to be given by the grant the cost of maintenance of the Voluntary Schools would be far less than that of the Board Schools. Therefore, even this large grant would not place the Voluntary Schools and the Board Schools upon an equal financial footing in the country districts, while the discrepancy between them would be far larger in London. The second question he desired to ask was whether this grant would put a stop to the rivalry in expenditure that now existed between the Board and the Voluntary Schools? It was well known that for many years there had been a sort of rivalry in expenditure going on between the two sets of schools. He did not say that that rivalry was altogether an evil because it tended to make the schools better and more efficient, but there could be no doubt that this expenditure was being continually increased. Would the proposal to give 5s. per head tend to decrease or increase this competition? In his opinion it would have a very strong tendency to egg on the expenditure of Board Schools, who would feel for the moment they were placed in a somewhat unfair position, and not at all contribute to a sounder system of education or destroy the rivalry between the two sets of schools. The increase in the rates per scholar last year was 1s. 4d. If that rate of increase only went on for three or four years, this large grant would soon be absorbed. There was, therefore, not much of a permanent character about this legislation. There was a third point worthy of consideration—Would this proposal tend to educational peace or educational war? To his mind one of the great essential characteristics of the successful promotion of education was that it should go on peaceably and with as little as possible Debate in this House, and above all things it should be kept as far as possible from the turmoil of political controversy and strife. He asked any hon. Gentleman whether the proposal was likely to tend to peace and harmony in educational matters. He could not help thinking that the proposal would give the opponents of the Government a very good rallying cry. [Opposition cheers.] It seemed to him it would tend in every possible way to foment in each district an agitation which before long would become very serious; the Government were in fact giving their opponents a very useful political cry. He could not for a moment suppose that the suggestion as to the association of schools would last even through the Committee stage. [Renewed Opposition cheers.] If the Education Department had to decide between the rival claims of different districts and schools as to whether the one or the other should have 3s., 4s., 5s., 6s., or what not, they would lay themselves open to abuse and to every possible suggestion of corruption. The Department would be put in an unfair position, and in his judgment such a system as that would not be tolerated long. He regretted he had had to make these remarks, because he thought that at the present time they had a grand opportunity. They had a large majority, and they had a mandate from the country to support the Voluntary Schools, and to permanently settle this great question. That it must be permanently settled was obvious. The Leader of the House suggested that there would be another Bill. No one, however, who had any knowledge of the working of the House would conceive it possible to have two Educational Bills in one Session. They must consider this Bill, good or bad, as the work of this Parliament. It was possible a Technical or a Secondary Education Bill on a smaller scale might be dangled before them, but still it was impossible to get this Measure through the House sufficiently early to enable them to take up another Bill dealing with the same subject. It appeared to him there was a simple solution of this great question. Everything was greatly cheaper since 1870. Since then they had made education compulsory and free, and he asked why could not the State fix the standard of secular education it required in all children and then fix the cost, to be varied, of course by Parliament from time to time? Parliament would pay the cost to Board and Voluntary Schools alike, leaving the management, cost of buildings, equipment, and religious teaching to the School Board in School Board districts and to Voluntary Schools in Voluntary School districts. That solution would have all the advantage of permanency, and there would not be rivalry between the two sets of schools, except friendly rivalry to do the best they could for each section of the community. The cost would be very little greater under such a system than under the present one. The First Lord proposed to grant £616,000. The poor Board Schools had a greater claim, which would be pressed very strongly upon the House. They would require £100,000, if not more; and he calculated that if the whole cost of secular teaching were put down at 35s. per head—and that would be a liberal allowance—the additional cost to supplement the present vote in the Estimates would be covered by just a million sterling. That was only, after all, £200,000 or £300,000, the cost of a gunboat, in addition to what we were now spending and proposing to spend. No one could say he had not always advocated the cause of elementary and other education. Though not in the House at the time he had much to do with the Education Act of 1870, and he would be the last to suggest that the working of that beneficent Measure should be at all damaged. He had, however, always held that denominational schools were essential, for in his judgment education without doctrinal religion was of little value. He knew it was often considered pretty much like treason to venture to differ from those who were supposed to lead them. If The Times condescended to notice his remarks it would possibly attribute to him, as it did to the hon. Member for Cardiff in respect to the South Africa Committee, personal motives in making these remarks. He had no such motives. During the many years he had been interested in social and educational questions he had been a great believer in a sound and popular system of education. He wished to see those who preferred a non-denominational system have what they desired just as he would provide a denominational system of education for those who wished to have it. They were bound to promote any national system that would advance those interests. In his judgment, to put anything in this Bill which would suggest unfairness to any one particular class of schools would tend to sectarian rivalry and to retard the progress of sound education. ["Hear, hear!"] He believed that even in this Bill, short as it was, the Government might have dealt with the question on a larger basis, having regard to the cost of secular education as a whole, and he repeated that from this point of view he thought the problem might have been solved. But he feared that the scheme set forth, though by it certain schools which badly wanted help would be assisted, would give an idea of unfairness in regard to other schools; that it would set up a spirit of rivalry and antagonism, and that the Measure to be introduced would not tend ultimately to the firmer foundation of the Voluntary Schools. [Opposition cheers.]

*Mr. ALBERT SPICER (Monmouth Boroughs) said he heartily concurred in the concluding remarks of the previous speaker. He thought the Government had made a great mistake in dealing with this matter from the narrow standpoint they had taken up, especially because, representing as they did, all shades of ecclesiastical opinion, they had peculiar advantages in dealing with it, and an opportunity of recognising what was fair and just to each section. The Measure, however, was drafted in a way which was most unfair and unjust to all free Churchmen. ["Hear, hear!"] In the Debate of last Session the Nonconformists, or political Nonconformists, as they were termed, were twitted by a noble Lord on the front Bench with having prevented, through their intolerance, a solution of this question. That was not true. The name "Political Nonconformists" was simply used, they knew, as a term of opprobrium, but after all Political Nonconformists were simply Nonconformists who were really in earnest and believed implicitly in their principles. ["Hear, hear!"] At any rate, they had a right to fair treatment in this matter. Free Churchmen, and he spoke as one, had shown their interest in the work of definite religious education, and it was proved by this fact that to-day they had a larger number of scholars and teachers in their Sunday schools than the Church of England. Free Churchmen were not responsible for the present difficulty. It had even been said that the existing School Board system of education was conducted in harmony with the ideas and wishes of the Nonconformists. He denied that free Churchmen had anything to do with that settlement. The Cowper-Temple Clause, which gave the undenominational character to the Act of 1870, was not of their creation. At that time, as had already been said that evening, the Nonconformists were divided on the question; the great Wesleyan body were in favour of denominational education, while the Congregationalists, the Baptists, and other bodies openly advocated that the State should take care of secular education, and that all the Churches should look after religious education. That was the attitude assumed, but directly after the Act was passed the London School Board was established, and they agreed that there should be Bible teaching in their schools. Well, that course caught the idea of the country, and the School Boards, with only a few exceptions, followed it. That system, therefore, was not created by the Nonconformists; it was adopted because it met the common sense views of the great mass of those who had to do with the Board Schools. The Nonconformists had, indeed, directly suffered by the system. For what was the result of it after 25 years experience? Why, that at the present time there were 8,000 parishes in England in which the only schools were those connected with the Established Church. The direct effect of this was that in any of those parishes where there was an intolerant Clergyman, or where strong Church views were held, the Nonconformist children attending them—there was no other school available for them—were under a certain stigma. [Cheers, and Ministerial cries of "No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen opposite exclaimed "No," but he knew that it was so in many cases. It might be said that the people who suffered under this state of things should make their complaints known; but it must be borne in mind that most of the Nonconformists in such parishes were in the employment of the leading Churchmen in the district, and thus could not complain or seek protection under the Conscience Clause without making themselves obnoxious. He contended that it was grossly unfair to place Nonconformists in that position, which they had endured in those 8,000 parishes for 25 years. ["Hear, hear!"] A second glaring injustice was that, while only one-sixth of the cost of the so-called Voluntary or Church of England Schools was borne by subscriptions and endowments, the other five-sixths were borne by the State, and yet the whole management of the schools was in the hands of one party. ["Hear, hear!"] No fair-minded man could say that that was a right state of things. A third great injustice to Nonconformists was that in the parishes to which he had referred, not a single Nonconformist young man or woman was permitted to enter the educational profession. ["Hear, hear!"] There were many bright young men and women in those parishes—some of them the sons and daughters of Nonconformist Ministers—who would be glad to enter the profession, and who would willingly and loyally serve the schools, subject to a Conscience Clause, but they were told that their services were not required unless they gave up their Nonconformity. ["Hear, hear," and Ministerial cries of "Oh, oh!"] That was no less an injury to education in those districts than to the Nonconformists. It was said that they must have definite religious teaching. He had had some experience of School Boards; he had served on one Board for 15 years; and on that Board the Nonconformists and the Liberals were always in a minority, yet they worked harmoniously. All the Voluntary Schools in that district were handed over to the Board by the managers. The Board enlarged the schools at the ratepayers' expense, and gave the Churchmen the right of using them twice a week and on Sundays. Moreover, the Board gave them the use of all the new appliances for their own special work, and he ventured to say that there were not ten men then in that district who would desire to go back to the old system. Yet this was a district, which, having adopted a fair and reasonable system through their representatives, would get nothing under this Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] That was in itself an evidence of the injustice of the course the Government adopted, for the effect of the proposal would be to punish those who had determined to work loyally together in the cause of national education. ["Hear, hear!"] And he believed that in the general experience concerning this particular district was really to be found the solution of the difficulty before them. It was said that if they had those schools everywhere controlled, where State-aided by popular representation, they would incur enormous expense. But let them bear in mind that this would only be the case if all the existing Voluntary Schools were shut up. If they could only arrange some fair way by which they should be transferred to popularly elected bodies, all these questions would instantly pass away. But it was said that they must have definite religious education. How were they to get it? They must bear in mind in the first place that teachers to Board Schools and to Voluntary Schools were today provided very largely from the same source. The Church Party had in their hands the great majority of the training institutions for the teachers, and any of them who had sat on boards knew perfectly well that they selected quite as many teachers from the Church training institutions as they did from those that were undenominational. He believed the percentage of Church training institutions to that of undenominational were something like 80 per cent. After all, what did this definite religious education depend upon? It depended upon those who are, after all, in responsible charge of the school. If those in charge, whether in Voluntary Schools or in Board Schools, were in sympathy with definite religious education, the teachers selected would also be religious men, and would be men who would be in sympathy with definite religious instruction. At the present time he did not believe there was any more definite religious education in Church Schools than there was in the great mass of Board Schools. It was not every clergyman who conducted the religious education. He was told that in the great mass of schools their so-called doctrinal education, meaning the Church catechism, was only taught once a week, and that the rest of the week it was simply Bible teaching, similar to that conducted in Board Schools. It seemed to him so much cant was talked on this matter by the so-called upholders of the Voluntary Schools, who were contradicting in their own lives and in the education they themselves were giving their children what they claimed there. They took the high schools, and secondary schools which had the system of undenominational education, and yet they were always crying out for their so-called definite doctrinal education in the education of those they could help to control. Let them look at this matter honestly. There were just as many on that side of the House interested in definite religious education as on the other side, and they would not have the Members of the Government Party claiming that they on the Opposition side were against such education. Let them have religious education established in conformity with the wishes of the people as a whole. It seemed to him that this proposal of the Government was not only unfair and unjust to the Free Churchmen, but it was peculiarly unfair and unjust to those who had shown the greatest interest in the cause of education. After all, two-thirds of the nation at the present time lived in Board School Districts. [HON. MEMBERS: "No; four-sevenths!"] He was speaking of the population. The people who would pay this new bill were the general taxpayers, and the general population who were in Board Schools were two-thirds, or 19,700,000, and one-third, or 9,200,000, were in Voluntary Schools. So that the very districts who would not rate themselves were to be helped by being allowed a gift, of which a large proportion would be paid by those who already paid a heavy share. He ventured to predict that there was no question that had been brought before this country that was so likely to reunite the Free Churchmen who had been separated by Home Rule as the one which had been introduced that evening by the First Lord of the Treasury. He should give his earnest opposition to the Resolution.

MR. GEORGE DIXON (Birmingham, Edgbaston) said he had noticed that the greatest objection that had been put forward to the Resolution was its injustice and unfairness to the poor Board Schools in the country districts. With all that had been said on that subject he entirely sympathised. [Opposition cheers.] Their case was one of the most unexpected and extraordinary injustice. [Opposition cheers.] He rose now for the purpose of placing before the Committee the case of the School Boards in the large towns, which had been scarcely referred to. The injustice and the unfairness there, in some respects, were equally great, and he wished to point out what were the real facts of the case. In the 6,000 or 8,000 rural districts where there were no Board Schools at all, what had been the history of their difficulties since the Act of 1870 was passed? By that Act they were authorised to form a Board School, and, having done that, they then had the power to levy a rate over the district which would be sufficient to provide all that was necessary for the efficient carrying on of their schools. But what did they do? They refused to form these School Boards and to levy this rate, and they refused because, he would not say entirely, but in a very large number of these villages mainly, they would not suffer the loss consequent on that rate. They had gone on all these years under those conditions. The Government had largely increased—nay, doubled—their grant, and, as they had been told very properly that night, the introduction of free education added considerably to their revenue. Therefore, financially, their position had been continually improving. ["Hear, hear!"] What did they hear now, within the last two years especially, since the Unionist Government had had a majority of 150? [Opposition cheers.] They had heard that these schools were in a state of financial decrepitude so alarming that unless something was immediately done they would find that they would be closed and that an enormous expense consequent thereon would be thrown on the rates. [Cheers.] He sympathised with those Gentlemen who said that would not be the case. In his opinion it was only the assertion of people who were entirely ignorant of the case. [Opposition cheers.] Let him draw the attention of the Committee to the state of the large towns. He would take the one he lived in, and of the School Board of which he had been a member since the commencement. What had they done? Of course they were compelled to provide sufficient accommodation for all those children who could not find accommodation in the existing schools. They had no choice. They had rated Birmingham to the extent of 46s. per scholar in their schools. They paid now—the last rate was—£115,000. Why did they do that? Because, in the first place, they were compelled to erect additional schools, and, in the second place, because they felt it was their duty to give to these children an education that would be efficient and that would gain the end the country had in view in the passing of the Act of 1870. They were told they had been competing with the denominational schools, as some people said to his utter astonishment, for the purpose of killing the denominational schools. That was utterly and entirely untrue. [Opposition cheers.] Such a thing had never yet entered into the mind of one single member of the Birmingham School Board, and he did not believe it had ever entered into the mind of any member of a School Board in any other part of the country. When the School Board was formed more than 20 years ago there was an average attendance of between 16,000 and 17,000 children in Voluntary Schools, and instead of these schools having been injured the average attendance in Voluntary Schools was 25,000. ["Hear, hear!"] Knowing as he did everything that had been done by the Birmingham Board, he did not hesitate to say, in the strongest possible manner, that the Board had never done anything that had been to the injury of a single denominational school and had always been on the most friendly terms with managers of those schools. What did this proposal mean? In some 6,000 or 8,000 agricultural parishes the population had continually refused to rate themselves and improve the education given in their schools, whereas in Birmingham they had spent no less than 46s. a head for the elementary education of their children. Under such circumstances the proposal was made to give this large grant of 5s. a head to those 6,000 or 8,000 parishes in country districts who had refused to rate themselves to the extent of a penny. [Opposition cheers.] When it was said that opposition to that proposal came from enemies of Voluntary Schools who wished them to be wiped out he utterly and entirely denied that. ["Hear!"] He would not vote against an additional grant of 5s. to those schools under the circumstances in which they were placed, but such a grant must be accompanied by an equal grant to large town School Boards. ["Hear, hear!"] It would be utterly unfair to confine the grant on the plea of their destitute condition to those who had refused to rate themselves and ignore those who had rated themselves heavily in the cause of education. It was said that the real cause of the difficulty was the unfair competition between Voluntary and Board Schools, the latter having the bottomless pocket of the ratepayers at command and spending so much money on their schools that the Voluntary Schools were injured. His answer to that, in the first place, was—Suppose this 5s. grant made, what would be the result? Would this grant prevent to any extent the competition complained of? Not at all; that competition would go on precisely as before. ["Hear, hear!"] That which was said to be injurious to Voluntary Schools, though he did not admit it, would still continue. In giving this grant, and refusing it to School Boards, Voluntary Schools would not be benefited so far as this so-called competition was concerned. He denied that if the grant were extended to School Boards it would be wasted. In a large number of cases—he was sure it would be so in Birmingham—the grant would go to relieve the school rate. No more than now would there be any disposition to use the money recklessly. Whatever a School Board did was done with the knowledge and consent of the ratepayers. To say to ratepayers that they should not spend the money in a way they might think proper, having regard to the education of the children in their area, was not an attitude that should be assumed towards a self-governing community. There was no case whatever for denying to School Boards this additional grant. If this principle were violated it would amount to a repeal of the most important principles of the Act of 1870, which directed that grants should be equal to all schools, and throughout all the great towns of England there would be a strong sense of resentment against the unfairness and injustice. ["Hear, hear!"] This feeling would grow year by year, and would become so strong that neither the Government that made the proposal nor Voluntary Schools would in the end gain by the arrangement, and it must be recognised as a very great mistake. ["Hear, hear!"] The grant, if made, should be made to all schools. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) hoped the Committee would permit him to speak a few words on this subject, because of the interest he had always taken in educational matters. In successive years, in conference and co-operation with others, he had introduced Bills to remove or mitigate the severity of the 17s. 6d. limit and for the relief of the rating of Voluntary Schools, and he felt that he should fail in his duty if he did not thank the Government for the proposal made. He did not intend to traverse the wide field which had been entered upon by Members who had preceded him. He concurred in the feeling expressed that injury was caused to the cause of education by mixing it up with political turmoil. Friends of education should work in harmony for the attainment of the one great end—the educational welfare of the country. As regarded what had been said by the hon. Member opposite with reference to the difficulties and hardships felt by Nonconformists, he would remark that many members of the Church of England appreciated those difficulties, and would rejoice if means could be devised for remedying them. He would remind the hon. Gentleman that there were Roman Catholics as well as Protestant Nonconformists in this country, whose interests must be borne in mind, and representing a borough which contained a large Irish Roman Catholic population, he should not be performing his duty towards them if he were to allow them to be ignored in that discussion. Turning to the main points of the Bill, he agreed with the First Lord of the Treasury that the chargeability of Voluntary Schools to rates was unequal and uncertain. There were some schools with which he was intimately acquainted where the whole question of continuing or discontinuing them depended upon the pressure or the absence of pressure on the part of the rating authorities, and there would be a sense of relief to Voluntary Schools if the law were thus changed. The principle of exemption now applied to many institutions ought in fairness and justice to be extended to the Voluntary Schools. As representing a town where there were large schools situated among the poor population, he must express his great satisfaction that the 17s. 6d. limit was to be entirely abolished. There were schools in Wigan which, to use the terms of the managers, were heavily fined. He knew of two Roman Catholic schools which were fined £50 and £60 a year, and there were schools belonging to the Church of England which were subjected to the same infliction. This charge was not only a heavy financial burden, but it also acted prejudicially to the cause of education, as it prevented managers extending the curriculum and giving a higher and better education. As to the increase of grant, he would remind the Committee of the increase in cost, owing to the action of the Government and the requirements of the Code. In the case of elementary schools, it had risen from £1 7s. 5d. in 1872 to £1 18s. 11¼d. in 1895; while in the case of Board Schools the change was even more remarkable, the cost having risen from £1 8s. 4½d. to £2 10s. 1¾d. But the friends of Voluntary Schools had not been inactive. They had increased their contributions. Taking the Voluntary Schools as a whole, there had been a growth of voluntary contributions from 6s. 6¼d. in 1894 to 6s. 9d. in 1895—a large sum when they were dealing with millions of children. He did not desire that there should be any diminution in their contributions, and was perfectly sure that Voluntary Schools could not continue to exist and have the support of the House of Commons unless the managers were willing to make liberal and growing contributions in support of their schools. As regarded the question of association, he had for many years desired such a system. At present each Voluntary School was isolated, but the Board Schools were grouped together, and he did not himself think that the Voluntary Schools could ever compete with the Board Schools on fair terms except they were brought together under some system of union and association. That system would give them mutual aid and facilities for consultation, and would give that flow of promotion from one school to another which now existed in Board Schools, and which would give life and energy to many of their schools in the large towns. He knew the feeling of hardship which existed among the friends of Voluntary Schools that they should receive no help from the rates, but he believed that such help was inconsistent with the existence of Voluntary Schools, and he, therefore, rejoiced to find a proposal made by the Government that those who contributed to the taxes of the country should pay part of the money arising from taxes in support of Voluntary Schools. Reference had been made to the County Palatine of Lancaster, and the name of the late Archbishop Benson had been mentioned in the Debate. It was stated that the late Primate had said that the benevolence of many in Lancashire was very inferior to the benevolence found in London. The venerable Prelate acted under a misapprehension, and with that candour which was part of his nature admitted in a letter to the newspapers that he was in error, and that the amount contributed in Lancashire to Voluntary Schools was far in excess of the amount contributed in London. He had confined his remarks as far as he possibly could to the question in hand, because he thought that injury was done to the cause of education by the discursive character of these Debates. He believed that if they dealt with one question at a time their progress would be more solid. He had confined his remarks to the case of Voluntary Schools alone, because he believed that alone was the question before the Committee. He regarded the proposals of the Government—although, perhaps, the proposal for association was somewhat attended with difficulties—as proposals which they ought all to support, and he felt grateful to the Government for their course in this matter. He believed that they had done their best to redeem their pledges, and that when the Measure was known in the country it would arouse a feeling of satisfaction, and that the position of Voluntary Schools, which was not only dear to the managers but also as dear to the parents of the children, would be rendered more secure by the action which the Government had taken in the proposals which they had now submitted to the House of Commons.

*Sir JOSEPH LEESE (Lancashire, Accrington) said he came to the House with the full intention of giving his vote in favour of the Resolution of the Government, but he was disappointed to find, not only that the Resolution was so narrow in its terms, but that, after the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, it carried with it certain provisions which made him hesitate to promise his vote. He was faced by an initial difficulty. He found it very difficult—nay, almost impossible—to dissociate local from Imperial interests. It was almost inevitable that the opinion of a Member of Parliament should be influenced by the position of his own constituency in regard to a great Imperial proposal like this Education Question. That had been the experience of several speakers that night. His right hon. and hon. Friends the Members for Bodmin and the Forest of Dean and Birmingham had all felt bound to place the needs of their own constituencies before the House, and to some extent to view the questions at issue with the eyes of their own constituencies. He therefore did not apologise for placing before the House the position in which he found himself in respect of his own constituency. He represented one of the most populous parts of Lancashire—a division of the county in which there had never been, and was not, a School Board or a Board School. ["Hear, hear!"] They last year educated their 10,000 children entirely in denominational schools, of which there were 48 in the division, and they raised in the same year £2,168 in voluntary contributions, which was equal to about a 4s. grant. They therefore felt it difficult, denominational educationalists as they undoubtedly were, to refuse this grant of 5s. if it was offered to them. ["Hear, hear!"] But they were not blind to the great danger that the grant, if given, might be used as a substitute for private subscriptions—[Opposition cheers]—and they were unwilling to run that risk. [Opposition cheers.] Men might argue that, as the point of efficiency had been reached in their schools, and as the inspectors were satisfied both as to the education given and as to the condition of their buildings, then this £2,500 (which would be the amount of a 5s. grant) would free them from the necessity for contributions. He could not find in the statement of the Leader of the House that there was to be any safeguard for the continuance of these private subscriptions. He therefore felt great difficulty indeed in following the right hon. Gentleman into the Lobby. [Opposition cheers.] He recognised that they could not fully debate the matter until they had seen the Bill, but he confessed he did not like the scheme of distribution. Above all things, he would like to see the necessitous schools helped more than those that did not so much require assistance, but he was afraid that the proposal as to distribution would create jealousy among the schools of the division. He did not like the proposed association or federation of these various denominational schools. Were they going to have the pooling of all their incomes, and to put on the shoulders of the prosperous denominational schools the burden of carrying those that were less prosperous? With regard to the omission of necessitous Board Schools, although those in his division were denominationalists, every one of them, at any rate by practice, they had no dislike to School Boards. They had no jealousy of them, and therefore they thought their omission from the benefit of this grant was very hard indeed. If the principle on which the Government were acting was to bring about a better and more efficient system of education, then, in leaving out those who required their help, they were not fulfilling their obligations to the country, and they were offending against every principle of equality. He was afraid he could not vote for the present Resolution, but when it came to granting the 5s. in Committee, then he could promise the Government his assistance.

*Sir JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) said that he should trespass for only a few minutes upon the time of the House. He should have preferred to wait until the Bill arrived at a later stage before he dealt with the provisions of the Measure, but there were some questions which it was only open to him to discuss at the present stage, and therefore he was compelled to refer to them on that occasion. He confessed that he had heard the very interesting speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury with some surprise. They thought that they were going to learn the details of some small Measure for the distribution of the sum voted last year, and they found that what was proposed by the Government Bill was really a new departure in our educational policy. Several hon. Members had spoken of Voluntary Schools as if they were of necessity denominational schools. That, however, was not the case. There were in many parts of the country, as in his own immediate neighbourhood, a great number of small parishes in which there were Voluntary Schools which were not denominational, but were maintained for the purpose of avoiding the elaborate and expensive machinery of a School Board, and the heartburnings that resulted from School Board elections. As far as denominational schools themselves were concerned he confessed that he had grave doubts as to the advantage of dogmatic theology for young children. The great founders of religions based their teaching not upon dogmatic theology but upon morals and conduct. However that might be, they could not shut their eyes to the fact that denominational schools were supported by a great number of our countrymen and therefore they were bound to regard them as forming a very important part of our educational system. He would venture to throw out two suggestions that he thought would greatly benefit Voluntary Schools and save expense to the rates. In the first place there were the class subjects, which were History, Geography, English, and Elementary Science. English schools were only allowed to take two of these subjects, whereas Scotch schools were allowed to take all four. The Scotch schools, therefore, were enabled to earn 2s. a head more than the English schools could. There could be no doubt that the Scotch system was the best from an educational point of view, and if permitted here also Voluntary Schools might earn 2s. per child more than it was now possible for them to do. We ought to encourage the study of these subjects in the smaller schools throughout the country. He could not see why our English Schools should be placed at a disadvantage in this respect. This was specially important in view of the abolition of the 17s. 6d. limit. He should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman in passing whether the 17s. 6d. limit could be removed in the case of the Board Schools as well as in that of the Voluntary Schools.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: It does not apply to them.

*SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said the next point on which he should like to say a word was with reference to the subscriptions and the rates. Hon. Members would recognise that it was impossible that Voluntary Schools could be carried on without the aid of subscriptions, and that if the Voluntary Schools ceased to exist the cost to the ratepayers and the taxpayers of the country would be enormously increased. It must be admitted, however, that it was a great hardship upon those who subscribed to maintain the Voluntary Schools that they should also be called upon to pay rates for the maintenance of the Board Schools. It was obvious that in that case the subscribers to those schools had to pay twice over for the education of their district. He asked therefore whether it would not be fair to allow subscriptions to Voluntary Schools to count against the School Board rate. The rates would, in the long run, be relieved, because as Voluntary Schools were more economical than Board Schools, every £1 in subscriptions to the Voluntary Schools would save some £1 5s. to the rates. The adoption of his suggestion would greatly encourage subscriptions, and would therefore do much to assist the Voluntary Schools. It would also save rates and taxes, because it would go far to obviate the necessity for any call either on the ratepayers or on the National Exchequer. He should be prepared to support the Resolution which had been proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, but he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether he could not, to a great extent, meet the needs and exigencies of the Voluntary Schools—which formed so important and valuable a part of our educational system —by relaxing the rules with regard to the payment for class subjects and by allowing subscriptions to those schools to count against the rates.

MR. J. H. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.) thought that a large amount of perverted ingenuity had been shown by the promoters of this Measure. It would have been easy to construct a small and good Bill, but this was a small and bad Bill. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman had been misled by the misrepresentations of his own friends—misrepresentations based upon fallacies. The first of such fallacies was that the condition of the Voluntary Schools was due to the competition of the Board Schools. That he denied. The pecuniary position of the Voluntary Schools was due to the growing requirements of the Education Department, which were due to the growing requirements of the public. The requirements of the Education Department had affected the Board Schools as well, and in endeavouring to meet them the Board Schools had incurred considerable expense. There had been no competition on the part of School Boards with the object of driving Voluntary Schools out of the field. For some seven years past most School Boards had been under the control of majorities, composed of Churchmen and Conservatives, and yet these very majorities—returned on the cry of economy and justice to Voluntary Schools—had been unable to check the expenditure of the Boards on education. That expenditure had gone on, and rightly so. Could anybody contend that the School Boards had spent too much money on education? Why, there was no country in the civilised world which did not spend, either actually or relatively, more on primary education than this country did. Surely when so much of the national welfare depended upon education it would not be right to check the expenditure of School Boards in a niggardly way. The simple and logical course for the Government to take would have been to grant to Board Schools and Voluntary Schools alike a sum in aid of their local expenditure. What harm would there have been in a Bill which said: "We have required more work from both Board Schools and Voluntary Schools, and therefore we will assist them both to meet their expenditure by a grant of 5s. more?". As to the repeal of the 17s. 6d. limit, it would result in placing the finances of the Voluntary Schools in four or five years in exactly the same position which they now occupied. Five shillings of State income would have been substituted for 5s. of local income; and four or five years hence the friends of the Voluntary Schools would be coming to that House and asking for a further grant, with less justification than they had now, because in that time local aid would very largely have ceased to be. Why was it that the Government were not prepared to give this 5s. grant all round? He ascribed it to the fact that they had been misled with regard to what the School Boards would most likely do with the 5s. grant. It had been assumed that if they gave more to the School Boards they would increase the competition of the Board School managers as against the Voluntary Schools. He did not believe that that would be the case. The School Boards had felt the strain of the requirements of the Education Department as much as the Voluntary Schools had, and they would gladly take an opportunity of reducing their rates to the amount that a 5s. grant would enable them to reduce them. If they compared the expenditure of the Government on the Metropolitan Police with the Government expenditure on the School Boards what did they find? The Police Rate amounted last year to £776,458, whilst the Imperial subsidy was £987,000. The rate levied by the School Board amounted to £1,473,125, whilst the Imperial subsidy was only £590,376. Thus, for the police that House granted in relief of local taxation £987 for every £776 raised by rates, whilst for the London Board Schools Parliament granted only £59 for every £147 raised by rates. In the provinces they found much the same state of things. The Provincial School Boards raised £2,146,043 in rates, and the Imperial subsidy was £2,050,174; but the county authorities raised in rates £2,289,265, and received as subsidy £2,375,984. Thus the Provincial School Boards received £205 in subsidy for every £214 raised by rates, whilst the county authorities received £237 in subsidy for every £228 raised by rates.

Surely the School Boards were justly entitled to a larger subsidy. If it was true, as he thought, that the School Boards would use this 5s. grant in relief of the rates, what could be said to justify the withholding of the grant from them? If it was said that the aim of the promoters of the Bill was to increase the finances of the Voluntary Schools as compared with those of the Board Schools, he would point out that that result would be achieved if the School Board rate was reduced by the amount of this 5s. grant, and the Voluntary Schools added the 5s. to their expenditure. The Bill, he maintained, contained elements of grave danger, and the first of these was the withdrawal of the 17s. 6d. limit. If they took away that check and safeguard, that protection against the withdrawal of voluntary contributions, in a very few years the income of the average Voluntary School would drop very nearly to the level of the present day. The second element was the proposal of associations of Voluntary Schools which, if they consisted more of urban than of rural schools were to receive more money than if they consisted of rural schools as compared with urban schools. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that urban schools were more in need of money than the rural schools. He denied this. In London there were federated Voluntary Schools under the Diocesan Board which were as badly off as any schools in the country; but if they took the Voluntary Schools as a whole they would find that the rural Voluntary Schools, like the rural Board Schools, were worse off than the urban Board and Voluntary Schools, and if more money was going to be given it should be to the rural schools and not to the urban schools. He did not gather from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that it was proposed to give any varying amounts as aids to schools according to their varied necessities. That was a most important point. It was essential in any well considered scheme of aid to the rural schools in particular that there should be a differentiation in the amount of aid given to them varying in inverse ratio according to the size of the schools. As to the compulsory federation plan, at present Voluntary Schools had the right to federate in a voluntary way. It was open to all Voluntary Schools at present to combine, but they did not care to do it. For example, they might have a Voluntary School with an active committee raising a considerable sum of money from local contributions; on the other hand they might have a school where the vicar and the committee did not do their duty in a business-like way; but the idea of the Government was to cast all the schools into the pool, the well-doing as well as the ill-doing. Unless they could show some reasonable cause for not federating they would not obtain any special aid at all. Here was a premium placed on incapacity, a special payment in respect of neglect of duty. Then there was the question as to the disposal of this money. In Clause IV. of last year's Bill there was an attempt to earmark the income for the purposes for which it was most required, but he did not gather from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill this year contained any proposal of the kind. There was nothing whatever to prevent the whole 5s. per child going, not to increase the staff and improve the payment of the poorly-paid teachers, but to relieve the subscribers or to increase the rent charge in the school accounts, and payable to the church or chapel connected with the schools. It appeared to him that the Bill was one which, except in the matter of size, was as bad as the Bill of last year. If the First Lord of the Treasury had been present during the whole of the discussion he would have seen that the omens were against his Bill already. ["No, no!"] This infantile Bill opened its eyes in much the same gloom as that in which its predecessor closed its eyes. [Laughter.] It had few friends on the opposite side of the House. Member after Member had spoken against the Bill, and he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to cast away the theological prejudice which made him inacapable of doing justice to the School Boards, and made this Measure an indirect negative attack on the School Boards, just as the Bill of last year was a positive and direct attack on the School Boards. If the right hon. Gentleman would specifically state that during the Session there would be a Bill brought in giving the grant to the Board Schools he would receive support from the Opposition side of the House. It was not too late to make this Bill a Measure for aiding Board Schools, and many Members were prepared to vote for a grant to Board and Voluntary Schools. The right hon. Gentleman appealed to the House to defer the general engagement on the educational Question. He could not imagine a conjuncture more favourable to that side of the House than that which occurred last Session. He would appeal to the Government to give the grant all round, and in that way they would do an act of justice which would be recognised by the House and the country, and which would do more to settle the Education Question upon a firm and friendly basis than a dozen Bills such as they had before the House to-night.

*MR. ALFRED HOPKINSON (Wilts, Cricklade) thought it had been proved, and, indeed, almost admitted, that if a Bill was passed on the lines of the Resolution before the House it would result in a condition of things which could not possibly be a permanent settlement of the question, and which would introduce new anomalies and new injustices. [Opposition cheers.] He said so not from any spirit of hostility to Voluntary Schools. He admitted fully that some Measure of relief was necessary for those schools. But the difficulties and injustices to which he referred were not merely as between Voluntary and Board Schools, but as between one locality and another—[Opposition cheers]—and which ought not to be allowed to exist even for the space of a single year. He had in his mind's eye two parishes side by side. In one there was an admirably conducted Voluntary School system, fair to the Dissenters, and where no religious difficulty whatever was felt. In the next parish there was a poor School Board. Now as between those two parishes he had no preference in this particular regard for one parish over the other, but he could not go down and say it was a fair way of dealing if, out of public funds to which both contributed equally, a large sum was given to the district where there was a Voluntary School and nothing whatever to the district where there was a poor School Board. [Opposition cheers.] He knew another and much more important place where there was an admirable School Board system, where 90 per cent. of the children attend the Board Schools, and where again no religious difficulty had ever been heard of. How could he possibly go down and say to the men in that town, nine-tenths of whom were fair-minded artisans, it was a right and reasonable thing that out of the general taxes to which they contribute their full quota practically nothing should be given to them, while a large amount was given to some neighbouring district which was no more populous, which might be richer, but which had neglected its educational duties? [Opposition cheers.] The only way out of the difficulty was to have some distinct and definite pledge that the question should be dealt with in favour of Board Schools, at all events the poorer Board Schools, on some early day. The mere statement that the question would be dealt with "if there was time" was not good enough. [Opposition cheers.] The right hon. Member for Bodmin had suggested one solution. Another would be, that before the Bill passed the House another Bill should be introduced for making a grant to Board Schools. If that were done then it might be possible to support the proposals of the Government; otherwise not. [Opposition cheers.] Individual opinions of private Members might not appear to be of much importance, but they were of importance to this extent—that if those who held them were there, and the Government were there with their support, it was because the statements such Members had made to the electors at the General Election were thought to be in accordance with justice and fairness. If this scheme were to stand and to stand alone without a distinct pledge of a further Bill he must confess that it would be impossible to make the same appeal to the electors on the same platform again. [Loud Opposition cheers.]

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) said that the First Lord of the Treasury had probably by this time been disabused of the idea that a small Bill, if it were a bad Bill, was easier to pass than a big Bill. The Government had admitted the anomalies which existed in the present educational system, but they had only attempted to redress the grievances of one side. In dealing with the Church Schools the Government's was a cash transaction; but other parties had to be content with a promise for the future, subject to all Parliamentary accidents. It was said that this procedure was justified on account of the greater urgency of the case for the Voluntary Schools. One hon. Member even said that unless this aid were given the schools would perish. That confirmed the idea that the Church of England had attempted too great a task, in seeking to monopolise so large a part of the educational machinery of the country. The necessities of the Board Schools in poor districts were just as great; a fact which the Vice President had admitted last Session, It was said that the condition of the Voluntary Schools was brought about by the competition of the Board Schools. But there were thousands of parishes where no School Board existed. Again, the requirements of the Education Department fell equally on both classes of schools; and as to the rejoinder that the Board Schools could fall back upon the rates, it was quite obvious that the taxable power of a small and poor parish must be absolutely limited. The First Lord of the Treasury insisted that the control of the Education Department over the schools was quite sufficient; as the assistance given was State-aid and not rate-aid. But money did not supply everything that was necessary in the management of public schools. Public interest as well as public money was required; and the great virtue of local control was that it gave to all the people of a parish an interest in the parish schools. It had been said that parents showed their preference for Voluntary Schools by sending their children to such schools. But in 8,000 parishes parents could not do anything else, because in those parishes there were no other schools within their reach. He looked upon the scheme of the Government as a retrogressive scheme. It was in the teeth of the declarations of Members of the Government during the Recess, and notably of the Vice President of the Council. It took away from the Board Schools that which was their due, and differentiated between the Board Schools and the Voluntary Schools. The measure was a measure to bribe the inhabitants of parishes to maintain Voluntary Schools, by offering them increased assistance from the State; while, on the other hand, the friends of the Board Schools were penalised, because they were told that where Board Schools existed they should not receive a single penny from the grant. It was ridiculous to suppose that a one-sided and nakedly sectarian measure such as this would bring about the settlement of the Education Question which the First Lord of the Treasury anticipated. It was clear, even from the speeches delivered from the Ministerial side of the House, that the Bill, if passed into law, would simply add fuel to the controversial fire. It would increase the antagonism between the Voluntary and Board School systems, and, although he had no doubt as to what the issue would be in that struggle, in the interests of education and social peace he greatly desired that it should be avoided. [Cheers.]

MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) said he should support the Resolution, because he believed it would improve education in the Voluntary Schools, and especially those in the country districts. At the same time he was bound to sympathise with the expression of regret which had come from one of his hon. Friends that the Government had not been able to provide in the proposed Bill some relief for necessitous Board School districts. [Opposition cheers.] He was not, however, altogether surprised at the action of the Government, for undoubtedly they had reason to anticipate, from what had passed in many of the Debates of last year, that a separate proposal to give so much per child to the Voluntary Schools would have been unanimously accepted by the House. It was also pretty clear from certain speeches that any proposal the Government might have made in the Bill to assist necessitous School Boards would certainly have also been made a matter of controversy by hon. Members who insisted that every School Board had an equal claim to this relief. However, the Government had already on various occasions pledged themselves that the question of necessitous School Board districts would be dealt with, and dealt with promptly. The Committee was bound to rely loyally on those pledges. But he felt sure that if necessary they would have that pledge repeated in still stronger terms before the Debate closed.

Those of them who were in favour of both these measures of relief might, he thought, without hesitation, vote cordially in favour of this Resolution, leaving it to the discretion of the Government whether it should be dealt with in one Measure or in two. Surely there were very few hon. Members, whatever they might wish, who expected the disappearance at any rate in the immediate future of Voluntary Schools, and so long as any large section desired—as undoubtedly they did at the present moment—some security for definite religious instruction in the Schools, so long ought they to support the Voluntary Schools. He was always ready to admit that many School Boards did give admirable religious instruction, but there were many districts in the country where the ratepayers probably preferred to pay voluntary rates—not subscriptions—in order to avoid what they thought the unnecessary extravagance of School Board expenditure. The present policy of hon. Members opposite, was not so much an assault on the Voluntary Schools as a starving out policy. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought there was an increasing demand for a higher and better education in our elementary schools, the curriculum was always being extended, salaries were gradually rising, and the numbers of children in the schools were increasing. But they must remember the different conditions in which the Voluntary Schools and Board Schools were. The Board Schools had the purse of the ratepayer to draw upon, and although in a sense that purse was limited, yet they could not expect the same length of purse to exist among the subscribers to Voluntary Schools. It was not the fact that subscriptions to Voluntary Schools had, during the last 15 years fallen off; so far from that being the case there had been during the last 15 years an absolute increase of something like £150,000, and he found that the average per child had kept up to very nearly 6s. 9d. So that there was good evidence that the subscribers to Voluntary Schools were making laudable and substantial efforts to keep up with the constantly increasing demand which was made upon them. It was extremely difficult for any authority to discriminate between these different schools, and he very much doubted whether any discrimination could be made between town and country in this matter. It was very difficult to intrust any Government Department with wide powers of discretion. However wise, judicious, and fair they might be in reality, undoubtedly their action would give rise to accusations of favouritism. The difficulty might to some extent be got over by the Government proposal for the association of schools. Local knowledge and combination were wanted. He had always considered that the best thing for our Voluntary School system was to have more association of school managers. The great weakness of the country Voluntary Schools at any rate was isolation. So long as they were isolated they could not have really efficient teaching, and often they could not have really efficient management. Any Measure that would promote the association on a large scale of Voluntary Schools, would be of great permanent benefit to them and education generally. Whether it could be done by compulsion was doubtful. But any means short of compulsion might well be resorted to. Certainly the best guarantee against waste was to allot sums of money rather to groups of schools than individuals. For these reasons he thought the plan outlined in the Bill was likely at any rate for a certain number of years to give relief and improvement to our Voluntary School system. Whether it would prove a permanent solution of the question was very doubtful. Personally, he thought there was no permanent solution short of rate aid to Voluntary Schools wherever it might be required, and he would not hesitate to allow, where rate aid was received, a due proportion of popular representative control. The Government had been wise and statesmenlike to begin by a proposal which did no real injustice to any class of school, which would undoubtedly tend to relieve the pressure on Voluntary Schools, and with proper supervision would prove a permanent benefit to the education of the country.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion) agreed that the pledge given by the First Lord of the Treasury as to extending the support proposed to be given by Board Schools to Voluntary Schools should be repeated in more definite terms. They ought to know whether the assistance proposed to be given in the future Bill to the Board Schools would be similar in extent and granted on similar principles to the assistance proposed to be given to Voluntary Schools. That proposal made no distinction between necessitous Voluntary Schools and those not necessitous. It was proposed to give a five per cent. grant for every child in every Voluntary School. He should like to know whether it was proposed to give a similar grant to all the children in Board Schools whether necessitous or not. He did not understand that the grant of five per cent. per child was to be given to the particular school which the child attended. He understood the object of grouping schools was to enable the grant earned by one child to be allocated to another. Would Board Schools be grouped for the same purpose or would the grants earned by children in prosperous Board Schools be allocated to less fortunate School Boards which might thereby be able to get a larger grant than was earned by their own children. The necessity of extending the provision to Board Schools seemed to underlie all the speeches delivered on the Opposition side. He entirely shared the view that not only ought relief to be given to necessi-Board Schools but to all alike. It was a mistake to treat this question as only affecting the interests of necessitous Board Schools. Necessitous ratepayers ought also to be considered who existed in all School Board districts wealthy or not. The richest School Board derived its rates from the ratepayers, many of whom were necessitous, and the ratepayers' pockets should be relieved as well as the pockets of contributors to Voluntary Schools. Hon. Gentlemen opposite would have to feel the difficulty which in many constituencies would be found very great that the Government had given large grants in relief of wealthy subscribers to Voluntary Schools, and refused or omitted to give any grant whatever, in relief of the pockets of the heavily burdened ratepayers. Hon. Gentlemen seemed to think they did well in denouncing School Board extravagance, because they thereby spoke in favour of the ratepayer, but School Board expenditure went no further than was necessitated by the exigencies of the case, and, therefore, the refusal to extend this grant to School Boards was simply a refusal to assist necessitous ratepayers where School Boards existed. Hon. Members opposite also argued that it was wise this legislation should be piecemeal, and that in the first place the relief should be confined to Voluntary Schools. They argued in this way because they thought it was easier to pass a Bill of a limited character than to pass one of an extended nature. That would be true if the limitation were one of the subjects of the Bill. He denied entirely that it was easier to pass a Bill if they limited the operation of the relief given by it to a particular section of the community. The machinery necessary for giving this relief was practically the same machinery as would be necessary if the Bill gave relief to Board Schools. He did not wish to attribute to the Government the sinister desire to pass this Bill, and the hope that some difficulty might arise which would make it impossible to pass another, but certainly one was forced to the belief that there was some extraordinary motive behind the desire to pass this Measure. There was another point which excited a very great suspicion in his mind. The word "voluntary" was introduced. It seemed to him it was absolutely unnecessary even for the purposes of the Government to introduce that word. If the word "elementary," were substituted, it would be perfectly possible to give the relief to Voluntary Schools, but it would also be possible to extend the operation of the Measure to Board Schools, if the House desired to do so. He put it to the First Lord of the Treasury, whether it would not be wise to make such an alteration in the wording of the Bill. That course would have been a much wiser one than passing an unnecessary and a stringent Resolution to tie the hands of the House so as to prevent equal justice being done to the Voluntary and Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"]

*MR. ERNEST GRAY (West Ham, N.) said that the Debate that evening had been remarkable for more reasons than one. He had noticed with no little satisfaction, the improved friendliness of tone adopted by hon. Members on his side of the House towards the School Boards, and the absence of attack on the Voluntary Schools by hon. Gentlemen opposite. [Cheers.] It appeared as though the Bill of last Session had really served a good purpose in bringing both sides of the House more nearly to an understanding on the great education question. ["Hear, hear!"] That being the case, he could not help expressing regret that the Government had not seen their way to take advantage of the rapprochement, and to bring in a scheme which, while doing justice to both Voluntary and Board Schools, would have met the general views of the House and of the country at large. [Cheers.] He could conceive of but one good excuse for dealing with only one section of the Government Scheme at the present time—namely, that they intended to pass this Measure and bring it into operation by March 31st, so that the Voluntary Schools might draw their grants up to the end of the present financial year. ["Hear, hear!"] That was the general belief in the country, and he must say that it was one of the surprises of the evening to find now that the Government did not intend to take that course. [Opposition cheers.] He could not understand why the passage of this Measure had not been facilitated by the incorporation in one and the same Bill of proposals for the necessitous Board Schools. He hoped that nobody would accuse him of any lack of sympathy with Voluntary Schools, because he ventured to uge that the claims of the necessitous Board School districts should be either considered in that Measure before the House or at an early date after the present proposals were passed. To that end, a promise or pledge should be given by the First Lord of the Treasury to undertake a Bill of that nature in somewhat more explicit terms than they had heard that afternoon from him. He was not desirous of seeing that pledge form part of the present Resolution, nor was he desirous of seeing a Bill introduced at once in order to give the House an earnest of security for the pledge. It would be sufficient for him, and doubtless for the House if the First Lord of the Treasury would state to them, in unequivocal language, that it was his intention to bring in a Bill dealing with the necessitous Board School districts at the earliest possible date. Otherwise he had no doubt that one of the earliest effects of this Bill would be to intensify the attack made on the voluntary system, and to more acutely develop the feeling of injustice which now existed throughout the country in regard to the Board Schools, and that sense of injustice unless it was removed would eventually drag down the Voluntary Schools. He was therefore pleading not only in the interests of the poorer School Board districts, but also in the interests of the Voluntary Schools that the two Measures should have been placed before the Committee at one and the same time. ["Hear, hear!"] His sympathy with the Voluntary School system, and with the Church of England had been measured by many a Sunday's work in their behalf during the last 25 years, and he hoped, therefore, that no one would accuse him of attempting to deprive the Voluntary Schools of the funds which he knew they needed so much, because he pleaded that the necessitous Board Schools should receive equal relief. ["Hear, hear!"] He knew there were many Voluntary Schools which needed relief in buildings, appliances, and staff, not through the competition of neighbouring Board Schools, but through the constantly increasing demands made by the Central Department. Those demands the Board Schools were able to meet, but the Voluntary Schools through lack of funds had been unable to do so. There was the inequality between the two systems—inequality not created by the Board Schools but the ever increasing demands of the Department and the failure of the locality to meet those demands, with the result that in many districts the Voluntary Schools compared unfavourably with the neighbouring Board Schools. Yet he knew that many of the Voluntary Schools were well equipped, well staffed, and well managed, and could compare favourably in every way with the very best Board School in the country. These were schools which did not need relief, and the managers of which, if left to themselves would hardly apply for relief under this Bill, and they certainly would not do so if any conditions were attached to the granting of that relief, and to him it seemed to be folly to propose any scheme which provided that those schools which did not need relief should share in the money which was so much wanted by the poorer schools. ["Hear, hear!"] There might on that ground be something to be said for this system of federation—a system which, he thought, would need more explanation, and no doubt would be more fully understood when the terms of the Bill were before them. For the moment he would like to ask for information at once as to the possible size of these federations—whether two schools could form a federation, for example, or whether it would be a federation covering two or three counties. Much would depend on the area over which the federation would have control. He must say, in passing, that he regretted that some such system of federation was not also to be compulsorily applied to the small School Boards of the country, so that proper and more efficient management might be secured. But his object in rising that night was rather to emphasise the urgent, the crying, necessity that existed for the relief, not of the School Boards, not of the Board Schools, but of the ratepayer—if they liked, of the Churchman—in the School Board districts, who for the last 25 years had been compelled to pay a rate which pressed with enormous severity on the Churchman and on the ratepayer, who was to have no relief under this proposal, while a neighbouring district where probably the Voluntary Schools had been supported by not more than two-and-a-half per cent. of the population, would receive relief. He took his own constituency—one he had brought before the Committee and the House on previous occasions, and, he was sorry to say, should be compelled to bring forward until relief was granted to the district—an area, including a population of over a quarter of a million, and with a School Board rate of 2s. 6d. in the pound. This rate was not due to extravagance—he could not press that too strongly on his hon. Friends on that side of the House. Anybody with a grain of common sense would see that, with a rate of these proportions, the ratepayers would take pretty good care that there was no extravagance on the part of their representatives. The very existence of that heavy rate was in itself a check upon all extravagance. The high rate was simply due to the fact that they had a low rateable value and a very dense population, coupled, perhaps, with the other influencing cause, that it was a new district, formed since the Act of 1870, and therefore but slightly supplied with Voluntary Schools. Let them put this Bill on the very lowest, the most immoral grounds they could—that this Bill was for the relief of the Church supporters of the Government. He did not pretend for a single instant that that was the ground to put it upon, but let them assume it for the sake of argument. Then, surely the Churchman in a district who had been contributing to the support of the Voluntary Schools that were there, and had been compelled to go on, year after year, paying this constantly increasing School Board rate, might well look to the Government and claim relief with as much justice and with as much hope of receiving sympathy as a Church supporter of Voluntary Schools in another district. And, should he say with greater expectation of securing relief, and with greater hope of securing sympathy than the Churchman in another district who had not supported the Voluntary Schools. It must be clearly understood that of that one-third of the population which now paid no School Board rate, but very few indeed of those ten million people subscribed at the present time to Voluntary Schools. Might he venture to say that if Churchmen generally had done their duty to their schools—ay! and Nonconformists too, who had kept their own separate management—if they had done their duty to their schools as well, as thoroughly and as loyally as the small percentage had done, then this claim would not have been made on the Government for relief. Take a district like Preston where the support of the Voluntary Schools had fallen entirely upon the purse of the few, and where the great mass of the population had shirked their duty to their schools and evaded their responsibilities. He appealed to the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether he was not accurately describing Preston, as a town which had successfully resisted the advent of a School Board, partly on account of its love for Voluntary Schools, and partly on account of its dislike of the School Board rate, and that the number of those who had resisted it on account of their dislike of the School Board rate was very much larger than those who had shown their loyalty to Voluntary Schools. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. W. E. M. TOMLINSON (Preston): Really, Mr. Lowther, I must just say one word.

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: "Order, order!" Mr. Gray.

*MR. GRAY continuing, said he hoped he was not misrepresenting his hon. Friend's constituency. He had no intention of doing so when he said he was informed by some of the most energetic supporters of the Church in Preston quite recently, that unfortunately every effort they had made on behalf of their Voluntary Schools, fell largely and constantly on the same few individuals who were consistent in their support, and they had regretted, as everyone, every friend of the Voluntary system must regret, that the large mass of these so-called Church supporters had not contributed to the support of the Church Schools. He ventured to say that those who were labouring in these necessitous Board districts, had as much right to appeal to the Government for assistance as those who had failed to support the schools in Voluntary School areas, and he very bitterly regretted that the scheme now before the Committee left these necessitous districts altogether unprovided with relief, and he feared with but very scanty assurances as to the future. [The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY "No, no,!"] He was very glad to hear that disclaimer. He must say that from the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman, he had a hope, a very strong hope, that in the early part of this Session some provision would be made for them.

And, it being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report progress; to sit again to-morrow.

SUPPLY [29th JANUARY].

ARMY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE, 1896-7.

Resolution reported;

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £255,300, be granted to Her Mejesty, to defray the Charge for Capitation Grants and Miscellaneous Charges of Volunteer Corps, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1897."

Resolution agreed to.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

LAW OF EVIDENCE (CRIMINAL CASES) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

MILITARY WORKS [MONEY].

Resolution reported;

"That it is expedient to authorise the issue, out of the Consolidated Fund, of any sums not exceeding in the whole £5,458,000, for the expenses of certain Military Works and other Military Services, and to authorise the Treasury to borrow by means of terminable annuities, payable out of moneys to be provided by Parliament for Army Services, and, if those moneys are insufficient, out of the Consolidated Fund, such sums as may be required for the purpose of providing money for the issue of the above-mentioned sum of £5,458,000 out of the Consolidated Fund, or the repayment to that Fund of all or any part of the sum so issued, and also to authorise the application of the Surplus of Income above Expenditure for the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1897, towards paying any sums authorised to be issued out of the Consolidated Fund for Military Works."

Resolution Read a Second time.

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) hoped the Government would not press this Report that night. If they did he should move the adjournment. There had been but an unsatisfactory discussion in Committee on the subject, the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill not having complete information. There was one subject upon which considerable interest was felt out of doors, and that was in reference to the large sum asked for for the erection of forts on the ranges of hills around London. He did not think the matter ought to be pressed through quite so quickly as this. It was a very extraordinary proposal, and the Government ought to give them fuller information about the matter. Although the amount involved might appear to be small, the business of the fortification of this great metropolis would lead to a large expenditure, and should be carefully looked into. Unless a full and satisfactory explanation was given, he thought it would be desirable to report Progress.

MR. BRODRICK remarked that the hon. Gentleman spoke at some length when this Resolution was before the Committee and when it seemed to be the general desire to get on with the discussion. The point the hon. Member raised had simply reference to the particulars of an expenditure—perhaps the smallest in the Bill; and what he had asked was that the Government should give full information and details as to every site on which it was proposed to mobilise troops. He might say that the Government desired to give the House every possible information in their power, but it would not be possible to designate, for the benefit of the whole world, the precise site on which it was intended, in case of invasion, to mobilise troops. But at the same time he should be perfectly prepared on the proper opportunity—which was on the Second Reading of the Bill—to give the House as full information as he possibly could on any subject that it seemed to be the general wish of the House to go into. As he told the Committee on Friday, the Government proposed to circulate with the Bill a full statement of all the places where it was proposed to reconstruct barracks at a cost of nearly three millions of money. As regarded the question of defence, he thought the hon. Gentleman would see there were limits to the disclosures it was desirable to make. On Friday he endeavoured to be perfectly frank with the Committee; he put before it every class of expenditure, with, as far as possible, details of that expenditure, and he trusted the hon. Member and the House would allow the Report stage to be taken, so that the Bill might be introduced. If hon. Gentlemen would look at the Bill, and select the points on which they desired to concentrate their attention, the Government would endeavour, to the best of their ability, to satisfy every reasonable demand that might be made in the matter.

*SIR C. DILKE, whilst supporting the Government on this question, was bound to say that the Under Secretary for War had himself to blame for attention being called to this particular item mentioned by his hon. Friend, for the right hon. Gentleman introduced the matter on this head in a most unfortunate way. This was not a new expenditure for the fortification of London, but was the completion of a policy which had been carried out steadily ever since 1888, and which was almost concluded by the late Government, who finished the more important of the works which were contemplated in this scheme. It had been represented that this was a new departure—

MR. BRODRICK did not think the right hon. Gentleman understood what he said the other night. What he said in the schedule under which this was contained was that the item was of a somewhat novel character, but that there was an exception, which was the item as to the fortification of London, which he then pointed out had been the policy of successive Governments since 1888.

*SIR C. DILKE said that, as a matter of fact, anybody who took a walk round all these places on a Saturday afternoon might see them for himself, as the principal ones were finished. It was a strange thing that, as a matter of fact, this policy had never been discussed in that House, although Mr. Stanhope mentioned it in 1888. What was intended was the erection of certain defences for the decentralisation of stores for the use of Volunteers that might be mobilised at Dorking, Boxhill, Guildford and other places. He thought it was a pity that a language of mystery had been used about the matter. He was aware that some hon. and gallant Members opposite, and some hon. Gentlemen who belonged to the Navy, objected to it; but he himself supported it, and should vote in its favour in every division, as he believed it would give a certain amount of confidence to the public and the Press under certain circumstances.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth) deprecated the discussion of what was a very serious matter before they had the Bill in their hands. He strongly opposed that portion of it which dealt with anything like the fortification of London. That was only one item of the Bill, which covered a vast amount of ground and dealt with the most serious questions as to the defence of our Empire.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought it was very desirable that they should know whether London was being surrounded with fortifications. Nobody could say that that was not the impression conveyed who was in the habit of reading The Times newspaper. The solemn remonstrance given in The Times in regard to the important speech of the Under Secretary for War against the proposal of the fortification of London showed what had been the impression produced by the right hon. Gentleman.

If that were a wrong impression, some other time than a quarter past 12 oclock should, he thought, be chosen for explaining it, so that the public could be made to understand that it was an entire delusion which had been disavowed by Her Majesty's Government. He thought it had created almost as much astonishment and amusement as the Bill which was introduced that afternoon. [Laughter.] The Fortification of London Bill and the Government Education Bill were two Bills which had taken the public entirely by surprise. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!" and laughter.] The country should have the opportunity of inquiring into both Measures. He hoped the Government would, at all events, say whether they were going to erect fortifications round London, or whether they were not.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.) hoped he could set the apprehensions of the right hon. Gentleman at rest. The Government were not going to erect a series of fortifications round London; they were simply going to complete the work which was undertaken by the right hon. Gentleman himself. [Laughter.] It was a work of a very simple character. It had cost, he thought, some £68,000 in the past, and in the future it was calculated to cost not more than £96,000, and he did hope that that being so the Committee would feel that there was not a very important question at issue, and that they would allow his right hon. Friend to bring in the Bill.

MR. DILLON thought it was the duty of Irish Members to resist such an expenditure. He did not care very much to what purpose the English people put their money provided they let Ireland have a fair share. The expenditure on military armaments and on the Navy during the last four or five years had been monstrous. He hoped they would have the support of the Conservative Members for Ireland in opposing this Report, because the present expenditure was so enormous that Ireland was unable to bear her share of the burden.

*MR. HUDSON KEARLEY (Devonport) thought that the expenditure of this additional sum of £96,000 would be a little wasteful. The statement was that London was going to be fortified. In his constituency there had been erected splendid monuments of the Palmerston era in the form of so-called fortifications. Lord Palmerston frightened the country into spending 11 millions of money. The whole town was barricaded with earthworks which were never worth a penny. Last year, as an act of humanity to the population, the War Department agreed to assent to the Town Council removing these ridiculous works, which they have now done at their own expense. In face of that experience, he thought they ought to resist this attempt to waste £96,000. The sooner the item was removed from the Bill the better it would be.

MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) asked how much money was to be spent in barracks in Ireland. In many places the existing barracks were almost falling to pieces. Three years ago a promise was made that the barracks in his constituency would be put into a decent condition, but nothing had yet been done. Was provision made in this Bill for the necessary expenditure? He also wanted to know what proportion of the whole sum asked for by the Government was to be expended in Ireland. He fancied that the amount intended to be expended in fortifying Berehaven and Lough Swilly was exceedingly small.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid) emphasised the statements of previous speakers, and hoped that the works in Ireland would not be proceeded with until Irish opinion had been consulted. He trusted that the Motion would be pressed to a division.

Question put, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution:"—The House divided:—Ayes, 109; Noes, 29.—(Division List—No. 9—appended.)

AYES.

Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Ellis
Atkinson, Rt. Hon. John
Bailey, James (Walworth)
Baker, Sir John
Balcarres, Lord
Balfour, Rt. Hon. A.J. (Manch'r)
Balfour, Gerald William (Leeds)
Banbury, Frederick George
Bartley, George C. T.
Beach, Rt. Hon. Sir M. H. (Bristol)
Bemrose, Henry Howe
Boscawen, Arthur Griffith-
Brassey, Albert
Brodrick, Rt. Hon. St. John
Caldwell, James
Cavendish, R. F. (N. Lancs.)
Cavendish, V. C. W. (Derbyshire)
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. J. (Birm.)
Charrington, Spencer
Clare, Octavius Leigh
Clough, Walter Owen
Cochrane, Hon. Thos. H A. E
Coghill, Douglas Harry
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse

Colomb, Sir John Charles Ready
Compton, Lord Alwyne (Beds)
Curzon, Rt. Hn. G. N. (Lanc. S. W.)
Curzon, Viscount (Bucks)
Dalbiac, Major Philip Hugh
Dane, Richard M,
Davies, W. Rees- (Pembrokesh.)
Digby, John K. D. Wingfield-
Dilke, Rt. Hon. Sir Charles
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Finch, George H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Fairbank, Joseph Thomas
Fisher, William Hayes
Fison, Frederick William
Flannery, Fortescue
Galloway, William Johnson
Gibbs, Hn. A. G. H. (City of Lond.)
Gibbs, Hon. Vicary (St. Albans)
Goldsworthy, Major-General
Goschen, George J. (Sussex)
Graham, Henry Robert
Gray, Ernest (West Ham)
Gretton, John
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robert Wm.
Hare, Thomas Leigh
Helder, Augustus
Hermon-Hodge, Robert Trotter
Hobhouse, Henry
Houldsworth, Sir Wm. Henry
Jessel, Captain Herbert Merton
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Kenny, William
Kenyon-Slaney, Col. William
Lawrence, Edwin (Cornwall)
Lawrence, Wm. F. (Liverpool)
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks)
Leese, Sir Joseph F. (Accrington)
Lockwood, Lt.-Col. A. R. (Essex)
Long, Rt. Hn. Walter (Liverpool)
Lloyd, Archie Kirkman
Macartney, W. G. Ellison
Macdona, John Cumming
McCalmont, Maj.-Gn. (Ant'm, N)
Malcolm, Ian
Milward, Colonel Victor
Monckton, Edward Philip
Montagu, Hon. J. Scott (Hants)
Muntz, Philip A.
Murray, Rt. Hn. A. Graham (Bute)
Murray, Charles J. (Coventry)
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Parkes, Ebenezer
Paulton, James Mellor
Pirie, Captain Duncan Vernon
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Pretyman, Capt. Ernest George
Pryce-Jones, Edward
Purvis, Robert
Robertson, Herbert (Hackney)
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Savory, Sir Joseph
Scoble, Sir Andrew Richard
Seely, Charles Hilton
Smith, Abel H. (Christchurch)
Stanley, Lord (Lancs.)
Stone, Sir Benjamin
Strutt, Hon. Charles Hedley
Talbot, Lord E. (Chichester)
Talbot, John G. (Oxford Univ.)
Tomlinson, Wm. Edw. Murray
Vincent, Col. Sir C. E. Howard
Wanklyn, James Leslie
Webster, Sir R. E. (Isle of W.)
Welby, Lieut.-Col. A. C. E.
Whiteley, H. (Ashton-under-L.)
Williams, Colonel R. (Dorset)
Williams, Jos. Powell- (Birm.)
Willoughby de Eresby, Lord
Willox, John Archibald
Wodehouse, Edmond R. (Bath)
Wortley, Rt. Hon. C. B. Stuart-
Wyvill, Marmaduke D'Arcy

TELLERS FOR THE AYES, Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

NOES.

Birrell, Augustine
Cawley. Frederick
Colville, John
Crean, Eugene
Daly, James
Davitt, Michael
Dillon, John
Doogan, P. C.
Goddard, Daniel Ford
Harrison, Charles
Hayne, Rt. Hon. Charles Seale-
Hazell, Walter
Jones, William (Carnarvonshire)
Knox, Edmund Francis Vesey
Lambert, George
Leuty, Thomas Richmond
Logan, John William
Luttrell, Hugh Fownes
M'Hugh, Patrick A. (Leitrim)
McKenna, Reginald
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
O'Brien, P. J. (Tipperary)
Roberts, John Bryn (Eifion)
Robson, William Snowdon
Stanhope, Hon. Philip J.
Tanner, Charles Kearns
Williams, John Carvell (Notts)
Wilson, Henry J. (York, W. R.)
Woodhouse, Sir J. T (Hudd'rsf'ld)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES, Mr. Kearley and Mr. Lough.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brodrick, Mr. Balfour and Mr. Powell-Williams.

Bill to provide for defraying the expenses of certain Military Works and other Military Services," presented accordingly, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Thursday, and to be printed.—[Bill 105.]

WAYS AND MEANS.

Committee deferred till Wednesday.

SUPPLY.

Committee deferred till Wednesday.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday, 24th February.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ELECTIONS) BILL.

Read a Second time, and committed for this day.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (IRELAND ACT (1885) AMENDMENT BILL.

Committee deferred until Wednesday.

UNLAWFUL POSSESSION BILL.

Adjourned Debate on Second Reading [29th January] further adjourned till Monday next.

SHOPS EARLY CLOSING BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday, 10th February.

MOTIONS.

OCCUPYING TENANTS ENFRANCHISEMENT (PURCHASE OF FEE SIMPLE).

Bill to enable Occupying Tenants of houses and places of business to purchase the Fee Simple of their holdings, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bartley, Sir Frederick Segar Hunt, and General Goldsworthy; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday, 10th February, and to be printed.—[Bill 106.]

MARRIED PERSONS SMALL INDUSTRIAL INCOMES (TAX RELIEF).

Bill to extend relief from Income Tax to Married Persons with Small Industrial Incomes, however earned, which do not exceed five hundred pounds a year, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bartley and Mr. Loder; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday, 17th February, and to be printed.—[Bill 107.]

BUILDING FEUS AND LEASES (SCOTLAND).

Bill to amend the Law relating to Feus and Leases for Building in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Colville, Mr. John Wilson (Govan), Mr. Caldwell and Mr. Souttar; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday, 17th March, and to be printed.—[Bill 108.]

MILITARY WORKS BILL (SCHEDULE OF PROPOSED WORKS).

Copy presented, of Schedule showing Proposed Expenditure on Barrack Services under the Military Works Bill [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS (AID GRANT, Etc.).

On the Motion that the House do adjourn,

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY said: It may be convenient to the House that I should state that, as we were unable to finish the Committee stage of the Education Resolution to-night, I shall ask the House to give the Government facilities for finishing the matter to-morrow night.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that on the Notice Paper there was a matter of an important character for to-morrow, and whether, if he appropriated a private Members' day so soon in the Session he would be willing to give facilities for the consideration of this important matter at some future period of the Session. It was very hard upon Members who had been fortunate in the ballot to have their opportunity taken away from them.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I think it is very hard, and I would much rather be discussing or listening to the discussion of my hon. Friend's Motion than hearing the same arguments on this matter repeated ad nauseam; but I have no choice.

Mr. LOUGH asked the right hon. Gentleman whether as great interest was taken on both sides of the House in this important matter, it was his intention, if the Debate was not finished to-morrow to go on on Wednesday and Thursday, or whether he would insist on the division to-morrow.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: Oh, I hope we shall finish to-morrow.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: I must protest against the language held by the right hon. Gentleman. In the discussion to-night a large amount of the condemnation of his Resolution came from his own supporters, and yet the right hon. Gentleman says that was a repetition of arguments ad nauseam. In my opinion that is not proper language to address to either side of the House. I venture to say that if he expected to dispose of such a question as this in a single night's discussion he is entirely misapprehending the whole character of this Bill, and the necessity of the country understanding what the operation of the Bill will be. When he tells us he is going to rush this Bill through in a single night's discussion, with the amount of differences of opinion which has been exhibited to-night, I must say the right hon. Gentleman has formed a very erroneous judgment of the character of the Bill, and of the manner it is likely to be dealt with in the House of Commons.

House adjourned at a Quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, 2nd February 1897.

POST OFFICE CONSOLIDATION BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to consolidate enactments relating to the Post Office was presented by the Duke of Norfolk; Read 1ª; to be printed: and to be Read 2ª on Friday next—[No. 9.]

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILLS AND CONSOLIDATION BILLS.

Moved, That a Committee of Seven Lords be appointed to join with a Committee of the House of Commons to consider all Statute Law Revision Bills and Consolidation Bills of the present Session (The Lord Chancellor); Agreed to: The Lords following were named of the Committee:

L. Chancellor.
E. Morley.
L. Watson.
L. Herschell.
L. Thring.
L. Welby.
L. James of Hereford.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to agree with the Committee of the House of Commons in the appointment of a Chairman;

Then a Message was ordered to be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint them therewith, and to request them to appoint Seven Members of that House to be joined with the said Committee pursuant to the Resolution of this House of the 28th of January last and to the Message of the House of Commons of yesterday signifying their concurrence in the said Resolution.

House adjourned at Twenty-five minutes before Five o'clock, to Thursday next, a Quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 2nd February, 1897.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS reported, that, in accordance with Standing Order LXXIX., he had conferred with the Chairman of Committees of the House of Lords, for the purpose of determining in which House of Parliament the respective Private Bills should be first considered, and they had determined that the Bills contained in the following List should originate in the House of Lords, viz.:—

1. Aberbrothwick Harbour.
2. Alexandra (Newport and South Wales) Docks and Railway.
3. Assam Railways and Trading Company.
4. Barry Railway.
5. Belfast Water.
6. Birmingham Churches.
7. Borrowstounness Town and Harbour.
8. Bournemouth Corporation.
9. Brading Harbour and Railway
10. Bray and Enniskerry Railway (Extension of Time).
11. Bristol Corporation (Docks).
12. Bristol Extension.
13. Bristol Tramways.
14. Bute Dock and Rhymney Railway Companies Amalgamation.
15. Bute Docks, Cardiff.
16. Caerphilly Urban District Council.
17. Caledonian Railway.
18. Carnarvon Corporation.
19. Chatham Loop Railway.
20. Christchurch Inclosure Allotments.
21. Clontarf and Hill of Howth Tramroad.
22. Clydebank and District Water.
23. Clyde Navigation (Extension of Time).
24. Cordoba Central Railway Company.
25. Cowes Gas.
26. Cowes Harbour (No. 1).
27. Cowes Harbour (No. 2).
28. Craigcrook Mortification.
29. Crichton Royal Institution.

30. Crowhurst, Sidley, and Bexhill Railway.
31. Deal and Walmer Water.
32. Dublin Eye and Ear Hospital.
33. Dublin United Tramways (Electrical Power).
34. Dublin United Tramways (New Lines).
35. Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway (New Ross and Waterford Extension).
36. Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway (Shillelagh Extension, &c.).
37. Eastbourne Corporation Water.
38. Eastbourne Water.
39. Easton and Church Hope Railway.
40. Edinburgh American Land Mortgage Company.
41. Fishguard and Rosslare Railways and Harbours.
42. Fylde Water (Transfer).
43. Glasgow Harbour Tunnel Company.
44. Gravesend and Milton Water.
45. Gravesend and Northfleet Water Board.
46. Gravesend Corporation Water.
47. Great Northern Railway (Ireland).
48. Great Western Railway (Bristol Lines).
49. Great Western Railway (Truro and Newquay Railway).
50. Guild of Literature and Art (Dissolution).
51. Harrogate Corporation (Water Transfer).
52. Harrogate Water.
53. Hastings and St. Leonards Tramway.
54. Hastings Harbour.
55. Hastings Harbour District Railway.
56. Hastings Harbour Railway.
57. Hunstanton Water and Gas.
58. King's Lynn Corporation.
59. Kingstown and Kingsbridge Junction Railway (Abandonment).
60. Lancashire, Derbyshire, and East Coast Railway.
61. Lincoln and East Coast Railway and Dock.
62. Liverpool City Churches.
63. Liverpool Corporation (No. 1).
64. Liverpool Corporation (No. 2).
65. Liverpool Corporation Tramways.
66. Llanelly Harbour.
67. London and South Western Railway (Meon Valley Railway).
68. London and South Western Railway (Various Powers).
69. London Bank of Australia.
70. Loughborough Corporation.
71. Lowestoft Corporation.
72. Lowestoft Water and Gas.
73. Malvern Link Urban District Gas
74. Malvern Urban District Gas.
75. Manchester Ship Canal.
76. Mason's Orphanage.
77. Mason University College.
78. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.
79. Midland and South Western Junction Railway.
80. Morecambe Urban District Council.
81. Mumbles Railway and Pier (Extension of Time).
82. Nar Valley Drainage.
83. Neath Corporation Tramways.
84. Neath Harbour (Extension of Time).
85. Newhaven and Seaford Water.
86. New Hunstanton Water and Gas.
87. Newport Corporation.
88. Newry Navigation.
89. North London Commercial Permanent Building Society.
90. North London Railway.
91. North Pembrokeshire and Fishguard Railway.
92. Provident Life Office.
93. Railway Clearing House.
94. Railway Clearing System Superannuation Fund.
95. Railway Passengers' Assurance.
96. Rathmines and Rathgar Township Tramways and Improvement.
97. Rhondda and Swansea Bay Railway.
98. Rhymney and Aber Valleys Gas and Water.
99. Rio Tinto Company.
100. St. Anne's-on-the-Sea Gas.
101. Southampton Corporation Tramways.
102. Southampton Corporation Water.
103. South Eastern Railway.
104. Stirling Burgh (Gas).
105. Stromness Harbour.
106. Swansea Corporation Tramways.
107. Swansea Improvements and Tramways.
108. Taff Vale Railway.
109. Taunton Gas.
110. Torquay Corporation Water.
111. Tyne Improvement.
112. Tynemouth Corporation Water.
113. Tynemouth Gas.
114. Vale of Glamorgan Railway.

115. Vale of Rheidol Light Railway.
116. Whiting's Patent.
117. Windsor Dock, Cardiff.
118. Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway.

SHOPS BILL.

Second Reading deferred from to-morrow till Wednesday, 10th February.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

FOOD SUPPLIES (UNITED KINGDOM.)

MR. HENRY SETON-KARR (St. Helens): To call attention to the wholly inadequate production of food supplies within the area of the United Kingdom in relation to its large and increasing population; and to move, That, in the opinion of this House the dependence of the United Kingdom on foreign imports for the necessaries of life, and the consequences that would arise therefrom in the event of war, demand the serious attention of Her Majesty's Government. [Tuesday, 2nd March.]

RUSSIA IN NORTH-EAST ASIA.

SIR ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): To call attention to the great advance of Russian power in north-east Asia and generally; and to move a Resolution. [Tuesday, 2nd March.]

TAXATION ON CLERICAL INCOMES.

MR. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford): To call attention to the unequal and increasing pressure of Local and Imperial Taxation upon the Incomes of the Clergy; and to move a Resolution. [An early day.]

POST OFFICE (FOUR MILE RADIUS.)

MR. C. T. GILES (Cambridge, Wisbech): That, having regard to the profits made by the Post Office, it is the duty of that Department to deliver letters to all persons in Great Britain and Ireland living within a four mile radius of a Post Office. [An early day.]

ROYAL PATRIOTIC FUND.

MR. HUDSON KEARLEY (Devonport): To call attention to the administration of the Royal Patriotic Fund Commissioners and move a Resolution.

FLOATING DERELICTS.

MR. CUMMING MACDONA (Southwark, Rotherhithe): On going into Committee of Supply, to call attention to the subject of floating derelicts, and move, That, in view of the number of derelict ships which have been proved to be continually present on the great Atlantic Ocean steamship and sailing routes, and which are a source of danger to all ships navigating that ocean, it is desirable that Her Majesty's Government should station a cruiser or cruisers at Queenstown, or some such port on the Irish coast, charged with the duty of searching for derelicts, and towing them into harbour or destroying them, as seems best to the officer in charge.

QUESTIONS.

BELFAST TEXTILE TRADES (FINES).

*SIR CHARLES DILKE, (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that many girls engaged in the textile trades in Belfast, have struck against the long lists of large fines recently placarded in the mills; and, whether instructions have been given, either to the local Inspector of Factories, or to the Women's Factory-inspection Department of the Home Office, to inquire whether the proposed fines are "fair and reasonable" under the Truck Act of 1895, with a view to their carrying out the duty of enforcement of the law imposed by the Truck Act of 1887?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): Yes, Sir, the strike in question has been engaging my anxious attention. I understand that many of the workpeople have returned to work, and I have been hoping that the matter would be settled by mutual agreement; if, however, this should fail, it may be necessary to have recourse to proceedings under the Truck Act of last Session, which, for the first time gives the workers full protection against all unfair or unreasonable fines. It is the duty of the inspector, with whom I am in constant communication, to see that the Act is complied with, and very precise instructions have been given to him and all the inspectors on the subject.

AGRICULTURAL PRICES (IRELAND).

MR. PATRICK M'HUGH (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether, in view of the admitted fall in the prices of agricultural produce in Ireland, he will consider the advisability of bringing some pressure within the law to bear on Irish landlords to induce them to give their tenants abatements in rents now due and falling due; and (2), is it his intention to employ the forces of the Crown in carrying out evictions in cases where abatements were refused, and tenants were unable to enter Court in order to have their rents revised?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): I have no means of exercising influence in the direction suggested in the first paragraph of the Question. My information, however, is to the effect that landlords on many estates have given abatements in rents. There is no connection between the employment of the forces of the Crown and the refusal on the part of a landlord to grant an abatement in particular cases, as the sheriff is entitled to demand and receive the protection of the forces of the Crown in executing all decrees of Courts of Justice, and I have no option in the matter. I may add that the number of evictions throughout Ireland in the years 1895 and 1896 was lower than in any year since 1877.

MR. J. C. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked if the statement of the right hon. Gentleman included the practical evictions, though not the physical evictions, carried out under Section 7 of the Act of 1887?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am speaking of evictions that have actually taken place.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING (SCOTLAND).

*MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg ask the Lord Advocate whether, having regard to the numerous complaints of illegal trawling off the coasts of Scotland, he will state why the Fishery Board for Scotland have failed to give effect, so far as the Island of Lewis is concerned, to the provisions of Section 10, sub-Section (1), of the Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act 1895, which empowers the Board to make a bye-law or bye-laws directing that the methods of fishing known as beam trawling and otter trawling shall not be used in any area or areas under the jurisdiction of Her Majesty within 13 miles of the Scottish coast; and, whether it is the intention of the Fishery Board for Scotland to make a bye-law dealing with this matter at an early date?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): As the hon. Member should be aware, Section 10, sub-Section (1), of the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1895, can only be acted upon if the concurrence of the States Signatories of the North Sea Convention has been obtained. The whole question is at present engaging the earnest attention of Her Majesty's Government; but, as it involves points of great difficulty, no decision has yet been arrived at.

EVICTIONS (CONNEMARA).

MR. W. O'MALLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he is aware that four families, numbering in all 26 souls, are left homeless as the result of evictions in Carne, Connemara, the names being Pat. Mulkerrin, Letterard, seven in family; Widow Folan, Letterard, seven in family; Widow King, Mace, eight in family; and Tom Connelly, Mace, ten in family; that all the belongings of the poor people were carried outside their dwellings, the doors of the houses locked, and no one admitted back as caretakers; (2) whether the relieving officer attended these evictions, and whether he has seen any of these families since and offered them either indoor or outdoor relief; and (3) whether the Local Government Board would issue special instructions to relieving officers in future to attend such evictions and offer relief when necessary?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The persons named in the first paragraph were evicted on the 18th January for non-payment of rent. The relieving officer was present on the date specified in the eviction notices, but the evictions did not, however, take place on that date. On application being made to him by the wives of Pat Mulkerrin and Thomas Connelly he offered them relief inside the workhouse. He refused to give them out-door relief as they had cattle, sheep, and potatoes. Neither Mrs. King nor Mrs. Folan has made any application to the relieving officer for relief. As regards the last paragraph, having regard to Sections 2 and 4 of the 11 & 12 Vict., cap. 47, the Local Government Board do not consider any further special instructions are required. I may add that I am informed that Mulkerrin and Mrs. Folan have since been re-instated in their holdings.

CALAIS HARBOUR.

SIR BEVAN EDWARDS (Hythe): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if the mails for the Continent which should have left Dover on Saturday night the 23rd January were detained their till 10.30 a.m. on the 24th in consequence of the difficulty of entering Calias Harbour; and, if so, why they were not sent to Folkestone for shipment to Boulogne as on a previous occasion.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): It is the case that the night mails for the Continent on the occasion referred to were delayed throngh difficulty in entering Calais Harbour during the storm; but the circumstances were not identical with those of the previous case referred to by the hon. and gallant Member. Arrangements have been concerted with the contractors and the French Post Office to meet the case of an accumulation of mails at Dover through protracted bad weather; and such an accumulation was avoided on the previous occasion by using the Boulogne route. But in cases where it is uncertain whether the Calais route will not be practicable after a short delay, the expense of diversion from the regular route is not considered justifiable in order to avoid the chance of delay to one mail only. In the particular case of the 23rd ultimo considerable uncertainty existed, and, as it turned out, the Saturday night and Sunday morning mails were taken to Calais together on Sunday morning.

TELEPHONE SERVICE (TUNBRIDGE WELLS).

MR. A. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been called to the long continued complaints of the inefficiency and costliness of the local telephone service at Tunbridge Wells; whether he is aware that a large number of subscribers, owing to the impossibility of getting any improvement from the National Company, have given notice to withdraw their subscriptions; whether he has received a Resolution, passed last week unanimously, by the Town Council of Tunbridge Wells, asking him to give a licence for the formation of a local company; whether a similar request was made to him by a deputation in May last year; and whether he will be willing to grant this request?

MR. HANBURY: Yes, Sir. The attention of the Postmaster General has been called to the complaints from Tunbridge Wells. He is not aware of the number of subscribers who have given notice to withdraw their subscriptions. The Resolution passed at a meeting of the Town Council on the 6th of January duly reached the hands of the Postmaster General, who caused its receipt to be acknowledged on the 11th of January. A request for a licence to enable a local company to be established in Tunbridge Wells was made by a Deputation which was introduced to the Postmaster General on the 19th of May last by the hon. Member. Since then, the Postmaster General understands the National Telephone Company, by arrangement with the Corporation, have doubled their telephone wires and placed them underground so as to meet the complaints of inefficiency, and he has reason I believe that the service has been considerably improved. He is still in communication with the Town Council; with the Telephone Subscribers' Committee; and with the National Company, on the subject of the Telephone service at Tunbridge Wells, and he is not at present in a position to come to a decision as to the course which he should adopt.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN asked if the right hon. Gentleman could give any indication when a decision might be expected; an early answer was promised to the deputation last May.

MR. HANBURY: I cannot say, but I will put the matter before the Post-Master General.

MANSLAUGHTER AT MANCHESTER.

MR. C. E. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has decided to recommend Her Majesty to reduce the sentence of three years' imprisonment passed on J. Hall at the Autumn Assizes in Manchester for the manslaughter of his wife, and in support of which appeal a memorial containing 12,000 signatures was presented to him at the close of last year?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I have not come to any decision at present, as I thought it desirable to communicate with the learned Judge who tried the case, and his answer has not yet reached me.

DUTY ON SCOTCH HERRINGS.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the recommendations of the Fishery Board for Scotland in the 14th Report, he is prepared to represent to the Governments of Austria and Russia the need of the reduction in the duty on herrings imported from Scotland into those countries?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): We have decided, after consultation with the Secretary for Scotland, that under existing circumstances there would be no advantage in making such representations.

INDIAN ARTILLERY AND ENGINEERS (CADETS).

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has received a sworn declaration made by Colonel A. C. Turner, Colonel C. H. Spragge, Colonel J. F. Brough, and Colonel A. N. Pearse, all of the Royal Artillery, with reference to the circumstances under which 16 successful candidates who had competed for cadetships in Addiscombe College, in December 1859, with a view of obtaining commissions in the Indian Artillery and Engineers, were in December 1860 induced to accept commissions in Her Majesty's Royal Artillery or Engineers, the Government having, while these cadets were pursuing their course for the Indian Army at Addiscombe, decided not to make any more appointments to the Indian Artillery and Engineers; whether these Officers had passed the examination prescribed by the regulations for the admission of candidates for cadetships in the Engineers and Artillery of Her Majesty's Indian forces, under the 34th clause of the Act of 21 & 22 Vict., c.106, and been sworn in as Indian cadets, and on their part had duly fulfilled the terms and conditions of the regulations; whether his attention has been particularly drawn to the statement in the declaration that early in December 1860 the 16 cadets, of whom these officers are the survivors, were asked by Sir Frederick Abbott, the Governor of Addiscombe, if, as no more appointments were to be made for India, they would accept commissions in Her Majesty's Royal Artillery or Engineers, and were assured that the privileges that would have belonged to them if appointed would be guaranteed; that £100 each was subsequently paid them towards their expenses at Addiscombe by the Indian Government, in accordance with one of the conditions under which they had received their cadetships; also that, on joining at Woolwich at Addiscombe early in 1861, 10 of the candidates, including the declarants, who obtained commissions in Her Majesty's Royal Artillery, were assured by Colonel G. Kennedy, then in command of the depôt, that if they would consent to volunteer for general service their privileges under the conditions in the regulations for admission to cadetships at Addiscombe would be preserved to them; will he explain why, in spite of these declarations, they have been retired on pension at English instead of Indian rates, and have been deprived of the benefit which would have accrued to them, had they been appointed to the Indian Army, of counting the year they spent at Addiscombe towards pension; and whether as these cadets were induced to continue their course and accept appointments in Her Majesty's Artillery by assurances officially given to them by two superior officers representing the Crown, the Government now intends to repudiate these assurances?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I can add very little to the replies made to my hon. Friend in 1895, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling District. The salient point in the case is, that these officers never were in the Indian Army, appointments to which had ceased before they came out of Addiscombe. Whatever hopes were held out by the Governor of that college were certainly unauthorised; and they were set aside in advance by the Indian General Order of the 9th December 1859, intimating that "all future appointments of cadets should be made subject to any alteration that may be decided upon."

POLICE RESERVE FORCE, DUBLIN.

MR. PATRICK M'HUGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what has been the average strength of the Police Reserve Force at the depôt, Dublin, during the last financial year, and what was the cost of same for that year?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The average number of reserve men at the depôt during year ended 31st March 1896, was 262, including head constables; and the cost for that year, as nearly as can be ascertained was £20,190 including the pay of officers.

SCIENCE AND ART CLASSES.

MR. ERNEST GRAY (West Ham, N.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been directed to Circular Letter No. 314 of the Science and Art Department which purports to explain a paragraph of the Science and Art Directory; whether he is aware that this explanation is contrary to the interpretation which has been generally placed on the regulations contained in the directory by the managers of science classes and evening continuation schools and opposed to the practice generally observed in such schools and classes; and, whether, having regard to the serious loss of grants which will result from the operation of these instructions, he will have the new regulations so modified that while one attendance may not be registered for two grants, yet grants may be made for separate attendance at science and art classes by pupils who are also attending day schools in accordance with the existing practice?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): The object of the circular and the regulation to which it refers is to prevent a double grant being paid—one by the Education Department and the other by the Science and Art Department. No school need come under the regulation during the present year; there is the option of working under the present system of payment by results. The meaning of the circular is that a scholar on the register of a day elementary school cannot be also registered for an attendance grant from the Science and Art Department. It is not intended to apply to evening schools and classes. The whole subject has been referred to a Departmental Committee, which will report to the Committee of Council on the grants of the Science and Art Department and the regulations necessary to prevent their overlapping those of the Education Department.

MR. GRAY asked if as the circular stood it would prevent pupils attending evening classes and also attending science classes from receiving separate grants.

SIR J. GORST said it would not, because during the present financial year the circular would work under the old system of payments by results, and before entering another year the Committee would report and arrangements would be made.

ST. ANDREW'S SCHOOL, WILLESDEN.

Mr. J. H. YOXALL (Nottingham): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education if he is aware that at the public elementary school of St. Andrew's, Willesden, two certificated schoolmistresses and an assistant teacher have received notice of dismissal from the chairman of the managers of the school because they decline to sign a memorandum of agreement, by the terms of which they would have been bound to be regular communicants and attendants at the church of St. Andrew's; that an increase of salary was withheld from a certificated assistant master on the ground that he did not attend that particular church, and that finally he was dismissed because he did not so attend; and, will he cause an inquiry to be made into the management of St. Andrew's Public Elementary School, Willesden, with regard to the disposal of the public moneys granted by the State out of which the teachers are paid?

Sir J. GORST: My attention has been called to the statements referred to in the first part of the hon. Member's question, and I have seen them with very great regret. [Cheers.] The Committee of Council, however, have no power to interfere in the appointment or dismissal of teachers; and, in the absence of such power, are not prepared to institute the suggested inquiry.

Mr. A. J. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether any suggestion or remonstrance has been made with these managers, or whether the Committee of Council propose to deal with them in any way for the action they have taken?

Sir J. GORST: No, Sir. The Committee of Council decline to interfere in other people's business. [Laughter.]

VACCINATION MEDICAL OFFICERS.

Sir WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether vaccination medical officers come under the provisions of the Poor Law Superannuation Act of 1896; and, if not, whether he will take steps to amend the Act in this respect?

The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Henry Chaplin, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The Local Government Board are of opinion that neither under the Superannuation Act of 1864, nor under the Act of last Session, is a Public Vaccinator who is paid by fees under a contract, an officer to whom a superannuation could be granted. I am not contemplating any alteration of the law in this respect.

SCHOOL BOARDS (SCOTLAND).

Mr. JOHN WILSON (Falkirk Burghs): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate upon what principle the Scotch Education Department now refuses to continue to pay the additional grant claimed by certain Scotch School Boards in virtue of that part of Section 67 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1872?

*__The LORD ADVOCATE__: I understand the hon. Member's Question to refer to the case of scholars in evening schools. The Scottish Education Department has had the matter under its consideration, and has taken legal opinion. It is advised that in view of the fact that there is now no restriction of age in the case of scholars in evening schools, and as such schools are not part of the accommodation which it is compulsory on School Boards to provide, this attendance cannot be included in reckoning the average attendance in the sense of the section referred to.

LOANS TO TENANTS (IRELAND).

Mr. PATRICK M'HUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the charges for interest and repayment of principal on loans to tenants advanced by the Board of Works, Ireland, amount to £7 10s. per cent. per annum; and will he, in view of the straitened circumstances of tenant farmers in Ireland, consider the advisability of extending the period for repayment of those loans, so as to give immediate relief to the occupiers of agricultural holdings without entailing any pecuniary loss on the Treasury?

Mr. HANBURY: Tenants' loans are repayable by an annuity of 6½ per cent. per annum for 22 years (covering interest at about £3 8s. per annum) unless the tenant desires to pay within a shorter period, when he has the option of increasing the amount of the annual instalments to such an amount as will repay the loan in the period selected by him. No loan is granted unless the estimated value of the anticipated improvement to be derived from the works is greater than the annuity. As the hon. Member is aware, the general question of the rate of loans is now under the consideration of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

RAILWAY RATES (IRELAND).

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he has received a copy of a resolution passed on the 25th January by the Oldcastle Board of Guardians, stating that in consequence of the high local tariffs and low preferential through rates Irish Railway Companies are imposing such burdens on Irish commerce as will tend to crush it; and, (2) whether he is prepared to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the feasibility and desirability of State purchase of Irish Railways, as to work them economically for the benefit of the entire country?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I have received a copy of the resolution referred to in the first part of the Question. As regards the second paragraph, it has already been pointed out that the suggested State purchase of railways in Ireland has been considered by two Royal Commissions which sat in 1865 and 1886. I see no reason for the appointment of a third Royal Commission to go over the same ground again after so brief an interval.

FLOODS (COUNTY LONGFORD).

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether complaints have reached him of the flooding of all the lowlands on the banks of the tributary streams which flow into the River Shannon from Rooskey, county Roscommon, to Athlone; whether it is the fact that a large volume of water is kept unnecessarily back by the shutting down of the floodgates at Tarmonbarry and also at Athlone; whether such a course is an absolute necessity for navigation purposes; and whether any steps can be taken to so widen and deepen the River Camlin as to prevent the disastrous floods that continually occur in county Longford?

MR. HANBURY: I am informed that every stream in the Shannon district was flooded, and that the flood was about an ordinary winter flood. The Rooskey and Tarmon sluices were all opened. At Tarmon the sluices were not running full, and the surface of the water above the sluices was at or below the summer level. With a view to protecting the low-lying land along the river between Athlone and Meelick, 27 miles, the Athlone sluices were either not opened or only slightly opened, but Lough Rea (above Athlone) did not rise so as to cause much flooding. The navigation was not in any way affected by the sluices, and was not taken into consideration. No works are in contemplation by the Government on the Camlin River, which has its own Local Drainage Board.

BRITISH MUSEUM STAFF.

*MR. J. F. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the staff of the British Museum are the only officials in the State-supported institutions of the Metropolis who are deprived of the Saturday half-holiday all the year round; and, whether it would be possible, by working with a reduced staff or in some other manner satisfactory to the trustees, to make a concession of alternate Saturday afternoons to those hard-working and deserving officials?

MR. HANBURY: I know of no right to a Saturday half-holiday, except that which is allowed by the two Orders in Council of 1890 to the Higher and Second Divisions. That right is confined to alternate Saturdays and is only when the Department is a seven hours' office, and then only on condition that the Head of the Department is satisfied that the state of public business will permit of it. The assistants in the British Museum are only required to attend six hours per diem, so they have not even this contingent claim under the Order in Council. If the hon. Member is referring to the attendants, they have no claim to a half-holiday. Whether it would be possible to do as he suggests is a question not for the Treasury, but for the trustees of the British Museum to decide. I understand that the trustees have already considered the matter, and have decided that it would be impossible, on the ground that Saturday afternoon above all others, is the time when there is generally most pressure, owing to the increased attendance of the public.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF IRELAND.

MR. JAMES DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Great Northern Railway of Ireland shunt trains over a level crossing entering the town of Castleblaney, causing delay and danger to the people who use this crossing; and, whether his Department have been able to take any steps during the Recess to induce the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland to erect a bridge over the railway there?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon): The Board of Trade have this morning received a letter from the Company, in which it is stated that the Directors have decided to put up a footbridge over this level crossing; and that their engineer has been instructed to communicate with the Town Commissioners at Castleblaney, with a view to coming to an arrangement as to the position of the bridge which will suit all purposes.

MR. DALY asked if the right hon. Gentleman would take into account the fact that the railway company shunted over this level crossing, and that it was only a footbridge they were going to erect?

MR. RITCHIE said he was aware that it was a footbridge the company were going to erect, but he could not give any further answer to the question.

MR. DALY said he would raise the question on the Estimates.

CONGESTED DISTRICTS (HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can state when the Bill to deal with the £15,000 voted last year in aid of Congested Districts in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland will be introduced?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: I can only tell the hon. Member that no date can as yet be fixed for the introduction of the Bill in question.

TIUMPAN HEAD LIGHTHOUSE (ISLAND OF LEWIS).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can now state when the construction of the lighthouse on Tiumpan Head, Island of Lewis, will be commenced?

MR. RITCHIE: Although the Board of Trade have sanctioned the establishment of a light on Tiumpan Head, I am not yet able to say when, having regard to the claims of other works also under consideration, the state of the Mercantile Marine Fund will admit of the work being commenced.

POST OFFICE AMENDMENT ACT, 1895.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, and, if so, when, he proposes to introduce a Bill to extend to Scotland the provisions of the Post Office Amendment Act, 1895?

MR. HANBURY: I hope that I may be able to introduce a Bill this session which will deal with the matter to which the hon. Member refers.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS (HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, in view of the fact that many of the younger children attending school in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland are unable to speak English, the inspectors visiting such schools will be authorised to question the children in Gaelic whenever such a course seems desirable, as is already done in Welsh in the schools of Wales?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: I must remind the hon. Member that Article 19 of the Code directs that in districts where Gaelic is spoken the intelligence of the children may be tested by requiring them to explain in Gaelic the meaning of any passage read or recited.

CROFTERS ACT, 1886.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Government propose to bring in a Bill to extend the benefits of the Crofters Act, 1886, to tenants holding under lease in the crofting counties of Scotland at rentals of £30 and under?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: No, Sir; Her Majesty's Government are not convinced that a case can be made out for the alteration of the law suggested in the hon. Member's Question.

SCHOOL TEACHERS' PENSIONS (IRELAND.)

MR. PATRICK M'HUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that, under existing arrangements, a national teacher in Ireland of the first class, assuming he commences to teach at the age of 18 years, would, after 20 years' service, be entitled to a pension of only £6 a year and that a third-class teacher would' after 30 years' service, be entitled to a pension of only £10 a year; is he aware that the Irish National Teachers' Pension Fund is insolvent through no fault of the teachers but through mistakes made by Government actuaries; and will the fund be placed in a position of solvency by special grant, and without deducting for such purpose any sum from the arrears of school grant due to Ireland under the Education Act of 1892?

MR. HANBURY: The pensions at the two periods would, I understand, be those stated in the Question. In practice the teachers prefer a gratuity to a pension—and they would receive £95 and £116 respectively. English teachers entered since 1862 receive no pension. It is not possible within the limits of an answer to explain the causes which have led to the present condition of the fund, but one important cause is the fact that existing teachers are paying much less than is required to produce one-fourth of the benefits, and have thus materially profited by the error in the original calculation. The steps to be taken to place the fund in a sound position are now engaging the attention of the Government.

MR. PATRICK M'HUGH: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is a fact that an Irish national teacher who commences to teach at the age of 18 years can claim full pension only after a service of 43 to 46 years; is there any other department of the public service in which so long a term of service is required in order to secure full pension; and could he state what are the periods of service after which teachers in elementary schools in Great Britain are permitted to retire on full pension?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I understand that the teacher described would, if a man, receive full pension at the age of 61, after 43 years' service; and if a woman, at 58, after 40 years' service. The teachers are pensionable under a special code. But I may say it frequently happens in the Civil Service that the full pension is not earned until after more than 40 years' service. I am informed that no teacher in Great Britain who entered since 1862 is entitled to pension, and that the rules under which pensions are given to those who entered before 1862 are so different from the Irish system that no comparison can be instituted; but I believe them to be on the whole not more favourable to the teachers than the Irish system.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

MR. J. C. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he is aware that the Roman Catholic and Protestant Managers of National Schools in Ireland and the Teachers Organisation have repeatedly called for the reduction of the average necessary for the employment of assistant teachers, and that the Commissioners of National Education last year, by a unanimous vote, requested the Treasury for sufficient funds to enable them to meet the proposed alteration; (2) whether he will use his influence with the Treasury so as to secure the necessary net grant to meet the views of the Commissioners; and (3) will he recommend that the assistant teachers at present threatened with withdrawal of salary, owing to the refusal of the Treasury to accede to the recommendations of the Board of Education, shall be retained in the pay of the Commissioners pending a settlement of the question?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Representations have been made as stated in the first paragraph of the Question. The Estimates for the coming financial year are now closed, but I shall be prepared again to bring the matter before the Treasury in connection with the Estimates for the year 1898–99 should the Commissioners so desire. As regards the last paragraph, the Commissioners have no power to continue payment to assistant teachers where the conditions of the existing Rules as to the average daily attendance for assistants are not fulfilled.

MR. FLYNN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he is aware that in five-eighths of the number of Irish National Schools at present the staff consists of one recognised teacher only, single teachers being thus responsible in over 5,000 schools for the efficient teaching of eight standards on 40 different part subjects daily ; and (2) whether the Commission of Inquiry respecting the employment of manual labour in National Schools will take into consideration the exceptional circumstances of rural schools in Ireland, and inquire into the educational soundness of making the staff of such schools dependent upon attendance rather than upon the number of classes and subjects taught?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR : There is only one teacher in about five out of eight National Schools, but in a very large number of these schools, where the average daily attendance is sufficient, the teacher is aided by one or two paid monitors. In practice, the individual daily instruction alluded to in the second paragraph is not given, nor is it necessary for the efficient instruction of the classes, and certainly no teacher is held responsible for such an arrangement. The general arrangement is to have certain subjects taught on only two, or perhaps three, days in the week. As regards the third paragraph, the Commission has been appointed to inquire how far and in what form manual and practical instruction should be included in the educational system of the primary schools under the Board of National Education. I am unable to say whether the Commission will consider the Question referred to by the hon. Member as coming within the scope of the reference to them.

INDIAN TROOPS (SCURVY).

*SIR CHARLES DILKE : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if there is any truth in the rumour of scurvy having been prevalent among the Indian troops at Suakin and Tokar last year.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing) : The Indian troops at Suakin were attacked for a short time by a sudden outbreak of scurvy, during which two British officers, 103 men, and 85 followers were admitted to hospital, suffering from this complaint. In about a month—viz., by the beginning of November—it was completely eradicated, and the general officer commanding was able to report that "by the middle of November, so far as the men were concerned, the force was as fit to take the field as it was on its arrival in the country."

TENANTS HOLDINGS (COUNTY MONAGHAN).

MR. DALY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the tenants in the townlands of Moylemore and Moylebeg, on the estate of Major Leslie, county Monaghan, have applied to the Irish Land Commisioners to purchase the landlord's mortgage on their holdings ; and that the Irish Land Commissioners have replied that the recent Irish Land Act does not give them power to deal with such cases ; and whether he will bring in a Bill this Session to give relief to tenants such as those referred to?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR : The Land Commissioners are unable to trace any such application as is referred to in this Question. I have already replied to the second paragraph of the Question.

DEPORTATION OF PAUPERS TO IRELAND.

MR. DALY : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state when he intends introducing the Bill to prevent the deportation of paupers from England and Scotland to Ireland.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR : I have again and again explained that any Bill which would provide a real remedy for the grievance complained of could not emanate from the Irish Office, as it would have to deal with the Poor Law as it now exists in England and Scotland. I am unable, therefore, to answer the question of the hon. Member.

CRETE.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether information has reached him that some Christian peasants returning to their villages were attacked near the gate of Canea by an armed band of Mahomedans on the evening of the 26th ultimo, several of them maltreated or wounded, and their mules and baggage taken from them; that great excitement prevails in Canea, and all the shops have been closed; and that some Christians were wounded outside the gates of Heraklion on the 27th ultimo; and whether any representations have been addressed by the representations of the Powers to the Vali of Crete or to the Government of the Porte respecting these alleged attacks upon the persons and properties of Christian subjects?

MR. CURZON: We have not heard of the particular incident at Canea mentioned in the Question. But during the past few weeks there have been frequent alarms in the towns, owing to the immigration of Mussulmans from the country districts, and there have been murders, both of Christians and Mussulmans. The foreign ships of war have produced a calming effect by their presence at the ports, and movement to the threatened quarters. The Turkish authorities appear to be doing their utmost to maintain order and restore confidence, and the foreign Consuls are in close communication with them. The continuance of peace depends largely upon the organisation of the new gendarmerie which is being rapidly proceeded with.

ARMY OFFICERS' UNIFORM.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any allowance will be made to Officers of the Army who have been ordered to provide themselves with the new mess waistcoat and patrol jacket in addition to the new sword hilts of last year; when the new helmet is to be taken into use; and why Officers are put to such expense in the matter of uniform?

*MR. BRODRICK: No change has been made in the mess waistcoat, but a less expensive mess jacket and patrol jacket have been introduced for infantry officers, and ample time has been allowed for those now in use to be worn out. As the object of the change has been to make officers' uniforms more serviceable and less expensive, and as the change is known to have been very generally desired by the officers concerned, no necessity for compensation is likely to arise. No decision has yet been come to as to the introduction of a helmet of a new pattern.

NETLEY HOSPITAL (ASSESSMENT).

SIR BARRINGTON SIMEON (Southampton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury (1) whether it is a fact that since the year 1876 the Government has paid on an assessment of £3,385 on Netley Hospital; (2) whether this sum represents about one-fourth the estimated annual value; and (3) whether he will consider the desirability of having a new valuation made of Netley Hospital?

MR. HANBURY: The answer to the first paragraph is, Yes. The Local Assessment Committee accepted this valuation as satisfactory in 1876, and have never asked for a revision until last July. The Treasury at once expressed their readiness to make a new valuation, and on July 18th, and again on January 18th, asked for information from the Assessment Committee which has not yet been supplied to them.

EQUIVALENT GRANT (SCOTLAND).

MR. WALTER THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government are prepared to give an assurance that an equivalent grant will be given to Scotland in proportion to the sum proposed to be given to the Voluntary Schools in England?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): We do not think, as was stated last year, that the system of "equivalent grants" is properly applicable to the matter dealt with in my right hon. Friend's Bill; but should this Bill become law, no doubt fair aid will be given to primary education in Scotland, in such manner as may be suitable to the educational requirements of the country.

MR. JAMES BRYCE (Aberdeen, S): May I ask upon what basis that aid will be calculated, or when the right hon. Gentleman will be able to make a statement on the subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I imagine any proposals of the kind could not be introduced until it was seen what the result may be of the Bill which my right hon. Friend introduced last night. ["Hear, hear!"]

IRISH MAILS.

MR. J. L. CAREW (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether it was with the consent of the Post Office authorities that the time of departure of the Irish day mail train was altered from 7.30 a.m. to 7.15, in order to allow a Scotch connection to be made; whether, since the establishment of the Irish mail service in 1860, the day and night trains to and from London have been run at the same rate of speed; whether, under the proposed new time table, the day mail service is to be run at a slower speed than the night train; and, whether he will endeavour to have the day service run at the same speed as the proposed accelerated night service, and thus convenience the public by an hour's later start at Euston and Dublin respectively?

MR. HANBURY: The dispatch of the Irish day mail train from Euston was altered from 7.30 a.m. to 7.15 a.m. in 1867, but it was not until 1872 that the Irish train was utilised for the conveyance of the Scotch bags. It is the case that the Irish day and night trains have since 1860 been run at practically the same rate of speed. Under the new time table the acceleration of the trains will be confined to the night mail. The acceleration of the day mail trains would be attended with considerable additional expense, which the advantage to the mail service is not held to justify. The convenience of half-an-hour's later start from Dublin has been conceded to passengers under the new time table, but in regard to the dispatch from London the postal advantage is entirely on the side of maintaining the present dispatch of 7.15 a.m.

ARBITRATION TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table of this House the text of the Arbitration Treaty between this country and the United States as recently signed?

MR. CURZON: If the hon. Member will put a Motion upon the Paper for the production of the Treaty, Her Majesty's Government will have no objection to lay it on the Table.

PARISH COUNCIL ELECTIONS.

*SIR WALTER FOSTER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has received any and, if so, what representations on the subject of the new Order for the election of parish councils, which deprives one elector of the right to demand a poll for the election of parish councillors, and orders that a poll cannot be taken unless the chairman assents, or it is demanded by five electors present at the meeting, or by one-third of those present, whichever number is least?

MR. CHAPLIN: I have received no representation since the Order referred to was issued, adverse to the course which has been adopted in this matter.

*SIR WALTER FOSTER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman apart from representations, whether he has considered if this Order does not contravene the words of the Statute, inasmuch as it takes away from the electors the power to demand a poll on a question of expense?

MR. CHAPLIN: I think, Sir, the Order is strictly carried out.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING (IRELAND).

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, (1) whether his attention has been called to the circumstance that English steam trawlers have been habitually fishing within the prescribed limits on the coast of the county Down; that some weeks ago three of them were arrested by the coastguard off St. John's Point, prosecuted, and fined the maximum penalty at the Castlewellan Petty Sessions, an amount for which one night's fishing amply recoups them; that the coastguard, though successful in this instance, can rarely catch the offenders, who are able to steam away from their sailing or rowing boats; and (2) whether under these circumstances, he will appeal to the Admiralty to assist in preventing the destruction of the spawning grounds and the ruin of the fishery; or, if that department is unwilling to undertake that duty, he will consider the propriety of organising a water police supplied with steam launches to protect this very important Irish industry?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The facts are substantially as stated in the first paragraph, though I am unable to ascertain what was the value of one night's fishing. On many occasions the coastguard could not come up with the steam trawlers. The question of providing a gunboat for the purpose of preventing illegal fishing by the steam trawlers, and of protecting the fisheries is now under the consideration of Government.

CHITRAL CAMPAIGN MEDAL.

MR. ARTHUR BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that considerable disappointment prevails at the delay in issuing a medal for the Chitral campaign; whether he can explain the cause of this delay; and whether the Secretary of State for War will make some representation in the proper quarter with a view to hastening the issue of this medal?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I greatly regret any disappointment caused by the delay in issuing the Chitral medal. The delay is practically due to a proposal from the Government of India, that in place of a clasp being added to the existing frontier medal an altogether new medal should be struck and issued to note the services of this very successful expedition. This involved the selection and execution of a design—a necessarily lengthy process. The dies were sent to India on January 1st, and I presume the medals are now being struck.

HULME CAVALRY BARRACKS (MANCHESTER).

MR. W. S. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether any decision has yet been arrived at by the Military authorities with regard to the Hulme Cavalry Barracks; what troops are now occupying the said barracks; how long such troops have been there; and whether it is intended to make any immediate change with regard to cavalry barracks being occupied by infantry soldiers?

MR. BRODRICK: The Hulme Barracks are at present occupied by infantry, who have been there since the autumn. No immediate change is contemplated.

LORD PENRHYN'S QUARRIES.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a letter signed "George Rowley," in The North Wales Observer and Express, of 8th January, 1897, in which he states, with reference to his appointment as Local Labour Correspondent to the Board of Trade, that his duty as correspondent was to obtain all information possible from the locality from secretaries of associations, etc., and forward them to the Board of Trade; that he received his appointment through the recommendation of several Welsh Members, well-known Radicals; that on labour questions he had been a trade unionist all his life, taken a leading part for more than twenty years, and had had a large experience of strikes of all kinds; that he was President of the Miners' Federation for some years; and only the other day was Chairman of a Welsh meeting at Cefnmawr for the purpose of raising subscriptions on behalf of the Bethesda men; and, whether the writer of this letter was specially instructed by the Board of Trade to visit Bethesda for the purpose of making inquiries as to the dispute at the Penrhyn Quarries, and his report thereupon received previous to the Department openly intervening in the matter?

MR. RITCHIE: I have just seen the letter, and assuming it to be as printed, it is a highly improper letter, and Mr. Rowley's explanation has been called for. Local correspondents are not permanent officials of the Board of Trade but persons able to supply information with regard to employment, and their reports are considered along with information obtained from other sources. The statement in the letter as quoted with regard to the mode in which the selection of Mr. Rowley was made is incorrect. When the Board of Trade first became aware of the prospect of a serious dispute in the Bethesda Quarries, they instructed Mr. Rowley in the ordinary course to supply them with information as to the facts, and a report was received from him under the date of September 15th. I think it would be satisfactory that I should read it to the House. It is as follows:—

"As instructed, I have visited the quarry district of Bethesda for the purpose of making inquiries as to the dispute in progress at the Penrhyn quarries I find that Lord Penrhyn is at present investigating the alleged grievances, and is in communication with the leaders of the men with a view to an amicable arrangement. The men continue working, but much anxiety exists in the locality owing to the decided inclination of the men to strike. Feeling runs so high that the slightest hitch in the proceedings will bring the men out. Every effort is being made by the committee and leaders to counteract this. It is thought that by Lord Penrhyn personally investigating the grievances matters will be put right. Public sympathy in the locality is with the men. They say that the wages earned in some instances by good practical quarrymen are much lower than what has been reported, only that the men do not care to come forward. Great dissatisfaction is expressed at the way in which contracts are let to non-practical persons, to the exclusion of the men who have been apprenticed to and worked at the trade all their lives. The quarry is worked in ponks or galleries of 100 or 150 yards in length, in which the quantity of rubbish and quality of the slate varies. The most unprofitable parts are sublet to the men who have not been fortunate in securing a gallery, and this, as a matter of course, places them at a great disadvantage; and these are the men who are seeking a minimum day's wage, or a more equal distribution of the advantages with the disadvantages. This information I received from different individuals in the neighbourhood of the quarries. I passed through the quarry as an ordinary visitor during the dinner hour, and I saw several meetings of the men here and there discussing the situation. The decision of Lord Penrhyn is anxiously awaited."

It is true that I interposed during the speech of my right hon. Friend the member for Thanet on Thursday last, owing to the repetition by him of an allegation which had been previously made by my hon. Friend the member for Macclesfield to the effect that the Board of Trade had been guided during their negotiations with Lord Penrhyn by information derived from the local correspondent of the Board of Trade. This allegation I then denied. This denial I emphatically repeat. I stated that no communication had been received from the local correspondent during the time of the negotiations. This statement is strictly accurate, but on the following day I ascertained that under the date of September 18th, prior to the commencement of negotiations and nearly a fortnight before the date of letter No. 1 in the published correspondence, which was the first letter asking for the Board's intervention, a communication had been received from the local correspondent. It was of no importance, and contained no advice to the Board, and no opinion whatever on the merits of the case. This communication had entirely escaped my recollection, and I at once ordered a copy of it to be sent to may right hon Friend, as I wished to be perfectly frank with him. ["Hear, hear!"] No further communication was held on the subject with the labour correspondent. In fact any such further communication with him was forbidden. No advice was asked. No advice was given, nor was anyconcealment attempted. On the contrary, Mr. Rowley's report was shown to Lord Penrhyn by Lord Dudley when he saw him at Penrhyn Castle, so that all along Lord Penrhyn had been in full possession of the communication referred to. ["Hear. hear!"]

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the report which he has read was in reply to a special request addressed to this person to go and make enquiries?

MR. RITCHIE: It was a request made in the ordinary course of business. It is the duty of the Board of Trade to make themselves acquainted with all labour movements, and, in accordance with the usual practice, when it was seen in the newspapers that a dispute had occurred which was likely to end in a strike, the local correspondent was asked to furnish the Board, not with any opinion of his own, but with information as to the facts connected with the matter. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT (Cheshire, Macclesfield): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether Lord Penrhyn was at liberty to disclose the letter which he has just read, or whether it was shown him by Lord Dudley strictly under the seal of confidence?

MR. RITCHIE: Strictly in confidence.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT had the following Question on Paper:—

"To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention had been called to a report in The Westminster Gazette of last Friday, of an alleged interview with Sir Courtenay Boyle, in the course of which Sir Courtenay Boyle is represented as having stated that he had himself received a letter upon the subject of the dispute at the Penrhyn Slate Quarries from a local labour correspondent of the Board of Trade; whether, inasmuch as this letter was an official communication from Mr. George Rowley, dated 17th December 1896, stating that, as instructed, he had visited the quarry district of Bethesda for the purpose of making inquiries as to the dispute in progress at the Penrhyn Quarry, which letter was minuted and initialed by the principal officials of the Board of Trade, including the President himself, he will now qualify the official statement that there was no communication whatever between that correspondent and the Board of Trade, the President, or any one connected with the Board of Trade in connection with this dispute during any time of the negotiations, and no communication was received nor invited from this gentleman with regard to the dispute in the Penrhyn Quarries; and, will he explain to the House the apparent discrepancies between the statements of Sir Courtenay Boyle and himself?"

*MR. SPEAKER: The Question which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Macclesfield is irregular and ought not to appear on the Paper, because it refers to a previous Debate in this House, and questions a statement there made. But as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, in answering a question of the right hon. Member for Thanet, did give a kind of anticipatory answer to the question of the hon. Member for Macclesfield, and went with great detail into what has taken place with reference to that Debate, I think it only fair that the hon. Member should be allowed to put his Question or ask the right hon. Gentleman any further question.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he adheres to the statement that no communication was received or invited from this gentleman with regard "to the dispute in the Penrhyn quarries. We heard nothing from him and we made no inquiry."

MR. RITCHIE: I hardly think it is necessary for me to make any further statement. I would point out to my hon. Friend that I have already said in this House that this communication, occurring as it did, prior to the opening of the negotiations, had escaped my memory. It is quite clear that in answering the question of my hon. Friend I was dealing with the period during which these negotiations had been going on, which period was closely within my recollection. In the question my hon. Friend now puts he asks whether my attention has been called to the report

"in the Westminster Gazette of last Friday of an alleged interview with Sir Courtenay Boyle, in the course of which Sir Courtenay Boyle is represented as having stated that he had himself received a letter upon the subject of the dispute at the Penrhyn slate quarries."

Oh, no; that is not the point.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT: But I should like an answer to that.

MR. RITCHIE: I am asked by Sir Courtenay Boyle to say that the account, which was published without his authority, differs totally from what really occurred, and that he made no such statements as those attributed to him. Going back to the point about which my hon. Friend asked me, namely, whether I "will now qualify the official statement that there was no communication whatever between that correspondent and the Board of Trade, the President, or anyone connected with the Board of Trade in connection with this dispute during any time of the negotiations," that was the statement I made. If I had recollected that there was this prior communication I should, of course, have stated so. I did not recollect it, because it was not within the area of the time of the negotiations, and anyone who heard me, in the Debate, use the expression I did, must have known that I was dealing with the time during which the negotiations took place. [Cheers.]

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is in accordance with the official practice for permanent officials to make statements or speeches for publication?

Mr. RITCHIE: I confess I did not see the statement which was published in the Westminster Gazette. Sir Courtenay Boyle sent it to me on Friday night. When I saw him subsequently, he stated that someone from the Westminster Gazette came with a view of asking him one or two questions in regard to the correspondence which had been published, and that he answered those questions without the slighest idea that he was being interviewed. [Laughter]. I am afraid he showed a guileless simplicity which one would have hardly suspected. [Laughter]. But I can quite understand how it arose. Some information was asked as to the correspondence that had been published. Sir Courtenay Boyle answered with a view of making some points clear, but he had no idea of being interviewed. [Laughter.]

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES: Will the right hon. Gentleman recommend his officials to exercise greater caution in the future?

[No answer was given].

NECESSITOUS SCHOOL BOARDS.

Mr. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when a Supplementary Estimate will be presented to provide, during the current financial year, for the hitherto unclaimed or unpaid grants to necessitous School Boards, under Section 97 of The Elementary Education Act 1870, for which provision was not made in the Education Votes passed last Session; and what the amount so proprovided in the Supplementary Estimate for this purpose will be?

Sir J. GORST: The Supplementary Estimate which the Committee of Council will shortly submit to the Treasury for presentation to this House will include a sum of nearly £20,000 for paying such claims referred to as are admissible.

FINNER RIFLE RANGE (COUNTY DONEGAL).

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that on the piece of land recently taken by the War Office for the construction of a rifle range at Finner, county Donegal, a cairn of great antiquity, which is held in great veneration by the people of the district, and is believed to contain the ashes of some Irish chiefs, is being demolished and the material used in the construction of the range; and whether, as this cairn stands on the highest part of the land and would not in any way interfere with its use, and as the necessary material can be got elsewhere in the neighbourhood, he will instruct the military authorities to stop further demolition of the cairn?

*Mr. BRODRICK: Inquiries are necessary before I can answer this question fully. Meanwhile, orders have been telegraphed to stop any destruction of the cairn if it is going on.

LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, having regard to the nature of the Report furnished at the close of the inquiry into the condition of the Mercantile Marine Fund, if he can state what steps are in contemplation for the redress of the grievances of the lighthouse keepers of the United Kingdom; and whether, since petitions have been repeatedly forwarded by English and Scotch lighthouse keepers to their respective Boards, and the Irish petition has remained for two years unacknowledged, he will promise to grant a Commission of some kind to inquire into these grievances and to examine witnesses from each branch of the service?

Mr. RITCHIE: The Board of Trade have quite recently received applications from the Trinity House and the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses for improvement in the present pay and the prospective pensions of lightkeepers in their service. These applications are both under consideration. No application has as yet been received from the Commissioners of Irish Lights with regard to the same matter. If any is received it will be duly considered, but the Board of Trade have no power to act without such application.

General LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) asked when it was likely that action would be taken in the direction of dealing with the lighthouse keepers?

MR. RITCHIE: I have stated that the applications have only quite recently been received. There will be no delay in considering them.

OATHS ACT (SCOTTISH FORM).

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been drawn to the report of an inquest, held at West Bromwich on the 27th January before Mr. Betham, deputy coroner, from which it appears that a surgeon, being called to give evidence, desired to be sworn according to the Scottish form, whereupon the deputy coroner professed his ignorance of the Scottish oath and stated that he was not bound to administer the oath in that form; whether, under the provisions of the Oaths Act 1888, the administration of the oath in the Scottish form was imperative upon the court in the circumstances stated; and if so, whether, he would communicate with the Lord Chancellor, with a view to the attention of coroners and county court judges being called to the matter; and, whether, having regard to the strong representations of the medical faculty as to the danger of infection from "kissing the book," he will consider the advisability of extending generally the practice of the Lambeth County Court namely to place printed notices in a conspicuous position in the courts calling public attention to the provisions of the Act which permit the Scottish form of oath as an alternative.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In answer to the hon. and learned Member's question, I am informed by the deputy coroner that he did not state that he was not bound to administer the oath in Scotch form. On the contrary, he was prepared to accept it if the witness could remember the form of it; the deputy coroner not then having the form by him. The witness was not required to kiss the book; his unsworn evidence being accepted. Under the provisions of the Oaths Act 1888, the administration of the oath in Scotch form is to be permitted if it is desired by the witness, and a circular has been issued by the Home Office calling the special attention of coroners and deputy coroners to these provisions; and I shall be pleased to show the hon and learned Member a copy of it if he desires to see it.

ROYAL PATRIOTIC FUND.

MR. HUDSON KEARLEY (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the Report and Recommendations of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the administrations of the various funds controlled by the Commissioners of the Royal Patriotic Fund, which has reported that there is immediately available from the total assets recently valued at £1,086,000 for the further relief of widows, children, and dependent relatives of soldiers, sailors, and marines who have lost their lives in the service of the Crown, a surplus approximating half a million sterling; and whether any steps have been taken for the prompt issue of a Supplementary Commission, under Clause 4 of the Patriotic Act of 1881, to deal with such surplus funds which have accrued and may hereafter accrue as recommended by the Committee?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The recommendations of the Committee are under the consideration of the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty. I cannot find in the Report to which the hon. Member refers any statement that there is immediately available a surplus approximating half a million sterling, nor would, I am informed, such a statement be in accordance with the fact.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

*MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, whether recent local legislation affecting the aborigines of Western Australia has been vetoed by Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, whether there is any objection to stating the grounds on which the Imperial veto has been exercised in this instance?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): No recent legislation affecting the aborigines of Western Australia has been vetoed. A new Bill was passed by the Legislature of that colony in 1894, to repeal Section 70 of the Constitution Act, which appropriates 1 per cent. of the colonial revenue for the use of the Aborigines Protection Board. This Measure was reserved by the Acting Governor, and has not yet been assented to. Considerable correspondence has passed with the colonial Government, which is now in the hands of the printer, and will, I trust, shortly be ready for presentation.

EDUCATION GRANT (SCOTLAND).

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the proposed repeal of so much of Section 19 of the Education Act 1876, as imposes a limit on the Parliamentary grant to day schools is intended to carry with it the repeal of Section 53, which applies the same conditions to Scotland?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The Bill does not refer to Scotland, and does not touch the question of the 17s. 6d. limit in respect to Scotland.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS COMMISSION (GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND).

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked whether the First Lord of the Treasury could now inform the House when he would be in a position to lay upon the Table the terms of reference to the Royal Commission on Financial Relations which he had promised to submit to Parliament at any early date?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The references to Royal Commissions are not usually laid upon the Table, but I shall be prepared next week in answer to a question to give the terms of reference to this Commission.

THE EGYPTIAN EXPEDITION.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY announced that the business in Committee of Supply on Friday would be the consideration of the grant in aid in connection with the Egyptian Expedition.

*SIR C. DILKE: Which will come first—the grant in aid for the Indian troops or the grant of £500,000?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The grant to the Egyptian Government.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS (AID GRANT, ETC.).

PRECEDENCE FOR THE EDUCATION RESOLUTION.

MR. E. J. C. MORTON (Devonport) asked whether, supposing the Debate on the financial Resolution went over that day, he was able to undertake that the Government would not take to-morrow.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I really am unable to entertain the hypothesis for a moment. [Laughter and cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY, rising again, moved:—

> "That the order for the Committee on 'Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant, Etc.)' have precedence this day of the notices of motion and other Orders of the Day."

He thought this was a motion that would need no justification from him. [Opposition cries of "Oh."] He much regretted that his hon. Friend who, by the fortune of the ballot, was the happy possessor of the first place that day, should be disappointed by the proposal to take the time for Government business. But it must be remembered that they were, after all, only discussing what was commonly regarded and what ought to be regarded as a purely formal stage in the procedure of bringing in a Bill, and which was quite independent of the discussions on the Second Reading and Committee stages of the Bill. In addition to the opportunity now afforded there would be an opportunity for some discussion on the Report of the Resolution. In the circumstances they ought not to delay long coming to a conclusion upon this, the first Parliamentary stage in the discussion of the Education Measure. ["Hear, hear."]

*MR. JOHN ELLIS (Notts, Rushcliffe) thought the motion did require further justification than the right hon. Gentleman had vouchsafed. It was, in his opinion, both as regards the manner in which it had been brought forward and the period of the Session, most unusual, and he might almost say unprecedented. Mr. Speaker Shaw Lefevre said the Standing Orders ought to be so framed as to give reasonable certainty to their proceedings and prevent Members from being confronted with surprises. But there was a great element of surprise about this motion. It was not until midnight last night that the First Lord of the Treasury announced that he would make this Motion to interfere with the Standing Orders. He admitted that the Standing Orders as they stood at the beginning of the Session did not give the Government sufficient time. But that had been largely remedied by the new Sessional order relating to Supply, and the merit of that new Sessional order lay in its certainty. A great part of the unnecessary weariness experienced in the House arose from the element of uncertainty in their procedure. They all knew the farce that went on at the beginning of the Session of a number of Members bringing in Bills which everybody knew in the great majority of cases would never go any further. Much of their time was undoubtedly wasted owing to the element of uncertainty. [Cheers.] If the Rules of the House were so altered that they could know beforehand what was coming on and the time it would take they would leave at the end of the Session with a better conscience as to the work they had done. Many hon. Members were engaged in important affairs outside and could not come every day. It would be an evil day when the House did not contain men in contact with the great philanthropic, social, industrial, and commercial currents which made up our national life. Their advice as experts was very important, and it was most inconvenient to them that the business of the House should be altered at short notice as it often was. If a return were made of the telegrams which the Party Whips had to dispatch, often at a moment's notice, to bring Members up from the country it would be an object lesson in the uncertainty of their proceedings. ["Hear, hear."] The Leader of the House gave away the whole case last night in regard to his Motion when he said there was no particular reason the Bill should be passed by a particular date.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: But there is the strongest reason why it should be through by an early date.

*MR. JOHN ELLIS: But the "time limit" had vanished. Why, therefore, make this raid on the Standing Orders and the rights of Members? He emphatically protested against this Motion, because it contained the element of uncertainty with which they were already too familiar, it was unfair to hon. Members who had Motions on the Paper, and there was no necessity for it. (Cheers.)

MR. HENRY LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said that when a Minister took away a day he should make it clear that he was justified in doing so, in the interests not only of the Government but of the business of the House. He agreed that when the principal Bill of the Session was before the House it should be discussed de die in diem. The Leader of the House had said he could not contemplate the hypothesis of the Debate lasting over that night. But he would make that hypothesis impossible by moving the clause. That evening there was a most important question with regard to Peers. On the Radical side of the House they took the deepest interest in Peers. [Laughter.] Yet the Leader of the House waved the subject away as though absolutely nothing. Private Members ought not to lose their days through the idiosyncrasies of a Minister. If the Debate did not finish that night, would it go on de die in diem?

MR. EDWIN LAWRENCE (Cornwall, Truro) said there was no hurry for the Education Resolution, and he protested against being deprived of bringing on a subject which excited the greatest interest amongst his constituents.

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I have on many occasions, from the front Bench, on whichever side of the House I have sat, supported Motions for taking away days, under certain conditions, from private Members; and as the Member for Truro has said, if the question before the House had been an urgent matter on which it was necessary at the earliest opportunity to come to a decision, I think I should again have supported the Government. But it is perfectly obvious that that is not the case. It was fully explained last night that this was to be a permanent Measure which is by its magnitude ultimately to compensate people for their present disappointments. I think that was the light in which the right hon. Gentleman put it. At midnight last night, he said he would much rather to-day be discussing the questions now on the Paper in regular order than he would be discussing the Education Bill. After the Debate of last night, I am not surprised at that statement. [Opposition cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman said the Debate had produced upon him a sense of nausea—[laughter]—that there been had a repetition of arguments ad nauseam, and he added that there were very important Motions on the Paper for the consideration of the House to-day. It is quite true. There is a very interesting Motion by the hon. Member for Sheffield. It is a Motion of great importance which affects the whole finance of the country. It proposed to put a 10 per cent. ad valorem duty upon all manufactures—[laughter]—and a 5 per cent. duty upon all partly manufactured goods. Well, Sir, that is a large order. [Laughter.] We should have been extremely glad to know the opinions of the Gentlemen opposite upon it, and the decision of the Government. I quite agree with the First Lord of the Treasury that it would have been of the deepest interest to discuss a question of that kind, especially as out of the proceeds it is proposed to finally provide for old-age pensions. No doubt the Resolution will command the support of the Colonial Secretary. [Laughter.] As the Education Bill, in its present form, is not urgent, it would be a pity to lose so interesting a discussion. The First Lord of the Treasury had deprecated prolonged discussion on this stage of the Financial Resolution, but the right hon. Gentleman opened the whole policy of the Bill on the Resolution, and it was upon the Resolution that we discussed the Bill on Monday night and will continue to discuss it. It is extremely important that the country should have time to form an opinion on this Bill. Probably there is no subject in which the country at large is more deeply interested than this question of education, or which it more thoroughly understands, and before we divide on the Resolution in Committee of Supply, which is practically speaking hereafter to shut out the question of the Board Schools, ought not the country to have an opportunity of knowing what we are doing here? It is not as if this Resolution, as in the case of most Resolutions in Committee, had no final or ulterior operation. I am not charging the Government with any evil design in the form of the Resolution. But no one can deny that when this Resolution is passed the effect will be to exclude this House from considering the claims put forward on their behalf. I must protest against any attempt, therefore, to force through the House a resolution of that character without giving ample time to the country to know what is the policy of the Government in this respect. The country also should have an opportunity of expressing its opinion as to a scheme of education which in its present form excludes the Board Schools of the country from any share of the public money which is to be voted by the Bill. When it is proposed, therefore, to displace the only business of the House and that almost on the threshold of the Session, for the purpose of hurrying on a scheme which ought not to be hurried on, I say that the scheme ought to be amply considered both in the House and out of it before we have reached the conclusive stage. I think that is the strongest reason why we ought not to take resolutions with an unusual dispatch which will exclude the entire question from debate. But, in addition to the House and the country, there is another body who ought to be glad of a little leisure to reflect on this Bill, and that is the Government itself. [Cheers.] I heard in the House last night warning voices addressed to the Government from their supporters behind, and I have seen in the Press this morning still stronger warnings from their best friends. Why then should not the Government take a day or two to think whether or not they were pressing their scheme on the country in a form which will be acceptable to it? I think, in the circumstances of this case, and especially of a case which requires leisure and reflection and which demands no immediate decision, that it is most unwise to disturb the present arrangements of the House, and therefore I shall vote against the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. [Cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The right hon. Gentleman, following the lead of my hon. Friend the Member for the Truro Division, has stated that his reason for objecting to the Motion is that there is no reason for proceeding rapidly with the Bill. I dissent entirely from that. [Cheers.] I dissent from it on two distinct grounds. I dissent from it partly on a ground which the House will understand when it sees the printed Bill, that it is very important in the interests of the Voluntary Schools that the Measure should become law at the earliest possible date. [Cheers.] I dissent from the statement in the second place, on the ground that it must be manifest to everyone that if an inordinate length of time is occupied by the discussion of the relief to be given to Voluntary Schools, it will be impossible to find time for the other scheme dealing with necessitous Board Schools. [Ironical laughter and cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that the Government had hastily adopted unexpected policy in thus separating the discussion of Voluntary Schools from other questions connected with education. I have stated that was the policy of the Government two or three times at least in the most formal and explicit manner in public, and in a mode which any hon. Member might understand. That being so, it is manifest, if the House is really seriously desirous that we should take up the second branch of relief to which I have referred, it is not a wise suggestion that we should spend days in meditating on this Bill and in wasting time which ought to be occupied in getting on with it. I hope hon. Gentlemen who are desirous to relieve Voluntary Schools or Board Schools will assist the Government by their vote and speech—and sometimes by the absence of their speeches [cheers and laughter]—to get this Bill through as soon as possible. I shall never be a party to the dilatory proceedings which the right hon. Gentleman appears to sanction by his speech, and which he is going to sanction by his vote. [Cheers].

MR. HENRY BROADHURST (Leicester), who spoke amid loud cries of "Divide," said that if hon. Gentlemen opposite had the same experience of the necessity for more piers and harbours as the hon. Member for Truro they would attach considerable importance to the Motion. The lives of thousands of their fellow countrymen were involved in the consideration of the hon. Member's Motion; and if there was no great urgency for the Education Bill, the right hon. Gentleman should allow one night, at any rate, to be devoted to the safety of our fishing and sea-going population. ["Hear, hear!"] If the request was not granted, however, he hoped that these people would note that they had been deprived of their opportunity by the Government in order to hasten on the work of dipping hands into the public purse to satisfy their clerical supporters. ["Oh, oh!" and cheers.] He invited the Leader of the House to withdraw the proposal of a grant for Voluntary Schools, and to associate necessitous Board Schools with them in one Resolution. If this were done, a great deal of support would be obtained from the Opposition Benches. It was nothing short of monstrous that the right hon. Gentleman should make this Motion in the first fortnight of the Session, and he suggested the right hon. Gentleman should give an assurance that if the Resolution was passed that evening he would continue the Education Debate to-morrow. He was grieved to find also that the House had sat until nearly 1 o'clock the previous morning. If some Members of the Opposition supported the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, would he give a definite pledge that the House should not in any circumstances be kept sitting after midnight? [Laughter and "Oh, oh!"] After 12 or half-past 12 o'clock a considerable number of Members could not take part in the business of the House because it was next to impossible for them to reach their homes after that hour. If the right hon. Gentleman would accept this offer he should consider whether it would not be his duty to stay his opposition to the Motion. [Cries of "Divide."]

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) recalled the words of the Leader of the House last Friday, when he said "he could not promise to take no Tuesday before Whitsuntide, but he would be glad to preserve any reasonable number of Tuesdays," and said that here the right hon. Gentleman was nevertheless taking the first private Members' Tuesday of the Session. In view of the opposition on their own side of the House to their education scheme, and the figures of the Romford poll, the Government would do wisely to take time to reconsider their extraordinary position.

MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) rose to address the House amid renewed cries of "Divide," when

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."—The House divided :—Ayes, 259; Noes, 143.—(Division List—No. 10—appended.)

AYES.

Aird, John
Allhusen, Augustus Henry Eden
Ambrose, William (Middlesex)
Arnold, Alfred
Arnold-Forster, Hugh O.
Arrol, Sir William
Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Ellis
Atkinson, Rt. Hon. John
Bagot, Capt. Josceline FitzRoy
Bailey, James (Walworth)
Baillie, James E. B. (Inverness)
Baird, John George Alexander
Balcarres, Lord
Balfour, Rt. Hon. A. J. (Manch'r)
Balfour, Gerald William (Leeds)
Banbury, Frederick George
Banes, Major George Edward
Barnes, Frederic Gorell
Bathurst, Hon. Allen Benjamin
Beach, Rt. Hon. Sir M. H. (Bristol)
Beach, W. W. Bramston (Hants.)
Bentinck, Lord Henry C.
Bethell, Captain
Bigwood, James
Bill, Charles
Blundell, Colonel Henry
Bonsor, Henry Cosmo Orme
Boscawen, Arthur Griffith-
Boulnois, Edmund
Bowles, Capt. H. F. (Middlesex)
Bowles, T. Gibson (King's Lynn)
Brassey, Albert
Brodrick, Rt. Hon. St. John
Brookfield, A. Montagu
Brown, Alexander H.
Carew, James Laurence
Cavendish, R. F. (N. Lancs.)
Cavendish, V. C. W. (Derbyshire)
Cecil, Lord Hugh
Chaloner, Captain R. G. W.
Chamberlain, Rt. Hn. J. (Birm.)
Chamberlain J. Austen (Worc'r)
Chaplin, Rt. Hon. Henry
Charrington, Spencer
Chelsea, Viscount
Clarke, Sir Edward (Plymouth)
Cochrane, Hon. Thos. H. A. E.
Coddington, Sir William
Coghill, Douglas Harry
Cohen, Benjamin Louis
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse
Compton, Lord Alwyne (Beds.)
Cook, Fred. Lucas (Lambeth)
Cooke, C. W. Radcliffe (Hereford)
Courtney, Rt. Hon. Leonard H.
Cox, Robert
Cranborne, Viscount
Cross, Herb. Shepherd (Bolton)
Currie, Sir Donald
Curzon, Rt. Hn. G. N. (Lancs. SW.)
Curzon, Viscount (Bucks.)
Dalbiac, Major Philip Hugh

Dane, Richard M.
Darling, Charles John
Denny, Colonel
Digby, John K. D. Wingfield-
Dixon, George
Dixon-Hartland, Sir Fred. Dixon
Dorington, Sir John Edward
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Doxford, William Theodore
Drage, Geoffrey
Drucker, A.
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Dyke, Rt. Hn. Sir William Hart
Edwards, Gen. Sir James Bevan
Egerton, Hon. A. de Tatton
Engledow, Charles John
Fardell, Thomas George
Farquhar, Sir Horace
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Fergusson, Rt. Hn. Sir J. (Manc'r)
Finch, George H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Firbank, Joseph Thomas
Fisher, William Hayes
FitzGerald, Sir R. U. Penrose
Fitz Wygram, General Sir F.
Flannery, Fortescue
Flower, Ernest
Folkestone, Viscount
Forster, Henry William
Forwood, Rt. Hon. Sir Arthur B.
Foster, Colonel (Lancaster)
Galloway, William Johnson
Garfit, William
Gibbs, Hn. A. G. H. (City of Lond.)
Gibbs, Hon. Vicary (St. Albans)
Giles, Charles Tyrrell
Gilliat, John Saunders
Goldsworthy, Major-General
Gordon, John Edward
Gorst, Rt. Hon. Sir John Eldon
Goschen, Rt. Hon. G. J. (St. G'rg's)
Goschen, George J. (Sussex)
Goulding, Edward Alfred
Graham, Henry Robert
Gray, Ernest (West Ham)
Green, Walford D. (Wednesb'y)
Gretton, John
Gull, Sir Cameron
Hall, Sir Charles
Halsey, Thomas Frederick
Hamilton, Rt. Hon. Lord Geo.
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robert Wm.
Hanson, Sir Reginald
Hare, Thomas Leigh
Heath, James
Helder, Augustus
Hermon-Hodge, Robert Trotter
Hill, Rt. Hn. Lord Arthur (Down)
Hill, Rt. Hn. A. Staveley (Staffs.)
Hoare, Edw. Brodie (Hampstead)
Hoare, Samuel (Norwich)

Hobhouse, Henry
Holland, Hon. Lionel Raleigh
Hopkinson, Alfred
Houldsworth, Sir Wm. Henry
Howard, Joseph
Howell, William Tudor
Howorth, Sir Henry Hoyle
Hubbard, Hon. Evelyn
Hudson, George Bickersteth
Hunt, Sir Frederick Seager
Isaacson, Frederick Wootton
Jebb, Richard Claverhouse
Jeffreys, Arthur Frederick
Jessel, Captain Herbert Merton
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Johnstone, John H. (Sussex)
Kemp, George
Kennaway, Rt. Hon. Sir John H.
Kenny, William
Kenrick, William
King, Sir Henry Seymour
Knowles, Lees
Lafone, Alfred
Laurie, Lieut.-General
Lawrence, Edwin (Cornwall)
Lawrence, Wm. F. (Liverpool)
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks.)
Lecky, William Edward H.
Lees, Elliott (Birkenhead)
Llewelyn, Sir Dillwyn- (Swnsea)
Lockwood, Lt.-Col. A. R. (Essex)
Loder, Gerald Walter Erskine
Long, Col. Charles W. (Evesham)
Long, Rt. Hon. Walter (L'pool.)
Lorne, Marquess of
Loyd, Archie Kirkman
Lucas-Shadwell, William
Macartney, W. G. Ellison
Macdona, John Cumming
Maclean, James Mackenzie
Maclure, John William
McCalmont, Mj.-Gen (Antr'm N)
Malcolm, Ian
Marks, Henry Hananel
Mellor, Colonel (Lancashire)
Melville, Beresford Valentine
Milbank, Powlett Charles John
Milward, Colonel Victor
Monckton, Edward Philip
Moon, Edward Robert Pacy
More, Robert Jasper
Mowbray, Rt. Hon. Sir John
Muntz, Philip A.
Murdoch, Charles Townshend
Murray, Rt. Hn. A. Graham (Bute)
Murray, Charles J. (Coventry)
Murray, Col. Wyndham (Bath)
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Northcote, Hon. Sir H. Stafford
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
O'Neill, Hon. Robert Torrens
Orr-Ewing, Charles Lindsay

Pease, Arthur (Darlington)
Pender, James
Penn, John
Phillpotts, Captain Arthur
Pierpoint, Robert
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Plunkett, Hon. Horace Curzon
Pollock, Harry Frederick
Powell, Sir Francis Sharp
Pretyman, Capt. Ernest George
Pryce-Jones, Edward
Purvis, Robert
Rankin, James
Rasch, Major Frederic Carne
Renshaw, Charles Bine
Ridley, Rt. Hn. Sir Matthew W.
Ritchie, Rt. Hon. Chas. Thomson
Robertson, Herbert (Hackney)
Rollit, Sir Albert Kaye
Round, James
Russell, Col. F. S. (Cheltenham)
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Samuel, Harry S. (Limehouse)
Saunderson, Col. Edw. James
Scoble, Sir Andrew Richard
Seely, Charles Hilton
Seton-Karr, Henry
Sharpe, William Edward T.
Sidebottom, William (Derbysh.)
Simeon, Sir Barrington
Smith, Abel (Herts)
Smith, Abel H. (Christchurch)
Smith, Hon. W. F. D. (Strand)
Spencer, Ernest
Stanley, Lord (Lancs.)
Stanley, Edw. Jas. (Somerset)
Stanley, Henry M. (Lambeth)
Stewart, Sir Mark J. M'Taggart
Strauss, Arthur
Strut, Hon. Charles Hedley
Sturt, Hon. Humphry Napier
Talbot, Lord E. (Chichester)
Talbot, John G. (Oxford Un.)
Taylor, Francis
Thorburn, Walter
Tomlinson, Wm. Edw. Murray
Tritton, Charles Ernest
Usborne, Thomas
Verney, Hon. Richard Greville
Warde, Lt.-Col. C. E. (Kent)
Waring, Col. Thomas
Warr, Augustus Frederick
Webster, Sir R. E. (I. of W.)
Welby, Lieut.-Col. A. C. E.
Wharton, John Lloyd
Whiteley, George (Stockport)
Whiteley, H. (Ashton-under-L.)
Whitmore, Charles Algernon
Williams, Colonel R. (Dorset)
Williams, Joseph Powell- (Birm.)
Willoughby de Eresby, Lord
Willox, John Archibald
Wilson, John (Falkirk)
Wilson, J. W. (Worc'sh. N.)
Wilson-Todd, Wm. H. (Yorks.)
Wodehouse, Edmond R. (Bath)
Wolff, Gustav Wilhelm
Wortley, Rt. Hon. C. B. Stuart-
Wyndham, George
Wyndham-Quin, Major W. H.
Wyvill, Marmaduke D'Arcy
Younger, William

TELLERS FOR THE AYES, Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther

NOES.

Abraham, William (Rhondda)
Acland, Rt. Hon. A. H. Dyke
Allan, William (Gateshead)
Arch, Joseph
Asquith, Rt. Hn. Herbert Henry
Atherley-Jones, L.
Austin, Sir John (Yorkshire)
Austin, M. (Limerick, W.)
Bainbridge, Emerson
Baker, Sir John
Barlow, John Emmot
Bayley, Thomas (Derbyshire)
Beaumont, Wentworth C. B.
Blake, Edward
Broadhurst, Henry
Bryce, Rt. Hon. James
Buchanan, Thomas Ryburn
Burt, Thomas
Buxton, Sydney Charles
Caldwell, James
Causton, Richard Knight
Cawley, Frederick
Channing, Francis Allston
Colville, John
Condon, Thomas Joseph
Crean, Eugene
Curran, Thomas B. (Donegal)
Daley, James
Davies, M. Vaughan (Cardigan)
Davies, W. Rees (Pembrokesh.)
Dilke, Rt. Hon. Sir Charles
Dillon, John
Donelan, Captain A.
Doogan, P. C.
Doughty, George
Dunn, Sir William
Ellis, John Edward (Notts.)
Evans, Samuel T. (Glamorgan)
Evans, Sir Francis H. (South'ton)
Farquharson, Dr. Robert
Farrell, James P. (Cavan, W.)
Fenwick, Charles
Ferguson, R. C. Munro (Leith)
Flynn, James Christopher
Foster, Sir Walter (Derby Co.)
Fowler, Rt. Hn. Sir Hy. (Wol'tn)
Fowler, Matthew (Durham)
Gilhooly, James
Gladstone, Rt. Hn. Herbert John
Goddard, Daniel Ford
Gold, Charles
Gourley, Sir Edward Temperley
Griffith, Ellis J.
Haldane, Richard Burdon
Harcourt, Rt. Hon. Sir William
Harrison, Charles
Hayne, Rt. Hon. Charles Seale
Hazell, Walter
Hedderwick, Thomas Chas. H.
Hogan, James Francis
Humphreys-Owen, Arthur C.
Hutton, Alfred E. (Morley)
Jacoby, James Alfred
Joicey, Sir James
Jones, David Brynmor (Swansea)
Jones, William (Carnarvonshire)
Kay-Shuttleworth, Rt. Hn. Sir U.
Kearley, Hudson E.
Kilbride, Denis
Kinloch, Sir John George Smyth
Labouchere, Henry
Lambert, George
Leese, Sir Joseph F. (Accrington)
Leng, Sir John
Leuty, Thomas Richmond
Lloyd-George, David
Lockwood, Sir Frank (York)
Logan, John William
Lough, Thomas
Lowther, Rt. Hon. James (Kent)
Luttrell, Hugh Fownes
Macaleese, Daniel
MacNeill, John Gordon Swift
McEwan, William
M'Hugh, Patrick A. (Leitrim)
McKenna, Reginald
McLaren, Charles Benjamin
McLeod, John
Mappin, Sir Frederick Thorpe
Mellor, Rt. Hn. J. W. (Yorks.)
Morgan, Rt. Hn. Sir G. O. (Denbs.)
Morgan, J. Lloyd (Carmarthen)
Morley, Charles (Breconshire)
Morley, Rt. Hn. John (Montrose)
Morton, Edward John Chalmers
Mundella, Rt. Hn. Anthony John
Nussey, Thomas Willans
O'Brien, James F. X. (Cork)
O'Connor, James (Wicklow, W.)
O'Kelly, James
Oldroyd, Mark
O'Malley, William
Paulton, James Mellor
Pease, Joseph A. (Northumb.)
Perks, Robert William
Pickersgill, Edward Hare
Pirie, Captain Duncan Vernon
Priestley, Briggs (Yorks)
Reckitt, Harold James
Reid, Sir Robert T.
Rickett, J. Compton
Roberts, John Bryn (Eifion)
Roberts, John H. (Denbighs)
Robertson, Edmund (Dundee)
Robson, William Snowdon
Roche, Hon. James (East Kerry)
Roche, John (East Galway)
Schwann, Charles E.
Scott, Charles Prestwich
Shaw, Thomas (Hawick B)
Sheehy, David
Souttar, Robinson
Spicer, Albert
Stanhope, Hon. Philip J.
Stevenson, Francis S.
Strachey, Edward
Sullivan, Donal (Westmeath)
Tennant, Harold John
Thomas, Abel (Carmarthen, E)

Thomas, Alfred (Glamorgan, E.)
Wallace, Robert (Perth)
Wayman, Thomas
Weir, James Galloway
Whittaker, Thomas Palmer
Williams, John Carvell (Notts.)
Wilson, Frederick W. (Norfolk)
Wilson, Henry J. (York, W.R.)
Wilson, John (Durham, Mid.)
Wilson, John (Govan)
Woodall, William
Woodhouse, Sir J. T. (Hud'rsfld)
Young, Samuel
Yoxall, James Henry

TELLERS FOR THE NOES, Mr. Thomas Ellis and Mr. McArthur.

Question put accordingly:—The House divided—Ayes, 283; Noes, 123—(Division List—No. 11—appended.)

AYES.

Aird, John
Allhusen, Augustus Henry Eden
Ambrose, William (Middlesex)
Arnold, Alfred
Arnold-Forster, Hugh O.
Arrol, Sir William
Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Ellis
Atkinson, Rt. Hon. John
Austin, M. (Limerick, W.)
Bagot, Capt. Josceline FitzRoy
Bailey, James (Walworth)
Baillie, James E. B. (Inverness)
Baird, John George Alexander
Balcarres, Lord
Balfour, Rt. Hon. A. J. (Man.)
Balfour, Gerald William (Leeds)
Banbury, Frederick George
Banes, Major George Edward
Barnes, Frederick Gorell
Bathurst, Hon. Allen Benjamin
Beach, Rt. Hon. Sir M. H. (Bristol)
Beach, W. W. Bramston (Hants)
Bentinck, Lord Henry C.
Bethell, Captain
Bigwood, James
Bill, Charles
Blundell, Colonel Henry
Bonsor, Henry Cosmo Orme
Boscawen, Arthur Griffith
Boulnois, Edmund
Bowles, Capt. H. F. (Middlesex)
Bowles, T. Gibson (King's Lynn)
Brassey, Albert
Brodrick, Rt. Hon. St. John
Brookfield, A. Montagu
Brown, Alexander H.
Carew, James Lawrence
Carson, Edward
Cavendish, R. F. (N. Lanc.)
Cavendish, V. C. W. (Derbyshire)
Cecil, Lord Hugh
Chaloner, Captain R. G. W.
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. J. (Birm.)
Chamberlain, J. Austen (Worc'r)
Chaplin, Rt. Hon. Henry
Charrington, Spencer
Chelsea, Viscount
Clarke, Sir Edward (Plymouth)
Cochrane, Hon. Thos. H. A. E.
Coddington, Sir William
Coghill, Douglas Harry
Cohen, Benjamin Louis
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse
Compton, Lord Alwyne (Beds.)
Condon, Thomas Joseph
Cook, Fred. Lucas (Lambeth)
Cooke, C. W. Radcliffe (Heref'd)
Courtney, Rt. Hon. Leonard H.
Cox, Robert
Cranborne, Viscount
Crean, Eugene
Cross, Herb. Shepherd (Bolton)
Curran, Thomas B. (Donegal)
Currie, Sir Donald
Curzon, Rt. G. N. (Lanc. S.W.)
Curzon, Viscount (Bucks.)
Dalbiac, Major Philip Hugh
Daly, James
Dane, Richard M.
Darling, Charles John
Denny, Colonel
Digby, John K. D. Wingfield
Dillon, John
Dixon-Hartland, Sir Fred. Dixon
Donelan, Captain A.
Doogan, P. C.
Dorington, Sir John Edward
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Douglas-Pennant, Hon. E. S.
Doxford, William Theodore
Drage, Geoffrey
Drucker, A.
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Dyke, Rt. Hon. Sir William Hart
Edwards, Gen. Sir James Bevan
Egerton, Hon. A. de Tatton
Engledow, Charles John
Fardell, Thomas George
Farquhar, Sir Horace
Farrell, James P. (Cavan, W.)
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Fergusson, Rt. Hon. Sir J. (Man.)
Finch, George H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Firbank, Joseph Thomas
Fisher, William Hayes
FitzGerald, Sir R. U. Penrose
FitzWygram, General Sir F.
Flannery, Fortescue
Fletcher, Sir Henry
Flower, Ernest
Flynn, James Christopher
Folkestone, Viscount
Forster, Henry William
Forwood, Rt. Hon. Sir Arthur B.
Foster, Colonel (Lancaster)
Fowler, Matthew (Durham)
Galloway, William Johnson
Garfit, William
Gibbs, Hon. A. G. H. (City of Lon.)
Gibbs, Hon. Vicary (St. Albans)
Giles, Charles Tyrrell
Gilhooly, James
Gilliat, John Saunders
Goldsworthy, Major-General
Gordon, John Edward
Gorst, Rt. Hon. Sir John Eldon
Goschen, Rt. Hn. G. J. (St. G'rg's)
Goschen, George J. (Sussex)
Goulding, Edward Alfred
Gray, Ernest (West Ham)
Green, Walford D. (Wednesb'y)
Gretton, John
Hall, Sir Charles
Halsey, Thomas Frederick
Hamilton, Rt. Hon. Lord Geo.
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robert Wm.
Hanson, Sir Reginald
Hardy, Laurence
Hare, Thomas Leigh
Heath, James
Helder, Augustus
Hermon-Hodge, Robert Trotter
Hill, Rt. Hn. Lord Arthur (Down)
Hill, Rt. Hn. A. Staveley (Staffs.)
Hoare, Edward Brodie (Hamps.)
Hoare, Samuel (Norwich)
Hobhouse, Henry
Hogan, James Francis
Holland, Hon. Lionel Raleigh
Hopkinson, Alfred
Houldsworth, Sir Wm. Henry
Howard, Joseph
Howell, William Tudor
Howorth, Sir Henry Hoyle
Hubbard, Hon. Evelyn
Hudson, George Bickersteth
Hunt, Sir Frederick Seager
Isaacson, Frederick Wootton
Jebb, Richard Claverhouse
Jeffreys, Arthur Frederick
Jessel, Captain Herbert Merton
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Johnstone, John H. (Sussex)
Kemp, George
Kennaway, Rt. Hon. Sir John H.
Kenny, William
Kenrick, William
Kilbride, Denis
King, Sir Henry Seymour
Knowles, Lees
Lafone, Alfred
Laurie, Lieut.-General
Lawrence, Edwin (Cornwall)
Lawrence, Wm. F. (Liverpool)
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks.)
Lecky, William Edward H.
Lees, Elliott (Birkenhead)
Llewelyn, Sir Dillwyn-(Swans'a)
Lockwood, Lt.-Col. A. R. (Essex)
Loder, Gerald Walter Erskine
Long, Col. Charles W. (Evesham)
Long, Rt. Hn. Walter (L'pool.)
Lorne, Marquess of
Loyd, Archie Kirkman
Lucas-Shadwell, William
Macaleese, Daniel

Macartney, W. G. Ellison
Macdona, John Cumming
Maclean, James Mackenzie
Maclure, John William
MacNeill, John Gordon Swift
McCalmont,Mj.-Gen.(Ant'm.N)
McKillop, James
Malcolm, Ian
Marks, Henry Hananel
Mellor, Colonel (Lancashire)
Melville, Beresford Valentine
Milbank, Powlett Charles John
Milner, Sir Frederick George
Milward, Colonel Victor
Monckton, Edward Philip
Moon, Edward Robert Pacy
More, Robert Jasper
Mowbray, Rt. Hon. Sir John
Muntz, Philip A.
Murdoch, Charles Townshend
Murray, Rt.Hn.A.Graham(Bute
Murray, Charles J. (Coventry)
Murray, Col. Wyndham (Bath)
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Northcote, Hon. Sir H. Stafford
O'Brien, James F. X. (Cork)
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
O'Malley, William
O'Niell, Hon. Robert Torrens
Orr-Ewing, Charles Lindsay
Pease, Arthur (Darlington)
Pender, James
Penn, John
Phillpotts, Captain Arthur
Pierpoint, Robert
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Plunkett, Hon. Horace Curzon
Pollock, Harry Frederick
Powell, Sir Francis Sharp
Pretyman, Capt. Ernest George
Pryce-Jones, Edward
Purvis, Robert
Rankin, James
Rasch, Major Frederic Carne
Renshaw, Charles Bine
Ridley,Rt.Hon. Sir Matthew W.
Ritchie,Rt. Hon. Chas. Thomson
Robertson, Herbert (Hackney)
Roche, Hon.James (East Kerry)
Roche, John (East Galway)
Rollit, Sir Albert Kaye
Round, James
Russell, Col. F. S. (Cheltenham)
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Samuel, Harry S. (Limehouse)
Saunderson, Col. Edw. James
Savory, Sir Joseph
Scoble, Sir Andrew Richard
Seely, Charles Hilton
Sharpe, William Edward T.
Sidebotham, J. W. (Cheshire)
Sidebottom, William (Derbysh.)
Simeon, Sir Barrington
Smith, Abel (Herts)
Smith, Abel H. (Christchurch)
Smith, Hon. W. F. D. (Strand)
Spencer, Ernest
Stanley, Lord (Lancs.)
Stanley, Edw. Jas. (Somerset)
Stanley, Henry M. (Lambeth)
Stewart, Sir Mark J. M'Taggart
Strauss, Arthur
Strutt, Hon. Charles Hedley
Sturt, Hon. Humphrey Napier
Sullivan, Donal (Westmeath)
Talbot, Lord, E. (Chichester)
Talbot, John G. (Oxford Univ.)
Taylor, Francis
Thorburn, Walter
Tomlinson, Wm. Edw. Murray
Tritton, Charles Ernest
Usborne, Thomas
Verney, Hon. Richard Greville
Warde, Lt.-Col. C. E. (Kent)
Waring, Col. Thomas
Warr, Augustus Frederick
Webster, SirR.E.(Isle of Wight)
Welby, Lieut.-Col. A. C. E.
Wharton, John Lloyd
Whiteley, George (Stockport)
Whiteley, H.(Ashton-under-L.)
Whitmore, Charles Algernon
Williams, Colonel R. (Dorset)
Williams,Joseph Powell-(Brm.)
Willoughby de Eresby, Lord
Willox, John Archibald
Wilson, John (Falkirk)
Wilson, J. W. (Worc'sh. N.)
Wilson-Todd, Wm. H. (Yorks.)
Wodehouse, Edmond R. (Bath)
Wolff, Gustav Wilhelm
Wortley, Rt. Hon. C. B. Stuart-
Wyndham, George
Wyndham-Quin, Major W. H.
Wyvill, Marmaduke D'Arcy
Younger, William

TELLERS FOR THE AYES, Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

NOES.

Abraham, William (Rhondda)
Acland, Rt.Hon.Hon.A.H.Dyke
Allan, William (Gateshead)
Arch, Joseph
Asquith, Rt.Hn.Herbert Henry
Atherley-Jones, L.
Austin, Sir John (Yorkshire)
Bainbridge, Emerson
Baker, Sir John
Barlow, John Emmott
Bayley, Thomas (Derbyshire)
Beaumont, Wentworth C. B.
Broadhurst, Henry
Bryce, Rt. Hon. James
Buchanan, Thomas Ryburn
Burt, Thomas
Buxton, Sydney Charles
Caldwell, James
Causton, Richard Knight
Cawley, Frederick
Channing, Francis Allston
Clark, Dr. G. B. (Caithness-sh.)
Colville, John
Davies, M. Vaughan-(Cardigan)
Davies, W. Rees- (Pembrokesh.)
Dilke, Rt. Hon. Sir Charles
Dixon, George
Doughty, George
Dunn, Sir William
Ellis, Thos. Edw. (Merionetsh.)
Evans, Samuel T. Glamorgan)
Evans, SirFrancisH.(South'ton)
Farquaharson, Dr. Robert
Fenwick, Charles
Ferguson, R. C. Munro (Leith)
Foster, Sir Walter (Derby Co.)
Fowler,Rt.Hn.SirHenry(Wl'tn)
Gladstone, Rt. Hn.Herbert John
Goddard, Daniel Ford
Gold, Charles
Gourley, Sir Edward Temperley
Griffith, Ellis J.
Gull, Sir Cameron
Haldane, Richard Burdon
Harcourt, Rt. Hon. Sir William
Harrison, Charles
Hayne, Rt. Hon. Charles Seale
Hazell, Walter
Hedderwick,Thomas Charles H.
Humphreys-Owen, Arthur C.
Hutton, Alfred E. (Morley)
Jacoby, James Alfred
Joicey, Sir James
Jones,David Brynmor(Swansea)
Jones,William,(Carnarvonsh're)
Kay-Shuttleworth,Rt.Hon.Sr.U
Kearley, Hudson E.
Kinloch,Sir JohnGeorgeSmythe
Labouchere, Henry
Lambert, George
Lawson, Sir Wilfrid (Cumb'ld.)
Leese,Sir JosephF.(Accrington)
Leng, Sir John
Leuty, Thomas Richmond
Lloyd-George, David
Lockwood, Sir Frank (York)
Logan, John William
Lough, Thomas
Lowther, Rt. Hon. James (Kent)
Luttrell, Hugh Fownes
McArthur, William
McEwan, William
M'Hugh, Patrick A. (Leitrim)
McKenna, Reginald
McLaren, Charles Benjamin
McLeod, John
Mappin, Sir Frederick Thorpe
Mellor, Rt. Hon. J. W.(Yorks.)
Morgan,Rt.Hn.Sir G.O.(Denbs.)
Morgan, J. Lloyd (Carmarthen)
Morley, Charles (Breconshire)
Morley, Rt.Hn.John (Montrose)
Morton, Edward John Chalmers
Mundella,Rt.Hn. AnthonyJohn
Nussey, Thomas Willans
O'Brien, James F. X. (Cork)
O'Kelly, James
Oldroyd, Mark
Paulton, James Mellor
Pease, Joseph A. (Northumb.)
Perks, Robert William
Pickersgill, Edward Hare
Pirie, Captain Duncan Vernon
Priestley, Briggs (Yorks)
Reckitt, Harold James
Rickett, J. Compton

Roberts, John Bryn (Eifion)
Roberts, John H. (Denbighs.)
Robertson, Edmund (Dundee)
Robson, William Snowdon
Schwann, Charles E.
Scott, Charles Prestwich
Seton-Karr, Henry
Shaw, Thomas (Hawick B.)
Souttar, Robinson
Spicer, Albert
Stanhope, Hon. Philip J.
Stevenson, Francis S.
Strachey, Edward
Tennant, Harold John
Thomas, Abel (Carmarthen, E.)
Thomas, Alfred (Glamorgan, E.)
Wallace, Robert (Perth)
Wayman, Thomas
Weir, James Galloway
Whittaker, Thomas Palmer
Williams, John Carvell (Notts)
Wilson Frederick W. (Norfolk)
Wilson, Henry J. (York, W.R.)
Wilson, John (Durham, Mid.)
Wilson, John (Govan)
Woodall, William
Woodhouse Sir J. T. (Hud'rsfld)
Yoxall, James Henry

TELLERS FOR THE NOES, Mr. John Ellis and Sir Robert Reid.

Ordered, that the Order for the Committee on "Voluntary Schools [Aid Grant, Etc.]" have precedence this day of the Notices of Motions and other Orders of the day.

MOTIONS.

CROFTER'S HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) ACT (1886) AMENDMENT.

Bill to amend the Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1886, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Weir, Dr. Clark, Mr. McLeod, Sir Leonard Lyell, and Sir William Wedderburn; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday, 17th February, and to be printed.—[Bill 109.]

SHOP ASSISTANTS (HALF-HOLIDAY).

Bill to provide that all Shop Assistants shall have one Half-Holiday in each week, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Duncombe, Mr. MacNeill, Colonel Dalbiac, Mr. Atherley Jones, Mr. Richardson, Mr. Brynmor Jones, and Mr. Harry Samuel; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time To-morrow, and to be printed.—[Bill 110.]

COUNTY SURVEYORS (IRELAND) AMENDMENT.

Bill to amend the existing Laws in Ireland relating to County Surveyors' Superannuation, and other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. William Johnston, Sir Thomas Lea, Mr. Hayden, Colonel Waring, Sir James Haslett, Mr. Dane, and Colonel McCalmont; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Friday, 12th February, and to be printed.—[Bill 111.]

INJURIES TO WORKMEN (EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

Bill to make better provision for Workmen injured in the course of their employment, ordered to be brought in by Sir Arthur Forwood, Mr. Warr, Mr. Tomlinson, and Sir Edward Hill; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Tuesday, 16th February, and to be printed.—[Bill 112.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS (AID GRANT, ETC.)

Considered in Committee:—

[THE CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, in the Chair].

Question again proposed,

"That it is expedient—(a) to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of an aid grant to Voluntary Schools, not exceeding five shillings per scholar for the whole number of scholars in those schools;

"(b) To repeal as regards day schools so much of section nineteen of The Elementary Education Act, 1876, as imposes a limit on the parliamentary grant to Elementary Schools in England and Wales; and

"(c) to make provision for the exemption from rates of Voluntary Schools."—(First Lord of the Treasury.)

Debate resumed.

MR. ERNEST GRAY (West Ham, N.), whose speech was interrupted on Monday night by the operation of the 12 o'clock rule, said he had ventured to express to the Committee on the previous night, the great disappointment felt by the friends of the Voluntary Schools at finding that the Bill to be based upon this Resolution would not come into operation by the end of March. He was sure the disappointment felt in the House at that statement of the First Lord of the Treasury was experienced perhaps in a more acute form by persons interested in the Voluntary Schools throughout the country. It was certainly reflected very widely in the Press that morning. But the best thing the friends of the Voluntary Schools could now do was to hasten, as far as they could, the passing of this Measure; and if he assumed that Ministerial difficulties stood in the way of the Bill getting through before the end of March, he thought he should not be far wrong. In regretting that a scheme for giving relief to the ratepayers of the poorer School Board districts did not form part of the proposed Bill, he was conveying to the House the views of his constituents. He hoped he was not wrong in assuming, after the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, which was made in more definite language that afternoon, coupled with statements the right hon. Gentleman had made himself a few days ago, that a Bill dealing with the question of the poorer School Board districts would be introduced by the Government this Session. If that were clearly understood it would tend to facilitate the passage of the Resolution through the Committee and the subsequent Bill through Parliament. Justified, as they believed they were, by the wording of Section 4 of the Bill of last year, many hon. Members on the Government side of the House, had, during the Recess, given definite pledges to their constituents that they would support the introduction of a scheme dealing with poor School Board districts, and it was a bitter disappointment to them that they were unable to give a complete fulfilment of those pledges now. But he thought he was right in assuming that the Bill would come at an early date and therefore on that point he would say nothing further. The next question was the consideration of the Resolution now before the Committee, apart altogether from the School Board district question. It seemed to him that there was only one course open to the friends of the Voluntary Schools in regard to that Resolution, and that was that if they could not have all that they had asked for together but were to get it in instalments they should leave nothing undone to secure the first instalment at the earliest possible date. He was therefore anxious to give all his support to the Government in their efforts to secure additional grants to the Voluntary Schools. He believed the proposed five shillings grant, if not as much as they should like to see given would yet do something to shore up the Voluntary School system for some years, that it would improve education moral and mental in the Voluntary Schools, that it would relieve the managers of those Schools of much cause for anxiety, and he trusted the application of the money would be so earmarked in the Bill and that it would do something also to improve the position of the teaching staffs. No one could by any stretch of imagination write the word "final" across the Measure. It was but a temporary expedient dealing with a pressing difficulty. He believed the Bill would help the Voluntary Schools until some Statesman was prepared to grapple with the whole problem of elementary education, and when public opinion on the subject was sufficiently ripe to propose in the House of Commons that the State should take over the whole cost of the elementary education of the country. When that time arrived the words "Board" and "Voluntary" would become memories of the past; and the question of education would be for ever disassociated from sectarian hate and political partisanship. There were one or two questions he should like to ask before he sat down. He wished to know whether it was proposed to make the grants on the basis of the average attendance of the children or on the basis of the whole number of children on the register of the school. As there was a difference of half a million between the children on average attendance and the children on the rolls there would, of course, be a material difference in the amount of money available if the grants were made on the basis of the number of children on the register. No doubt it was intended by the Government that the grant should be made in respect of average attendance. He would abstain from criticism of the Bill until its provisions were in print; but there was one statement of the First Lord of the Treasury to which he desired briefly to draw attention, that associations containing a large number of town schools would be given grants at a greater rate than associations containing a preponderance of rural schools. The fact that the right hon. Gentleman after making that statement was interrupted and had to make further explanations, showed the incredulity with which the announcement was received by both sides of the House. He thought it showed a little ignorance as to the cost of school management on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. The cost per head of maintaining thirty scholars in a school in the rural parts of England and Wales might be much larger than the cost per head of maintaining a thousand scholars in a school in any of the towns. In the rural districts the greatest difficulty had been experienced by the children in getting efficient education in those schools, and in getting education under sanitary and comfortable conditions. ["Hear, hear!"] It was not an unknown thing for rural schools not to be provided with an adequate supply of drinking water for the children during their meal time. The expenditure for this would involve a cost on the managers of the schools, which they were unable to meet under the present grant. He urged the Government to remodel the proposal to offer a greater proportion of the grant to urban schools by turning it round and giving the greater proportion to the rural schools. This was a subject which ought not, he thought, to pass unnoticed when the terms of the Bill were before them. Perhaps he might apologise to the Minister in charge for having intervened at all in the discussion. It was to him a matter of very material importance, not only for the fact that he had been connected with this work for many years, but from the fact that his constituents were deeply interested in the question of grants to the poorer School Board districts. There was no borough, county, or district throughout the country where the pinch of the School Board rate had been more keenly felt than in the Borough of West Ham, and he sincerely hoped that a pledge would be given on the subject by one of the Members of the Government of an explicit character.

*Mr. D. F. GODDARD (Ipswich) said his first objection to these Resolutions was on the broad ground of religious equality. These Resolutions were conceived for the purpose of endowing the so-called Voluntary Schools to the exclusion of other elementary schools. The hollowness of the term "Voluntary" in this connection was plainly shown by the fact that in 1895 the Church of England schools had an income of £3,629,967, of which only £640,406 came from Voluntary subscriptions; an amount which really represented something like 2d. out of every 1s. of money used. He thought the time had come when the fiction of Voluntary Schools should be swept away, what was really meant was sectarian schools. What was really being done was to build up the Church of England and Roman Catholic Church by special grants of public money. The anxiety of these schools and Churches had never been for educational efficiency—[Cries of "Oh!"]—it had been to make their schools the nurseries of their ecclesiastical system. As a firm adherent to the principles of religious equality, he thought it was only right to protest against any such grant as this, and he believed the great mass of the people in the country would also object to it. They were going to tax the Roman Catholics for the benefit of the Established Church, and to tax the Nonconformists in order that in certain schools such catechisms as that of Mr. Gace, which consigned Nonconformists to the nethermost hell, should be taught. It must be clear to everybody that in supporting the Board Schools through the rates they were not supporting any distinctive doctrinal teaching, and at all events all classes of the community had the opportunity if they chose to avail themselves of it of being represented on the management, whereas there was no suggestion of control in these schools. His second objection was that this scheme would involve a great waste of the nation's money. He did not object to the expenditure of the nation's money for purposes of education, but he could see no guarantee that this money would be spent on better education. As in the case of the Agricultural Rating Bill of last year, the help would go to those who needed it least. It could scarcely be contended that all these schools really needed anything like an extra grant of 5s. when they remembered that in 1893 there were over 1,000 schools which were maintained without any subscriptions at all, and that there were something like 670 or 674 schools which were maintained with subscriptions of less than 1s. per child. He understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Associations which he referred to would increase the grant in some cases and reduce it in others. He thought this would prove to be an apple of discord amongst these Associations, as every one of those schools which had a chance of securing a 5s. grant would not make a claim for less. He did not notice any guarantee as to increased efficiency in the teaching in these schools. Again, no attempt was made to give the people whose money was to be used any more control over the schools than they had at the present time. He knew it would be said control would be vested in the Education Department. That was not the control the people asked for; they wanted a more definite local control. They demanded it, and that was what they would have. It was said by the Leader of the House that the accounts of the schools were to be properly audited. That was a distinctly good move, but it was not all that was wanted. It was necessary that the accounts should be published in the locality of a school, and so brought within reach of everyone interested. In conclusion, he desired to refer to the very serious remarks the First Lord of the Treasury addressed to those who were in favour of the present School Board system. The right hon. Gentleman told them they would only be rushing to the destruction of that system if they did anything to hasten the decay of the Voluntary system. Upon that point the Committee would, perhaps, allow him to quote some words of the Lord President of the Council. The noble Duke once said in the House of Commons:—

> "There are many of us, and I do not scruple to say I am one of them, who believe that the principle of School Boards is the right and true principle in this matter. We believe that being the right and true principle, it will in the end prevail. We believe when once the time has arrived that Parliament has declared the education of the country to be the business of the State, it becomes inevitable that sooner or later the State education must be in the hands not of individuals, but of the representatives of the people."

*SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford), who was received with cheers, said the Debate had shown to him more distinctly than ever how delicate was the compromise at which Parliament arrived in 1870, and how delicate and fine was the machinery of that compromise. He had always felt, and he felt it most acutely during the six years he was at the Education Office, that if in the slightest degree that machinery was disturbed great friction might immediately result, leading possibly to the utter disorganisation of the whole educational system. To-day they were in the midst of one of those educational controversies which afforded deep anxiety to all those who had Party instincts and deep consternation to those who had good education uppermost in their minds; the discussion also afforded great joy to the Opposition of the day. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not complain of the attitude of Her Majesty's Opposition in regard to this proposal. It was, indeed, a scanty bill of fare that had been prepared for them during this Session, and if they chose the only dainty dish set before them and dressed and redressed it for the benefit of the constituencies the Government and their supporters must not be too hard upon them. Besides and beyond the difficulties which must always attend any fresh effort respecting elementary education in this country the Government were confronted to-day with an opposition which had been made keener by the events of last year. He had no wish to condemn the Government for the failure of last year, but hon. Members must, in dealing with opposition like the present, look at the case as a whole. No doubt the Debates of last Session created a bitterness which made it much more difficult to deal with the subject now in a calm and sober mood. Somehow or other the fear had been spread among the ranks opposite that the Government intended some day or other, by one fell swoop, to destroy the School Board system. Personally he had always recognised the School Board as a great part of our educational system, and however eager he might be, for obvious reasons, to support the Voluntary Schools of the country, he had never failed to acknowledge the great educational effect of the Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] He assured his hon. Friends that they would never forward the cause they had at heart by attempting to disparage the work done by School Boards. [Opposition cheers.] It might be that in their efforts School Boards had caused grievous financial difficulties to the Voluntary Schools, but that was an incident of the situation, and he said advisedly that the best thing he and his hon. Friends could do, if they wished to come to a good decision, was to recognise the fact that the School Board system must obtain in this country, as part of our great educational system, a recognition which was perfectly compatible with their support of the Voluntary system. ["Hear, hear!"] There was one other very important matter in which grievous harm had been done with regard to the settlement of this question. He had a strong belief that they could only solve this question, not by annihilating the central department, which must always exist as a security to the taxpayers, but by appointing some great educational authority in each county in England and Wales—["hear, hear!"]—and in the metropolis, which would be not only representative in its character, but beyond the possibility of reproach in respect to its dealings as between Board and Voluntary Schools. The Debates of last year had a most unfortunate result on the County Councils. During the first few weeks after the introduction of last year's Bill the County Councils, with one solitary exception, expressed a readiness to undertake the duties sought to be imposed upon them, but when it became known to the County Councils that in Parliament Members were flying at each other's throats, and that besides the administrative efforts they would have to make they would have to deal with such a vexed and difficult question as that raging in the House of Commons between Board and Voluntary Schools, they very naturally, as businesslike and practical bodies, expressed a wish to have nothing to do with the matter. Hon. Members found themselves hampered by what happened last year, but they also found themselves face to face with a proposal which, after all, had the merit of being an honest endeavour to carry out the pledge which had been again and again given, not only in the country, but in the House. ["Hear, hear!"] For many weeks past he had noticed it foreshadowed in the Opposition Press that the Government intended some coup or some trap, and his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury had been pictured as engaged in bird-catching and other interesting rural amusements and sports. [Laughter.] So far from the Government having designed a trap for the Opposition, they had been led by force of circumstances to prepare a trap for themselves. [Opposition cheers.] They had been obliged to place this Resolution before the House, which gave hon. Members, whether supporters, or so-called supporters, of the Government—[a laugh)—or Members of the Opposition, free scope for their ingenuity, and allowed them to indulge not in Second Reading but Committee speeches. ["Hear!"] If there was any trap set for any particular bird in this case it had been the one set by the Government themselves. [Opposition laughter.] It was obvious that the Opposition were going to fight out this matter to the bitter end. [Opposition cheers.] They were difficult to deal with. [Opposition cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.] If this Bill had referred only to necessitous Board Schools they would have heard throughout the length and breadth of the land denunciations of the Government for having only partially dealt with this great question. [Opposition cheers.] As far as his experience went, he was certain that it was utterly impossible for the Government to refuse to deal with necessitous Board Schools at an early date, and not only hon. Members of the Opposition, but those on the Ministerial benches had a fair claim to demand from the Government a very clear statement as to the time at which the House might look forward to for the introduction of such a Measure. ["Hear, hear!"] He had heard many speeches on the question; perhaps not so many in support of the Government Measure as he could have wished. [Laughter.] Though some hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House seemed to have been puzzled as to what the Bill would or would not do, he confessed that he had never been so much puzzled as he was by the course of the Debate last night. He had always supposed that at the last General Election a large number of his hon. Friends, and some Members of the Government, gave very distinct pledges that the monetary inequality between Voluntary and Board Schools should once for all be done away with. He did not himself give pledges of that nature, but had always understood that they were given broadcast. [Opposition cheers.] He further understood that an effort was made during the last Session by the Government to redeem that pledge, but by a Measure so large and ambitious that it had to be withdrawn. One of the chief reasons of the failure of this Measure was the somewhat wholesale condemnation that it received from his hon. Friends below the Gangway on the ground that it did not go far enough—that it did not meet the requirements of the case. Now, the Government brought in a far less ambitious and far less comprehensive scheme which, to a great extent, met the demands of his hon. Friends with regard to the necessitous Voluntary Schools, and he never was more astounded than he was by the Debate that followed its introduction last night. He sat there hour by hour among supporters, not of Voluntary Schools but of Board Schools. [Opposition laughter.] Instead of hearing his hon. Friends thanking the Government for what they were proposing, he heard nothing of the kind. There was not even a murmur of thanks from them. [Opposition laughter.] Hon. Member after hon. Member rose around him until he was almost terrified out of his Parliamentary senses—[laughter]—not to commend the proposals of the Government under whose auspices they won their seats—[ironical Opposition cheers]—but to condemn them because, forsooth, they did not assist the Board Schools. He hoped he might be forgiven if he sat somewhat alarmed when he saw such strange phenomena going on around him. [Laughter.] Of course, it was to be understood that the action of the Government did not stop at the point of the present proposals touching the Voluntary Schools. He understood that a pledge, and a perfectly distinct pledge, would be given by the Government, in the course of the Debate, that a similar Measure would be applied to the necessitous Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] But, after all, the kernel of this question was the distribution of the money, and its importance led him to bitterly regret that they were unhappily prevented from setting up such an authority as he had intimated. There must be somebody responsible for the distribution of the fund, and the Government had fallen back on the Education Department, which was a good authority for the purpose as far as one point went. It had been hinted once or twice that the Education Department was not the proper authority for the purpose, and that there would be jealousies as between school and school and district and district. He believed there would be nothing of the kind. ["Hear, hear!"] If the Department were to be set up for the first time as a central authority in London to carry out the object, it would be a very bad and vicious principle, but this authority had always been engaged in giving grants to schools and carrying out this work under the Act of 1870, and so far as it would be responsible for the distribution of the funds he thought there would be no chance of bitterness or friction. Then as to the local authority. It was not the best that could have been obtained last year, but it was the next best at this date that could be devised to find out what really were the local needs and necessities of the schools. That was what was wanted. They did not want to see the money squandered on schools that did not require assistance. The proposal for an equal grant all round was, he believed, a foolish device for squandering the taxpayers' money. ["Hear, hear!"] Let them look at the question as they might, it was a matter of great importance to the taxpayers of the country as a whole, for the extinction of the Voluntary system would involve a large increase of national expenditure of many millions for elementary education. ["Hear, hear!"] The next point to consider was the new system of the association of schools. How was it going to work? He presumed that the associations would cover a very large area indeed; otherwise the system would be absurd. The more associations they had, the more intricate would be the work both locally and for the Department. Their primary duty would be to give the best information they could to the Department concerning every school in their area, and further to frame a scheme for the assistance of those schools. He believed that if they made association compulsory it would fail, but that it would work on a permissive basis. The schools that did not enter into the association would not be left out in the cold, but would be dealt with by the Department, which would be able to get information with regard to them from its own inspectors. The Department, as he understood the scheme, would not be tied by any local authority, but would be the supreme authority in regard to these transactions. It was very obvious that under such a scheme as this the Department would be able to deal, especially in rural districts, with many of the inequalities which occurred. It might be urged that this was new work for these associations. He did not think it would be so considered either by the Church of England, the Wesleyans, or the Roman Catholics. He would remind hon. Members that in every diocese the Church of England had her diocesan boards, which had not only to deal with large administrative work as regarded schools, but also and especially with this very work of aiding, through subscriptions, necessitous schools in their districts. Therefore, as regarded the Department, they had every information for the purpose of carrying out the new duties imposed upon them, and as regarded the local authorities, most of them would be dealing with work which, in many cases, they had been performing for years. Then there was the question of the allotment of this money to various localities or various areas. The First Lord of the Treasury had stated that a larger sum would be allotted to the urban or town districts than would be allotted to the country districts. That was, no doubt, an unpleasant statement for those who represented rural constituencies, but he thought some misapprehension existed on the point. In many districts, no doubt, such as Manchester and the larger Lancashire towns, where there were poor districts with large schools and a larger number of pupils in them—in the very poorest districts, such as he had referred to, and such as they had in the East End of London, it must be necessary to allot a much larger sum than would be allotted to the country. But he would ask the Committee to consider—and this was the test of the thing—whether it would be possible under this scheme for any rural school in any county in England which was in difficulties to continue to suffer and yet not get a grant from the Education Department, if it was to be supreme in these matters. As he understood, the proposals of the Government would be wide enough in their scope to deal with any necessitous school, whether in town or in country. ["Hear, hear!"] If they were satisfied on that point, it mattered little to those who represented rural districts, whether the gross sum allotted in each case was larger or smaller. All they required to be satisfied upon was that before the Bill passed through Committee it should be provided that in no case should a rural school which really wanted aid have withheld from it a grant to the proper amount. ["Hear, hear!"] He could not but allude to the question of subscription to Voluntary Schools. It was perfectly obvious that they must now allow this Measure to go forward as a relief to subscribers to Voluntary Schools. [Opposition cheers.] He thought it absolutely necessary that in this new Act there should be a direction to the Education Department that, in all cases in which help was given to Voluntary Schools, due consideration should be given to the subscriptions paid to the schools. He thought it should be a sine quâ non in all cases in which assistance was to be given to the locality that there should be some guarantee, on the part of the locality, that the subsisting subscriptions would be maintained. [Opposition cheers.] It would be urged that the more they gave to Voluntary Schools the more the subscriptions would drop away. [Opposition cheers.] He would like to tell the House what happened in the case of the Free Education Act, against which a similar objection was urged. In 1890, before that Act came into operation, the rate subscribed per head per child in Voluntary Schools was 6s. 7½d. In 1895—five years after the Act came into force—the rate was 6s. 9d. [Cheers.] That was, in his opinion, a conclusive answer to the objection that the first result of this grant would be to produce a diminution of subscriptions. ["Hear, hear!"] The Government had been rather roughly handled on the question of passing this scheme through before the 31st of March. He owned that he for one considered it was absolutely necessary that they should meet early this Session so as to be able to carry a Measure through for the appropriation of a certain sum in the Treasury, and that it should be handed over at once to the assistance of Voluntary Schools. [Opposition cheers.] It seemed that they were doomed to disappointment on that point, but he thought he had, at all events, shown two things—in the first place, that the grant of to-day was different from the grant proposed yesterday—[cheers]—and, in the second place, that the application of the grant was also totally different, that these proposals were by no means on all fours with the late proposals of the Government, and that it would be absolutely impossible to allocate what remained of this sum so as to fit it with the existing proposals of the Government. He had spoken at length, because he had felt that the occasion not only required but demanded it. [Opposition cheers.] It might be true that in this case, as in that of many of his hon. Friends, there were some things in this Measure of which he might not altogether approve. He should have liked a better and a more comprehensive scheme and to have had allied with this scheme something that would have given a clear definition of what elementary education really meant compared with what it meant when Mr. Forster gave them that famous guarantee with regard to expenditure upon their elementary education. Like many others on that side of the House he might be disappointed in one or two points, but he should support this proposal with his vote to the very end—[Opposition ironical cheers]—because he honestly believed that in the difficult, the almost impossible, circumstances of the case it was the very best proposal the Government could have produced. ["Hear, hear!"] He could not understand for what earthly reason hon. Members should be picking holes in this Resolution because it did not happen to suit the position of some obscure school in their constituencies. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] After spending 30 years in the support of a Party was he to throw Party loyalty to the winds because of some trifling matter such as this, and forget those huge interests—Imperial, national, and colonial—committed to the charge of his right. hon Friends below him? He almost shuddered to think of the hilarity with which hon. Members greeted the spectacle of hon. Friends near him attacking this proposal and who were delighted with their performance and yet were always so frightened when the time for voting came. [Cheers and laughter.] In all good humour and with the best of temper he would remind hon. Gentlemen that big majorities did not last for ever. [Opposition cheers and laughter.] He was old enough to give them the advantage of his experience, and he reminded them of what took place in the years 1868 to 1874. He was Whip to the Party in those years, and well remembered Mr. Gladstone's majority in 1868 of over 100, and how the Opposition cheered when the majority on a division was not more than 70 or 80. What killed that majority in 1874? He had his hand on the tiller throughout the whole of the election, and knew what upset that majority. [Cheers and laughter.] It was a clause in the Education Act of 1870; it was the disgust of Nonconformists with Mr. Forster and others leaders of their Party that upset the Government at that time. He could assure his hon. Friends that they were playing with edged tools in their criticisms of this Measure. [Opposition laughter.] If they wanted to understand the effect of their conduct let them look at the delight of hon. Members opposite. [Renewed laughter.] Hon. Members opposite had been bubbling over with laughter and cheers ever since last night. [Loud laughter.] Of this he was quite certain, that whatever criticisms of this Measure might come from the other side of the House, Her Majesty's Government had only to go forward with determination and they would secure an adequate result for their labours and real and lasting assistance to Voluntary Schools. [Cheers.]

Sir W. Hart Dyke.

*Sir HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.), who was received with cheers, said: It is not unnatural that an old and distinguished Whip like my right hon. Friend should have been disturbed by the strange phenomena by which he found himself surrounded last night, and I am not surprised that he should have delivered a rather severe lecture to Members on his own side who do not take quite the same view of their election pledges as he takes. I am under the impression that a great many Members opposite who unquestionably did pledge themselves in the strongest manner to support a Measure for giving additional relief to Voluntary Schools did in towns accompany the pledge with a declaration that they would do nothing to injure Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] I think they are—it is perhaps impertinent for me to interfere—I think they are fulfilling pledges given when they take exception to the manner in which the Bill proposes to deal with the interests of Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] I am rather surprised that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Hart Dyke) should administer to us with his usual good humour and candour a lecture about making Second Reading speeches. I think my right hon. Friend has gone into the details of the Bill in a manner which suggests that he has had some better means of information as to the meaning of the Bill than we poor ignorant mortals could derive from the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury. I am not going to make a Second Reading speech, and I am not going into the details of the Measure on the present occasion. I feel the difficulty of discussing the details of any measure before the Bill in its entirety is before the House, and I confess I did not understand last night—I have not the acuteness of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin—the scheme of the association of schools. I do not complain of that, for I can quite understand the scheme is complicated and does require to be seen in print before we can form a complete idea of it. But this stage of the Bill it not what the First Lord of the Treasury has described as a purely formal one. If this were a purely formal vote on which an ordinary Ways and Means Bill should be founded, then there would be great force in the statement the right hon. Gentleman made as to the non-necessity of protracted discussion, and there would have been a fair appeal to precedent that whereas the forms of the House require the introduction of a resolution in Committee, yet nevertheless the introduction should be regarded as a First Reading and Debate and should not be continued in a manner unusual to that stage of a Bill. But the Government have adopted a policy on this occasion which compels discussion now—["hear, hear!"]—and at this stage, on what we think the most vital parts of the Bill. [Cheers.] The Government have no right to complain of that discussion—they have no right to attempt to abbreviate it. [Cheers.] They have themselves selected this mode of procedure.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: We had no alternative.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: I quite understand that is the right hon. Gentleman's view, and I am going to deal with it. He said the other night there was no alternative, but there we join issue. There is no alternative, according to the Standing Orders of the House, when a Government proposes a Bill the main object of which is to grant public money, no alternative to the adoption of the course of introducing the Bill in pursuance of a resolution in Committee. That I concede to the right hon. Gentleman, but, while the orders of the House require that a Bill dealing with the granting of public money should be introduced in Committee of the whole House, the Standing Orders do not require that the resolution should be so limited as to preclude discussion on one of the vital principles of the proposal. [Cheers.] Let me put this fairly before the House. The Government might have proposed, but they have not, to give additional aid to denominational schools on the ground of grave necessity existing in certain schools or in certain districts. In that case it ought to be open to the Opposition to say, and we should have said, "Such aid should be granted to Board Schools where equal necessity prevails." ["Hear, hear!"] That is what the Government might do, but what have the Government done? They have proposed that such additional aid shall be granted to all denominational schools equally. ["Hear, hear!"] If that be so, then we have the right to say that all Board Schools should share in this grant, that they should be treated alike. ["Hear, hear!"] I am not dealing with the question whether that is a right contention or not; I am dealing simply with the procedure which the Government have adopted, and to which the right hon. Gentleman said there was no alternative. The Government have adopted a procedure which prevents any Member or any section of the House joining issue on this contention; they have precluded us alike from discussion and division what we consider the main objection to this Bill. ["Hear, hear!"]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: What other form could we adopt?

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: What is the ground on which the restriction is made? The right hon. Gentleman says what form could he have adopted. It is not the invariable form to limit a resolution. A resolution is made wide, and then the Bill following upon that resolution limits its operation. ["Hear, hear!"] Now what is the justification, or what was it until 4 o'clock yesterday? It was this—the saving of time. This is the justification Members have put forward—that it was necessary to pass any measure dealing with Voluntary Schools before March 31, and that any additional matter introduced into that Bill to make the Bill provocative of discussion and contentious in character would prejudice the passage of the Bill before March 31. That was what the country understood; that was what an overwhelming number of Members of the House understood. ["Hear, hear!"] Let us see whether there is any substance in that contention. Assume that it be the case; assume that the Government had not departed from their position, that they still say, "We will fulfill the pledges we gave last year; you shall have the money for Voluntary Schools before March 31"; assume that to be the case. Then I say the argument that the inclusion of grants to Board Schools would protract procedure is an unsound one. The inclusion of Board Schools would save time. ["Hear, hear!"] Measures of equal justice pass far more rapidly in this House than measures of discriminating injustice. [Cheers.] There would have been less discussion on the chief and main contention—there are many others—that whatever you do all schools should be treated alike. That would have been taken out of discussion altogether. The Government would have had the support of all denominationalists, of all Members who have pledged themselves to equal treatment between different classes of schools; they would have had the support of the School Boards and of the ratepayers, and that is not a support to be despised by any Government under any circumstances. [Cheers.] But now we are told it is not the intention of the Government to pass this Measure before March 31.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: We hope to do so.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: Well, of course, all Governments hope to do so. That is their desire.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Hear, hear.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: That is their desire, their hope, and that is generally their illusion. We endeavoured to pass some Bills in our time, and we were satirised by no one more severely than the right hon. Gentleman himself as to the folly of the hopes we indulged in. The right hon. Gentleman does not imitate that folly. He says at once,

> "I cannot pass this Measure by March 31. I hope to do it, I wish to do it, and if the House would quietly vote upon it without discussion it can be done."

He knows as well as we do it is impossible that a Bill of this kind could pass into law before March 31. [Cheers.] Well, then, we have got the whole Session before us. The time limit is gone. [Cheers.] There can be no argument in saying there shall be this roundabout process of two Bills when the whole thing can be done in one. [Cheers.] I venture to assert that if this Bill dealt out equal justice to the Board Schools as compared with the Voluntary Schools it would not require but one additional clause in it to cover all those who desire equality. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman who last spoke reminded us of the history of last year. Yes, it was on March 31 of last year that the Government, with the Session then all before them, and with other important Measures also mentioned in the Queen's Speech, introduced their gigantic scheme which was to overturn the whole settlement of 1870, and which was to revolutionise, either for evil or good, the whole system of national education in this country. [Cheers.] They were not then deterred by the time limit. [Renewed cheers.] If I remember aright, the right hon. Gentleman assured us at a much later period of the Session that it was the full intention of the Government that the Bill should be passed during that Session. If the Government intend to include Board Schools and to give them any relief whatever, there is no necessity why a Bill introduced on February 1, and when, therefore, there can be no pressure of time, should not include all the Government proposals. [Cheers.] We have a sort of pledge or promise. It has not been given yet but it is going to be given. The hon. Member for West Ham said he assumed a pledge would be given, and my right hon. Friend who has just sat down spoke, in a style with which a good many of us are familiar, as to his reliance on the promise not yet before the House, but which he said he believed would be before the House, with reference to the introduction of another Bill. If that be the intention of the Government, if that is to be the pledge of the Government, if they think it necessary to have another Resolution, another First and Second Reading, another Committee stage, and another Third Reading—all to save time—[cheers and laughter]—all to promote the rapid progress of this Measure through the House—[laughter]—then all I can say is let them ask men who have been in this House five years—I will not take a longer period—whether they will be deluded by such a transparent fallacy. [Cheers.] There is but one mode and one way in which the Government can make this pledge effective. It is this, and we shall hold them to it. If they are in earnest on this question will they pledge themselves to the House, as we pledged ourselves to the House in 1893, that they will not advise Her Majesty to prorogue Parliament until the Bill dealing with Board Schools has passed into law. [Cheers.] If they do not give that pledge, I think their pledge is absolutely worthless. [Cheers.] But there is one advantage in two Bills. I do not know whether it has occurred to the right hon. Gentleman—I do not impute to him that such a possibility has crossed his mind, but there is one advantage. He relies strongly upon the Standing Orders of this House, which require that Money Bills should be introduced in Committee. But there are some other Standing Orders of this House, and something more important than even Standing Orders—the Constitution—which does not allow a Money Bill to be altered, or amended, or dealt with in another place. They can reject it, they cannot alter it. If you have one Bill dealing both with Voluntary Schools and with Board Schools and that Bill goes to another place, it will either have to be passed or rejected as a whole. [Cheers.] I do not think even the Bishop of Chester would take upon himself the responsibility of rejecting a Government Bill under those circumstances. [Laughter and cheers.] But if two Bills go to the other House, one dealing only with Voluntary Schools, and the other dealing only with Board Schools, I should not like to prophesy what would be the fate of the second Bill. [Cheers.] But let us assume that the Government are of opinion that this grant ought not to be made to the Board Schools, why should they prevent Debate in this House? Why should they prevent the House expressing an opinion on that question? Why not let the arguments be heard, meeting those arguments with counter-arguments and not with the gag? [Cheers.] Why not meet them as every other question in this House is met—by fair discussion and full Debate? [Cheers.] Every Member of the House has a right to vote upon the question, and what the Government are preventing is the House voting on this simple issue whether Board Schools should be treated equally with Voluntary Schools. [Cheers.] Of course, hon. Members who feel strongly in favour of this additional grant to Voluntary Schools cannot, and will not, vote for the rejection of this Resolution. That is really the trap in which we are put. We cannot vote upon the question, Is it right or is it wrong to treat Board Schools the same as Voluntary Schools? We have but one division here, and that division is whether this Resolution should be rejected or accepted. We cannot expand it or put anything into it which would add to the expenditure by one shilling. When we arrive at the Committee stage any Member who moved an Amendment to include Board Schools would be met by the Chairman saying it was out of order. I say not only has this House the right to discuss, debate, and divide on this question, but our constituents have a right to know how we vote upon it. [Cheers.] There are some few hon. Members who can speak with authority on this question. There is my hon. Friend, the Member for Edgbaston, who has perhaps, done more for education in Birmingham than any man living. He has told us frankly what is the fatal blot in this scheme—it is the non-extension of the Bill to the Board Schools. But he cannot vote in this House upon it. If the right hon. Gentleman would simply strike out the word "voluntary" from his Resolution, and put in "elementary," he can restrict his own Bill as much as he likes, and with his big majority—now, I should think, after the crack of this afternoon's whip, reduced to perfect and unquestioning obedience —I have no doubt he can carry any Bill he likes. We do not expect to defeat it. [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] I thank hon. Members for that cheer, which is a frank expression that they do not like to talk about the Measure, and that they have an objection to argument. But you may depend upon it you will never shut the mouths of Members of this House or of people in this country who are strong advocates of doing justice to Board Schools by any such procedure as this you have adopted. The House of Commons is proud of its great traditions of fair play and free discussion, and I think that these traditions should be rigidly maintained whenever we are dealing with the appropriation of public money. [Cheers.] I have always regarded the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury as a consummate debater and a peculiarly fair opponent, and it would have been the very last criticism I should have passed on him that I thought him capable of endeavouring to pass legislation without giving the House the fullest opportunity of stating objections to the legislation which he himself believed to be good, but which others thought to be injurious. If the right hon. Gentleman will agree to change the word "voluntary" and introduce "elementary" it does not pledge him to alter his Bill or to extend its scope. But it would give us an opportunity of saying that these Board Schools and denominational schools should be put on an equal footing. If he will not do that he has no right to complain of our discussing the subject on this Resolution. It is not a question of one, two, three, or four nights which we ought to have for discussion. [Ministerial laughter.] Many of those hon. Gentlemen who are now laughing were not in the House at the time, but I can remember how, in the last Parliament, hon. Members opposite claimed to be entitled to a much longer time for the discussion of isolated clauses and phrases in a Bill to which they objected. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman complained the other night that my right hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham had introduced words which represented something that did not exist. My right hon. Friend alluded to the words "statutory equality." Those words are the Duke of Devonshire's. [Cheers.] That is an apt and accurate phrase. There is statutory equality at this moment, and if this Resolution were passed it would authorise the House to repeal that statutory equality. The right hon. Gentleman criticised my right hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham for not having read Section 97 of the Education Act. I am not fond of tu quoques, but I do not think the right hon. Gentleman himself could have read that section. It distinctly enacts that the conditions of the annual Parliamentary grant—and this is going to be an annual Parliamentary grant—"shall not give any preference or advantage to any school on the ground that it is, or it is not, provided by the School Board." [Opposition cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Yes, but the section goes on to give a privilege to poor Board Schools which is not given to Voluntary Schools, whether poor or rich. [Ministerial cheers.]

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: What the section does is this. It provides that where the 3d. rate will not produce 7s. 6d. per head of the children at school, there shall be a small additional grant made to that school. [Ministerial cheers.] It enacts that the Parliamentary grant shall not be subject to any conditions restricting its application to Voluntary Schools or Board Schools.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: That is restricting.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: Do hon. Members think that the few thousand pounds which have been given under that Act were any advantage to Board Schools over Voluntary Schools? [AN HON. MEMBER: "Certainly."] All I can say is that the hon. Member who says "certainly" cannot be very familiar with the circumstances of School Boards. [Cheers.] [AN HON. MEMBER: It gives £40,000.] At all events where is this statutory equality? Hon. Members do not mean to provide for Board Schools.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: In this Bill.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: Why is the principle of statutory equality to be departed from? The right hon. Gentleman told us that the number of children in average attendance in the schools was 4,500,000. Of these

2,500,000 are in Voluntary Schools, and 2,000,000 in Board Schools. The ratepayers of this country pay £4,000,000 in rates for the education of these children. The average rate in England is 9d.; in London 10¼d., in boroughs 8¾d., and in parishes 8d. That is a very heavy rate, and when you come to analyse it and apply it to parishes and boroughs, you have this result—that there are 1,764 parishes and 138 boroughs where the rate is 3d. and above, and you have only 206 parishes and 21 boroughs where it is below. The hon. Member for West Ham spoke of the enormous rating of his constituency. I may say there are 297 rural parishes where the rate is upwards of 1s., and in 108 boroughs and 892 parishes the rate is between 6d. and 1s. The burden of these rates is very heavy in the large towns. The right hon. Gentleman said the other night that Gentlemen on this side of the House were not noted for their readiness to relieve the ratepayers, and he based that accusation on the fact that last Session we claimed that relief to ratepayers should not be confined to one class of ratepayers, but extended to all. There is no reason why the relief now proposed should not be equally extended. But the great point of complaint is that there is unfair and undue competition between the Board Schools and the Voluntary Schools, and that the Government are bound to bring forward this exclusive Measure to prevent the destruction of Voluntary Schools. It is absolutely one of those delusions for which there is not a shadow of foundation that the Voluntary School system is decaying and dying out. Let me give a few figures. In 1870 there were 1,150,000 children in Voluntary Schools, to-day there are 2,500,000. [Ministerial cheers.] All honour to Voluntary Schools. But you cannot have all the signs of robust health and, at the same time, be dying of mortal disease. [Cheers and laughter.] Then in 1870 there were 8,281 Voluntary Schools. Since 1870 1,323 have been transferred to Board Schools. So, if matters remained as they were, there would be 7,000 Voluntary Schools, but now there are 14,479. Of the 1,323 which have been transferred to School Boards, 260 were British, or undenominational Schools. The transfer of the Church of England Schools is an unappreciable figure. There were only 19 transferred last year. Does that justify you in coming to the House and saying, "We claim public money because we are expiring?" [Cheers.] Put your claim on its true and proper ground, and the House of Commons will listen to it. The difficulty is not the extinction of Voluntary Schools, not that the scholars are decreasing, the buildings decaying, and their hold on the popular mind weakening, but this. The Education Department, wisely and righteously, as I think, have elevated the standard of popular education and have made demands on Voluntary Schools and upon Board Schools which have necessitated a large increase of expenditure. That is the true state of the case —not that there is any hostility and—most absurd of all statements—that there is competition. The chairman of the Birmingham School Board and my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham have disposed of that from the School Board and teachers' point of view; and the hon. Member for Monmouthshire as far as his experience went. [Ministerial laughter.] His experience is great. He has been for 15 years the respected chairman of a large and successful School Board, where he told us there was perfect amity of feeling between both sides on this question. I do not believe there is any attempt, on the one side, to destroy School Boards, or, on the other, to destroy Voluntary Schools. The right hon. Member for London University complained of the hardship upon subscribers to Voluntary Schools who had to pay the School Board rate. Subscribers to Voluntary Schools pay their subscriptions towards what is to them a noble object. But paying rates is not, as some people think, a contribution to a private adventure school set up by a private body in competition with existing schools. It is an obligation imposed by the Legislature on the community that where there is not a proper number of schools they shall provide them; and the private subscriber has no more right to complain of paying his School Board rate and trying to set off one contribution against another than a charitable donor has to say he will set off his contributions to private charity against his poor rate.

[Cheers.] If Voluntary Schools complain justly—I find no fault with their complaint—of the heavy expenditure put on their shoulders, so do the ratepayers. Why should the ratepayers be left out in the cold? ["Hear, hear!"] Why is the sympathy which the right hon. Gentleman claims a monopoly of for ratepayers not to be extended to those who live in large towns? Hon. Members have spoken very properly of their own experience in their own locality. I represent a town where Board and Voluntary Schools are in full working order, where they are both of high character, and there is no competition. I can assure hon. Gentlemen opposite whose experience is confined to rural districts that it is not the desire of the ratepayers in large towns to extinguish Voluntary Schools. In Wolverhampton we have upwards of 5,000 children in the Board Schools and upwards of 8,000 in the Voluntary Schools, and admirable Voluntary Schools they are. The grant earned is approximately much the same in both kinds of schools. We have schools belonging to the Church of England, the Church of Rome, and also to the Wesleyan body. Under this Bill the ratepayers of Wolverhampton, who are now—I think I am speaking correctly—paying a school rate of about 8d. in the pound, in a town where the rates are 7s. 3d. in the pound, where they feel the pressure of school rates quite as acutely as the supporters of Voluntary Schools feel the pressure of their subscriptions—if this Bill becomes law the ratepayers will see subscribers to Voluntary Schools in Wolverhampton receiving upwards of £2,150, while they will not receive a penny. Where is the justice of that? [Cheers.] What crime have School Boards committed that they are to be treated in this manner? One or two hon. Members, notably the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last, have censured seriously the constant attempt to denounce Board Schools and describe them as if they were national evils, a sort of insanitary dwellings which ought to be treated as if propagating a plague. All that hon. Members can say against Board Schools was that in certain cases they had been extravagant. What public body has not been extravagant in its time? [Cheers.] Have town councils never been extravagant? Have vestries never been extravagant? Have County Councils never been extravagant? Has the House of Commons never been extravagant? [Cheers.] There has been waste of public money everywhere, and I venture to say there has been less extravagance in connection with the School Board system than in connection with almost any other body in this country. [Cheers.] An hon. Member talked about the "bottomless purse of the rates." Do hon. Members who represent large towns endorse that? [Cheers.] Do they not know that there is nothing more difficult than to get an additional rate in large towns? Do they not know that the rates are virtually settled by the ratepayers themselves, and that School Boards are changed every three years by popular election? If the ratepayers choose themselves to increase their rates no outsider has any right to complain. [Cheers.] For anyone professing to know anything about our local expenditure to say that it is easy to raise the rates is simply to proclaim his own total and absolute ignorance. [Cheers.] The School Boards, I admit, have raised education to a higher standard, and they have endeavoured to reach a lofty ideal, and the House and the country should be indebted to them for it. [Cheers.] There are hon. Members in this House who say, Whatever else you spend money upon you must maintain the defences of the country. You must make your Navy as complete, as strong, and as efficient as you can because the defence of the country is the first consideration. I agree with that, but I would point out that this country has other defences besides the Navy. The dangers of this country are ignorance, vice, and crime, and against these three deadly foes the elevation of our national system of education has been one of our strongest bulwarks. [Cheers.] We know, and the President of the Board of Trade knows, that however much we may be encouraged and comforted by the recent returns showing that there has been an exaggeration as to foreign competition, every man connected with trade knows that there is a reality in that danger, and that it is necessary that our working classes and artisans should be educated to a much higher point than they are educated today; and no money can be better or more wisely spent than on education. [Cheers.] We are a rich nation. The money is pouring in, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer knows, by hundreds of thousands—I might almost say by millions at the present moment—and there can be no more beneficial application of the national wealth than the application of it to the improvement of the education of the people. There is no necessity on pecuniary grounds for discriminating between Board Schools and Voluntary Schools. [Cheers.] There is no reason of time; there is no question of opportunity. Both sides of the House will support a Measure of justice and fairness. There is no question of financial resources. We complain that the First Lord of the Treasury shut us up to this inept, inconvenient, and unfortunate method of dealing with this question, and we ask him to remove that restriction and enable us wholly and fairly to Debate the question in the whole House when the Bill comes before the House. We think we are entitled to claim a distinct Debate and a distinct Division upon that question. [Cheers.] If he deprives us of that, he may win, as I have no doubt he will win, and secure by a large majority the passage of this Resolution, but he will stamp it with a stigma of injustice which the whole country will appreciate. [Loud cheers.]

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs), who was received with cheers, said he had listened with very great surprise to the observation of the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken with regard to the procedure the Government were taking in this case. The right hon. Gentleman was perfectly entitled to his opinion that it would be better to deal with all schools in one Bill. The Government thought it would be better to deal with Voluntary Schools in one Bill and with such Board Schools as required special treatment in another Bill. [Opposition laughter.] That was a matter on which there might be a difference of opinion, but he did not think there could be any difference of opinion in the House as to one suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that the reason why the Government had taken this course was that if there were two Bills it would be possible that in another place the Bill dealing with Voluntary Schools might be passed and that dealing with Board Schools rejected. He ventured to think that a more unworthy suspicion had never been uttered. [Cheers.] He did not think it was worthy of the right hon. Gentleman who uttered it or of the right hon. Gentleman who cheered it. [Cheers.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: It was done on the Paper Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said it was an idea that never occurred to Her Majesty's Government. It was an idea they repudiated with indignation, and he ventured to think that it was a suggestion which should not have been introduced into the Debate. [Cheers.] He had listened with almost equal surprise to the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the procedure adopted in putting this Resolution on the Paper. The right hon. Gentleman said:—

> "Why do you not make your resolution wide enough to include all schools, Board Schools as well as Voluntary Schools?"

It was perfectly true, as the right hon. Gentleman said, that they might have a wide resolution and yet limit it by the Bill. It was also perfectly true that it was the duty of those proposing a resolution of this kind to make it conform as nearly as might be to the Bill to be introduced. [Cheers.] It would be, he ventured to say, contrary to Parliamentary practice and the traditions of the House to cast the net wide in the way that the right hon. Gentleman suggested, to frame a wide resolution, apparently by way of catching support in all quarters, when it had been determined that the Bill was to be confined to a particular class of measure. [Cheers.] Such a practice would be unworthy of that House, and in taking the course the Government had taken they not only had not been guilty of any want of fair play whatever, but they had, as he ventured to submit to the better judgment of the Committee, taken the only course properly open to them. [Cheers.] What was the grievance of the right hon. Gentleman? Did it prevent discussion on the question that Board Schools should be included? The right hon. Gentleman's own speech was the best answer to that. Would it prevent the right hon. Gentleman from raising the point again on the Second Reading?

[Opposition cries of "Yes."] It would not. A declaratory Amendment might be put down and the rejection of the Bill might be moved on the ground that it did not extend to Board Schools. No idea could be more unfounded than that the Government supposed that the discussion of this question could be prevented by the form of the Resolution. ["Hear, hear!"] Another observation of the right hon. Gentleman was that this Bill was conceived in a spirit of hostility to Board Schools. There could be no greater mistake. The Government recognised the good work the Board Schools had done in secular education, and that in many cases they gave admirable religious education. But it was not a religious education which was satisfactory to the consciences of all parents. [Cheers.] It was said that this Bill was contrary to religious equality. He believed in religious equality, but it must be religious equality all round. [Cheers.] Was it religious equality that because the religious teaching in Board Schools was satisfactory to a number of parents, those parents who objected to such teaching as inadequate for their children should be rated for the support of the special religious teaching given in Board Schools and should be left to struggle with the difficulty of keeping up as best they could schools in which their children received the religious education they desired? It had been said how many things had been done in the name of liberty. Still stranger things were attempted to be done nowadays in the name of religious equality. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Rotherham said that this Bill did not carry out the principle laid down by the Prime Minister in 1895 when he said that the first point to be dealt with in reference to education was that in the conduct of the education of this country provision should be made by which the children might be taught the religious faith their parents desired them to be taught. The right hon. Gentleman said the Bill did not carry out that principle because there was no equivalent in it to Clause 27 of the Bill of last year providing for special religious teaching in schools at the request of a sufficient number of parents. Was that the only mode in which provision could be made for religious teaching? Surely by maintaining the efficiency of Voluntary Schools, which had been kept in existence at a vast sacrifice for that purpose, they were taking as effective a step as could be taken for carrying out the first purpose indicated by the Prime Minister. ["Hear, hear!"] The second purpose the Prime Minister mentioned was that some relief should be given to the ever-increasing burden of the Education Rate. The right hon. Gentleman said this Bill did not do that. But to what extent would the rate increase if Voluntary Schools died out? Surely the right hon. Gentleman must realise that, heavy as the rate might be in a place like Wolverhampton, it was nothing to what it would be if Voluntary Schools were suffered to be extinguished. A Bill which was intended to help Voluntary Schools to hold their own was not only in the true interest of religious equality, but was also in the interests of the ratepayer. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Member for Rotherham had quoted from the reply of the President of the Council to a deputation of Archbishops and Bishops. He thought that quotation gave a most inadequate idea of what the Duke of Devonshire said on that occasion. The Duke of Devonshire was then dealing with a proposal that the fixed grant should be increased, and he pointed out with unanswerable force that if they increased the fixed grant all round they would waste the money of the public, because they would give the grant to all schools alike, and while some schools would want nothing, to others an increase of 5s. would not be enough. That passage in the Duke of Devonshire's speech was much more germane to the Bill than the passage quoted by the right hon. Gentleman. He had been unable to find in The Times report of the remarks of the Duke of Devonshire on that occasion the expression "statutory equality." If this expression was used it was in reference only to the question of the fixed grant. Any one who said that statutory equality in any wider sense existed was utterly and absolutely mistaken. There was no statutory equality as between Board Schools and Voluntary Schools. In the first place, the Board Schools had at their back the rates; they could draw on the rates to any extent, and did draw upon them to a very large extent, as the ratepayers of the country very well knew. And with regard to the Parliamentary grant, Section 97 of the Act of 1870 contained a proviso which conferred on Board Schools in poor districts a privilege which was not conferred on Voluntary Schools at all. Thus, so far from there being any statutory equality, there was statutory inequality, and it was with the view of, to some degree, redressing that statutory inequality that this Bill was brought forward by the Government. [Cheers.] Voluntary Schools were an essential element in the settlement of the educational question which was arrived at in 1870. The religious feeling of a large number of parents must be met. Whatever the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton might say as to the increased attendance in Voluntary Schools, and whatever was the cause, he appealed to the Committee whether it was not a matter of common knowledge that the Voluntary Schools were in very many cases very hard put to it indeed. It was with difficulty that they kept their heads above water, and the object of the Bill was to help them to increase their efficiency and make them contribute even more worthily than at present to the completion of the educational machinery of the country. He did not attribute to the Board Schools or to those who managed them any unworthy motives of competition with Voluntary Schools. He did not believe such motives existed, or if they did exist at all it was only in the most exceptional and special cases. But Voluntary Schools were inevitably suffering owing to the fact that they were in competition with those who had behind them the bottomless purse of the ratepayers. They were hard squeezed, and in some cases were in danger of being squeezed out of existence. But then it was said there were also poor Board Schools, and that they ought also to be dealt with. He thought one lesson must have impressed itself on the mind of everyone who had followed Parliamentary procedure of late, and that was the wisdom of doing one thing at a time. [Cheers.] The Government did not fail to recognise the case for aid to the poor Board Schools. What the First Lord of the Treasury had said on that subject must not be minimised in the way that had been attempted by some speakers opposite. The Government had every intention of dealing with the question of poor Board Schools at as early a date as possible. The method of best carrying out that object had been for some time under the consideration of the Government, and they would be prepared to bring their proposals forward on the first suitable occasion. [Cheers and Opposition laughter.] There was one remark he would make. If the Bill now under consideration met with such detailed resistance and obstruction as had been threatened—[cheers and cries of "Oh!"]—the country would be able to realise—[cheers and counter cheers and Opposition cries of "Romford!"]—that that obstruction was directed, not only against the Bill now under consideration, but might also in its effects prejudice the Bill for the relief of poor Board Schools. [Cheers and Opposition laughter.] Surely if right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite were in earnest in this matter; if what they desired was that the poor Board Schools should be aided, if what they were in search of was not a weapon to attack the present proposal of the Government, but if they were actuated by a genuine desire to help poor Board Schools—[Opposition cries of "All schools"]—they would with adequate discussion, but not more than adequate discussion, deal with the Bill now before the Committee. [Cheers.] The right hon. Member for Bodmin referred to the Bill as savouring of injustice because it might help Voluntary Schools without helping poor Board Schools in the same neighbourhood, and which he said were equally deserving of help. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see the propriety of not quarrelling with a Measure of this kind merely on a question of procedure. The demands put forward by some Members of the Opposition went far beyond the question of aid to poor Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] They had been told that aid should be given to all schools alike, whether poor or rich, whether Board or Voluntary. That was a proposal not to improve educational machinery, but to relieve the rates. The hon. Member for the Edgbaston Division told them that any aid given to Board Schools in Birmingham would go to the relief of the ratepayer, and his speech was cheered by hon. Gentlemen opposite because they regarded it as hostile to the Measure now under consideration. He would like to know what reception hon. Gentlemen opposite would have given to a proposal made by the Government to apply the money of the taxpayer in relief of the ratepayers of Birmingham. [Cheers.] What a howl of derision would have been raised! They would have been met by all the arguments which were directed against another Measure with a similar object which was passed last year. [Cheers.] But such a proposal would not rest there. It would bring them to this —that the taxpayer should undertake the whole expense of the maintenance of education throughout the country to the relief of the subscribers and ratepayers alike. That might be a counsel of perfection; on its merits he expressed no opinion. But to call it a Measure which might be embodied in a simple little Bill was rather too strong. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not know what the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say to such a proposal. Was the country ripe for it? Was it not rather a waste of time, when the question before them was what could be done in a practical way to relieve schools that needed aid, to embark on the discussion of such an heroic remedy? The Measure under consideration was a modest and he hoped would be an effective Measure. It provided for a grant which in the aggregate was not to exceed 5s. for each child in all Voluntary Schools. That grant was not to be distributed to all alike. Some of the schools wanted nothing; some wanted a great deal more than 5s. per child. They must discriminate. At present there was no machinery available for discrimination, and they naturally turned to the Education Department and asked it to undertake a work for which he conceived it was extremely well fitted. There was a further advantage in such a simple proposal. This money, be it remembered, was not to be provided from local resources, but from the revenue of the country, and in those circumstances surely the control over the expenditure of the money should rest with the central authority representing the Government. They ought to control the expenditure of their own money. When ratepayers' money was expended it was reasonable that the ratepayers should control the expenditure; similarly when the money of the taxpayers was expended the right and reasonable thing was that the central authority, as representing the ratepayers, should have the control. How was the money to be expended? Not indiscriminately. It was to be applied for the relief of necessitous schools and to increase their educational efficiency, and in its application due regard was to be paid to the keeping up of voluntary subscriptions. The Education Department might in performing their task look for help to associations of schools. Such associations existed already to a not inconsiderable extent, and it was proposed to encourage their formation and enlargement. That would be done with all due regard to the religious convictions of those who maintained any particular Voluntary School. He thought it would be generally admitted that it would be little less than an outrage to force a school connected with a particular religious denomination into an association of which the general feeling was not in harmony with the views of that denomination. But generally it would be greatly to the advantage of schools and conduce to efficient discrimination if they were encouraged to join such associations. When such an association was formed there would be allotted to it a certain share of the aid grant according to the number of all the scholars in all the schools in the association. The rate according to which that share would be allotted would be 5s. per child, or if separate rates should be established by the Department for town and country schools, according to those rates respectively. That there was good ground for giving the Department power so to discriminate he should be prepared to prove when the proper time came. The share allotted to each association would be distributed in aid of necessitous schools with due regard to the maintenance of voluntary subscriptions, and it would be distributed by the Department according to the draft scheme which the association would be expected to prepare. Surely this was right? Some schools were rich and needed no help, whilst others were poor and needed help badly. Was it not reasonable that out of their share of the aid grant the managers of wealthy schools should minister to the necessities of other schools? Then he held that the abolition of the 17s. 6d. limit in the case of day schools was right. The grants could be earned only if the school was efficient enough to merit it. In the name of common sense, why should they penalise economy? If a school with smaller subscriptions was turning out an equally good article as a richer school, why should it not get the same amount of grant as was given to that school which possibly had had to spend a great deal more money in order to earn it? Surely it was also right that Voluntary Schools should be relieved from rates. Chapels, museums, scientific and literary institutions were exempted; and our Voluntary Schools were doing work which, in its nature, was a sacred work, and which, in many cases, was more valuable than that done by scientific and literary institutions. Such were the provisions of the Measure now under consideration, and it was a Measure of vast importance. He made no appeal to right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite for their support, although he might reasonably make such an appeal if any importance could be attached to the views expressed by the Opposition in the course of the Debate on the Education Bill of last Session. Of the many things of the same sort that were said, he would only quote one. Speaking on the Second Reading of that Measure the right hon. Member for East Fife said:—

> "We were told in the Speech from the Throne that the position of Voluntary Schools is in many places precarious and requires further assistance from public resources. If this Bill had corresponded to the terms of that announcement—if, in other words, it had proposed some additional and even large provision from public resources to maintain a high standard of education where at present it is unduly low, and if that provision had been accompanied by adequate safeguards—[Opposition cheers]—for the control and the wise expenditure of the money that was granted, although we might have differed, and probably should have differed upon points of detail, it certainly would not have encountered the resistance which this Measure must be prepared to meet."

["Hear, hear!"] Right hon. Gentlemen opposite had cheered at the words "adequate safeguards." If that was the point on which they wanted light, why did not they reserve their criticisms until they saw the Bill? Now all the expectations held out by right hon. and hon. Members opposite last year were, it appeared, to be thrown to the winds, and the supporters of the Bill were to encounter an opposition as determined as that which met the previous Bill. It was impossible to please hon. Members opposite. If the Government introduced a large Measure they were told that it was too big; if they introduced a smaller Measure they were told that it was too small. The only course that the Government could reasonably take in these circumstances was to give up all idea of meeting the views of hon. Members opposite and to introduce a Measure which they believed to be right. He, therefore, made no appeal to the Opposition for help in this matter, but he thought that the Government were entitled to the loyal support of the Gentlemen who sat on the Benches behind them. [Ironical Opposition cheers.] He could understand the rapture with which hon. Members opposite hailed any symptom of a possible rift in the lute. He quite understood the disappointment which some of his hon. Friends felt because this Bill could not be passed in time to give Voluntary Schools the benefit of the quarter's grant for the financial year now current. He thought, however, that that feeling of disappointment arose from a misconception. The Bill of last year proposed to give the Voluntary Schools 4s.; the present Bill proposed to give them 5s. Therefore, in the first 12 months, dating from April 1, during which the Bill would be in operation, the Voluntary Schools would get the amount which they would have earned under the Bill of last Session, if it had passed, in the course of the 15 months beginning on January 1. But this was really understating the case, because under this Bill the grant would be estimated on an increased number of scholars, and so the Voluntary Schools would actually profit by the alteration made in the Bill of this year, for owing to the increase in the number of scholars the schools would receive, taken together, £616,000 as against £489,000 which they would have received under the Bill of last year. It should be borne in mind also that in any circumstances it would have been impossible to make any discrimination with regard to the distribution of the grant during the last quarter of this financial year. If the money had been paid away during this quarter it would have had to be paid to schools alike without that discrimination which the Government took to be the essence of the question. He appealed to his hon. Friends and to all those whose minds were open on this subject not to let a great cause be prejudiced by any feeling of disappointment, or by any difference on matters of detail or procedure. This Measure was concerned with a great cause; it was the cause of religious freedom and religious equality. ["Oh, oh!" and cheers.] They respected the views of those who were satisfied with the religious education given in the Board Schools; but they also respected the views of those who desired religious education of a different kind, and the Government thought that there ought to be fair play all round. They had now a favourable combination of circumstances for rendering substantial service to those Voluntary Schools which had done so brave a work. They had a favourable revenue—[ironical cheers]—they had a friendly Government. Let all those who were interested in the welfare of the Voluntary Schools therefore join together as one man in pushing forward a proposal which the Government believed, not only to be right in itself, but one for the benefit of Voluntary Schools which was practicable in existing circumstances. [Cheers.]

*MR. A. C. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomery) stated that the proposals of the Government would be opposed by him to the utmost of his power. He did not look upon the abolition of rating as a serious consequence except that it implied the general principle of giving directly or indirectly religious instruction out of the rates. On that ground he objected to it, but as a practical matter he did not apprehend that it might cause serious difficulties. He thought, however, that its tendency might be to strengthen the claim which the community had on the Voluntary Schools because it would bring the community in as the creditors of those schools when the time came to deal with them in a different manner from that which was now being pursued. As to the 17s. 6d. limit, he agreed that to penalise a school simply because it had managed with scanty resources and by economy to earn a satisfactory grant was impolitic. The 17s. 6d. limit, however, consecrated the principle of local contribution, and its abolition, therefore, greatly changed the character of the schools. The provision as to audit by the Education Department was good as far as it went, but he hoped that it would be a real and effectual audit, such an audit as that which was given by the Local Government Board to County Council accounts. The grant of 5s. per child would not be nearly enough to help the poorer country schools up to anything like a high standard of efficiency. He should also like to know something of the machinery, constitution, and working of the proposed associations. His experience of country business was that the number of men who would do work of this kind was limited, and the amount of time at their disposal was pretty heavily drawn upon at present. He doubted whether there would be a sufficient number of men of experience in business to carry out the work, and the consequence would be that it would fall a great deal too much into the hands of the clergy. Business which was exclusively conducted by the clergy would not command the confidence even of Churchmen, and the real objection to the whole of this arrangement was that it placed the control of the funds which were intended to be applied for schools at which all children attended in the hands of one religious body. The association in short would be a Committee of the diocesan conference. He acknowledged that the Voluntary Schools conducted by the clergy were in many cases conducted with great toleration and a fair regard to the feelings of Nonconformist parents, but what was objected to was the entire absence of local control. Local control was wanted, not so much to ensure the right expenditure of money, as to ensure protection against interference with the Conscience Clause, interference with the religious belief of the parents of children, and generally against an intolerance which was in too many cases the characteristic of the working of clerical schools. Both the Solicitor General and his hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University had been misled by the jingle of State Aid, State Control, Rate Aid, Local Control. The latter, for the reason he had given, was necessary whether the aid was local or Imperial. As an illustration he took a case from his own constituency, which was an extensive county. In one part of the county there was a solid block of 155,000 acres, with a population of 24,000, and a rateable value of £7 18s. per head, which would be recognised as a high rateable value. In the whole of this area there was not a single Board School or British School; they were all Church Schools. Something like a half of the population of this large area were Nonconformists, and they had no security whatever except the good feeling of the parson of the parish that their children would be saved from being proselytised. He compared this district with an area of the same county consisting of parishes where there were Board Schools or British Schools. The latter area had a rateable value of £129,000, and a population of 24,466, making the rateable value per head £4 17s. 6d. In the first block he had mentioned there were 2,508 children in average attendance, and the district would therefore have a grant of £627 per annum. In the other area there were 3,515 children in average attendance, of whom only 1,343 were in non-Board Schools; so while the area with a rateable value of £7 18s. per head would get £627, that with a value of only £4 17s. 6d. per head, though more populous, would only get £336. There was no reason whatever for the inequality of treatment as between Board and Voluntary Schools, because the Board Schools were as much the result of the Voluntary efforts of the people as the Church Schools were. The Board Schools were established with the full assent and consent of the people who set them up. They all knew the great inequality in the pressure of taxation as between rateable and other property, but to accentuate this inequality by relieving the ratepayers of the towns more largely than the ratepayers of the country was only one more instance of the extremely retrograde nature of this Measure. In short, this Measure was simply and avowedly one for the endowment of the Church. That was the long and the short of the whole business. The whole argument of the Solicitor General pointed in this direction. In his opinion the hon. and learned Gentleman had somewhat exaggerated the extent to which conscience operated to induce parents to send their children to Voluntary Schools. He did not think the Voluntary Schools were preferred because the parents craved for definite religious instruction, as it was called; it was because they dreaded the rates. Whenever there was a fight whether there should be a School Board or not, one did not hear anything said about religion; one only heard the argument that to have no School Board would save the rates. He believed the religious instruction given in the Board Schools was acceptable to the great majority of the parents, and for his part he had greater sympathy with the consciences of those who did not wish to have dogmatic teaching forced upon their children, than of those who wished to force dogmatic teaching upon people who did not want it.

On the return of the CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS, after the usual interval,

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said the announcement that, contrary to public expectation, the grant in aid of the Voluntary Schools was not to be made available during the current financial year would cause great regret to both Churchmen and educationalists throughout the country; and, knowing as he did that Voluntary Schools urgently needed assistance, he thought there was some ground for complaint against the Government. ["Hear, hear!"] He regarded the question of education as the most vital question of the day, and therefore one to be considered entirely from a national standpoint. ["Hear, hear!"] His right hon. Friend the Member for Dartford had reproached some supporters of the Government for being too critical in this matter. But education transcended in importance every party question; and, in his opinion, those did best for their party who, in dealing with such an important question, endeavoured to do the best for the State. Therefore, in the interest of the State, he would follow some of his hon. Friends in a friendly criticism of the proposals of the Government, hoping that those proposals might yet be modified in some important points of detail. Education was the great national need of the day. A commercial standpoint was not, perhaps, the highest ground from which to view education, but it was one which in these days of commercial rivalry between nations could not be altogether neglected. He believed that if the matter were thoroughly investigated it would be found that any want of success on the part of the people of this country in holding their own against the commercial competition of other nations was entirely due to their deficiencies in education. In the laxity of the State in not providing the means of primary education until 1870—for what had been done before that date was not of any moment—as contrasted with the educational efforts during the last hundred years of countries like Germany, was to be found the chief cause of the success of foreign competition. Our national system of education rested upon two classes of schools—the Voluntary and the Board. He regarded both classes of schools as complementary parts of our national system of education, and thought that both should have full justice done to them. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Ipswich had said that Voluntary Schools were devoted not to education but to theology. That phrase, he thought, showed a great want of knowledge of the history of Voluntary Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] It ought to be remembered that the Voluntary Schools were alone, for a long period, doing the work of education for the people of this country, while other countries were working at State education. [AN HON. MEMBER: Why?] Because the State was neglecting its duty. Apart from history, however, without the Voluntary Schools they would have to find room for 2½ million scholars, and what an expense in buildings, capital, and income that would entail. He believed that the best expenditure we could make was on education, but the chief danger with the ratepayers to-day was lest there should be a reaction against education owing to its cost. The worst blow, therefore, that they could strike at educational progress would be to cast such a burden on the ratepayers as would be involved in dispensing with Voluntary Schools, or in allowing them to die. Moreover, the great portion of the nation demanded these schools. He did not think that dogmatic theology was in any sense the best training for children, but they could not shut their eyes to the fact that a vast number of people thought that no education was complete unless it was based upon religion. Voluntary Schools were therefore necessary. He wished equally that the Board Schools should be maintained in efficiency; he knew their great value, at any rate in our large towns, and the worst thing they could do for education would be to limit in any way their operations. He was in favour of largely increasing the resources of the Board Schools rather than limiting them. He believed that in education equality was equity, and the best way of maintaining the Board School system in the ultimate interest of the Voluntary Schools themselves was by equality of treatment. He thought the Church had most to fear in the end from a departure from the compromise of 1870. The Solicitor General had said that one object of this Bill was to redress the inequality between the Voluntary and Board Schools, and he pointed out that £40,000 a year might be expended on Board Schools. But this Bill proposed to give £650,000 a year to the Voluntary Schools, and, therefore, so far from redressing the inequality, it created a new inequality. [Opposition cheers.] He regretted that they were not dealing with both classes of schools at the same time on equal lines; and if it were yet possible to do so, he believed that would be the best mode of complying with the wishes of the country. He thought it was a matter of profound regret to many of them that this differential treatment should have been entered upon when a permanent settlement might have been arrived at. He could not help noticing in some of the speeches which had been delivered, and in the Resolution, a strong tendency towards the very dangerous doctrine of differential treatment. The right hon. Member for Bodmin had spoken of poor districts in Cornwall, and there were similar lands in Yorkshire which would receive no aid, while other districts round about would receive considerable aid. They might regret the fact, even if it were necessary, that, whereas Manchester would get very large sums, the equally poor schools languishing in the densely crowded districts of our metropolis would receive comparatively small aid. London would receive much less than Manchester, and towns and districts which paid their own rates would have to contribute through their taxes to the maintenance of the Voluntary Schools in other parts. ["Hear, hear!"] These and other differences of treatment would render this Bill difficult of operation. He thought that a voluntary association would have great difficulty in deciding the difference of grant between different schools, and that there would be very considerable dissension in consequence. The better course would have been to deal simultaneously with both classes of schools. The Voluntary Schools required help, and it should be given them upon conditions, the primary one being the representation of parents upon the management—[Opposition cheers]—and that would also have been to choose the line of least resistance. They must remember that if the schools had not to pay the rates the ratepayers would have to make up the difference; and that seemed to him to establish an additional claim to their supervision of the work done by the schools. He did not see that it was at all necessary that the control of the grant should be with the Education Department, for what they wanted in dealing with the details of education was local knowledge and sympathy. He was certain that the great want in our education was sympathy at home with the education of the children. He had represented the opinion of his constituents in this matter. His constituency had discussed this question, and the majority of the clergymen there had determined that, in the interests of the Church and education, it would be wise to have some representation of the parents on the management of the schools. In such a case there was no need for two Bills; the condition was not an objectionable one, and a Measure embodying it might have passed rapidly, and even before the termination of the present financial year. One could not but regret that education was again thrown into the cauldron of theological and political disputation. Instead of all parties recognising the vast necessity which existed for supporting and improving our forms of education, instead of realising that it was our great want at present that we had not that education which would fit us for competition with other nations, we were having bitter discussions, with the ultimate result that no adequate grant was forthcoming this year either for Voluntary or necessitous Board Schools. In this matter simultaneity and spontaneity would have been principles well worthy on application by the Treasury Bench.

Mr. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) did not believe a greater surprise was ever sprung on the House of Commons than when the First Lord of the Treasury, replying to a question yesterday, announced that the grant in aid of Voluntary Schools would not take effect during the present financial year. Nobody in the country or in the House had, before that reply, received the faintest hint that such was the intention of the Government, and up to the present hour the Treasury Bench had not deigned to offer the slightest atom of explanation of the grounds on which they had departed from a policy which had been accepted as settled by the whole of the country during the whole of the autumn and winter. Why were they asked to come here a month earlier than usual if this Bill was not to be passed before the end of the financial year? No one could say a justification was to be found in the programme of the Government, for no Government, particularly one with such a majority as the present, ever commenced a Session with so meagre a programme. He accused the Government of a breach of pledge, for they distinctly said, when the Bill of last year was dropped, that the money was earmarked, and was lying in the Exchequer for the Voluntary Schools, and would not be devoted to the reduction of the National Debt. Speaking, in the course of the Budget speech, of the Education Bill of last year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said there was a surplus of £433,000, out of which he proposed to provide for any charge that would be placed on the Exchequer by that Bill, and, the right hon. Gentleman added, after that charge was defrayed, a modest surplus would remain. They were now told by the First Lord of the Treasury that the calculation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that if the Bill of last year had passed, only £100,000 would have come to the Voluntary Schools. [The Chancellor of the Exchequer: "£120,000."] He could not understand why the sum was so small. They were told the Bill would not have come into operation until the 1st of January of this year, but if that were so the solicitude of the Government for the Voluntary Schools contrasted very unfavourably with their solicitude for the agriculturists of the country. It was all very fine for the Government to say they had raised the grant from 4s. to 5s. Yes, but last year everybody was a friend of the Voluntary Schools, and even many Members on the Opposition side of the House declared that 4s. was absolutely inadequate. It was mean and shabby to the Voluntary Schools to deprive them of the £120,000 which the Government gave a distinct pledge was earmarked for them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I do not think the hon. Gentleman really understands the situation. Under our Bill of last year it was proposed, and we should have adhered to the proposal, to give 4s. per head to the children in Voluntary Schools. That would have involved a payment of one-quarter of that sum in the current year and 4s. in the year 1897-98, or 5s. per head in all. That is precisely the sum we propose to give under this Bill, only it will all be paid in 1897-98 instead of a quarter in 1896-97 and the rest in 1897-98.

MR. DILLON said he did not believe that if the Bill of last year had been passed it would have been possible for the Government to have stood by the 4s. grant, for not a single supporter of the Government supported the 4s. grant. Their view of the present Bill must be altogether in view of the declarations of the Government. If the Bill had been a short Bill intended to give the Voluntary Schools in the present financial year the money they lost by the withdrawal of last year's Bill, it would have been passed, he believed, in a very few days. The Government, however, had introduced a Measure which must be regarded as their Education Bill for the year, because, although they spoke vaguely of introducing another Bill in the course of the Session for the purpose of giving grants to necessitous Board Schools, anyone who had listened to the language used yesterday by the First Lord of the Treasury, or who read his remarks in The Times to-day, would be forced to the conclusion that this Bill was the Government Education Bill for the Session. There was not a shadow of a chance of the Bill slipping rapidly through all its stages, because by divorcing the grant to Voluntary Schools from that to necessitous Board Schools, the opposition to the Measure had been enormously increased. In his opinion the fate of the Bill had been seriously endangered by the policy and conduct of the Government. It would be idle for the friends of the Voluntary Schools—and he spoke as a friend of them—to shut their eyes to the serious issues which had been raised by the new departure of the Government. The Bill had to be considered, not from the point of view of a temporary Measure, but from the point of view of a permanent Measure, of a Measure giving a grant of £600,000 to the Voluntary Schools for ever, and giving it without any satisfactory pledge that a corresponding grant would be offered to the necessitous Board Schools. That, he believed, would be a disastrous position in which to place the Voluntary Schools. As to the merits of the Bill itself, he would say, without hesitation, speaking on behalf of the Catholic Schools, that it was a great improvement on the Bill of last year, because it offered those schools a grant of 1s. a head more than the previous Measure. As far as they could understand the explanation of the First Lord of the Treasury, the result of the Government proposal would be to give to the really poor schools—and all Catholic Schools were poor schools—something more than 5s. a head, probably an average of 6s. The abolition of the 17s. 6d. limit was an advantage, but he regretted that the Government had not proposed to abolish the provision against unnecessary schools, a provision which was odious to Catholics at any rate. Still, the Bill offered considerable advantages, and so far as it affected Catholic Schools it would receive no opposition from him and those around him. At the same time, they could not forget that the case of the Catholic Schools was unfortunately tied up with that of the Protestant Church Schools, and no doubt the Bill as it stood would inflict grave injustice on large districts in the country—giving grants to one district and not to another, to parishes which needed no help; and to others, which sorely needed help, none at all. [" Hear, hear! "] No one could deny that the Nonconformists suffered from grievances in the country districts, but the Nonconformists would be the first to admit that the claims of the Catholic Schools in no way touched those grievances. The present Bill, however, made no pretence to remove those grievances, and he contended that if the object of the Measure was to secure just treatment for the Voluntary Schools as a whole, the wise policy would have been to insert something in the Bill which would have disarmed opposition and have given a quid pro quo to the Nonconformists. The Catholic leaders and the Catholic people in this country had been in favour of dealing with this question in a broad and generous spirit, and of removing grievances wherever they existed. But this Bill set up fresh grievances, and therefore it was not calculated to remedy existing injustice. Nevertheless, he should support the Bill. [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] Indeed, he was bound to do so, in consideration of the increased grant it gave to the Catholic Schools—to those poor schools which were only maintained by armies of collectors, who gathered, Sunday after Sunday, the pence of the poor for the purpose. At the same time he regarded the policy of the Government, from the point of view of the Voluntary Schools generally, as very unsatisfactory and dangerous to the best interests of those schools. What was the history of the question? Just before the General Election of 1895—on the eve of the fall of the late Government—Lord Salisbury, speaking, he thought, in London, and also The Times in a leading article commenting on his Lordship's speech, gave advice to the friends of the Voluntary Schools not to place all their reliance upon a grant from the Imperial Exchequer. On the contrary, they were advised to look to the rates, and both Lord Salisbury and The Times said it was the first duty of the friends of the Voluntary Schools to come to an agreement among themselves. But others held the view that there could be no final settlement of the question unless the necessitous Board Schools were dealt with at the same time as Voluntary Schools. The subject was discussed by the country, the Election came on, and hon. Members opposite went to the country, and to a man pledged themselves to endeavour to make it the first business of the Government to do justice to the Voluntary Schools. The Party came back with a majority of 150, but on this question, with the support of the Irish Members, they had a majority of 320. How did they redeem their pledge? The whole question between State aid and rate aid, and the inequality between the two sets of schools, was debated at length in the country, and a remarkable meeting took place at the Church House. At that meeting, acting on the advice of The Times and of Lord Salisbury given 18 months before, the representatives of the two archdioceses of this country came to an almost unanimous Resolution, based on what appeared to him to be a just and reasonable proposal for a final settlement of this question, that there should be a grant from the Imperial Exchequer all round, to Board and Voluntary Schools alike, and that in School Board districts Voluntary Schools should be allowed a proportion of the rates. What was the answer after the Church had come round to the Catholic programme, and had adopted the advice of Lord Salisbury? The Times stated that the proposal was preposterous, and could not be seriously made. Only that day he laid side by side those two articles from The Times—the one written in June, 1895, and the other in November last—and it was almost impossible to imagine that so much audacity could exist even in The Times. He looked forward to the future both of this Bill and of the Voluntary Schools with the greatest possible alarm. He intervened in the Debate of last year and pointed out that in his judgment this whole Question was one of friendly negotiation and compromise, and he believed so still. He believed the question would never be settled on any permanent basis until the two opposite parties in that House and in the country entered into friendly negotiation and conference. He believed that the evil which had pursued the Government in their policy of last year and in their policy of this year was that they had brought in a Measure, not of compromise, and resting on what he might describe as give and take, but had sought to pursue a policy of "knifing" their opponents, and of doing injustice. When the Bill of last year was withdrawn on the 23rd of June last, the Leader of the Oppositon made a most remarkable offer of which no notice was taken at the time except to receive it with jeers and contempt. It appeared to him that if that offer had been properly treated it offered a basis of settlement much better, he feared, than the Voluntary Schools would get under the present Bill. The Leader of the Opposition said:—

> "If the Government would now reconsider this matter and would be content to confine this new authority to secondary education, where I dare say it might be highly useful and advantageous if they would give the advantages to Voluntary Schools, which, subject to reasonable conditions we are willing to grant, then they might pass, with the general consent of the House of Commons, and with the approval of the country, an Education Bill which would be useful and permanent."

That was one of the things about which he (Mr. Dillon) was most concerned—that it should be permanent. And, though the "reasonable conditions" of the Leader of the Opposition might have been a matter for difference of opinion, still he was convinced that an arrangement could be arrived at—at least, speaking for the Catholics he knew it could be, because they had never been afraid to trust the parents of the children and public authorities to a very great extent, and give them reasonable control. That offer of the Leader of the Opposition was commented upon in the following language by The Daily Chronicle of the following morning—and he took The Daily Chronicle because he knew it to be one of the most extreme opponents of the Education Bill of last year, and of this year also:—

> "Sir William Harcourt last night offered a compromise with the purport of which we heartily agree, and which Sir John Gorst did not seem entirely disposed to reject."

The Vice-President of the Council had now disappeared from the scene.

> "Let the anti-School Board part of the Bill be obliterated. Let the Government confine themselves to a simple plan of relief for the Voluntary Schools, by rate aid if they so please, accompanied by adequate popular control."

What did their friend The Times say? It spoke then the language of the irreconcilable Members on the Opposition side of the House:—

> "We have never dreamed of suggesting that the vital provisions of the Bill should be exercised while those of less importance should be retained."

It should be remembered that the vital provisions of the Bill were those provided for the purpose of destroying the School Board system, and those of less importance were those giving relief to Voluntary Schools.

> "This is, however, the substance of the 'terms of peace' which Sir William Harcourt offered, with an insulting affectation of seriousness, in the course of his speech on Professor Stuart's Amendment."

The Government had taken Sir William Harcourt's advice too late and insufficiently. They had brought in a Bill in a new, and, to him, a more acceptable shape, but in a shape for another reason likely to give rise to a most furious and, he was afraid, a prolonged opposition. He desired to say one word on the question of popular control. The hon. Member for the Cambridge University (Mr. Jebb) in the speech to which they all listened with intense pleasure, laid down the principle that they had no right—and they had no right—to penalise and to fine children because their parents sent them to schools where dogmatic religion was taught. Until they devised a system under which a child who went to a school where dogmatic religion was taught had equal advantages from the public funds with a child who went to a school where there was no denominational teaching, they could never settle this question. The Catholics, at all events, recognised that one of the essential conditions of such a plan—and it would ultimately have to be devised—was that there should be a system of popular control extended over the schools as was consistent with the preservation of dogmatic teaching. Of course it stood to reason that you could not ask, without self-contradiction and becoming absurd, religious schools to accept control that might take away their religious character; but short of that the Catholics of this country were prepared to accept popular control. He could bring forward many proofs of this from statements of the Bishops and the Cardinal. On May 16, 1896, there was an article in the Tablet, supposed to be the organ of Cardinal Vaughan, and mouthpiece of his views, and certainly was not Nationalist. In that article occurred the following passage:—

> "As far as the Opposition is concerned, Mr. Balfour is absolutely master of the situation. Why then is he content to apply what he deliberately admits is an inadequate remedy, when all the while it is in his power to be just to the uttermost farthing? . . The official representatives of the Church of England are afraid to trust the people; they dread the rates because they fear the interference of the ratepayers. It is an odd situation. The Church, which calls itself national, is afraid of the local authorities, while the religious body which is the most unpopular in the land is ready to trust them, and believe they would deal justice to all."

All they asked for was justice and equality. They offered every reasonable control to ratepayers, and if he were asked to-morrow what suggestion he would offer for a settlement of the question, he would say the suggestion put forward and adopted at the Church meeting, on the resolution that increased grants should be made all round to Board and Voluntary Schools, coupled with the warning that in those Board School districts where School Boards would not treat Voluntary Schools fairly, the grants might be withheld. There had been threats that, if Voluntary Schools were allowed to participate in the rates, there were certain men who would go to prison rather than pay the rates; but that he thought unfair and absurd. Suppose Catholics and others had refused payment of rates in that way, where would Board Schools be? It would be perfectly competent for the Government to introduce a Bill which would offer to every School Board in the country grants in aid exactly equal to all schools on this condition, that if a School Board in any district would not give fair play to Voluntary Schools by allowing a maintenance grant equal to that allowed to Board Schools, then the Government grant might be withheld from that district. His conviction was that if this matter were left in the hands of School Boards that the Boards and the managers of Voluntary Schools would pull together more peaceably than many people imagined. The Bill as it stood would have the support of his vote, not without foreboding as to its fate and to its effect if it passed into law. He did not believe the policy of the Government was wise as regarded Voluntary Schools, and he believed it would be injurious to the future of those schools. Last year, when the Government came to the House with an unbroken majority, with a mandate from the country, and high enthusiasm in favour of Voluntary Schools, they could have settled this question on a firm, just, and lasting basis, but they threw away their opportunity then, and he feared they would throw away their opportunity now.

Sir JOHN KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton) recognised that the hon. Member represented the Catholic portion of the community, whose sacrifices on behalf of education were well known, and he was glad to hear the hon. Gentleman announce his intention of voting for the Bill in the belief that it would confer large benefits on those he represented. The hon. Gentleman had boasted very largely of the readiness of Roman Catholics to submit to ratepayers' control; but he would like to ask the hon. Gentleman whether he would allow ratepayers a voice in the selection of teachers? ["Hear, hear!"] And also if he thought that ratepayers generally would consider any control adequate which did not give them a voice in the selection of teachers? ["Hear, hear!"] Passing from that, he thought the policy of the Government, as explained in the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury, made two things very clear. One was that the Government were fully prepared to carry out the pledges made by their supporters on the hustings to maintain Voluntary Schools, and also that there was no wish on their part to upset the settlement of 1870 on which our educational policy was based. There was a fear last Session in the minds of many on both sides of the House, fostered by some things in the Bill, and various speeches made outside the House, and it was much to have the assurance from his right hon. Friend, given on the previous night. It was not fair to say that while the attack on School Boards last year was open this year it was covert. He did not think there was ground for saying that he saw no possibility of an attack on School Boards under the Bill, and he should have thought this fact would have gone far to remove opposition to the Measure. These two facts enabled him to give his hearty support to the Bill, and he had hoped that after statements made over and over again by hon. Members opposite, a simple Measure to give relief to Voluntary Schools would have had their support, and that both Parties might have co-operated for this end, and that with a moderate amount of discussion the Bill would have become law. As regards the Unionist Party, he believed they were steeped to the eyes in pledges to support Voluntary Schools, and to do their utmost to remove a strain upon those schools well nigh unbearable. To the promises made, the present position of the Party in the House was largely due. The people of England felt very strongly in regard to Voluntary Schools, and the importance of religious education for their children, and preferred the personal religious instruction Voluntary Schools offered. All interested in education had admitted again and again that variety of management was desirable, and that healthy competition between Board and Voluntary Schools advanced the cause of education, whilst there was also the fear, which was present to them, of the large charge, amounting to millions, that must be cast upon the rates and upon education if the Voluntary Schools were wiped out of existence. That being the opinion strongly held on that side of the House he did not see how they could recede from the position they had taken up and decline to afford that substantial measure of aid to Voluntary Schools which was proposed to be given under the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] It was proposed that the assistance should be given in a discriminating manner so that those who needed it might have help, and those who did not should not have it. He would ask the House could the Government have done less than they had done after all they had said in view of the great urgency of the case and of the greatness of the need at the present time? Right hon. Gentlemen opposite had spoken of the injustice that was to be done to the Board Schools. Where was the injustice that was involved in the matter? Was it unfair to give additional State aid to the Voluntary Schools under the present circumstances? No doubt, at first under the settlement it was intended that there should be exact equality between the schools in this matter. But if ever there was equality it had practically ceased by the enormous increase of the expenditure involved in education, and equality had ceased in this way: the Board Schools had rates to draw upon to an unlimited extent, whereas the Voluntary Schools had no increased facilities to draw upon to meet their increased expenditure. Something was necessary to be done to redress this balance of inequality which had been growing and increasing so much. Perhaps the rate might be delightful in theory, but there were two obstacles in the way. One was the Nonconformist conscience, which would not tolerate paying the rates for the maintenance of denominational schools, and also the Ratepayers' Association which had put its foot down so firmly to resist any further charges upon the rates. Therefore, if additional aid was to be given to redress the inequality which at present existed they could only fall back upon an additional grant from the State. He quite admitted the hardship of the poor Board Schools, but with them it was not a question of existence, it was a question of efficiency. With the Voluntary Schools, on the contrary, it was a question of existence. The Board Schools could afford to wait a short time till the pledges of the Government could be fulfilled. This demand on behalf of rich and powerful communities that they should have more from the State in aid of the Board Schools than they now received was to him a new idea to a large extent. It had often been urged in that Debate as if the Board Schools received nothing at the present time from the State except the large grants given from the Exchequer. As regarded the poor and necessitous Board Schools he hoped it would be recognised that the Government were in earnest when they introduced the question last year before which time very little was heard on the subject. He trusted the friends of such schools would be satisfied with these promises, and would wait a reasonable time till their demands could be fairly met. He could only state it was his hearty intention to support this Measure. The question of the existence of Voluntary Schools had become a burning one, and whatever might be done in that House he believed the Government in their honest attempt to give that relief to Voluntary Schools which they so greatly needed would have the cordial and generous support of the country.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar), congratulated the Government on the fact that the right hon. Baronet on this occasion was able to give them his support, though he was bound to say he was not able to agree with him in the reasons he gave for according that support. He understood the argument of the right hon. Baronet was that the compromise of 1870 would not be affected by the Bill, that the educational position would not be materially altered and that, therefore, this Bill ought to pass the House of Commons. Their position on that side of the House was this: In the first place they did not in the least know what the Government were going to do in regard to their further instalment in education. All they did know was they were going to vote £600,000 to Voluntary Schools. They did not know whether the proposals of the Government in regard to the Board Schools would involve the sum of £50,000 under Section 97 of the old Act or whether it was really going to be substantially an equivalent grant to the Board Schools in the future. Until they were certain they were going to receive justice as between the different classes of schools in this matter they were not able to swallow this Bill without comment and without opposition. He was bound to say the speech of the Solicitor General made them feel that as regarded the Board Schools the further Bill which the Government had been promising would be, as far as they were concerned, totally inadequate to meet the case. The Solicitor General and the right hon. Gentleman who had last spoken, talked of the poorer School Board districts and necessitous Board Schools. But he, for one, considered there were large towns where the rates were very heavy for educational purposes, such as London, Birmingham, and elsewhere, which were quite as much in need and deserved as much consideration as some of the poorer School Board districts, and unless these towns were dealt with on terms of equality and justice they should certainly not be satisfied with the proposals of the Government. The Bill of last year was supported chiefly on three grounds. In the first place it was stated that the Department was over-worked, and therefore there ought to be a considerable amount of decentralisation. Under the proposal of the Government, as they understood it, the work of the Department would not be diminished by one iota, while all the difficulties of distinguishing between rural and urban schools, and dealing with the new association schools would be cast on the shoulders of an already over-burdened Department. The second reason was, that rural Voluntary Schools and the smaller Board Schools were in such a state of inefficiency that they required levelling up to a better standard. As regarded this Bill, the smaller Board Schools got nothing, and the rural districts less than the urban. The chief argument in support of the Bill was that the burden of Voluntary Schools had become so intolerable that they must give them substantial relief. The Bill did not relieve those upon whom the greatest strain existed—who had to pay high rates. This Debate and that of last year, showed that there was no hostility on the Liberal Benches towards Voluntary Schools. Whatever they might have thought on that side of the House years ago, they all now admitted that the Voluntary system was a necessary portion of our great educational system and ought to be properly supported. It gave variety and some advantages that, at all events on the lowest ground—that of cost—it was agreed that the extinction of the Voluntary Schools was out of the question. They also agreed that some Voluntary Schools were in a destitute condition and required more assistance than other schools in other parts of the Kingdom. Last year the Government defined Voluntary Schools as belonging to three classes. The first class consisted of necessitous schools where the rates and subscriptions were high. But under this Bill the rates would not be diminished, and the subscriptions, though high, would not be reduced in larger proportion than elsewhere. The second class of necessitous schools were those which were small and in rural districts, where the cost of management was out of proportion to the income of the school. As regards these, they were told that they would receive a lower grant than schools in urban districts which required it less. In the third place, they were told that Roman Catholic schools were among the most necessitous. He believed everyone wanted to give generous treatment to Roman Catholic schools, which had a special interest in the denominational question, and were unquestionably among the poorest schools. While admitting that Voluntary Schools deserved support, and that there was a considerable number of necessitous Voluntary Schools, he contested the argument that the Voluntary Schools, as a whole, required exceptional treatment, and should receive separate and larger grants which were not equally extended to Board Schools. As the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton had pointed out, the Voluntary Schools were not diminishing in numbers or attendance, but increasing. In London, where the strain upon them was greatest because the subscriptions were larger and the School Board rate heavier than in any other town in the Kingdom, instead of diminishing the Voluntary Schools were increasing, and instead of being squeezed out were in a stronger position than they ever were before in the history of education. While there were 400,000 children in the Board Schools in London, the number in the Voluntary Schools was larger by many thousands, and had increased by some thousands during the past year. As regarded the financial position of the Voluntary Schools, taking the Church of England Schools altogether, while the burden of subscriptions had only increased in the last 15 years by £40,000, they were receiving a grant of no less than £640,000 a year and educating 430,000 children a year. Neither as regarded the strain upon them nor their financial position was a separate grant to Voluntary Schools justified without giving an equivalent grant to Board Schools. It had been pointed out how unequal the proposal of the Government would work in regard to the grant. While in London £70,000 would be received less than schools in Lancashire, Londoners paid in rates for education £2,250,000 a year, against the small sum paid by those who received a larger amount. The only guarantee there had been for some years against the disappearance of subscriptions had been the so-called 17s. 6d. limit, and though he agreed that that particular system had great evils, and, in some cases, caused great hardship, at the same time it was the one guarantee that the large amount of annual subscriptions—£840,000—should not disappear. Therefore the Opposition would certainly scrutinise the Bill very carefully to see whether there was any real guarantee that the amount proposed to be given to Voluntary Schools would really go towards increased efficiency in these schools, and in no sense towards a diminution of subscriptions. He would ask the Government, if the plan was that the subscriptions should go on and that the extra assistance should all go to increase the efficiency of education in Voluntary Schools, what became of the cry of the intolerable strain? The old cry was against a high rate and heavy subscriptions; but if nothing was to be done to reduce the subscriptions, what was to become of the cry of the intolerable strain? Taking the proposal as a whole, the Opposition could not help opposing it, because it seemed unjust as between the different forms and classes of schools, because it settled nothing and unsettled everything, and would do a great deal to destroy and diminish education by putting Board Schools in an inferior position to Voluntary Schools, and by raising, in an aggravated form, all those denominational and theological questions which have for so many years delayed the progress of education in this country.

MR. LUCAS-SHADWELL (Hastings) thought there been an unnecessary amount of criticism of the Measure from Members on the Ministerial side of the House, and he would not follow the example that had been set in that respect. He did not regard this proposal as in any way a final settlement of the Education Question. He regarded it as an instalment, and he hoped it was an earnest of benefits yet to come. After the experience of last Session, he was not surprised that the Government had not seen their way to introduce a comprehensive Measure instead of dealing with the Voluntary Schools alone. He had been somewhat surprised to learn the enthusiasm aroused by the School Board system in some hon. Members on his side of the House. He had no desire to attack School Boards, but he could not feel any enthusiasm for the system. He believed it was in many ways a bad system, and that School Boards had gone in for a great deal of unnecessary extravagance, and he believed they would have been more injurious to the education of the country had it not been that Conservative Churchmen had made it their duty to take an active part in School Board work. He looked upon the present Bill as an improvement on the Bill of last year, inasmuch as it gave 1s. more to the Voluntary Schools, and he believed the managers would be grateful for it. He was glad to see also that under the Bill there would be great inducements to Voluntary Schools to associate. The abolition of the 17s. 6d. limit would, he thought, be a great benefit. It had undoubtedly acted hitherto as a great discouragement to deserving schools, and was contrary to the principle of payment by results. He was also glad to know that school buildings were to be exempted from rates. There was, no doubt, much to be said in favour of the relief of necessitous Board Schools, and the Government had promised at a later date to introduce a Measure for that purpose; but Board Schools were in a very different position from Voluntary Schools, as they could go to the ratepayers for money whenever they wanted it. The Church Schools in this country had done a great work, and he believed that this Bill would greatly encourage their managers and enable them to keep the schools going.

*Mr. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL (Fife, W.) said that, coming as he did from a country where there were universal School Boards, tempered only by the "Shorter Catechism"—a document for which he should feel bound to express more respect than he really entertained, were it not for the undoubted historical fact that it was an article of foreign importation, having stamped upon it the odious words, "Made in England"—he approached this thorny question in a more open state of mind, and was able to detect, perhaps, a certain amount of humbug on both sides. He was very much struck by a remark made by the hon. Member for Wigan, that a great number of children in that part of the country daily attended Church Schools, and nevertheless on Sunday went to a Nonconformist Sunday School.

Sir FRANCIS POWELL: My remark did not apply only to Wigan, but was general, and applied to the whole country.

*Mr. BIRRELL said the comment he made on that observation, now known to be true of all parts of the country—[laughter]—was this—what a slipshod, unscientific, invertebrate, and, he would add, undenominational kind of religious education must that be which, given on five or six days of the week in these Church Schools all over England, yet left the children perfectly free on the Sunday, without any mental discomfort, without any moral queasyness, without certainly any painful dislocation of faith, to leave this sacramental atmosphere of the Church School and go on Sunday to some Baptist or Congregational place of instruction. [Laughter.] He believed that to be absolutely true—[cheers]—and it proved that this so-called religious difficulty did not exist, and that this miserable attempt to divide the children of this country into two hostile camps scowling at each other for the love of God was a perfect sham and an imposture. [Cheers.] The fact was that, with the exception of the Roman Catholics and the Jews, the great bulk of the people who sent their children to these schools, so far as they thought at all upon religious questions, thought alike, and very rarely entered into the domain of controversial theology. He had known himself a great number of children who had been taught in excellent Elementary Church Schools and who yet remained—dear little things—as ignorant of the Pauline theology as even the right hon. Member for London University would wish them to be. [Laughter.] He doubted very much whether of the Members of the House, all of whom had had a secondary education, there were three who could write an essay of as many pages on, say, the doctrine of the Trinity without falling on one side or the other into the most horrible heresy, which in better ages or happier days they must have expiated with their lives. [Laughter.] The fact was these things were not taught by religious teachers of any sense in any school. The present Archbishop of Canterbury once kept a school, a place of secondary education, but on denominational lines. He preached in the college chapel sermons which powerfully influenced for good the minds of the young fellows who listened to him. He had published a selection of these sermons under the title "Rugby Sermons," and he (Mr. Birrell) defied any Member of the House, simply from a perusal of these sermons, to gain any notion whatever as to what the Archbishop of Canterbury—he did not say now, but then—thought on these doctrinal points which separated Churches. This was not because he was without a dogmatic creed, but because he was a schoolmaster who knew his business. ["Hear, hear!"] The House ought, without difficulty and without much distinction of party, to have simply one object in view in all these educational questions, and that was to see that the secular education of the children of this country was carried on in well-built sanitary schools, supplied by well-trained and, therefore, well-paid and independent teachers—["hear, hear!"]—who were equipped with all the necessary tools of their most distinguished science. No parent obviously should be compelled by law to send his child to an ill-built, ill-taught, or ill-equipped school. ["Hear, hear!"] But when there was a choice between two schools, each of which satisfied these tests, it seemed to him pedantic tyranny to prevent a parent from choosing which of the two he would send his child to, or to punish him in any way for that choice. The only persons at present aggrieved in this respect were the Nonconformists in the 8,000 parishes in which there were none but Church Schools. Churchmen had recognised this grievance but had not suggested any way by which it should be remedied. It was said truly that some Voluntary Schools were very hard put to it to carry on their work, and that they could only keep their heads above water by mendicancy, and by sending round the hat with a vehemence which was hardly consistent with their Christian character. The stress upon the Voluntary Schools was a stress put upon them by the Education Department, and the schools in the poor School Board districts suffered from precisely the same disease. The only difference between the two cases was that the Voluntary Schools could not find the money because their friends were not well enough off to supply it, whilst the Board Schools could not find the money because the rates did not provide it. To talk as the Solicitor General had done about the "bottomless purse of the ratepayer" was a form of playful extravagance which he might, having regard to the gravity of the rest of the speech, have denied himself. [Laughter.] Why did one kind of school poverty call for immediate relief more than the other? As a lover of education he did not wish to see the schools of the country starved or stinted. He was one of those extraordinary people who thought that enough money was not spent on either Board Schools or Voluntary Schools. Far too little money was spent on the preservation of the mind of the nation. The breed of the nation was no doubt equally important, but he did not see what that House was to do to improve that. [Laughter.] It was a saying of the greatest man who ever held a seat in that House—Francis Bacon—that the mind and breed of the nation were the only two things that intelligent politicians should concern themselves with. Under our present system, though there was hardship in both cases, the poor School Board district suffered most. In a poor School Board district the wretched parent was rated up to the eyes for an inefficient education, whilst in a purely voluntary district the parent paid no rate, nor did he as a rule contribute at all to the support of the school, being content to leave that operation to the religious zeal or political partisanship of his betters. Therefore, the stress upon the poor really fell with greater heaviness in a poor School Board district than in a district where there were only Voluntary Schools. The Bill of the Government he approached with somewhat the same feeling of astonishment as he was constantly in during the discussions on the Measure of last Session. Honestly, he could not make out what Ministers were at. He would have thought that, given a popular Tory Minister who was a sound Churchman, when in England at all events—[laughter]—and given a large Tory majority, the first thing Ministers would have done would have been so to buttress and fortress the Voluntary Schools as to place them upon a financial basis which would have made them perfectly independent for all time, and that, having made them safe, he would have left the School Board system alone, a system which, though only 25 years old, was deeply rooted in the respect and esteem of the community, and have done nothing to raise the faintest suspicion of unfairness of treatment. The Bill, however, that was introduced last year wounded the pride of the School Boards and did not fill the pockets of the Voluntary Schools. It had, therefore, comparatively few friends and died ignominiously by the roadside. Now that the Bill was dead he noticed that there was an inclination in some quarters to say something in commendation of it, and he should follow that example. Although it was a bad and ill-conceived Bill, it contained evidence that the persons who constructed it had in view a very great object, and many of its clauses, if they could have been taken by themselves, would have conferred great educational benefits upon the country. But this Bill was, in the language of Shakespeare, "the baby of a girl," a poor, puny, mean thing, and he doubted whether it would receive Christian baptism at the hands of any clergyman of the Church of England, though, having regard to its fragility, he should be sorry if that ceremony should be postponed indefinitely. [Laughter.] No one had supported the Bill who had not admitted that, taken by itself, and if it were to stand alone, it was an unfair and therefore an unjust Bill. Everybody had said that it must be supplemented, and that another Bill must be brought in to remedy the injustice, to destroy the inequality which this Bill created. [Cheers.] The Leader of the House in reply to this criticism was civil; he put his hands to his ears and said:—

> "If you would only hold your tongues, and not discuss it over and over again; if you would only be content to say a thing once and never repeat it"

—[Ministerial cheers and laughter]—the Government would slip this Measure and proceed to bring in another. But what impression would be made on the Treasury Bench if they only made an observation once? [Laughter.] It was only by saying a thing over and over again that they made the faintest impression upon the Government, and he had often heard an argument succeed on its fiftieth repetition which failed to excite remark on its first utterance. [Laughter.] He thought that any minority was entitled, however small it might be, and however mean might be the intellectual calibre of its members, to protest against having the odium and the shame of an unjust Bill thrown upon them if their exposure of it delays the introduction of another Bill which would set this evil right. Who established and endowed the inequality? Why, the Government. They it was who created the injustice, and then said, "If you only take it quietly we will, at our leisure and in our own good time, introduce another Measure and so make it all right." Now that March 31 had no longer any Parliamentary meaning for them he could not understand why the Government did not do what they admitted to be just in one Bill. The Government should remember that not one of their supporters had defended the Bill as a "financial entity"; they had only granted to it a somewhat dubious support on the ground that it was to be followed by another Bill on an uncertain day. Hon. Gentlemen might trust their leaders, but their leaders could not expect that the Opposition should place the same confidence in them. He was surprised to hear the Solicitor General speak with so much emotion about the remark of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton as to the possible action of the House of Lords when the Board Schools Bill came to be considered. The Solicitor General, surely, was not entitled to say what might happen in another place. They knew that worms turned, and even peers might revolt—[laughter]—and there was nothing to prevent the Lords from taking the bit in their teeth and throwing out such a Measure. He was also surprised that the supporters of the Voluntary Schools should be so satisfied as they were with this miserable dole. He thought that the Bill was not only unjust, but inadequate for the purpose which it had in view; and, though they did not know what provisions were being made in the Bill to maintain the subscriptions, they knew that the 17s. 6d. limit, which was some security for their continuance, had been removed. It might, therefore, turn out that what the schools gained in public money would be lost in private subscriptions; and in that case the intolerable strain which existed would still continue to press upon them. He wondered, therefore, that some hon. Members opposite did not raise their voices in favour of such a treatment of Voluntary Schools as would render them independent and able to carry out the great work entrusted to them in a satisfactory manner. So far as the Resolution was concerned, he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman was unable to take the advice to alter the words of his Resolution so as to enable this question to be fairly and properly discussed. The Members of the Opposition should not be asked to go into a Debate with their hands tied behind their backs, and possibly with their tongues restricted by the interposition of the Chair. [Cheers.]

Mr. Birrell.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) moved as an Amendment to the Resolution, in Sub-section (a), line 3, before the word "Voluntary" to insert the word "necessitous." The hon. Member, who spoke amid a babel of noise, said the only ground upon which the Government put forward their proposal was that Voluntary Schools were suffering from an intolerable strain, and that to maintain them in efficiency it was absolutely necessary there should be a grant in aid of them. But there were certain Voluntary Schools in respect of which it could not be said that they were suffering from any such intolerable strain, but were, on the contrary, in no need of aid, and even the Government and their supporters admitted that would be the case. He proposed, therefore, that the Resolution should be confined absolutely to necessitous schools. In the interests of absolute equality between the two systems it ought to be so confined.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said it was perfectly true the Government meant to confine as far as they could the grant of this money to necessitous schools, and when the Bill was in the hands of Members it would be seen that the best machinery had been provided to carry out that purpose. If the word "necessitous" were introduced before "Voluntary Schools" the result would be not merely to confine the aid grant to necessitous schools, but to diminish the total amount of the grant given to Voluntary Schools generally. The Government could not assent to that, and were unable therefore to accept the Amendment.

MR. LOUGH supported the Amendment. He desired, he said, to approach the question from a non-Party spirit. The great defect of the proposal of the Government was this—that instead of trying to deal with the obvious evils of our educational system, they had raised the whole question of national education in a most violent form. His hon. Friend, in moving his Amendment, aimed at touching one of the obvious evils in the educational system. There were extremely necessitous Voluntary Schools all over the country, such, for instance, as the Catholic Schools mentioned by the hon. Member for East Mayo. The acceptance of the Amendment would ensure what would otherwise not be secured, that some substantial relief should reach these schools. Every one of those Catholic Schools which existed in 1870 was still maintained, though the proportion of scholars who could pay any fee whatever was only one-fourth of that in other Denominational Schools.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: The hon. Member is not addressing himself to the Amendment. There may be reasons why the Amendment should be accepted, but the hon. Gentleman is not dealing with the Amendment at all. He is urging no reason why it should be accepted in place of the original Motion.

MR. LOUGH said his argument was that the chance of relief for these schools was damaged by the proposals of the Government being so large. Last year the assistance to the Voluntary Schools was defeated by the Bill being too comprehensive; and the same danger now presented itself. The First Lord of the Treasury said that the Association of Voluntary Schools which were to be formed would enable the necessitous cases to be dealt with. But he could not see what common bond there would be between the schools forming the Association. Why should the representatives of one school be anxious for a larger grant to another and more necessitous school if their own grant was thereby diminished? There was no guarantee for discrimination.

MR. H. H. ASQUITH (Fife, E.), who was received with loud cheers, said: I regret the impatience with which in some quarters of the House this Amendment has been received. In the view of a great number of us on this side it is a matter of very real and substantial importance. [Cheers.] What is the proposal my hon. Friend has made? It is that the grants to be provided by Parliament should be confined to necessitous Voluntary Schools. [Cheers.] I listened with respect to the short and somewhat contemptuous observations made by the First Lord of the Treasury—[cries of "No, no!" and "Hear, hear!"]—in reply to that proposal. The question I wish to put—and it deserves a serious answer on the part of the Government—is this, Is this grant you are now asking us to vote out of the public money, to be given to Voluntary Schools which do not come within the category of necessitous schools? I gather from what the First Lord of the Treasury has said that the answer would be in the negative.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Yes.

MR. ASQUITH: Very well; that forms at least a basis for the Amendment. If the grant is only to be given to necessitous Voluntary Schools—because, admittedly, Voluntary Schools not necessitous, need no aid from the ratepayers—why should we not insert words in the Amendment confining the purpose and scope of the Vote to the class of schools which it is conceded are alone to be benefited? ["Hear, hear!"] I can see a reason why the Government should reject this Amendment. It is this—if we limit the grant about to be made to payments to necessitous Voluntary Schools, then 5s. per head would only have to be paid for the children attending such schools. But the proposal of the Governmen is that, although relief is to be given only to necessitous schools, yet the sum to be distributed is to be calculated at 5s. per child in all Voluntary Schools, necessitous or not. In other words, the 5s. per head is not a true—I do not like to use invidious terms—but a false and fraudulent description. [Cheers.] You are to take the whole number of the children educated in all Voluntary Schools of the country, whether these schools are necessitous or not, and then, giving your dole to the necessitous schools alone, you, of course, embrace a far smaller number of children than if the dole applied to all Voluntary Schools, and you are not in that case giving 5s., but 6s., 7s., or even 10s. per child. [Cheers and counter-cheers.] I see that that proposition receives assent on the Treasury Bench. [Ministerial cheers.] Then why have you not the courage to put it in your Resolution? [Cheers.] This is not a grant—and it is not intended to be a grant—of 5s. per head of the children in the schools which are proposed to be relieved by the grant. It is a grant intended to be measured by the whole number of children in Voluntary Schools, necessitous or not, but the benefit of which is to be received alone by those schools which are necessitous. ["Hear, hear!"] If that be so, what we are asked now to appropriate out of the taxpayers' money is not 5s., but some indefinite number of shillings above 5s. for each child in the necessitous Voluntary Schools. [Opposition cheers and cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Benches.] The discussion has not been useless, having elucidated that point. I ask one more question. Are you going to give 5s. per head to necessitous School Boards based, not upon the number of children educated in these schools alone, but upon the number of all the children attending the Board Schools? These are questions to which we are entitled to have, not a contemptuous brushing aside, but an explicit, categorical, and unmistakable answer before the Committee divides on this Amendment. [Cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY, who was loudly cheered, said: The right hon. Gentleman has asked me two questions. One of them, it seems to me, he is rather late in the day in asking. [Laughter.] The other is rather premature. [Cheers.] The question the right hon. Gentleman has asked in regard to Voluntary Schools surely could have been answered by any Gentleman who took the trouble to listen to my statement yesterday, or to the subsequent speeches which were delivered from this Bench. [Cheers.] The needs of the Voluntary Schools vary between comparatively wide limits. Some Voluntary Schools need nothing; some need a small subvention; some need 5s., an average grant; some need considerably more. The sum we allocate to be divided into these various amounts among the Voluntary Schools is calculated upon the rate stated in the Resolution before the Committee. If we were to accept the Amendment the result would be to diminish that amount by a very large sum, and we do not mean to diminish it. [Cheers.] For that reason we cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman. With regard to the second question put by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, whether we were going to adopt the same principle in regard to Board Schools—I would remind him that one of the reasons why we have not introduced into this Bill any question dealing with Board Schools is that, from the very nature of the case, similar provisions cannot be applied. ["Hear, hear!" and Opposition cries of "Oh!"] The need may be equal; I do not confess that; I do not dispute it; I do not deal with it one way or the other; but the machinery by which that need is to be met must, from the very necessities of the case, be a different machinery. It is absurd of the right hon. Gentleman to ask me whether the machinery is to be applied in the same way, and when hon. Gentlemen will consent to allow us to have this Bill, and when we are in a position to introduce the Bill dealing with Board Schools, then I shall be able to explain, I am sure to their satisfaction, why it is that a machinery applicable to the one case is not equally applicable to the other. [Cheers.]

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, we are not here upon a question of machinery. [Cheers.] We are here on a question of principle, for you are dealing with public money. [Cheers.] We are on a financial Resolution. You have told us now that you are going to ask for a grant of £600,000, not for the purposes which are stated in the Resolution, but for a different purpose. [Ministerial cries of "No!" and Opposition cheers.] You are going to deal with this money, not for all Voluntary Schools; but I must say the ingenuity with which this Resolution has been framed is such as to make it impossible almost to get at the real intention of the Government upon the matter. If we understand the explanation given by the First Lord of the Treasury, it is that you are to take 5s. a head from schools that do not want it for the purpose of using that money for schools which are alleged to want it. [Cheers.] A more tortuous, a more indirect, and, in my opinion, a more improper—[cries of "Oh!"]—manner of taking £600,000 I never knew. But the searching question is the second question of my right hon. Friend. When he asks whether this principle is to be applied to the Board Schools of the country, what answer does the right hon. Gentleman give? It is perfectly easy for him to say whether he will follow the same principle, but he evades the question. [Cheers.] There must be different machinery, yes, but you may have different machinery for arriving at the same end. Do you mean to arrive at the same end? We have had an endeavour to support this grant to Voluntary Schools by great promise of what is going to be done for the Board Schools. Promises have been held out in order to induce hon. Members on the other side of the House who do not feel very comfortable—[laughter]—to support your Bill. The policy of the Government has been to say to them, "Open your mouths and shut your eyes and then you will see what the Board Schools will get." But I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen opposite are ready, not to open their mouths, but to shut their eyes, which is more important in regard to this matter. On this side of the House we are not disposed to shut our eyes in this matter—[Ministerial laughter]—and we shall endeavour to open the eyes of other people. [Cheers.] I daresay the right hon. Gentleman is about to shut our mouths—[laughter]—we know that their favourite system is—[Cries of "Order!"]

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that there is a specific Amendment now before the Committee.

*Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am trying to ask, Sir, whether the principle of this Amendment is about to be applied not only to the Voluntary Schools but to the Board Schools. That is a very practical matter—whether £600,000, or thereabouts, is to be given to the Board Schools as well as to the Voluntary Schools. The greater part of this Debate has turned upon demands made from every side of the House that equal justice should be done to the Board Schools as to the Voluntary Schools, and the Government had held out this expectation as an inducement to us to proceed with these resolutions. Surely, therefore, it is necessary to ascertain how far that inducement which has been held out by the Government is an inducement which ought to lead people to support this Bill. I gather from the answer of the right hon. Gentleman that the Government have no intention whatever of dealing with the Board Schools upon the same principle that they have applied to the Voluntary Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] It was of great importance we should ascertain that, and I think that the Amendment of my hon. Friend has been of the greatest value, because it has detected what are the real intentions of the Government in this matter. We may form our own opinions as to what are the views and intentions of the Government in dealing with the Bill which we are told we are to have, some day or other, on the subject of Board Schools. It is our duty to ascertain before we pass this Bill for the Voluntary Schools what the principles are upon which the other Bill is to be dealt with. I have my own opinion as to what will become of that Bill as soon as the Government have got the Voluntary Schools Bill; but, however, that is a matter which we shall have an opportunity later on of discussing. I should like very much to state my reasons for a very profound scepticism as to the future of that Bill, but that is a matter which does not arise. [Ministerial cheers.] Yes, but the Amendment has been a very good test, a very good method of forecasting the fortunes of that Bill, and I think the answer the First Lord of the Treasury has given is such as will satisfy us as to what the real intentions of the Government are in dealing with the Board Schools. [Opposition cheers.]

Question put, "That the word 'necessitous' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 112; Noes, 320.

The announcement of the figures was received with Ministerial cheers.

(Division List—No. 12—appended.)

AYES.

Abraham, William (Rhondda)
Acland, Rt. Hon. A. H. Dyke
Allan, William (Gateshead)
Allen, Wm. (Newc. under Lyme)
Asquith, Rt. Hn. Herbert Henry
Atherley-Jones, L.
Austin, Sir John (Yorkshire)
Bainbridge, Emerson
Baker, Sir John
Barlow, John Emmott
Bayley, Thomas (Derbyshire)
Beaumont, Wentworth C. B.
Birrell, Augustine
Bolton, Thomas Dolling
Brigg, John
Broadhurst, Henry
Bryce, Rt. Hon. James
Buchanan, Thomas Ryburn
Burt, Thomas
Buxton, Sydney Charles
Caldwell, James
Causton, Richard Knight
Channing, Francis Allston
Clark, Dr. G. B. (Caithness-sh.)
Colville, John
Dalziel, James Henry
Davies, M. Vaughan- (Cardigan)
Davies, W. Rees- (Pembrokesh.)
Dilke, Rt. Hon. Sir Charles
Doughty, George
Dunn, Sir William
Ellis, John Edward (Notts.)
Ellis, Thos. Edw. (Merionethsh.)
Evans, Samuel T. (Glamorgan)
Evans, Sir Francis H. (South'ton)
Farquharson, Dr. Robert
Fenwick, Charles
Ferguson, R. C. Munro (Leith)
Foster, Sir Walter (Derby Co.)
Fowler, Rt. Hn. Sir H. (Wol'tn)
Gladstone, Rt. Hn. Herbert John
Goddard, Daniel Ford
Gold, Charles
Griffith, Ellis J.
Haldane, Richard Burdon
Harcourt, Rt. Hon. Sir William
Harrison, Charles
Hayne, Rt. Hon. Charles Seale-
Hazell, Walter
Humphreys-Owen, Arthur C.
Hutton, Alfred E. (Morley)
Joicey, Sir James
Jones, David Brynmor (Swansea)
Jones, William (Carnarvonshire)
Kearley, Hudson E.
Kinloch, Sir John G. Smyth
Labouchere, Henry
Lambert, George
Lawson, Sir Wilfrid (Cumb'land)
Leese, Sir Joseph F. (Accr'gton)
Leng, Sir John
Lockwood, Sir Frank (York)
Logan, John William
Luttrell, Hugh Fownes
M'Arthur, William
M'Kenna, Reginald
M'Laren, Charles Benjamin
M'Leod, John
Mappin, Sir Frederick Thorpe
Montagu, Sir S. (Whitechapel)
Morgan, J. Lloyd (Carmarthen)
Morley, Charles (Breconshire)
Morley, Rt. Hn. John (Montrose)
Mundella, Rt. Hn. Anthony John
Nussey, Thomas Willans
Oldroyd, Mark
Paulton, James Mellor
Pease, Joseph A. (Northumb.)
Pease, Sir Joseph W. (Durham)
Perks, Robert William
Pickersgill, Edward Hare
Pirie, Captain Duncan Vernon
Priestley, Briggs (Yorks.)
Provand, Andrew Dryburgh
Randell, David
Rickett, J. Compton
Roberts, John Bryn (Eifion)
Roberts, John H. (Denbighs.)
Robson, William Snowdon
Schwann, Charles E.
Shaw, Thomas (Hawick B.)
Souttar, Robinson
Spicer, Albert
Stanhope, Hon. Philip J.
Stevenson, Francis S.
Strachey, Edward
Tennant, Harold John
Thomas, Abel (Carmarthen, E.)
Thomas, Alfred (Glamorgan, E.)
Wallace, Robert (Perth)
Walton, John Lawson
Wayman, Thomas
Wedderburn, Sir William
Whittaker, Thomas Palmer
Williams, John Carvell (Notts.)
Wilson, Frederick W. (Norfolk)
Wilson, Henry J. (York, W.R.)
Wilson, John (Durham, Mid.)
Wilson, John (Govan)
Woodall, William
Woodhouse, Sir J. T. (Hud'rsf'ld)
Yoxall, James Henry

TELLERS FOR THE AYES, Mr. Lloyd-George and Mr. Lough.

NOES.

Abraham, William (Cork, N.E.)
Aird, John
Allhusen, Augustus Henry Eden
Ambrose, William (Middlesex)
Arnold, Alfred
Arnold-Forster, Hugh O.
Arrol, Sir William
Atkinson, Rt. Hon. John
Baden-Powell, Sir Geo. Smyth
Bagot, Capt. Josceline FitzRoy
Bailey, James (Walworth)
Baillie, James E. B. (Inverness)
Baird, John George Alexander
Balcarres, Lord
Balfour, Rt. Hon. A. J. (Manch'r)
Balfour, Gerald William (Leeds)
Banbury, Frederick George
Barnes, Frederic Gorell
Bartley, George C. T.
Bass, Hamar
Bathurst, Hon. Allen Benjamin
Beach, Rt. Hon. Sir M. H. (Bristol)
Beach, W. W. Bramston (Hants)
Beckett, Ernest William
Begg, Ferdinand Faithful
Bemrose, Henry Howe
Bentinck, Lord Henry C.
Bethell, Commander
Bhownaggree, M. M.
Bigwood, James
Bill, Charles
Blundell, Colonel Henry
Bond, Edward
Bonsor, Henry Cosmo Orme
Boscawen, Arthur Griffith-
Bousfield, William Robert
Bowles, Capt. H. F. (Middlesex)
Bowles, T. Gibson (King's Lynn)
Brassey, Albert
Brodrick, Rt. Hon. St. John
Brookfield, A. Montagu
Bucknill, Thomas Townsend
Butcher, John George
Carew, James Laurence
Cavendish, R. F. (N. Lancs.)
Cavendish, V. C. W. (Derbyshire)
Cecil, Lord Hugh
Chaloner, Captain R. G. W.
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. J. (Birm.)
Chamberlain, J. Austen (Worc'r)
Chaplin, Rt. Hon. Henry
Charrington, Spencer
Chelsea, Viscount
Clare, Octavius Leigh

Clarke, Sir Edward (Plymouth)
Cochrane, Hon. Thos. H. A. E.
Coddington, Sir William
Coghill, Douglas Harry
Cohen, Benjamin Louis
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse
Compton, Lord Alwyne (Beds.)
Condon, Thomas Joseph
Cook, Fred. Lucas (Lambeth)
Cooke, C. W. Radcliffe (Heref'd)
Cox, Robert
Cranborne, Viscount
Crean, Eugene
Cripps, Charles Alfred
Cross, Alexander (Glasgow)
Cross, Herb. Shepherd (Bolton)
Curran, Thomas B. (Donegal)
Curzon, Rt. Hn. G. N. (Lanc. S. W.)
Curzon, Viscount (Bucks.)
Dalbiac, Major Philip Hugh
Dalrymple, Sir Charles
Daly, James
Dane, Richard M.
Davenport, W. Bromley-
Denny, Colonel
Digby, John K. D. Wingfield-
Dillon, John
Dixon-Hartland, Sir Fred. Dixon
Donelan, Captain A.
Donkin, Richard Sim
Doogan, P. C.
Dorington, Sir John Edward
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Douglas-Pennant, Hon. E. S.
Drage, Geoffrey
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Dyke, Rt. Hon. Sir William Hart
Edwards, Gen. Sir James Bevan
Egerton, Hon. A. de Tatton
Engledew, Charles John
Fardell, Thomas George
Farquhar, Sir Horace
Farrell, James P. (Cavan W.)
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Fergusson, Rt. Hn. Sir J. (Mancr.)
Field, Admiral (Eastbourne)
Fielden, Thomas
Finch, George H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Fisher, William Hayes
Fitz Wygram, General Sir F.
Flannery, Fortescue
Fletcher, Sir Henry
Flower, Ernest
Flynn, James Christopher
Folkestone, Viscount
Forster, Henry William
Foster, Colonel (Lancaster)
Foster, Harry S. (Suffolk)
Fowler, Matthew (Durham)
Galloway, William Johnson
Garfit, William
Gedge, Sydney
Gibbs, Hn. A. G. H. (City of Lond.)
Gibbs, Hon. Vicary (St. Albans)
Gilhooly, James
Gilliat, John Saunders
Goldsworthy, Major-General
Gordon, John Edward
Gorst, Rt. Hon. Sir John Eldon
Goschen, Rt. Hn. G. J. (St. G'rg's)
Goschen, George J. (Sussex)
Goulding, Edward Alfred
Graham, Henry Robert
Gray, Ernest (West Ham)
Green, Walford D. (Wednesb'ry)
Greene, W. Raymond- (Cambs.)
Gretton, John
Gull, Sir Cameron
Gunter, Colonel
Halsey, Thomas Frederick
Hamilton, Rt. Hon. Lord Geo.
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robert Wm.
Hanson, Sir Reginald
Hardy, Laurence
Hare, Thomas Leigh
Heath, James
Helder, Augustus
Hermon-Hodge, Robert Trotter
Hickman, Sir Alfred
Hill, Rt. Hn. Lord Arthur (Down)
Hill, Rt. Hn. A. Staveley (Staffs.)
Hoare, Edw. Brodie (Hampstead)
Hoare, Samuel (Norwich)
Hobhouse, Henry
Hogan, James Francis
Holland, Hon. Lionel Raleigh
Hornby, William Henry
Houldsworth, Sir Wm. Henry
Howard, Joseph
Howell, William Tudor
Howorth, Sir Henry Hoyle
Hubbard, Hon. Evelyn
Hudson, George Bickersteth
Hughes, Colonel Edwin
Hunt, Sir Frederick Seager
Isaacson, Frederick Wootton
Jebb, Richard Claverhouse
Jeffreys, Arthur Frederick
Jessel, Captain Herbert Merton
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Johnstone, John H. (Sussex)
Kemp, George
Kennaway, Rt. Hon. Sir John H.
Kenny, William
Kenrick, William
Kenyon, James
Kenyon-Slaney, Col. William
Kilbride, Denis
King, Sir Henry Seymour
Knowles, Lees
Knox, Edmund Francis Vesey
Lafone, Alfred
Laurie, Lieut.-General
Lawrence, Edwin (Cornwall)
Lawrence, Wm. F. (Liverpool)
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks.)
Lecky, William Edward H.
Lees, Elliott (Birkenhead)
Llewelyn, Sir Dillwyn- (Swans'a)
Lockwood, Lt.-Col. A. R. (Essex)
Loder, Gerald Walter Erskine
Long, Col. Chas. W. (Evesham)
Long, Rt. Hn. Walter (Liverpool)
Lorne, Marquess of
Lowles, John
Loyd, Archie Kirkman
Lubbock, Rt. Hon. Sir John
Lucas-Shadwell, William
Lyttelton, Hon. Alfred
MacAleese, Daniel
Macartney, W. G. Ellison
Macdona, John Cumming
Maclure, John William
MacNeill, John Gordon Swift
McCalmont, Maj.-Gn. (Ant'm, N)
McDermott, Patrick
M'Hugh, E. (Armagh, S.)
M'Hugh, Patrick A. (Leitrim
McKillop, James
Malcolm, Ian
Marks, Henry Hananel
Martin, Richard Biddulph
Massey-Mainwaring, Hn. W. F.
Mellor, Colonel (Lancashire)
Melville, Beresford Valentine
Meysey-Thompson, Sir H. M.
Milbank, Powlett Charles John
Milner, Sir Frederick George
Milward, Colonel Victor
Monckton, Edward Philip
Monk, Charles James
Montagu, Hon. J. Scott (Hants.)
Moon, Edward Robert Pacy
More, Robert Jasper
Murdoch, Charles Townshend
Murray, Rt. Hn. A. Graham (Bute)
Murray, Charles J. (Coventry)
Murray, Col. Wyndham (Bath)
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Northcote, Hon. Sir H. Stafford
O'Brien, James F. X. (Cork)
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
O'Brien, P. J. (Tipperary)
O'Connor, Arthur (Donegal)
O'Connor, T. P. (Liverpool)
O'Kelly, James
O'Malley, William
Orr-Ewing, Charles Lindsay
Parkes, Ebenezer
Parnell, John Howard
Pease, Arthur (Darlington)
Pender, James
Penn, John
Phillpotts, Captain Arthur
Pierpoint, Robert
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Plunkett, Hon. Horace Curzon
Pollock, Harry Frederick
Powell, Sir Francis Sharp
Power, Patrick Joseph
Pretyman, Capt. Ernest George
Pryce-Jones, Edward
Purvis, Robert
Pym, C. Guy
Rankin, James
Rasch, Major Frederic Carne
Rentoul, James Alexander
Richards, Henry Charles
Ridley, Rt. Hon. Sir Matthew W.
Ritchie, Rt. Hon. Chas. Thomson
Robinson, Brooke
Roche, Hon. James (East Kerry)
Roche, John (East Galway)
Rollit, Albert Kaye
Round, James
Russell, Col. F. S. (Cheltenham)
Russell, Sir George (Berkshire)
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Rutherford, John
Samuel, Harry S. (Limehouse)
Saunderson, Col. Edw. James
Savory, Sir Joseph
Scoble, Sir Andrew Richard
Seely, Charles Hilton
Seton-Karr, Henry
Sharpe, William Edward T.
Sidebotham, J. W. (Cheshire)
Sidebottom, William (Derbysh.)

Simeon, Sir Barrington
Skewes-Cox, Thomas
Smith, Abel (Herts)
Smith, Abel H. (Christchurch)
Smith, Hon. W. F. D. (Strand)
Spencer, Ernest
Stanley, Lord (Lancs.)
Stanley, Edw. Jas. (Somerset)
Stanley, Henry M. (Lambeth)
Stephens, Henry Charles
Stewart, Sir Mark J. M'Taggart
Stock, James Henry
Strauss, Arthur
Strutt, Hon. Charles Hedley
Sturt, Hon. Humphry Napier
Sullivan, Donal (Westmeath)
Talbot, Lord E. (Chichester)
Talbot, John G. (Oxford Univ.)
Taylor, Francis
Thorburn, Walter
Thornton, Percy M.
Tomlinson, Wm. Edw. Murray
Tritton, Charles Ernest
Verney, Hon. Richard Greville
Vincent, Col. Sir C. E. Howard
Warde, Lt.-Col. C. E. (Kent)
Waring, Col. Thomas
Warr, Augustus Frederick
Webster, R. G. (St. Pancras)
Webster, Sir R. E. (Isle of Wight)
Welby, Lieut.-Col. A. C. E.
Wharton, John Lloyd
Whiteley, H. (Ashton-under-L.)
Whitmore, Charles Algernon
Williams, Col. R. (Dorset)
Williams, Joseph Powell- (Birm.)
Willoughby de Eresby, Lord
Willox, John Archibald
Wilson, John (Falkirk)
Wilson, J. W. (Worc'shire, N.)
Wilson-Todd, Wm. H. (Yorks.)
Wodehouse, Edmond R. (Bath)
Wolff, Gustav Wilhelm
Wortley, Rt. Hon. C. B. Stuart-
Wyndham-Quin, Major W. H.
Wyvill, Marmaduke D'Arcy
Younger, William

TELLERS FOR THE NOES, Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

Main Question again proposed:—

And, it being after Midnight, and Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Chairman proceeded to interrupt the Business:

Whereupon THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS proceeded to put the Question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Mr. Chairman, may I direct your attention to the fact that the Closure cannot be moved according to the 25th Standing Order?

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: The hon. Member is labouring under a mistake. I am putting the main Question. No Closure has yet been moved.

MR. MACNEILL: Then I object to the main Question—it is after Twelve o'clock.

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: If the hon. Member objects, then it is open to move the Closure.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I move that the Question be now put.

MR. MACNEILL: I object to that.

The House having been cleared for a Division,

MR. MACNEILL, seated, with his hat on: Will you now, Mr. Lowther, hear me on a Point of Order? I object to this Motion, and I submit, Sir, with great respect, that the Motion for Closure cannot now be put, in accordance with rules after 12 o'clock. ["Oh, oh!" "Order, order!"] May I simply say this to show how this occurs? ["Order, order!"] First, the Motion on which a Division was taken was a subsidiary Motion and not part and parcel of the whole Motion, in reference to the transaction before the Committee, it was merely an Amendment. That being so, if, on that Amendment there had been a Motion for the Closure and if that had been carried and the Amendment disposed of it would have been competent for The First Lord of the Treasury to propose the Motion on the whole Question. But when he made his Motion, the Question had not been proposed. [Interruptions and cries of "Order!"] I submit, Sir, that it is utterly impossible in accordance with the rules for any Chairman to invalidate the rules in reference to the Closure, and put the Closure in the midst of the transaction. [Cries of "Order!"] And, Sir, if you will forgive me, it is scarcely within the province of a Chairman to suggest the Closure himself. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" "Order!" and "Hear, hear!"]

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: The process is not so elaborate as the hon. Member seems to think it is. If he will look at Rule I. he will observe that the Closure may be moved "on the interruption of business." It was moved on the interruption of business—[cries of "No, no!" "Hear, hear!" and "Order!"]—the interruption of business took place when the hon. Member objected to my putting the Question. ["Hear, hear!"] That was the interruption of business, and thereupon the Closure was moved according to Rule I. ["Hear, hear!"] The Question is, That the Question be now put.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

The House divided: — Ayes, 296; Noes, 142.—(Division List—No. 13—appended.)

AYES.

Aird, John
Allhusen, Augustus Henry Eden
Ambrose, William (Middlesex)
Arnold, Alfred
Arnold-Forster, Hugh O.
Arrol, Sir William
Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Ellis
Atkinson, Rt. Hon. John
Baden-Powell, Sir Geo. Smyth
Bagot, Capt. Joceline FitzRoy
Bailey, James (Walworth)
Baillie, James E. B. (Inverness)
Baird, John George Alexander
Balcarres, Lord
Balfour, Rt. Hon. A. J. (Manch'r)
Balfour, Gerald William (Leeds)
Banbury, Frederick George
Barnes, Frederic Gorell
Bartley, George C. T.
Bass, Hamar
Bathurst, Hon. Allen Benjamin
Beach, Rt. Hon. Sir M. H. (Bristol)
Beach, W. W. Bramston (Hants.)
Beckett, Ernest William
Begg, Ferdinand Faithful
Bemrose, Henry Howe
Bentinck, Lord Henry C.
Bethell, Commander
Bhownaggree, M. M.
Bigwood, James
Bill, Charles
Blundell, Colonel Henry
Bond, Edward
Bonsor, Henry Cosmo Orme
Boscawen, Arthur Griffith
Bousfield, William Robert
Bowles, Capt. H. F. (Middlesex)
Bowles, T. Gibson (King's Lynn)
Brassey, Albert
Brodrick, Rt. Hon. St. John
Brookfield, A. Montagu
Bucknill, Thomas Townsend
Butcher, John George
Carew, James Laurence
Cavendish, R. F. (N. Lancs.)
Cavendish, V. C. W. (Derbyshire)
Cecil, Lord Hugh
Chaloner, Captain R. G. W.
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. J. (Birm.)
Chamberlain, J. Austen (Worc'r)
Chaplin, Rt. Hon. Henry
Charrington, Spencer
Chelsea, Viscount
Clare, Octavius Leigh
Clarke, Sir Edward (Plymouth)
Cochrane, Hon. Thos. H. A. E.
Coddington, Sir William
Coghill, Douglas Harry
Cohen, Benjamin Louis
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse
Compton, Lord Alwyne (Beds)
Cook, Fred. Lucas (Lambeth)
Cooke, C. W. Radcliffe (Heref'd)
Cox, Robert
Cranborne, Viscount
Cripps, Charles Alfred
Cross, Alexander (Glasgow)
Cross, Herb. Shepherd (Bolton)
Curran, Thomas B. (Donegal)
Curzon, Rt. Hn. G. N. (Lanc. S. W.)
Curzon, Viscount (Bucks.)
Dalbiac, Major Philip Hugh
Dalrymple, Sir Charles
Dane, Richard M.
Davenport, W. Bromley-
Denny, Colonel
Digby, John K. D. Wingfield-
Dixon-Hartland, Sir Fred. Dixon
Donkin, Richard Sim
Dorington, Sir John Edward
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Douglas-Pennant, Hon. Edw. S.
Drage, Geoffrey
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Dyke, Rt. Hon. Sir William Hart
Edwards, Gen. Sir James B.
Egerton, Hon. A. de Tatton
Engledow, Charles John
Fardell, Thomas George
Farquhar, Sir Horace
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Fergusson, Rt. Hn. Sir J. (Man'cr)
Field, Admiral (Eastbourne)
Fielden, Thomas
Finch, George H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Fisher, William Hayes
Fitz Wygram, General Sir F.
Flannery, Fortescue
Fletcher, Sir Henry
Flower, Ernest
Folkestone, Viscount
Forster, Henry William
Foster, Colonel (Lancaster)
Foster, Harry S. (Suffolk)
Fowler, Matthew (Durham)
Galloway, William Johnson
Garfit, William
Gedge, Sydney
Gibbs, Hn. A. G. H. (City of Lond.)
Gibbs, Hon. Vicary (St. Albans)
Gilliat, John Saunders
Goldsworthy, Major-General
Gordon, John Edward
Gorst, Rt. Hon. Sir John Eldon
Goschen, Rt. Hon. G. J. (St. G'rg's)
Goschen, G. J. (Sussex)
Goulding, Edward Alfred
Graham, Henry Robert
Gray, Ernest (West Ham)
Green, Walford D. (Wednsbry)
Greene, W. Raymond- (Cambs)
Gretton, John
Gull, Sir Cameron
Gunter, Colonel
Halsey, Thomas Frederick
Hamilton, Rt. Hon. Lord Geo.
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robt. Wm.
Hanson, Sir Reginald
Hardy, Laurence
Hare, Thomas Leigh
Heath, James
Helder, Augustus
Hermon-Hodge, Robert Trotter
Hickman, Sir Alfred
Hill, Rt. Hn. Lord Arthur (Down)
Hill, Rt Hn. A. Staveley (Staffs.)
Hoare, Edw. Brodie (Hampstead)
Hoare, Samuel (Norwich)
Hobhouse, Henry
Holland, Hon. Lionel Raleigh
Hornby, William Henry
Houldsworth, Sir Wm. Henry
Howard, Joseph
Howell, William Tudor
Howorth, Sir Henry Hoyle
Hubbard. Hon. Evelyn
Hudson, George Bickersteth
Hughes, Colonel Edwin
Hunt, Sir Frederick Seager
Isaacson, Frederick Wootton
Jebb, Richard Claverhouse
Jeffreys, Arthur Frederick
Jessel, Captain Herbert Merton
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Johnstone, John H. (Sussex)
Kemp, George
Kennaway, Rt. Hn. Sir John H.
Kenny, William
Kenrick, William
Kenyon, James
Kenyon-Slaney, Col. William
King, Sir Henry Seymour
Knowles, Lees
Knox, Edmund Francis Vesey
Lafone, Alfred
Laurie, Lieut.-General
Lawrence, Edwin (Cornwall)
Lawrence, Wm. F. (Liverpool)
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks.)
Lecky, William Edward H.
Lees, Elliott (Birkenhead)
Llewelyn, Sir Dillwyn-(Sw'ns'a)
Lockwood, Lt.-Col. A. R. (Essex)
Loder, Gerald Walter Erskine
Long, Col. Charles W. (Evesham)
Long, Rt. Hn. Walter (Liverpool)
Lorne, Marquess of
Lowles, John.
Loyd, Archie Kirkman
Lubbock, Rt. Hon. Sir John
Lucas-Shadwell, William
Lyttelton, Hon. Alfred
Macartney, W. G. Ellison
Macdona, John Cumming
Maclure, John William
McCalmont, Maj.-Gen. (Ant'mN)
McKillop, James
Malcolm, Ian
Marks, Henry Hananel
Martin, Richard Biddulph
Massey-Mainwaring, Hon. W. F.
Mellor, Colonel (Lancashire)
Melville, Beresford Valentine
Meysey-Thompson, Sir H. M.

Milbank, Powlett Charles John
Milner, Sir Frederick George
Milward, Colonel Victor
Monckton, Edward Philip
Monk, Charles James
Montagu, Hon. J. Scott (Hants)
Moon, Edward Robert Pacy
More, Robert Jasper
Murdoch, Charles Townshend
Murray, Rt.Hn.A.Gr'h'm(Bute)
Murray, Charles J. (Coventry)
Murray, Col. Wyndham (Bath)
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Northcote, Hon. Sir H. Stafford
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
O'Connor, Arthur (Donegal)
O'Kelly, James
Orr-Ewing, Charles Lindsay
Parkes, Ebenezer
Parnell, John Howard
Pease, Arthur (Darlington)
Pender, James
Penn, John
Phillpotts, Captain Arthur
Pierpoint, Robert
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Plunkett, Hon. Horace Curzon
Pollock, Harry Frederick
Powell, Sir Francis Sharp
Pretyman, Captain Ernest G.
Pryce-Jones, Edward
Purvis, Robert
Pym, C. Guy
Rankin, James
Rasch, Major Frederic Carne
Rentoul, James Alexander
Richards, Henry Charles
Ridley, Rt. Hn. Sir Matthew W.
Ritchie, Rt. Hn. Chas. Thomson
Robinson, Brooke
Rollit, Sir Albert Kaye
Round, James
Russell, Col. F. S. (Cheltenham)
Russell, Sir George (Berkshire)
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Rutherford, John
Samuel, Harry S. (Limehouse)
Saunderson, Col. Edw. James
Savory, Sir Arthur Richard
Scoble, Sir Andrew Richard
Seely, Charles Hilton
Seton-Karr, Henry
Sharpe, William Edward T.
Sidebotham, J. W. (Cheshire)
Sidebottom, William (Derbysh)
Simeon, Sir Barrington
Skewes-Cox, Thomas
Smith, Abel (Herts)
Smith, Abel H. (Christchurch)
Smith, Hon. W. F. D. (Strand)
Spencer, Ernest
Stanley, Lord (Lancs)
Stanley, Edw. Jas. (Somerset)
Stanley, Henry M. (Lambeth)
Stephens, Henry Charles
Stewart, Sir Mark J. McTaggart
Stock, James Henry
Strauss, Arthur
Strutt, Hon. Charles Hedley
Sturt, Hon. Humphry Napier
Talbot, Lord E. (Chichester)
Talbot, John G. (Oxford Univ.)
Taylor, Francis
Thorburn, Walter
Thornton, Percy M.
Tomlinson, Wm. Edw. Murray
Tritton, Charles Ernest
Verney, Hon. Richard Greville
Vincent, Col. Sir C. E. Howard
Warde, Lt.-Col. C. E. (Kent)
Waring, Col. Thomas
Warr, Augustus Frederick
Webster, R. G. (St. Pancras)
Webster, Sir R. E. (Isle of Wight)
Welby, Lieut.-Col. A. C. E.
Wharton, John Lloyd
Whiteley, H. (Ashton-under-L.)
Whitmore, Charles Algernon
Williams, Colonel R. (Dorset)
Williams, Joseph Powell-(Birm.)
Willoughby de Eresby, Lord
Willox, John Archibald
Wilson, John (Falkirk)
Wilson, J. W. (Worc'sh. N.)
Wilson-Todd, Wm. H. (Yorks.)
Wodehouse, Edmond R. (Bath)
Wolff, Gustav Wilhelm
Wortley, Rt. Hon. C. B. Stuart-
Wyndham-Quin, Major W H.
Wyvill, Marmaduke d'Arcy
Younger, William

TELLERS FOR THE AYES, Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

NOES.

Abraham, William (Cork, N.E.)
Abraham, William (Rhondda)
Acland, Rt. Hon. A. H. Dyke
Allan, William (Gateshead)
Allen, Wm. (Newc. under Lyme)
Asquith, Rt. Hon. Herbert Henry
Atherley-Jones, L.
Austin, Sir John (Yorkshire)
Bainbridge, Emerson
Baker, Sir John
Barlow, John Emmott
Bayley, Thomas (Derbyshire)
Beaumont, Wentworth C. B.
Birrell, Augustine
Bolton, Thomas Dolling
Brigg, John
Broadhurst, Henry
Bryce, Rt. Hon. James
Buchanan, Thomas Ryburn
Burt, Thomas
Buxton, Sydney Charles
Caldwell, James
Causton, Richard Knight
Channing, Francis Allston
Clark, Dr. G. B. (Caithness-sh.)
Colville, John
Condon, Thomas Joseph
Crean, Eugene
Daly, James
Dalziel, James Henry
Davies, M. Vaughan-(Cardigan)
Davies, W. Rees-(Pembrokesh.)
Davitt, Michael
Dilke, Rt. Hon. Sir Charles
Dillon, John
Dixon, George
Donelan, Captain A.
Doogan, P.C.
Doughty, George
Dunn, Sir William
Ellis, John Edward (Notts)
Evans, Samuel T. (Glamorgan)
Evans, Sir Francis H. (South'ton)
Farquharson, Dr. Robert
Farrell, James P. (Cavan, W.)
Fenwick, Charles
Ferguson, R. C. Munro (Leith)
Flynn, James Christopher
Foster, Sir Walter (Derby Co.)
Fowler, Rt. Hn. Sir H. (Wol'h'tn)
Gilhooly, James
Gladstone, Rt. Hn. Herbert John
Goddard, Daniel Ford
Gold, Charles
Griffith, Ellis J.
Haldane, Richard Burdon
Harcourt, Rt. Hon. Sir William
Harrison, Charles
Hayne, Rt. Hon. Charles Seale-
Hazell, Walter
Hogan, James Francis
Humphreys-Owen, Arthur C.
Hutton, Alfred E. (Morley)
Joicey, Sir James
Jones, David Brynmor (Sw'nse')
Jones, William (C'rn'rvonshire)
Kearley, Hudson E.
Kilbride, Denis
Kinloch, Sir John Geo. Smyth
Labouchere, Henry
Lambert, George
Lawson, Sir Wilfrid (Cumb'lnd)
Leese, Sir Joseph F. (Accrington)
Leng, Sir John
Lloyd-George, David
Lockwood, Sir Frank (York)
Logan, John William
Lough, Thomas
Luttrell, Hugh Fownes
Macaleese, Daniel
MacNeill, John Gordon Swift
McDermott, Patrick
M'Hugh, E. (Armagh, S.)
M'Hugh, Patrick A. (Leitrim)
McKenna, Reginald
McLaren, Charles Benjamin B.
McLeod, John
Mappin, Sir Frederick Thorpe
Montagu, Sir S. (Whitechapel)
Morgan, J. Lloyd (Carmarthen)
Morley, Charles (Breconshire)
Morley, Rt. Hn. John (Montrose)
Mundella, Rt. Hn. Anthony John
Nussey, Thomas Willans
O'Brien, James F. X. (Cork)
O'Brien, P. J. (Tipperary)
O'Connor, T. P. (Liverpool)
Oldroyd, Mark
O'Malley, William
Paulton, James Mellor
Pease, Joseph A. (Northumb.)
Pease, Sir Joseph W. (Durham)
Perks, Robert William
Pickersgill, Edward Hare

Pirie, Captain Duncan Vernon
Power, Patrick Joseph
Priestley, Briggs (Yorks.)
Provand, Andrew Dryburgh
Randell, David
Rickett, J. Compton
Roberts, John Bryn (Eifion)
Roberts, John H. (Denbighs.)
Robson, William Snowdon
Roche, Hon. James (East Kerry)
Roche, John (East Galway)
Schwann, Charles E.
Scott, Charles Prestwich
Shaw, Thomas (Hawick B.)
Sheehy, David
Souttar, Robinson
Spicer, Albert
Stanhope, Hon. Philip J.
Stevenson, Francis S.
Strachey, Edward
Sullivan, Donal (Westmeath)
Tanner, Charles Kearns
Tennant, Harold John
Thomas, Abel (Carmarthen, E.)
Thomas, Alfred (Glamorgan, E.)
Wallace, Robert (Perth)
Walton, John Lawson
Wayman, Thomas
Wedderburn, Sir William
Whittaker, Thomas Palmer
Williams, John Carvell (Notts)
Wilson, Frederick W. (Norfolk)
Wilson, Henry J. (York, W.R.)
Wilson, John (Durham, Mid)
Wilson, John (Govan)
Woodall, William
Woodhouse, Sir J. T. (Hudd'rsf'ld)
Yoxall, James Henry

TELLERS FOR THE NOES, Mr. Thomas Ellis and Mr. McArthur

Main Question put accordingly. The Committee divided:—Ayes, 325; Noes, 110.

The announcement of the numbers was received with cheers.

(Division List, No. 14—(appended.)

AYES.

Abraham, William (Cork, N.E.)
Aird, John
Allan, William (Gateshead)
Allhusen, Augustus Henry Eden
Ambrose, William (Middlesex)
Arnold, Alfred
Arnold-Forster, Hugh O.
Arrol, Sir William
Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Ellis
Atkinson, Rt. Hon. John
Baden-Powell, Sir Geo. Smyth
Bagot, Capt. Josceline FitzRoy
Bailey, James (Walworth)
Baillie, James E. B. (Inverness)
Baird, John George Alexander
Balcarres, Lord
Balfour, Rt. Hon. A. J. (Manch'r)
Balfour, Gerald William (Leeds)
Banbury, Frederick George
Barnes, Frederic Gorell
Bartley, George C. T.
Bass, Hamar
Bathurst, Hon. Allen Benjamin
Beach, Rt. Hn. Sir M. H. (Bristol)
Beach, W. W. Bramston (Hants.)
Beckett, Ernest William
Begg, Ferdinand Faithful
Bemrose, Henry Howe
Bentinck Lord Henry C.
Bethell, Commander
Bhownaggree, M. M.
Bigwood, James
Bill, Charles
Blundell, Colonel Henry
Bond, Edward
Bonsor, Henry Cosmo Orme
Boscawen, Arthur Griffith-
Bousfield, William Robert
Bowles, Capt. H. F. (Middlesex)
Bowles, T. Gibson (King's Lynn)
Brassey, Albert
Brodrick, Rt. Hon. St. John
Brookfield, A. Montagu
Bucknill, Thomas Townsend
Butcher, John George
Carew, James Laurence
Cavendish, R. F. (N. Lancs.)
Cavendish, V. C. W. (Derbyshire)
Cecil, Lord Hugh
Chaloner, Captain R. G. W.
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. J. (Birm.)
Chamberlain, J. Austen (Worc'r.)
Chaplin, Rt. Hon. Henry
Charrington, Spencer
Chelsea, Viscount
Clare, Octavius Leigh
Clarke, Sir Edward (Plymouth)
Cochrane, Hon. Thos. H. A. E.
Coddington, Sir William
Coghill, Douglas Harry
Cohen, Benjamin Louis
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse
Compton, Lord Alwyne (Beds.)
Condon, Thomas Joseph
Cook, Fred. Lucas (Lambeth)
Cooke, C. W. Radcliffe (Heref'd)
Cox, Robert
Cranborne, Viscount
Crean, Eugene
Cripps, Charles Alfred
Cross, Alexander (Glasgow)
Cross, Herb. Shepherd (Bolton)
Curran, Thomas B. (Donegal)
Curzon, Rt. Hn. G. N. (Lanc. S. W.)
Curzon, Viscount (Bucks.)
Dalbiac, Major Philip Hugh
Dalrymple, Sir Charles
Daly, James
Dane Richard M.
Davenport, W. Bromley-
Davitt, Michael
Denny, Colonel
Digby, John K. D. Wingfield-
Dillon, John
Dixon-Hartland, Sir Fred. Dixon
Donelan Captain A.
Donkin, Richard Sim
Doogan, P. C.
Dorington, Sir John Edward
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Douglas-Pennant, Hon. E. S.
Drage, Geoffrey
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Dyke, Rt. Hn. Sir William Hart
Edwards, Gen. Sir James Bevan
Egerton, Hon. A. de Tatton
Engledow, Charles John
Fardell, Thomas George
Farquhar, Sir Horace
Farrell, James P. (Cavan, W.)
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Fergusson, Rt. Hn. Sir J. (Manc'r)
Field, Admiral (Eastbourne
Fielden, Thomas
Finch, George H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Fisher, William Hayes
Fitz Wygram, General Sir F.
Flannery, Fortescue
Fletcher, Sir Henry
Flower, Ernest
Flynn, James Christopher
Folkestone, Viscount
Forster, Henry William
Foster, Colonel (Lancaster)
Foster, Harry S. (Suffolk)
Fowler, Matthew (Durham)
Galloway, William Johnson
Garfit, William
Gedge, Sydney
Gibbs, Hn. A. G. H. (City of Lond.)
Gibbs, Hon. Vicary (St. Albans)
Gilhooly, James
Gilliat, John Saunders
Goldsworthy, Major-General
Gordon, John Edward
Gorst, Rt. Hon. Sir John Eldon
Goschen, Rt. Hn. G. J. (St. G'rg's)
Goschen, George J. (Sussex)
Goulding, Edward Alfred
Graham, Henry Robert
Gray, Ernest (West Ham)
Green, Walford D. (Wednesb'ry)
Greene, W. Raymond (Cambs.)
Gretton, John
Gull, Sir Cameron
Gunter, Colonel
Halsey, Thomas Frederick
Hamilton, Rt. Hon. Lord Geo.
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robert Wm.
Hanson, Sir Reginald
Hardy, Laurence
Hare, Thomas Leigh
Heath, James
Helder, Augustus
Hermon-Hodge, Robert Trotter
Hickman, Sir Alfred
Hill, Rt. Hn. Lord Arthur (Down)
Hill, Rt. Hn. A. Staveley (Staffs.)
Hoare, Edw. Brodie (Hampstead)

Hoare, Samuel (Norwich)
Hobhouse, Henry
Hogan, James Francis
Holland, Hon. Lionel Raleigh
Hornby, William Henry
Houldsworth, Sir Wm. Henry
Howard, Joseph
Howell, William Tudor
Howorth, Sir Henry Hoyle
Hubbard, Hon. Evelyn
Hudson, George Bickersteth
Hughes, Colonel Edwin
Hunt, Sir Frederick Seager
Isaacson, Frederick Wootton
Jebb, Richard Claverhouse
Jeffreys, Arthur Frederick
Jessel, Captain Herbert Merton
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Kemp, George
Kennaway, Rt. Hon. Sir John H.
Kenny, William
Kenrick, William
Kenyon, James
Kenyon-Slaney, Col. William
Kilbride, Denis
King, Sir Henry Seymour
Knowles, Lees
Knox, Edmund Francis Vesey
Lafone, Alfred
Laurie, Lieut.-General
Lawrence, Edwin (Cornwall)
Lawrence Wm. F. (Liverpool)
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks.)
Lecky, William Edward H.
Lees, Elliott (Birkenhead)
Llewelyn, Sir Dillwyn-(Swans'a)
Lockwood, Lt.-Col. A.R.(Essex)
Loder, Gerald Walter Erskine
Long, Col. Charles W.(Evesham)
Long, Rt. Hn. Walter(Liverpool)
Lorne, Marquess of
Lowles, John
Loyd, Archie Kirkman
Lubbock, Rt. Hon. Sir John
Lucas-Shadwell, William
Lyttelton, Hon. Alfred
Macaleese, Daniel
Macartney, W. G. Ellison
Macdona, John Cumming
Maclure, John William
MacNeill, John Gordon Swift
McCalmont, Maj.-Gn.(Ant'm, N)
McDermott, Patrick
M'Hugh, E. (Armagh, S.)
M'Hugh, Patrick A. (Leitrim)
McKillop, James
Malcolm, Ian
Marks, Henry Hananel
Martin, Richard Biddulph
Massey-Mainwaring, Hon. W.F.
Mellor, Colonel (Lancashire)
Melville, Beresford Valentine
Meysey-Thompson, Sir H. M.
Millbank, Powlett Charles John
Milner, Sir Frederick George
Milward, Colonel Victor
Monckton, Edward Philip
Monk, Charles James
Montagu, Hon. J. Scott (Hants)
Montagu, Sir S. (Whitechapel)
Moon, Edward Robert Pacy
More, Robert Jasper
Murdoch, Charles Townshend
Murray, Rt. Hn. A. Grah'm (Bute)
Murray, Charles J. Coventry
Murray, Col. Wyndham (Bath)
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Northcote, Hon. Sir H. Stafford
O'Brien, James F. X. (Cork)
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
O'Brien, P. J. (Tipperary)
O'Connor, Arthur (Donegal)
O'Connor, T. P. (Liverpool)
O'Kelly, James
O'Malley, William
Orr-Ewing, Charles Lindsay
Parkes, Ebenezer
Parnell, John Howard
Pease, Arthur (Darlington)
Pender, James
Penn, John
Phillpotts, Captain Arthur
Pierpoint, Robert
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Plunkett, Hon. Horace Curzon
Pollock, Harry Frederick
Powell, Sir Francis Sharp
Power, Patrick Joseph
Pretyman, Capt. Ernest George
Pryce-Jones, Edward
Purvis, Robert
Pym, C. Guy
Rankin, James
Rasch, Major Frederic Carne
Rentoul, James Alexander
Richards, Henry Charles
Ridley, Rt. Hon. Sir Matthew W.
Ritchie, Rt. Hon. Chas. Thomson
Robinson, Brooke
Roche, Hon. James (East Kerry)
Roche, John (East Galway)
Rollit, Sir Albert Kaye
Round, James
Russell, Col. F. S. (Cheltenham)
Russell, Sir George (Berks.)
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Rutherford, John
Samuel, Harry S. (Limehouse)
Saunderson, Col. Edw. James
Savory, Sir Joseph
Scoble, Sir Andrew Richard
Seely, Charles Hilton
Seton-Karr, Henry
Sharpe, William Edward T.
Sheehy, David
Sidebotham, J. W. (Cheshire)
Sidebottom William (Derbysh.)
Simeon, Sir Barrington
Skewes-Cox, Thomas
Smith, Abel H. (Christchurch)
Smith, Hon. W. F. D. (Strand)
Spencer, Ernest
Stanley, Lord (Lancs.)
Stanley, Edw. Jas. (Somerset)
Stanley, Henry M. (Lambeth)
Stephens, Henry Charles
Stewart, Sir Mark J. McTaggart
Stock, James Henry
Strauss, Arthur
Strutt, Hon. Charles Hedley
Sturt, Hon. Humphry Napier
Sullivan, Donal (Westmeath)
Talbot, Lord E. (Chichester)
Talbot, John G. (Oxford Univ.)
Tanner, Charles Kearns
Taylor, Francis
Thorburn, Walter
Thornton, Percy M.
Tomlinson, Wm. Edw. Murray
Tritton, Charles Ernest
Verney, Hon. Richard Greville
Vincent, Col. Sir C. E. Howard
Warde, Lt.-Col. C. E. (Kent)
Waring, Col. Thomas
Warr, Augustus Frederick
Webster, R. G. (St. Pancras)
Webster, Sir R.E. (Isle of Wight)
Welby, Lieut.-Col. A. C. E.
Wharton, John Lloyd
Whiteley, H.(Ashton-under-L.)
Whitmore, Charles Algernon
Williams, Colonel R. (Dorset)
Williams, Joseph Powell-(Birm.)
Willoughby de Eresby, Lord
Willox, John Archibald
Wilson, John (Falkirk)
Wilson, J. W. (Worc'sh., N.)
Wilson-Todd, Wm. H. (Yorks.)
Wodehouse, Edmond R. (Bath)
Wolff, Gustav Wilhelm
Wortley, Rt. Hon. C. B. Stuart-
Wyndham-Quin, Major W. H.
Wyvill, Marmaduke d'Arcy
Younger, William

Tellers for the Ayes, Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther

NOES.

Abraham, William (Rhondda)
Acland, Rt. Hon. A. H. Dyke
Allen, Wm. (Newc. under Lyme)
Asquith, Rt. Hn. Herbert Henry
Atherley-Jones, L.
Austin, Sir John (Yorkshire)
Bainbridge, Emerson
Baker, Sir John
Barlow, John Emmott
Bayley, Thomas (Derbyshire)
Beaumont, Wentworth C. B.
Birrell, Augustine
Bolton, Thomas Dolling
Brigg, John
Broadhurst, Henry
Bryce, Rt. Hon. James
Buchanan, Thomas Ryburn
Burt, Thomas
Buxton, Sydney Charles
Caldwell, James
Causton, Richard Knight
Channing, Francis Allston
Clark, Dr. G. B. (Caithness-sh.)
Colville, John
Dalziel, James Henry
Davies, M. Vaughan- (Cardigan)
Davies, W. Rees- (Pembrokesh.)

Dilke, Rt. Hon. Sir Charles
Dixon, George
Doughty, George
Dunn, Sir William
Ellis, John Edward (Notts.)
Evans, Samuel T. (Glamorgan)
Evans, SirFrancisH.(South'ton)
Farquharson, Dr. Robert
Fenwick, Charles
Ferguson, R. C. Munro (Leith)
Foster, Sir Walter (Derby Co.)
Fowler,RtHnSirHenry(Wol'tn)
Gladstone,Rt.Hn. Herbert John
Goddard, Daniel Ford
Gold, Charles
Griffith, Ellis J.
Haldane, Richard Burdon
Harcourt, Rt. Hon. Sir William
Harrison, Charles
Hayne, Rt. Hon. Charles Seale-
Hazell, Walter
Humphreys-Owen, Arthur C.
Hutton, Alfred E. (Morley)
Joicey, Sir James
Jones,David Brynmor(Swansea)
Jones,William (Carnarvonshire)
Kearley, Hudson E.
Kinloch,SirJohn George Smyth
Labouchere, Henry
Lambert, George
Lawson,SirWilfrid (Cumb'land)
Leese,Sir Joseph F.(Accrington)
Leng, Sir John
Lloyd-George, David
Lockwood, Sir Frank (York)
Logan, John William
Lough, Thomas
Luttrell, Hugh Fownes
McKenna, Reginald
McLaren, Charles Benjamin
McLeod, John
Mappin, Sir Frederick Thorpe
Morgan, J. Lloyd (Carmarthen)
Morley, Charles (Breconshire)
Morley,Rt.Hon.John (Montrose)
Mundella,Rt.Hn.Anthony John
Nussey, Thomas Willans
Oldroyd, Mark
Paulton, James Mellor
Pease, Joseph A. (Northumb.)
Pease, Sir Joseph W. (Durham)
Perks, Robert William
Pickersgill, Edward Hare
Pirie, Captain Duncan Vernon
Provand, Andrew Dryburgh
Randell, David
Rickett, J. Compton
Roberts, John Bryn (Eifion)
Roberts, John H. (Denbighs.)
Robson, William Snowdon
Scott, Charles Prestwich
Shaw, Thomas (Hawick B.)
Souttar, Robinson
Spicer, Albert
Stanhope, Hon. Philip J.
Stevenson, Francis S.
Strachey, Edward
Tennant, Harold John
Thomas, Abel (Carmarthen, E.)
Thomas, Alfred (Glamorgan,E.)
Wallace, Robert (Perth)
Walton, John Lawson
Wayman, Thomas
Wedderburn, Sir William
Whittaker, Thomas Palmer
Williams, John Carvell (Notts.)
Wilson, Frederick W. (Norfolk)
Wilson, Henry J. (York, W.R.)
Wilson, John (Durham, Mid)
Wilson, John (Govan)
Woodall, William
Woodhouse,Sir J.T.(Hud'rsf'ld)
Yoxall, James Henry

TELLERS FOR THE NOES, Mr. Thomas Ellis and Mr. McArthur.

Resolved,—That it is expedient—

(a) to authorise the payment out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of an aid grant to Voluntary Schools, not exceeding five shillings per scholar for the whole number of scholars in those schools;

(b) to repeal as regards day schools so much of section nineteen of The Elementary Education Act, 1876, as imposes a limit on the parliamentary grant to elementary schools in England and Wales; and

(c) to make provision for the exemption from rates of Voluntary Schools.

Whereupon the Chairman of Ways and Means left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolution to be reported upon Thursday.

MR. ACLAND: Will it be the first Order?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Yes, the first Order.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (IRELAND) (WOMEN) BILL

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow.

COUNTY COUNCILLORS (QUALIFICATION OF WOMEN) (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Tuesday next.

CORONERS' INQUESTS (RAILWAY FATALITIES) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Tuesday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT (1894) AMENDMENT BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (ELECTIONS) BILL.

Considered in Committee, and reported without Amendment; Bill Read the Third time, and passed.

House Adjourned at Twenty minutes before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 3rd February 1897.

QUEEN'S SPEECH.

The Comptroller of the Household (Lord Arthur Hill) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as followeth :—

"I have received with great satisfaction the loyal and dutiful expression of your thanks for the Speech with which I have opened the present Session of Parliament."

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS.

LONDON (CLARE MARKET, STRAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER.

Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State for improving an area situated in the parishes of St. Mary-le-Strand, St. Clement Danes, St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and St. Martin-in-the-Fields, in the county of London, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jesse Collings and Secretary Sir Matthew White Ridley; presented, and Read the First time; Referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, and to be printed.—[Bill 113.]

METROPOLITAN POLICE PROVISIONAL ORDER.

Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, under the Metropolitan Police Act, 1886, relating to lands in the parish of St. James, Westminster, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jesse Collings and Secretary Sir Matthew White Ridley; presented, and Read the First time; Referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, and to be printed.—[Bill 114.]

ARBITRATION TREATY (GREAT BRITAIN AND UNITED STATES).

Address for "Copy of the Arbitration Treaty between this Country and the United States as recently signed."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE (EXTENSION TO WOMEN) BILL.

*Mr. FAITHFULL BEGG (Glasgow, St. Rollox), in rising to move the Second Reading of this Bill, said the question of the extension of the franchise to women was in no sense a Party one. He had no desire that it should be dragged into the arena of party controversy, and he did not think the interests of those whose cause he was pleading would be furthered should such an event occur. He asserted, however, that, in his opinion, it would be a lasting credit to any Party in the country which should undertake a Party Measure embodying the principle which was embodied in the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] The Bill was intended merely to establish the principle of the extension of the Parliamentary franchise. The Bill, however, contained the irreducible minimum which should be granted by the House in the matter, if the franchise was granted to women at all. It was calculated that the Bill would enfranchise about 500,000 women. He was given to understand that one of the most difficult points in connection with the phraseology of the Bill was whether it did or did not include married women. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean, who held strong opinions on the subject, had said that the Bill was obscurely drawn, and contended that it would not include married women. He had no desire to go into the intricacies of legal phraseology, for in the course of discussing the details of the Measure the intention of the House would no doubt be made perfectly clear on the point. He might, say, however, for his own part, that he approved the inclusion of married women, and his reason for doing so was that, by a series of Acts which had been passed in recent years, married women had been given the control of their own earnings—["hear, hear!"]—the control of property that accrued to them as next of kin, and the right to hold property which was secured to them by bequest; and in those circumstances he contended that it followed, as a matter of course, that they should be entitled to vote in connection with the management of that property. ["Hear, hear!"] Another criticism of the Bill made by the right hon. Member was that it would further complicate the existing qualifications for the franchise. He admitted that the franchise was already sufficiently complicated, and he had hoped that the wording of the Bill, if it were passed into law, would rather simplify than further complicate the present state of things. At present the disqualifications for the Parliamentary vote applied to Peers—a restriction which he fully approved—to candidates' agents, to minors, to lunatics, to paupers, to felons, and lastly to women. That was the category in which intelligent women were placed in this country in relation to the Parliamentary franchise. ["Hear, hear!"] Even illiterate persons were allowed to vote, and he found that in the last election no fewer than 73,000 illiterates voted. It was not a credit to our civilisation that, in such circumstances, intelligent women should be debarred from exercising the privilege. [Cheers.] Now as to the qualifications of women to vote. They were regarded as capable of holding property, and, in consequence, paid taxes upon it, and it had been recognised for many years as a principle of the constitution that taxation and representation should go together. ["Hear, hear!"] Further, the right had been extended to them to vote in connection with Parish and District Councils, Poor Law Guardians, County Councils, Town Councils, and School Board Elections, and he ventured to say that they had exercised those functions with credit to themselves and advantage to the country. ["Hear, hear!"] Moreover, women had been recently appointed on Royal Commissions, and had been from time to time called as witnesses in Parliamentary inquiries. They had also been granted in recent years educational facilities, through which they had distinguished themselves in many walks of life. Nearly 500 women had already taken the B.A. degree at the London University, nearly 400 had passed tripos examinations at Cambridge, and nearly 300 had passed with honours at Oxford. [Cheers.] Notwithstanding all this, they were debarred from assisting to decide by whom the laws under which they lived should be made. ["Hear, hear!"] The criminal statistics of the country showed that women were more law-abiding citizens than men. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] The female population of the country exceeded the male population by about one million, and yet they found that while 8,426 men were convicted at assizes and quarter sessions last year, only 1,267 women were convicted. They were told that women did not understand politics. Did all men understand them? [Laughter.] He denied that women were less capable of understanding difficult questions than men, but even if they were that would be no valid reason for excluding them from the franchise. ["Hear, hear!"] Women had special interests of their own which they understood, and which they desired and required to protect. They had special knowledge with regard to special questions, and they had special means of obtaining information with regard to matters which affected their own sex, which were not open to men in any proper sense of the word. ["Hear, hear!"] Therefore, it was only common justice that women should have the means of giving effect to the opinions they formed on those subjects in a constitutional manner—namely, by voting for the election of Members to that House. He wished to say here, with regard to the names which were on the back of the Bill, that he desired to thank hon. Members who had assisted him in bringing in the Measure. There was, he contended, a large mass of public opinion, both in Scotland and in England, in favour of the principle of this Measure, as shown, not only by the petitions sent up to that House by women, but by the resolutions adopted at representative conferences of both the great political parties in the State. He also reminded the House, on this point, of the appeal which was signed last year by no less than 257,000 women from every constituency in the United Kingdom, in favour of the principle of the Bill. Then they had the experience of their Colonies, and he thought this experience was very valuable, because it had given them an object lesson in connection with the working of this principle. A Bill for the enfranchisement of women in connection with Parliamentary Elections was passed in South Australia in 1894, and the working of that Measure had been eminently satisfactory. The first General Election under the Act took place in 1896, and he found that women voted in very large numbers, and that the utmost order and good feeling prevailed. "The gloomy forebodings," said his authority, "of those who had opposed Women's Suffrage have proved entirely groundless." In New Zealand, too, where such a Bill was passed in 1893, the working of the principle had been satisfactory. Sir John Hall, who was formerly the Premier for New Zealand, stated:—

> "Already the fallacy of the arguments against it have been proved. . . . Instead of the rough usage and unpleasant associations which they were warned awaited them, never before has an election been conducted with more decorum and order."

And Sir John quoted a returning officer, who told him that he would rather poll 200 women than 70 men. That was, he thought, admirable testimony to the working of the Measure. He was quite aware that there was a strong opposition in that House to the proposal he was now bringing forward. He knew the rejection of this Measure was to be moved by his hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Radcliffe Cooke). He was to be wounded in this matter in the house of his friend, whose manly, but ungallant voice, would be shortly raised in opposition to the Measure. The rejection was to be seconded by the hon. Member for Northampton. He had always understood that the hon. Gentleman's mission in life was to break down privilege and to remedy injustice, yet here they had him the advocate of exclusiveness and the perpetuator of inequality. He had not been able to follow the arguments of the hon. Gentleman in this matter. His main position he understood to be that this was a Measure for unsexing women. He had pondered over that expression, but he had not been able to attach any definite meaning to it. If this principle of the working of which they had not had experience in other connections in this country and in the Colonies, then there might be some point in the criticism. But this principle had been introduced here in municipal matters, and in the Colonies in Parliamentary Elections, and introduced with advantage. That being so he was unable to fathom what could be the basis upon which the hon. Gentleman brought forward an assertion of this kind. He believed himself that the hon. Gentleman had in his mind a certain political institution in this country which, if he might say so, was his pet aversion—that great organisation, the Primrose League—and that he believed, if women were enfranchised in this country, their votes would be cast exclusively in support of Tory candidates. If that was so, and the hon. Member did not dissent from it—

MR. HENRY LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I do dissent.

*MR. FAITHFULL BEGG: Then the hon. Gentleman thinks that the votes would be cast in favour of the candidates of his own way of thinking.

MR. LABOUCHERE: No.

*MR. FAITHFULL BEGG: Then the hon. Gentleman has no opinion on the matter at all.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Yes I have.

*MR. FAITHFULL BEGG said that, however that might be, the argument was largely used in the country that the effect of the enfranchisement of women would be to bring a great reinforcement into the ranks of either one or the other party in the State. In his opinion that was a most unworthy argument. That was the very last consideration which should be advanced in connection with a matter of this kind. He was not aware that when they had had to consider the granting of an extension of the franchise they had ever considered the particular direction in which the votes would be cast. If they had done so he hoped they would never do so in the future. Such an argument and such a consideration as that was pure and unadulterated Krugerism. Mr. Kruger professed to be willing to redress the grievances of the Uitlanders and to extend the franchise, but he wished to be satisfied beforehand that the votes would be cast in favour of the particular policy of which he approved. That was not an aspect of the question which should be regarded for a moment by anyone considering such an important matter as this. His general position was that there was no valid argument against the principle of this Bill. Arguments there might be, born of prejudice or of sentiment, but there was no logical, valid, or just argument against the position which he took up in this matter. He had had the greatest possible pleasure in bringing this matter before the House, and he appealed to all hon. Members to cast themselves loose from any remnant of prejudice of sentiment, or other unworthy consideration; to recognise the inherent justice of the claim which was now being once more made in constitutional form in that House, to give effect to the logical consequences and outcome of those successive legislative experiments which had been made, and which, he contended, had been made successfully, in this country in the past, and by doing so once more to broaden, to strengthen, and to improve the basis upon which our representative institutions stood. He believed that, thus broadened, thus strengthened, and thus improved, those institutions would continue to be the guarantee and security for the prosperity of the country in the future as they had been the guarantee and security for that prosperity in the past. He begged to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

*MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.), in seconding the Motion, complimented the hon. Mover on the ability of his speech. He did not think there were any persons in the House who would be prepared to dispute the view that the Women's Suffrage question had, in the last few years, made the most substantial progress in the opinions of the people of this country. He did not deny that they might still be confronted to some extent with the ridicule which, in times past, was the usual way with which this question was approached by those opposed to it; but on the whole, the question had passed from the stage of ridicule to the intelligible ground of practical politics. Upon that common platform, as to the political expediency or inexpediency of the Measure, they were now in a position to debate the question. There still remained one or two grotesque arguments against the Measure of Women's Enfranchisement, but before dealing with them he should like to say one word with regard to the legal aspect of this Measure. He had not the smallest doubt that the Bill would be exposed to the critical acumen of many learned friends, and he might say at once that on the compass of the Measure there would be a divergent opinion from two points of view; one that it was not large enough in its scope, and the other that it was too small or narrow in its scope. Those who were responsible for the drafting of the Bill thought it wise to choose the line of least resistance. They knew perfectly well, if, for instance, they were to enfranchise women lodgers, that there would be a very strong and very formidable volume of opposition from certain sections of the House, and although he, for one, should very much like to see women lodgers included within the scope of the Bill, yet those who were responsible for its drafting came to the conclusion that it would be well to allow that question to be laid before the House at large, so that when the Bill came before the Committee, amendments in that direction, if that was the general sense, might be included. Again, there was the debatable question as to whether women who were married should be included in the Bill. There, again, no attempt had been made to deal with that proposition. The point of view the promoters of the Bill took was this. There were a large number of Members who say, "If you include married women we shall oppose the Bill." On the other hand, there were Members who said, "If you do not include married women we shall oppose it, because we think married women, of all people in the world belonging to their sex, at any rate, are entitled to the highest consideration, and it is discreditable to make marriage a loss of political status." He ventured to suggest that the Bill probably did include married women. It was not quite clear, and perhaps some hon. Gentlemen would say that it ought to be made quite clear. He agreed there was force in that observation, but, in view of a very recent decision in the High Courts of Justice, there was some doubt raised as to whether or no certain operative words in the Acts of Parliament creating local government franchises did or did not include married women. However that might be, the basis upon which all hon. Members would vote, either for or against the Measure, was this—that its promoters were enunciating the principle of Women's Suffrage, and they should leave the questions of the scope and the extent of the qualifications to be dealt with by the House in the proper place for so dealing with them—namely, in the Committee of this House, and upon the Report stage of the Bill. He had said there were grotesque arguments still surviving against the enfranchisement of women. One such argument was that because women were not likely and could not be called upon to use arms in defence of their country, they ought not to be entrusted with the franchise. He remembered the last time upon which this question was debated in the House, his right hon. Friend the Member for East Fife—whose absence, in common with that of the occupants of both Front Benches he deplored, because he knew they should probably hear, when the Debate had reached its final stages, speeches from his right hon. Friend and other right hon. Gentlemen directed against this Bill, without their having condescended to listen to the arguments which have been advanced in support of it—he remembered his right hon. Friend adopted that argument, and he ventured to say that his expression of grotesque as applied to it was not unwarranted. He should like to ask how many people who were responsible for involving this country in war were ever likely to bear arms in its defence? They, in the House of Commons, and also in the other House, were the persons who in a large measure were responsible for directing that movement of popular opinion which might produce war. And yet, of all the hon. Members in that Assembly, except one or two hon. and gallant Gentlemen, there was hardly a solitary man who would bear arms. He had no doubt that his hon. Friend the Member for Hereford and the hon. Member for Northampton, who would not even, either of them, take the position of a drummer boy in the Army, would both rise up in their places and say it was an anomaly, unjust and unreasonable, to entrust the franchise to people not capable of bearing arms in the defence of their country. What he claimed for women was, that although they did not actually, and might not, perhaps, be able (although that might be an arguable question) to bear arms, at the same time they bore the responsibilities and disadvantages of war. They suffered more acutely in their own persons and the persons of their children from being deprived of their husbands or their sons or brothers by the operations of war. They suffered from the burden of taxes and the general disarrangement of their social condition by war, to as large an extent at least, and probably even to a larger extent, than those who took an active part in carrying on war. He would not dwell further upon that argument. He dismissed it as one which was grotesque, and which could not be reasonably sustained before any enlightened assembly. Among arguments he had culled from speeches made against this extension was one which at first sight appeared formidable, that women were indifferent to the franchise, and did not care to exercise it, that there had never been any demonstration on their part of their anxiety for the franchise. Had the working classes of this country ever demonstrated with any remarkable ardour for the exercise of the franchise? [" Yes ! "] For centuries the working classes of this country acquiesced in their exclusion from the franchise. True, there were intermittent agitations excited by the enthusiasm of political leaders, but for the most part it was a sorrowful fact, and it was a matter of common reproach at the time of the extension of the franchise in 1867, and again in 1885, that the working classes were to a very large and lamentable extent oblivious to the responsibilities that devolved upon them in relation to the franchise; and he ventured to say, speaking with the strongest democratic instincts, that it was more due to the exigencies of political parties than to any persistent and solid agitation for it that the working classes received the franchise. Women had not the same opportunities of making their views and opinions known as were in the nature of things conceded to men. Women had not control of the Press, women had not control of the platform, it was contrary to the nature of women to take part in those formidable demonstrations which from time to time marked the activity of political enthusiasm among men. But, although they had not these facilities, there were not wanting indications of a strong opinion in favour of this movement among the women of the day. Many women of distinction had given adhesion to the movement, and so far as he could gather the feeling among women was in that direction. So far as vehicles for the expression of opinion offered, petitions and so forth, the evidence was abundant that women did desire the possession of the franchise. Another argument which had a formidable appearance, and which no doubt would be heard ad nauseam, was that women would come under influences direct or indirect which would control their votes. Now which were these improper agencies?

Mr. LABOUCHERE: The Church.

*MR. ATHERLEY-JONES said he anticipated that. But which Church? Was it the English Church or the Catholic Church? [HON. MEMBERS: "All!"] Well, were the precepts and examples of the churches good or bad? Were Ministers belonging to the various religious denominations fit and proper persons to exercise their influence over women or not? In the first place there would be as great variety of opinion brought to bear upon women from the various sections of the Church as would be exercised in other directions, and Nonconformist Ministers using their influence in one way, Clergymen of the Established Church perhaps in another. Therefore, so far as the Church was concerned there would be check and counter-check applied, and the effect even if such influence did operate would be impartial. Another influence was possibly that of the male relatives of women. Well, that was not an unenlightened or baneful influence, and again there would be check and counter-check, and the number of the electorate would swell without injury to either political party. But these were mainly speculative opinions. There was no ground for supposing that women would be more likely to be susceptible to undue influence than men. The very same argument was advanced against the enfranchisement of certain sections of the working classes. It was said they would be subject to all kinds of indirect influence and would be driven to the polls like sheep. But none of these anticipations had been realised. The working classes had exercised the franchise with a full sense of their responsibility, and it was unworthy the serious consideration of this great cause to argue on the assertion that women would not honestly, conscientiously and intelligently exercise the franchise if it were conferred upon them. Another argument he would briefly touch upon would probably be the degradation of women. One hon. Member had even gone so far as to say women would be unsexed by being dragged into the turmoil and dust of party strife. Could such an argument as that be in the mouth of hon. Gentlemen who were only too glad to avail themselves of the services of women during election time? Had the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Cooke) never found a haughty Primrose Dame ready to go through the slums of Hereford to gain a vote for him? Did not his hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) sometimes lean for support on a Liberal Woman of Northampton? [Laughter.]

MR. LABOUCHERE: No. [Laughter.]

*MR. ATHERLEY-JONES said his hon. Friend repudiated the suggestion, but he had reason to believe that among the ladies of Northampton his hon. Friend had many hearty and sympathising supporters. Not only did Members avail themselves of women's help in political organisations but they dragged their wives through all the dreary, weary election time, from platform to platform, to listen to insipid oratory. [Laughter.] He knew one most charming lady, wife of a Member on that side of the House, who conducted to a successful issue an election campaign during her husband's absence abroad. It was idle to talk about this degradation, all the evidence we had showed that it tended to elevate the tone of elections when women took part in them. If there ever was any force in the argument it had disappeared, and women now took part in District Council, Parish Council, County Council, Boards of Guardians, Municipal and School Board elections, and upon some of these bodies women sat and took part in administration of local affairs. In view of these admissions made by the Legislature, the justice of the claim to vote for a Member of Parliament could not be invalidated by any such ridiculous contention. Another, and the last argument to which he would allude, was that there was no necessity to give women votes because they were already represented by the male members of their families. It was a specious, plausible argument, but absolutely unsound. A similar argument was advanced against the enfranchisement of agricultural labourers; it was said that the farmers and owners represented the interests of agriculture, and solemn speeches declared the interests of owners, farmers, and labourers to be identical. He had only to state one fact to bring conviction to the minds of Members that the interests of women are not adequately represented. There are over two millions of women employed in our factories. He wished to say nothing in disparagement of Trades Unions, they might be right or wrong in the view they took, but they had been constant in their efforts to interfere with the rights of labour by women. Trades Unions had continually been hampering the attempts of women to have the free right to sell their labour in whatever direction they pleased. The two million women who worked in factories should have the right to bring direct influence to bear through legitimate channels upon Parliament, through Members chosen by themselves to decide this question. Was it not of urgent and vital importance in the interests of sanitation that factory women should be able to bring direct pressure to bear on Parliament to better the conditions of their lives? Was the question of education and employment of children of no moment to women? Whatever might be the effect of recent legislation in New Zealand or New South Wales, undoubtedly a great factor and lever for dealing with the temperance question would be the enfranchisement of women, and it was a well-known fact that what animated the women of New Zealand to secure the franchise was the conviction that, not through the men, but through the agency of women, could any reform in that direction be secured. If women possessed the franchise, an honest effort would be made, which, he believed, would be crowned with success, if not to remove, at least to mitigate, the horrible evils which resulted from our unhappy social system. The number of women who would be enfranchised by the Bill was comparatively small. The supporters of the Bill believed that by admitting women to the franchise Parliament would do much to upraise, morally, intellectually, and politically the condition of women, and to make woman what to a large extent she was not at present—a more fitting companion, comrade, and partner to man. [Cheers.]

*MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford), in moving the rejection of the Bill, congratulated the supporters of the Bill on the able advocacy of the hon. Member who moved the Second Reading. First of all, however, he desired to remove the reproach cast on the capital city of his native county, which he had the honour to represent. It was said that he sent 40—[" No," and laughter]—Primrose Dames to wander about the slums of Hereford to get votes for him.

*MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: Haughty, not forty. [Laughter.]

*MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: He sent no Primrose Dames to wander through the slums of Hereford, because there were no slums in that highly-respectable city. [" Hear, hear!"] His hon. and learned Friend who had just spoken had said he was a comparatively new convert to this movement. He did not tell all about himself. When he first entered the House he was in favour of Women's Suffrage. A few years after he changed his mind, and became a convinced opponent of it, and now he said he had been re-converted to his original views.

*MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: I never was in favour of it when I first entered the House. It was in my childhood. [Laughter and cheers.]

*MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: Then the sooner the hon. Member attains to his second childhood the better. [" Hear, hear!"] The Conference of the National Union of Conservative Associations, which at Oxford in 1887 passed a resolution in favour of Women's Suffrage, passed also a resolution in favour of Protection, but nothing came of either. [Laughter.] It was suggested that we should follow the example of New Zealand and South Australia. Generally speaking, the children followed the example of the parent, not the parents the example of the children, and the only answer to this he would give in two words—fiat experimentum. When other civilised nations began to grant the franchise to women, it might be time for the most civilised nation in the world to see whether it would not be well to follow their example. Women had now the vote in Wyoming, and formerly in Washington, but when the latter was formed into a State the Women's Suffrage Law was repealed. If in America, where there were about 44 States, only the smallest and most remote had adopted the system, that was considerable reason why we should hesitate and watch what they were going to do in the matter. Before proceeding further he would like, with the permission of the House, to make a few respectful comments on the attitude assumed by Members of Parliament on this question. He had had an opportunity on this and previous occasions of conversing with Members of the House, and he had found their attitude to be one of considerable doubt. In fact, many would have been only too pleased if the Debate of yesterday had lasted over to-day. He did not wonder at their state of mind, for sometimes they called themselves Wobblers, and sometimes Waverers, but he would not weary the House with particular instances, though he would mention in passing one hon. Member who, when he asked him if he was going to vote for the Bill, said, "Yes, to please my mother." [Laughter.] There were also a large number who said they would vote for the Bill, but hoped it would not pass, or would vote for it because they had a number of women bothering them to do so. He had also a very good instance which would give rise to no little surprise if he ventured to mention the name of the hon. Member. [An HON. MEMBER: "Name."] No, he was not going to give him away. [Laughter.] He was not going to expose him to the tender mercies of the women he had deluded and deceived. [Laughter.] What did that hon. Member tell him only last Thursday as ever was, when he met him in the Lobby? The hon. Member was in the House now. [Laughter.] He said to him, "Are you an advocate of Women's Suffrage?" He replied, "Oh, yes, yes!" Then he looked very solemn, cast his eyes up to the ceiling, smote thrice upon his breast, assumed the attitude of the penitent publican, and said, "But in our inmost soul"—and then he smote his breast again so as to leave no doubt where he kept his soul—[laughter]—"in our inmost soul we dislike this Measure. We are the victims of pertinacity. We are the victims of the importunate widow." [Laughter.] Then he went on to say, "More than this, I will give you what I think a good argument to use against it"—and he was going to use it. He would not say on which side of the House that hon. Member sat, but he could see him. [Loud laughter.] The argument was this. It was said that several of the Leaders of the two Parties in the House were in favour of Women's Suffrage; yet was it to be supposed that if the Leaders of the two great Parties had been in favour of Women's Suffrage, and believed there was a feeling in the country in favour of it commensurate with the talk about it, they would allow the matter to remain in the hands of private Members? Would it not long before this have formed a plank in some Government platform? Was it to be supposed that the Leader of the House, who was believed to be in favour of this movement, would have taken that Wednesday last year which would have afforded so favourable an opportunity for the discussion of this Bill? Would the right hon. Gentleman not have spared that one day if he had had any real belief that either his followers were in favour of this Bill, or that there was any considerable body of opinion in the country in its favour? He thought it was very dishonourable on the part of hon. Members to deceive the ladies by telling them they would vote for this Measure though they did not want it. Now he would say a few words as to the progress made with the movement. The two principal Women's Suffrage Societies into which the original society was divided had been in existence for 30 years, and he had asked the Secretary of the so-called Parliamentary Committee, Miss Cozens—they had all seen her outside in the Lobby—what she thought was the cause why the original society was divided, and her reply was that there was a split on the married women. He knew there was a difference of opinion. The married women said they would not be ruled over by spinsters and widows, and they had their way, but the real cause of the division was, that about eight or nine years ago the fortunes of Woman Suffrage were at an extremely low ebb. Many branches had to be given up because no women attended them. The main support came from the Radical side, and at last it occurred to a brilliant but unscrupulous genius that it would be a good stroke of policy if they could persuade Liberal associations—purely political associations—to become affiliated with the central body of the Women's Suffrage Society. That scheme was actually carried out, but at the expense of unity. Why? Because some who remained in the old society said it was not honourable nor honest. He found in the report of the Central National Society that out of 67 societies who were claimed as affiliated with the Suffrage Society only 11 were Suffrage Societies, and 56 were Liberal Associations of the ordinary stamp. The Parliamentary Committee appeared to have originated at Congleton, in Cheshire. It did not flourish there, and was brought up to London, and it consisted for some time, so he understood, of Miss Cozens, the secretary, and her mother. There was no office, no officials, and no money. Now, however, there was an imposing list of officials, headed by their old friend Sir R. Temple, whom he regretted not to see in the House. The financial condition of the society—which he thought was, after all, the great test of the vitality of a society—was this: The annual subscriptions amounted to £15 1s. 6d., but the expenditure came to £26 1s. 9d. However, there was a balance of £12 in hand. He had asked Miss Cozens how that was made up, and she said it was no use trying to get subscriptions, so they had a ball at Kensington Town Hall, by which they raised £40. He would now turn to the part of the country which was the most favourably situated in connection with this movement—that was the North of England, whose centre was Manchester. The Manchester society was the earliest founded of any. It was founded in the year 1867—30 years ago. It was greatly assisted by the fact that Miss Becker, the mainstay of the movement up there, lived in the place. It was also the constituency represented by the Leader of the House, who was supposed to be in favour of the movement. He would point out the condition of that Society. Manchester was a city of 530,000 inhabitants. It was difficult to be closely accurate in giving the number of members of the society, because he observed in all these cases where application was made to secretaries for official reports giving the number of members of their societies, there was much vagueness in their replies. However, he had endeavoured to calculate the number of members of the Manchester Society, and he found that in a population of 530,000 there were about 160 members all told, both men and women, many of them not residing in Manchester at all. So, roughly speaking, they were in a proportion of about 1 to 3,500 of the population, and that in a part of England where the Society had been longest in existence. In these circumstances could it be said that public feeling had been greatly roused in Manchester, or that there was a great desire for the grant of these privileges to the sex in that part of the world? Then as to the question of finance. In what condition were the finances of the Suffrage Society in Manchester? Why, the Society was in debt to the extent of £70 at this moment, and yet in Manchester there were plenty of wealthy, intelligent women who were supposed, according to the supporters of this Bill, to be pining for the franchise. How was it that they did not come forward to free the Society from the burden of this debt, planking down their thousands, and putting the Society in a position of permanent financial security? But there was not a single supporter of the movement in Manchester who would move a finger to relieve the Society from this burden of debt. But if the parent Society in Manchester languished, what about the branches, of which there was one at Rochdale and another at Gorton? A friend of his wrote to those places asking what the position of those Societies was, and what was the feeling in the neighbourhood. With reference to Rochdale, the report of the Secretary said:—"Thought has been stirred in the town on the question, and we have enrolled fresh members." Now this stirring of thought had resulted in the expenditure of £4 15s. 4d., and in receipts of £4 9s. 3d. There was accordingly a deficit of 6s. 1d., which the General Committee had to defray, so that the Rochdale branch of the Society was now without a shilling to bless itself with. With reference to Gorton, the report of the Secretary said:—"The cause of Women's Suffrage is slowly gaining ground, and the opinions of this branch have been instrumental in some degree in forming a true opinion upon the matter here." But they had not gone very far in the formation of a true opinion, for the total income of the year amounted to the magnificent sum of 12s. The management, however, cut their coat according to their cloth, and spent in the year exactly the same sum. They were, however, happier than the Society in Manchester, in that they were not in debt. To sum up, Manchester was in debt to the sum of £70, Rochdale had not a single shilling to bless itself with, and Gorton was in the same position. Yet he should have supposed that, if these opinions were really spreading, there would have been people in both those places who would be willing to give some practical expression of their views, and to put these Societies on a sound foundation, thus enabling them to rouse public opinion in the neighbourhood. Now he would go to another place in the North of England. In Leeds the population was 402,500, and the number of members there was about 113, bearing the same proportion to the population as the members of the Society did to the population in Manchester, namely, 1 to every 3,500 inhabitants. The finances of the Society in Leeds, the report said, were in a satisfactory condition, and he was bound to say they were, as compared with the finances elsewhere. The income of this Society last year was £7 6s. 4d., and there was a cash balance of £2 11s. 5½d. That appeared to be the Society in the whole of this part of the country which was in the most flourishing condition. But he was not surprised that the Secretary who supplied this information should say, "Here also women are very indifferent;" so they were not only indifferent in Leeds but in many other places also. In London there were the two parent Societies, and he lumped their members together, although it was very difficult to say whether they were residents in London or not. It was clear that many were not, and had no real connection with London; but he would give the Society the benefit of those members, and lumping together the total number of members of the two parent Societies in London, he found that the proportion of members of this Society to the population was 1 to half a million. So this movement had made so much progress that one person in half a million would subscribe to the funds of the institution which was intended to promote the cause. If it were said, as it would be probably, that this view was the view of an opponent, and possibly a biassed individual, he would refer to what the most active supporters of the movement said about it themselves. Did they say that much substantial progress had been made? He had with him a report of the National Conference of the Delegates of the Women's Suffrage Societies in Great Britain and Ireland, held in Birmingham in October last. He presumed they got together there the most representative body they could. Affixed to this report was a map of England, which he held in his hand. The dark places on the map were the names of places where meetings had been held during the last few years—drawing-room meetings, and so on. Here was Manchester, where so much good work was said to have been done, and Leeds, and Gorton, and Rochdale. These were marked very black. All the rest of England was almost wholly blank. The supporters of the movement did not seem to be altogether satisfied with the condition of the country. They did not think that it had been quite sufficiently well worked, and they had drawn up a smaller map, which he held in his hand. On this, as would be seen, they proposed to divide England into districts, to be organised by paid organisers. Well, they had £2 11s. 5d. in Leeds, which would go some way to pay them, he supposed. Where the rest of the money was to come from he did not know. He would say as regarded that map that it was as blank as a map of Africa used to be. So here was a great constitutional agitation for conferring new rights upon people who had never had them before, and who inhabited places where they had never even heard of those rights, never had been approached on the subject, and knew nothing about it. The first reference he should make to the speeches delivered at this Women's Suffrage Meeting, in October last, was to the speech of the principal speaker—a Mrs. Thomas Taylor. She made an earnest speech, a speech which was referred to as being the most interesting and practical speech those present had ever heard. She wanted to know how it was that Women's Suffrage had not made the progress that some of its friends wished it had made, and she said:—

Mr. Radcliffe Cooke.

> "We must seek for the real reasons why we have not yet got the Suffrage, and amongst all those that are hurled at our heads by friends or foes, only one to my mind really hits the nail on the head. It is this: 'you have not got the great mass of women with you. The majority of women do not really care about the Suffrage.' That I think we must all admit is true. There are hundreds and thousands of women who do care for the Suffrage, but there are millions—I speak advisedly—" and this was a woman who knew all about it and who had been all over the country propagating the faith—

"millions who not only do not care, but who have many of them never heard of it, and who certainly do not realise what it means."

So that House was actually asked to grant the suffrage to millions of women who knew nothing about it, and did not care for it. Then Mrs. Taylor referred to the map he had shown to the House, and said:—

"Look at Cumberland, at Lincoln, at Devonshire. What do all those blank spaces mean but that there are no Suffrage women there, or only a few isolated individuals. If all the marked places may be taken as centres of life, all those blank spaces are realms of darkness, heathen lands so far as Women's Suffrage is concerned. What chance, I ask you, have we of getting Women's Suffrage"— this was what the Women's Society, the active supporters of the movement said, who knew all about it—

"what chance have we of getting Women's Suffrage or of having numbers of women at elections pressing M.P.'s for the Suffrage, when we have all that much country unconcerned about it—unconverted."

So what they were asked to do was to give to that large country, that unconverted land, the Suffrage, and there were gentlemen who would actually do so, and who were ready to take a leap into the realm of darkness, to use this good lady's phrase. Mrs. Taylor was followed by a lady of distinction, the Hon. Mrs. Arthur Lyttleton, who, after addressing Mrs. Taylor, and thoroughly agreeing with the truth and accuracy of the observations that had fallen from her, spoke as follows:—

"Let all those anxious for the amelioration of the position of women, in whatever department of life it may be, put aside their differences, and agree to some such scheme as that laid before us to-day, which will, as we hope, ensure that every man and woman in England will be made acquainted with what we seek. This will enable us to have a definite plan to put before our supporters, many of whom have contributed to the Suffrage movement during the last twenty or thirty years, and who are growing tired of giving, for as they say, we seem no nearer to our goal."

"No nearer our goal!" And his hon. Friend pretended to think they had reached it when he knew perfectly well they had not even made a start for the race that was set before them. He would give the House one more quotation, and then he had done. Mrs. Lyttleton was followed by Mrs. Scatchherd, who also spoke with such becoming frankness that he would venture to read one passage, the last one he should read from the Report:—

"The question is," asks this good lady, "what are we to do now? It is useless merely to say pleasant things; we must speak the truth and face the situation. Our experience then is that the day of the average public meeting which we have been holding for the last fifteen years is practically over and that drawing-room meetings are also becoming things of the past. What did you get at these meetings? A resolution passed in favour of the Suffrage. What next? Well, nothing—nothing practical. You get an expression of approval, intellectual approval; but that is vastly different from conviction."

They had it then that the day of the average public meeting held in Manchester, Leeds, or at the Oxford Conference, which the ladies had been holding for the last 15 years, was practically over, and that the drawing-room meeting was also becoming a thing of the past. The drawing-room meeting of his day was sometimes of a singular complexion. The ladies used to think then that it was desirable to try and get up some kind of discussion on the subject of Women's Suffrage, for although they were all women they were of one mind in one house, and they could not get them to advocate the question with any show of argument on behalf of the unfortunate men. What they did, therefore, was this. In order to make the meeting more agreeable they used to borrow a couple of barristers and invite them to come and say what they had to say on behalf of their own degraded sex. He knew this, because he had been "borrowed," and he had made remarks that were not received in the cordial spirit in which they had been offered. [Laughter.] He knew also the exaggerated mode in which the resolutions were passed, and how the meetings were put in the Press. He met the same speakers over and over again; the same organisers, such as Miss Becker, Miss Tod, Miss Orme. If the front drawing-room was nearly full then the meeting was described as "a fine display of public feeling;" if the front drawing-room was quite full, and the folding doors were thrown open, and the little back drawing-room nearly full, too, then the assembly assumed the character of a national demonstration. [Laughter.] Those meetings were industriously reported throughout the country, until at last people began to say that there must be something in the movement, whereas, if they were behind the scenes they would know perfectly well that it was a "put-up job," that it was a manufactured article, and that the people who promoted it were "a stage army." [Laughter.] It was the same now. The Report of the National Society for Women's Suffrage, 1894, contained a list of meetings which were held —78 in all, of which 25 were drawing-room meetings. There was a drawing-room meeting by invitation of Miss Tickell; a drawing-room meeting by invitation of Mrs. Algernon Joy, with Mr. Joy in the chair; and of these meetings Mrs. Fawcett, the hon. secretary, addressed 34, Miss Blackburn 10, and Miss Mordan 8, and all these women made one attempt after another at different meetings to endeavour to excite enthusiasm among their friends in favour of this movement. In the North, the manifestations were the same. Out of 34 meetings held in the year ending October last, the "stage army" was again to the front. Mrs. Philip addressed 15 meetings, Miss Hodgson and Miss Edwards each 7.

Sir WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) rose to order, and asked whether the hon. Member was speaking to the question before the House?

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is within the limits of order, though perhaps somewhat discursive.

*Mr. RADCLIFFE COOKE said he was employing all these quotations as an illustration to show how the movement in favour of Women's Suffrage was got up, and he was, therefore, endeavouring to support the arguments with which he began—that there was no sufficient demand for the Franchise among women; and that the demand was supported by meetings organised and got up in this way was no true demand, and in order to show what the nature of the meetings was. He said now, as he said before, that it was a "stage army" that went about the country; whereas now they had Mrs. Fawcett and other ladies going from place to place about the country endeavouring to promote the movement, so then they had Miss Becker, Miss Tod, and Miss Orme following the same procedure.

Mr. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Is it right, Sir, that all the names of those ladies should be dragged into this controversy? [Cheers.]

*Mr. SPEAKER: It is not a question of order.

Mr. W. JOHNSTON: It is very bad taste then.

*Mr. RADCLIFFE COOKE said it was a matter of purely good or bad taste, if the hon. Gentleman liked, when he mentioned that a lady attended 50 meetings, that the women had a public meeting here and a public meeting there, and that certain ladies attended so many public meetings, and he mentioned them by name. Was it wrong to say that? Was it a question of bad taste? How could he show how a movement of this kind was organised unless he mentioned the organisers by name? Was it bad taste to mention that? No; he thought it was good argument. He considered that Mrs. Russell-Cooke formed a very good judgment of the opinion of the members of the House when she said:—

> "I am under the impression, though I would not say it to everyone, that, although we sometimes attack Members of Parliament, there is on the whole a larger proportion of opinion in favour of Women's Suffrage in the House of Commons than there is in the country; and that is why Members are so slack about putting their professions into actual practice."

He had shown the plan of campaign and the war chest at Leeds; and he said that the position of the movement in this country did not as yet warrant the introduction of any Bill of any sort or kind granting the Suffrage to Women. [Cheers.] If he were conducting a case in Court he should stop here. He should submit that there was no case; or if it went to the jury, he should rest content with the facts he had proved and should decline to address them. But he thought it due to his hon. Friend who brought forward the question, and in consideration of the strong views held by some hon. Members on the subject, to venture, with the permission of the House, on a rather dry disquisition while making the endeavour to prove the second head of the argument with which he started, namely, that it was unjust to grant Women's Suffrage. Might he be allowed to preface the observations on this head with some remarks on the nature of the Franchise? This Measure was said to be intended to give the vote to duly-qualified women, that was to say women who had some sort of property qualification. Stress was laid by his hon. Friend on the intelligence of women, and this was a point which was made much of, and would be again, by subsequent speakers. He granted that intelligence as fully as ever the hon. Member could wish, but intelligence had nothing to do with this question, except that the voter must not be deficient in ordinary human capacity, must not be a lunatic or an idiot. But intelligence, whether good, bad, or indifferent, was not a qualification, for the simple reason that they could not test it where millions were concerned. Mr. Mill, an early and consistent advocate of what he called the emancipation of woman, desired such a test, but he abandoned all notion of it on the ground of its impracticability. Examinations formed some test, and they had the University vote so tested, but this, too, as a test, was becoming discredited. Therefore, the highly intelligent widow with a lowly, intelligent coachman, had no cause quâ intelligence to complain because he had a vote and she had not. But it was said that the highly-intelligent widow had a large property and the non-intelligent coachman none; but on the score of intelligence she had no claim for special consideration, because to put her on an equality with the coachman she ought to have a proportion of votes equivalent to the extent in which her intelligence exceeded his. [Laughter.] It would be said also that there were many women possessed of a large amount of property, but neither was property in itself a qualification. It was not the house, the sticks and the stones, that voted; this property was only an indication of the position in the community held by the owner of it; it was an outward and visible sign that he had some interest in the country. But property was not the only indication, and as an indication it was rapidly falling into disrepute. Indeed, they proposed to take away from the owners of property the very property qualification and votes which they now enjoyed. Services were a qualification, a lodging was a qualification, and the like. Now, what sort of position did these indications denote? He thought it was this, that the subject of them was not a mere casual, not a mere waif and stray.

MR. WILLIAM ALLAN (Gateshead): Mr. Speaker, I beg to call your attention to the fact that there are not 40 Members present.

After the usual interval, a quorum was found to be present.

*MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE said all the qualifications he had mentioned were indications of some stability on the part of the voter, or led to some presumption that he had some interest in some place for some time, and therefore was likely to be engaged in the duties of a citizen. Underlying all these qualifications or indications was the suggestion or presumption of work. Position in the community, with the ever underlying accompaniment of work, was in his judgment the true qualification for the exercise of the franchise. Now women, like men, had position in the community—married women the best and most stable of all positions, and they had their sphere of work; but again, with insignificant exceptions, their sphere of work was different from that of men. It had no direct relation as men's work had to the principal functions of this House, and the reasons for the existence of this House. In a word, the question resolved itself into a question of sex. Look around. This building, in which this room, from its associations and use, was the most noteworthy feature, was raised by the labours of men. He went forth into this great city and found that throughout the length and breadth thereof not one brick nor one stone was laid on but by the hands of men. All those great arteries of communication which constitute what Lord Bacon called the essentials to the greatness and wealth of a nation—easy conveyance of men and goods from place to place—had been made and were maintained by men who, in like manner, conduct the traffic over them, and devise the complex system whereby such traffic was regulated. All our manufactories in which the produce of the earth was converted into wealth for the use of mankind, and all the machinery therein, had been erected and were kept going by men. Go to our great ports and see how vast was the foreign trade of this country, and how all the laborious part of it was carried on by men. Who went down to the sea in ships and saw the wonders and braved the dangers of the deep? Men. Who navigated over trackless oceans? That vast marine which brought wealth and comfort to every home. Who founded the great Empire of which this kingdom was the heart? Men. That "morning drum beat which," as had been well said, "following the sun and keeping company with the hours, encircles the earth with one unbroken strain of the martial airs of England," wakened whom? Men. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Who nursed you?"] Who secured to us the fruits of toil and safeguarded us in our sea-girt isle? Men. What was the outcome of all these unceasing and ever increasing labours of men? [Mr. ALLAN (Gateshead): "Children."] Our existence here to-day as a social and civilised community. And what did a social and civilised community involve and require? Laws, whereby its complex system might be regulated. And laws made by whom? By Parliament. [Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Member to address himself more directly to the question. [Cheers.]

*MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: Oh! I must have egregiously failed to make myself clear. [Cheers and laughter.] What he was arguing was this, that as all the material framework of society, all that enabled this country to be a social and civilised community, was made and executed by men, so they ought to govern it. That this point was a good one was plain from the efforts which the supporters of the Women's Suffrage movement had made from time to time to show that women could do the work of men. In the Women's Suffrage Journal, conducted by Miss Becker, a number of instances were cited of cases in which women performed the work of men. From that he gathered that there were a few women who superintend lighthouses in America, a few women who navigate small coasting vessels, and that there is at least one woman pilot somewhere on the Welsh coast. She even went to the extent of instancing women criminals where the crime committed was, if he might so say, of a masculine character, such as burglary, and she included these as instances of women being equal to men. In this day her example in this last mentioned respect was followed by her successors, for in a recent number of the Women's Signal there was an instance given of a young woman housebreaker which was given as an instance of women being physically the equal of men. The pit-brow girls were used by the supporters of the Women's Suffrage Movement for that particular purpose. There was a deputation to a former Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews) requesting him to include these girls in his Bill and prohibit them from working as described, on the ground that the work was hard and unwomanly. A deputation of those same girls attended this House in their picturesque garb, and by whom was it led? By the leaders of the Women's Suffrage Movement, who had declared that the reason why they supported the claim of these women to do this hard and unwomanly work was, that it showed women were physically the equals of men, and could do the same hard work as men, and that that was the strongest argument in favour of granting them the suffrage. He did not see, at present, any prospect of putting the two sexes on an equality. No one could set bounds to the march of intellect or the discoveries of scientific men; but he could see no chance of the human race being propagated in any other mode than that with which they were familiar. [Cries of "Oh!"] Looking around them as they walked through the streets, and observing how the standard of height of women had risen as compared with the standard of height among men, one might possibly expect the time when the equality of women and men would be physically, and, as regards stature, an established fact; or, possibly, as was the case with birds of prey, the female might become ultimately bigger than the male, and then men would have to take a back seat. But until this physical alteration was effected he should be a convinced opponent of this Measure, and if ever he happened to be in the House of Commons when it was brought forward, if he did not move its rejection he should, at any rate, vote against it.

On the return of MR. SPEAKER after the usual interval,

MR. HENRY LABOUCHERE (Northampton) said he was sorry that an important question such as this was should be greeted with a certain amount of levity by the House. He would ask the House to look at it in its serious aspect. The hon. Gentleman who moved this Bill apologised for being the only Scotchman whose name was upon the back of the Bill. What surprised him was that there was one Scotchman who would put his name on the back of the Bill, because in his youth he had been nurtured on the works of John Knox, and he remembered especially one of John Knox's works, which was "The Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous regimen of women." If Scotchmen had any respect for that great man—whom they all respected in England—he was convinced that they would not say that John Knox's views were to be set aside on account of anything that might be said by recreant Scotchmen—he did not use the word in any invidious sense. It was 30 years ago, he thought, when this question was first submitted to the House of Commons by Mr. John Stuart Mill. About 50 Members voted in favour of it; but he remembered that it was regarded by every Member who went into the Lobby as a huge joke. He was perfectly certain that there was not one Gentleman in the House who voted on that occasion who took the thing seriously, with the exception of Mr. Mill himself. [Sir C. DILKE: "Mr. Bright."] His right hon. Friend said Mr. Bright. He himself happened to be sitting down in the smoking room with Mr. John Bright while the discussion was going on, and Mr. Bright said, "I suppose we must give John Mill a vote, but I cannot say that I am strongly in favour of giving votes to women," and on subsequent occasions he had told him that he regretted on that occasion that he did give a vote for it. He hoped hon. Gentlemen, therefore, would think well before they voted. He admitted that, foolishly, looking upon the thing as a joke, he went into the Lobby as one of those 50 Members; and it was because he might have done some evil upon that occasion that he had made it his special duty to show his repentance by doing what he could ever since to prevent women having votes. It was said that this was a woman's question; but he ventured to point out that it was also a man's question. As a man, he objected to petticoat government, and he also spoke for the vast majority of women, who recognised that they were not fitted to govern in that House, and did not wish to. [Cries of "Oh!"] He was obliged to call attention to the tactics pursued on this occasion. They seemed to him to be essentially feminine, and they were a forecast of what they might expect if this vote was carried and women were allowed to exercise paramount influence on the affairs of the country. He gathered from what fell from the hon. Gentleman who moved the Second Reading of the Bill that he did not intend to proceed with the Bill. [Mr. FAITHFULL BEGG: "I made no such statement."] Did he understand the hon Gentleman distinctly to say that he intended to proceed to the Third Reading of this Bill? [Mr. FAITHFULL BEGG: "Yes."] The hon. Gentleman divided different political opinions into three categories; one was as to subjects that no one could understand, and he proceeded to tell them that this Bill was one of the subjects which he could not understand. He had said that the phraseology of the Bill might be bad, that everything in the Bill might be bad, but that he did not trouble himself with the cobwebs of phraseology. He could not help thinking himself that a lady must have drawn up this Bill. He saw the names of the right hon. Member for the Liskeard Division, of an eminent lawyer on this side of the House, and of other equally eminent Gentlemen upon it, but he should like to ask these Gentlemen and the hon. Gentleman who moved it whether they had anything to do with the drawing up of the Bill? The hon. Gentleman's silence gave consent. He should like to know whether he ever took the trouble to read the Bill before it was in print. No, he did not.

MR. FAITHFULL BEGG: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I am entirely responsible for the phraseology of the Bill so far as a layman can be responsible for a document of this kind.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said the hon. Gentleman made his position worse. He said he did read the Bill, but he had told them that he did not understand it, and he calmly put it before them without understanding what it meant. The words of the Bill were, that on and after the passing of this Act every woman who is an inhabitant, occupier or tenant of any dwelling place, tenement or building within the borough or county where such occupation exists shall be entitled to be registered as a voter. There was a certain amount of ingenuous cunning in these words, if he might say so. There were two associations for Women Suffrage, and there was a dispute going on between the women suffragists. Some desired that married women should have votes; others desired that married women should not have votes. So far as he could see—and he had taken the opinion of eminent lawyers—this Bill would not give married women votes, although it was intended by it to give married women votes. Surely they ought to know whether this Bill did give married women votes or did not. If this were a Bill for men, would they for a moment go on with it without clearly understanding so essential a point as whether they gave to one-half of the men whom they were going to enfranchise a vote or not? The Bill went on to say that women should be entitled to be registered, but it did not state what were to be the conditions of registration. They knew, in regard to men, that there were certain conditions which had to be fulfilled in order to enable a man to be on the register. One condition was the question of time; but here there was to be no time. Does the hon. Gentleman wish to place women in a different position to men? He did not think he did; and therefore he hardly thought that he did read this Bill before it was printed, or if he did so, that he did not read it with any very great care. The last clause of the Bill said, "Provided always that such woman is not subject to any legal incapacity which would disqualify a man voter." Now, what were the legal incapacities at the present moment? That a man must not be an alien, a lunatic, an idiot—or a Peer. There was actually inserted in this remarkable Bill a special clause to make a distinction between men and women, and to say that idiot, alien, or lunatic women, and Peeresses in their own right, were to have a vote. He did think that a Bill ought to be drawn up in a more practical manner before they discussed it.

Mr. FAITHFULL BEGG thought the phraseology of the Bill was perfectly clear; the object was to attach to women precisely the same disability as was attached to men.

Mr. LABOUCHERE asked the hon. Gentleman, whatever his opinion was, to look at the words he had quoted. The male voter was subject to the incapacity he had pointed out, but the Bill distinctly said that a woman was not to be. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, grammar was the same whether it applied to men or women. So far as he could see, the only women who would be enfranchised by this Bill would be widows and spinsters who lived alone and had some little shop. It was a thorough property qualification Bill, and, therefore, he should be surprised if many hon. Gentlemen on his own side voted for it. They had heard of the two million toiling women, but they were not the persons who would be enfranchised, so that the very class of women for whose sake hon. Friends of his had advocated female suffrage would not be benefited by this Measure. Very possibly his argument did not affect hon. Gentlemen on the other side. He had been very glad to notice on the other side in the present House of Commons so many young women—so many young men. [Laughter.] If he ignored their initial error in being Conservatives he had found them manly and independent in the views they expressed, and he wished to address a few remarks to them. His right hon. Friend the Member for the Forest of Dean had brought in a Bill which provided that every man and woman of full age, whether married or single, should be qualified to vote at Parliamentary or local elections unless disqualified for reason other than sex or marriage, by common law or Act of Parliament. The Bill further provided that no person should be disqualified by sex or marriage from being elected or being a Member of either House of Parliament. If they did away with the barrier of sex, logically they must give the vote to every woman. [Ministerial cheers.] What would be the consequence? In electioneering the life of a candidate would be absolutely intolerable. [Laughter.] They knew what phase of mind a lady had. She never would understand a plain answer to a question. [Laughter.] He had always observed that ladies, for whom he had the highest respect and admiration, were incapable of argument; when one proved to a woman she was wrong she simply repeated in almost the same words her previous proposition. [Laughter.] A lady, one of the leading members of the Liberal Women's Federation—he believed that was the name of it—[a laugh]—who had been in favour of female suffrage, wrote to him only this morning. She said she was recently founding a Liberal Women's Association when a lady got up and said:—

> "We need a moral vote; no one ought to be allowed to vote whose character does not bear the strictest investigation."

[Loud laughter.] He merely mentioned that as an instance of the sort of thing they would be exposed to when women ruled the roast. It must be remembered that women were in the majority. ["Not qualified."] He was pointing out that if they passed this Bill they would in the end have to give women the vote on the same conditions as they gave it to men. [Ministerial cheers.] His right hon. Friend the Member for the Forest of Dean was perfectly logical in saying that if women were to be electors they ought also to be elected. They themselves would look to that when they got the vote. What would happen? This august assembly would become an epicene club. [Laughter.] They would have men and women sitting here together and discussing matters. Women would claim the right to be on the Executive. They had now a Lord of the Admiralty; they would have a Lady of the Admiralty. [Laughter.] He really believed that the Speaker's seat would not be sacred, and that it was probable they would have a Speakeress. [Laughter.] He took it the Whips would be ladies. If he were allowed to choose the Whips he did not know anything he could not pass through the House. It was a most dangerous and fatal possibility that they would have Whips urging hon. Members, by all the blandishments known to the fair sex, to vote for or against what were their conscientious opinions. Reference had been made to the action of New Zealand on this subject, but he declined to admit that the Mother of Parliaments should be influenced by what the New Zealand Legislature did. Would the hon. Members who cited New Zealand be in favour of a proportionate income tax and divers other schemes which had passed the New Zealand Legislature? Women had votes at municipal elections. Well, he was sorry they had, but he did not think the few women who had such votes would do themselves much harm by it. But he was perfectly certain that when they obtained those votes they would make the fact an argument for claiming the Parliamentary vote. Nor had he any objection to women sitting on Boards of Guardians and School Boards, because there were matters concerning women and children who were under the control of those bodies, which women were best fitted to deal with but to say that there was no distinction between women having a vote for those local bodies and for the election of Members of Parliament was, in his opinion, to take an exceedingly low view of the Imperial Parliament. ["Hear, hear!"] What hon. Member who was in favour of this Measure would appoint a woman to manage his estate or his business? Not one of them; and to say that, because women were elected to sit on Boards of Guardians and School Boards, therefore they had a right to sit in that House, was in his opinion an utter absurdity. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen who were moving in this matter had to face the hard fact that women generally really did not want the suffrage. But they were told that, even were this so, it should not prevent the House from granting it to them, and in this connection the hon. Member who seconded the Motion asked whether the working man really wanted the suffrage before he got it. He was surprised at his hon. Friend using that argument, because he was certainly under the impression that the working man did want the suffrage, and that Parliament gave it to him, not only as a matter of justice, but because he claimed it. ["Hear, hear!"] Then it was urged, as an argument in favour of the Bill, that women had no means at present of expressing their views. Why, they went about the country holding meetings, forming associations, and getting up petitions, and they almost mobbed hon. Members when they were leaving the House. [Laughter.] He sometimes thought that, on the whole, ladies had too many means of expressing their views. [Laughter.] Assuredly, then, they had the means of expressing their views, but the views they expressed were their own particular views, and they did not represent the views of their sex. ["Hear, hear!"] As to the statement that women really desired the vote, he could only say that he had met a great many women in the course of his life, and he had not found that any such desire existed among them. In fact, he did not believe that one woman out of 100 was the least desirous of obtaining the vote. ["Hear, hear!"] He would state what happened to him at Northampton at the last General Election. Ladies connected with the Women Franchise movement came down in strong force, took a committee room, placarded the town with denunciations of him, and went about the place trying to induce persons to vote against him. Well, he asked a meeting of Liberals whether they had seen those ladies going about the town, and they said they had. Then he said he wanted to know what the husbands of those women were doing, and the men exclaimed: "Nursing the baby"—[laughter]—"Washing up the baby's dirty clothes"—[laughter]—"Cooking the dinner," or "Cleaning up the room." [Loud laughter.] He asked them whether they wished their wives to go galavanting about the country in this way, and whether they were prepared to undertake domestic duties? They said emphatically that they were not, and he did not believe he lost a single vote in consequence of the action of those ladies. ["Hear, hear!"] It was not a question of Conservative or Liberal, for not only were there a couple of Conservative, but there were two or three Liberal candidates in the field besides himself who were in favour of giving women the suffrage, and yet the men of Northampton deliberately came to the conclusion that they preferred sending to Parliament a Radical who was opposed to Women's Suffrage, rather than either a Conservative or a Radical who was in favour of it. ["Hear, hear!"] One of the ladies came to see him—a nice-looking, charming girl—[laughter]—and she said, "Is it possible that you are against us?" He said he was, and he gave this instance just to show the kind of way women talked on these matters. What did hon. Members think this lady next said to him? She said, "Do you believe in love?" [Loud laughter.] He replied that he did—more or less—[laughter]—and he added that he was surprised that so fascinating a young lady had not yet succumbed to the demands of some gentleman. "Well," she replied, "I might have done so; a baronet wanted me to marry him, but I did not love him." [Laughter.] And he then told her that, if she would take his advice, she would do a great deal better for herself to go and get a baronet than going about fishing for votes on this question. ["Hear, hear" and laughter.] He had noticed that one hon. Gentleman who had supported the Bill charged its opponents with having recourse to sentimental arguments, but he contended that sentiment was wholly on the other side of the matter. ["Hear, hear!"] He was talking the other day on the subject with an esteemed friend on that side of the House, and when he said that he was going to vote against the Bill his friend said, "Had you a mother?" [Loud laughter.] He frankly said that he had had a mother; that she did not want the suffrage, and did very well without it. ["Hear, hear!"] But really what had all this to do with the matter? ["Hear, hear!"] He only related those incidents as specimens to show the silly talk that did duty for argument on this question. He had no doubt that there were many hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House who were sincerely and honestly in favour of the Measure on the merits of the question; for instance, men like the right hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney), though he must confess that he was surprised that a man of his robust views should be in favour of it. It was further urged that the proposal ought to be granted on grounds of justice, and they were asked whether it was just to impose taxation without representation? Well, the present Bill would not give representation to women generally even if it were passed. Widows and moneyed spinsters were not the only women who were taxed. There was such a thing as indirect taxation, and all women were subject to it. ["Hear, hear!"] Did hon. Gentlemen think that they would in any way benefit the vast numbers of working women, large numbers of whom were subjected to sweating, by granting the suffrage to widows and moneyed spinsters, who would in no sort of way, and in no sense, represent them? ["Hear, hear" and murmurs of dissent.] He did not think so, and when hon. Members talked about Justice demanding the Measure, it should always be borne in mind that the matter was really based on common sense. Nature had made a distinction between men and women, and no Act of Parliament could alter that distinction. [Laughter.] Woman had her province, and he would prefer to leave her to it. For women to exercise the Parliamentary vote, to meddle with Parliamentary elections, or to be in Parliament, was as absurd as for men to engage in the occupations of women. He asserted that women were physically unable to fulfil the full duties of citizenship. [An hon. Member: "There are exceptions."] Yes, but they could not legislate for exceptions. They must legislate for the general mass. He knew perfectly well that no man here, with perhaps two or three exceptions, would fight if they were engaged in war abroad, but, if the country was invaded, then it was the duty of every man sound in wind and limb to fight for the country. It is impossible to say that women could fulfil the primary duty of citzenship, which was to defend the country against foreign invasion, unless they went back to the reign of the Amazons. Intellectually, he said, that women had not these gifts which fitted them for being elected. They had got a certain amount of what he might call instinct rather than reason, but they were impulsive, emotional, and had got absolutely no sense of proportion. The tendency of women had been to fall under influence. His hon. Friend the Seconder said it was desirable they should fall under the influence of the Church, meaning all Churches. He thought that Members on that side of the House drew a great line of distinction between religious matters and political matters, and that, while they recognised that the pastors of the different denominations were in their right in exercising influence over their flocks in religious matters, they must not have one half-pennyworth of influence over them in political matters. Woman was essentially an altruist, if he might be allowed to use the expression—she worked through somebody else. The fact was, woman's province was not to go into the market-place and talk. Who was the woman they had respected for ages? Cornelia. Did they suppose that if Cornelia had gone talking in the Forum her name would have come down to them with that respect it had? No. They respected her because she was the mother of the Gracchi—because she brought into the world these Gracchi, and worked through them for the benefit of her country. He did not want women to take part in the rough wrangles and quarrels that distinguished political life. It had always been the rule, since the world began, that it was most undesirable that women should take that active part in public life that men did. The Greek view of women was that the best woman was the woman who was the least heard of. The Roman view was, "the woman who lived chaste, made wool, and looked after her own house." For his part he was of opinion that those views, though old, were sound and solid, and by them he should always stand. He stood there, not only as the advocate of man, but as representing the wishes of the women in protesting against their being given votes, and in saying that the vast mass of women did not want them. If they had the ballot he did not think they would have twenty Members of that House voting for this Bill. He only asked hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House to vote fairly and squarely, and according to their own conscientious opinions. If they did really believe it was desirable that the whole of the women should have votes and should be allowed to sit in that House, and to fulfil all the duties that were now performed by men in public matters, let them by all means vote for this Bill. But he urged them not to vote simply because they imagined that this was not a practical question, and that the Bill would not be pushed forward. The fact was, they pledged themselves by giving a vote for the Bill, because if it was not pushed forward at the present moment another Bill would be brought in later, they would be reminded that they had already voted for a similar Measure, and that they were bound to continue to do so. Always after a large extension of the franchise there was almost immediately a general election. The result of this vote would be that there would be a general election. He showed the strength of his convictions on this subject by urging the House to vote against the Bill, although he thought that in some respects a general election was most desirable. If hon. Gentlemen opposite were not anxious for a general election let them not give a vote, a thoroughly unpractical vote, for a Bill which was drawn up in a fashion truly ridiculous, and which at one moment tried to persuade them that all women would have votes, and, at another moment, that they would not have votes.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said they knew that there were more than 100 Members who would vote for the Bill that day, and they voted because there was a strong feeling outside for the Bill. The hon. Member for Hereford seemed to imply that there was no feeling in Cumberland in favour of it. He happened to know that there were no less than 4,000 women connected with the various political associations in that county, and every one of those associations was in favour of Women's Suffrage. He was glad that there had not been much said that day on the odious lines of voting for this Bill, because women would vote this or that way. He thought that was about the lowest line anybody could take. If all the women were to vote in favour of the publicans he should still be in favour of giving them votes, because he thought it was right and just that they should have them. There could only be two sound and satisfactory reasons why women should not be allowed to take part in Parliamentary elections. One was that they had some defect in their intellect, and the other was that they had some defect in their conscience. Either their head or their heart must be wrong if they were justified in excluding them as they were now excluded. He did not think there was any deterioration in women in regard to character in any way. A diploma of this kind from the hon. Member for Flint was trustworthy. But, without going so far as the hon. Member for Flint, he would say that women were at least as good as men. Then, if they were not too bad for the franchise, they were too stupid? If the stupid were to be excluded from the franchise, how about the illiterate voters? These were entrusted with the franchise, and elaborate precautions were taken to allow them to record their votes. Surely these should be excluded if women were to be excluded. What did the £10 householders know about politics when the Whigs enfranchised them in 1832; or the householders who were enfranchised by the Tories in 1864; or the county voters whom Mr. Gladstone enfranchised in 1884? The way to teach people politics was to let them take part in politics, else it was to act on the principle of the old lady who would not allow her son to go into the water until he had learned to swim. [Laughter.] Women would learn politics, and have plenty of teachers when they had votes to give. Many of them were politicians now. Look at the Primrose Dames—did they not talk politics at their meetings? Look at the Women's Liberal Association—were they not at the present time most active among Liberal organisations? It was but a year ago that his hon. Friend Mr. Labouchere took him to address a Women's Liberal Association somewhere in the East End of London. [Laughter.] Were not candidates delighted to avail themselves of the services of women? Of course they were; and was it not an extraordinary thing for a Member to accept the assistance of women to influence voters, and yet to say that women who could influence votes were not fit to have a vote themselves? This was more inconsistent than the average politician, and that was saying a good deal. Another argument which had not been used much during the Debate was what he might call the refinement argument, the argument that women were too refined, and would be spoiled if they took part in the rough and tumble of Parties—that they are too good for politics. He read in a newspaper the other day how at Dunedin, New Zealand, where it appeared the women electors outnumbered the men, they returned a man who had been very much opposed to giving the franchise to women, and he explained his position by saying he opposed the extension because women were too good for the franchise, not that the franchise was too good for women. That might be so; he did not know whether that argument would be used. It had been said by so great an authority as Mr. Gladstone, that to adopt Women's Suffrage would be to invite women to leave that position of delicacy, purity and refinement which is the present source of her power. But he was not convinced. If politics degraded women they degraded men; and if there was something degrading in politics, then they had better not take part in them, but leave them to the basest of mankind. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet (Mr. J. Lowther) had in times past expressed the view that the Turf offered a more honourable pursuit than proceedings in the House, but he did not agree with the right hon. Gentleman. In sitting for six months in the House, trying to promote just legislation for the whole country, they were employed in the noblest work men could occupy themselves with. If, as Mr. Gladstone said in one of his articles, all those who lived in a country should love that country and take an interest in it, it was a most patriotic thing to give women votes. He could not understand how any Liberal could be afraid in this matter. He looked upon his hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) as a leader of democrats, as a friend of political economy and of liberty in every shade, and yet there he was shuddering and shaking in his shoes at the prospect of a few women voting for or against him. [Laughter.] It was an extraordinary position to take, and it gave him a thrill of pain to contemplate him. Everybody was to have equal justice—except women. An American planter expressed the view that all men are born free except niggers; and similarly his hon. Friend declared all men are born free except women. [Laughter.] If women were admitted to the franchise, what harm could they do? Could they make things worse than they were? Mankind had been running the world for some four thousand years, and had made an awful mess of it; could women make it worse with hundred-million Budgets, massacres, famine, riots, and frightful war expenditure all over the world? Would they bring in the drink traffic or do anything to remove evils which, as Mr. Gladstone said, made our people in our slums as miserable and degraded as those of any heathen country? Let us not wrap ourselves in self-complacency and say, "Who can show us any good?" Take women's help in everything that was humane and merciful, everything that would alleviate the lot of our suffering fellow countrymen—that was our duty. He might quote the words of the present Prime Minister, uttered some eight months ago:—

> "It is the improvement of the daily life of struggling millions, the diminution of the sorrows so many are born to, which is the task, the blessed task, that Parliament is called into existence for."

If that be so, then call in women to help in that noble work. We had arrived at a year which should be memorable in the annals of this country, and every day brought suggestions how to celebrate the completion of the sixtieth year of the reign of our Sovereign—a woman—he might say the woman of the century. The House might do something worthy of the celebration of this great event, the longest reign in English history, by performing a great act of enfranchisement, which would be a legislative monument for all years to come of statesmanlike justice. ["Hear!"]

COL. WARING (Down, N.) said he was an advocate of the rights of women, but he took a view slightly differing from that of hon. Members who had posed in the part. He was a convert or a pervert. The first time he voted in the House on this subject it was for a Bill similar to the present, and on the present occasion he had the full intention of voting in an opposite sense. He had been convinced by the arguments of women themselves, and held with good reason, that the majority of women, and those whose opinions were best worth having, were strongly opposed to the Bill. He was not without a little experience in the matter, and had the opportunity of knowing the views of a considerable number of ladies in various relations, and he had found them without exception opposed to this Bill becoming the law of the land. The proposer and seconder of the Amendment had gone over the grounds of objection thoroughly, and had dealt with the question from a jocular point of view. That was not his intention. He held the view of women, who were the best judges in this matter, that in accepting the franchise they would surrender more powerful influence than they would receive in political matters. They preferred the indirect power to the direct power with which it was proposed to invest them. This direct power would be exercised only by that class of women of whom samples might be seen outside the doors of the House. He confessed that he did not think the hon. Member for Northampton, or even St. Anthony, would incur much danger in passing through the small crowd in the Lobby. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] Well, it was his opinion; it was matter of taste. If hon. Members found attractions there it was surprising that they attended the Debate. The opinion among women generally was opposed to their introduction into political turmoil. If they had the franchise they would prefer not to use it, and still less would they like to be governed by their fussy sisters who Members might see in the Lobby. What evidence was there that women asked for the franchise? The evidence only of those ladies to whom he had alluded. There had been no demonstration on the other side, simply because those who were opposed to the Measure were those who considered it would be out of their sphere to demonstrate. They had demonstrated indirectly through their husbands, brothers, and sons, and he hoped they would do so effectually on the present occasion. The proposer of this Bill talked about their discarding prejudice. He had no prejudice in this matter. He had already voted for this proposal, and now he was prepared to vote the opposite way, because in the intervening time he had become convinced that to pass such a Measure would be mischievous to the country, mischievous to the sex it was proposed to emancipate, and mischievous to the interests of the world at large. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Bill talked about the military argument. He dared say there were some Members who wished to see the military influence of this country less preponderant than it was, and who thought that if ladies had a vote wars and rumours of wars would cease. He believed that the most militant and most military people were the ladies. Did they ever hear of a woman who would not like to see her son in the Army or Navy, and if she had children in either branch of the service would object to their going to the front? It was said that ladies should have this direct power because their male relations did not represent them. He thought a good many hon. Members would be chary about giving a vote contrary to the desires of his female relatives. It might also be said that, as the local franchise had been given to women, they should, therefore, extend to them the franchise for Imperial purposes. However, that was an entirely different question. In local matters their advice and assistance was most valuable, and he himself assisted his hon. Friend the Member for South Belfast in getting an Act passed last Session to enable ladies to serve as members of Boards of Guardians in Ireland. They were told that this question was a moral question. No doubt it was, but he doubted very much whether the ladies who were anxious to obtain a vote were the best judges of how that moral question could be best solved.

Mr. G. WYNDHAM (Dover) said that, as being in some slight degree responsible for the shape in which this Measure had been presented to the House—in collaboration, of course, with many others of greater experience and of far greater technical knowledge in the matter of drafting than he could pretend to be—he should like, for a moment, to take up the challenge which the hon. Member for Northampton had thrown out. He was sorry the hon. Member was not in his place. His speech amused the House, but it surprised him a little. On the cover of the weekly periodical which they all associated with the hon. Gentleman, there appeared the classic presentment of woman personified, as he had always ingenuously thought, with that wide wisdom, that manly courage, that common sense which the hon. Gentleman attributed to himself that afternoon, and which justified him, in his own opinion, in judging and condemning everyone in this Kingdom—from the Prime Minister in his own Party down to a corporal in a marching regiment. The hon. Member began his speech by a sigh for the good old days. He remembered, he said, when this subject was a jest. Everyone would admit that the hon. Member could give it new life, that in his hands age had not withered it, nor custom staled its manifold variety. It was still amusing; but if the hon. Member could make fun of this matter which was new, he could not produce any new arguments. The arguments he adduced were the old arguments, and in particular he would beg the attention of the House to his use of a familiar device. He hardly touched the merits of the question at all, for he did not call it an attack upon the merits of the question to say in one sentence that women are so subjected to the influence of the other sex that they ought on that account, and that account alone, to be struck off the register, and in the very next sentence to say there were not 20 men in the House who would vote according to their convictions, because they were all subject to the influence of women. As to the shape in which the Measure was presented to the House, it was the result of many Debates in times past. When the hon. Member argued that the House was suspicious, and justly suspicious, of any attempt to capture its assent to abstract resolutions, he associated himself with him. But in times past so many attacks had been made upon the shape in which this Measure was put forward that they dared not bring it forward as, perhaps, they should have done, in the form of a resolution, because if they had brought forward a resolution on the question of Women's Suffrage they should have been told that such a resolution weighed for nothing. They were, then, driven to a Bill. But if a Bill was brought forward, on the other hand, which introduced any question which was rather a question of franchise —whether for men or for women—it gave an opportunity to the enemy. He would assume that they made women who were owners voters, in right of their ownership, and not of their occupation. If they had done so, there was not a Radical who would have voted for the Measure. He would assume, on the other hand, that they had left out the owners and put in women on the larger or service franchise. In such a case there was hardly a Conservative in the House who would have voted for it. Hon. Gentlemen who differed from them might say it was clear they could not frame a Bill on this subject. He denied that altogether. He said if, in that House, it was impossible to invite an opinion upon a question of principle, why then they were restricted by the law they had made from doing the duty which the country expected from them. The country did expect that this House should be able to say whether the sex was to remain under this disability or not, and in this Bill they invited the House to say yea or nay to that question, and invited them to pronounce on no other question of representation whatever. The hon. Member for Northampton, descending into minuter details, tried to frighten people by saying that in this Bill they gave a woman a preferential right over a man in the matter of registration. He did not read it so. They entitled a woman to be placed on the register of voters, but they only entitled her to be placed on as the Revising Barrister acted in accordance with the rules and procedure of his office. This Measure was, in the opinion of its promoters, a Reform Bill, and they declined to associate it in their minds with the terrors which the hon. Member for Northampton had depicted before them. They thought that this Reform Bill had nothing whatever to do with the so-called movement for Women's Rights, whatever might be the merits or demerits of that movement. It had nothing more to do with that movement for Women's Rights than the Reform Bill of 1885 had to do with the propaganda of Jack Cade. On the contrary, they held—and they appealed to the past to support them—that the result of every inclusion of new voters into the electorate had been to minimise the apparent importance of the most extreme advocates of those reform measures. He remembered when he was a boy that the name of the hon. Member for North West Norfolk was a word of terror in good Tory households, while now he was an esteemed and popular Member of that House on both sides. He would name again another question of representation —the question as to whether the religious test should be applied in that House. Mr. Bradlaugh, so long as he fighting for that question, was also a word of terror, but, when he had won the victory on that question of representation, Mr. Bradlaugh was also an esteemed and popular Member of the House. And so, he thought, it would be found that when the franchise was granted to women, who otherwise were capable and were householders, a great deal of the extreme pronunciation of views with which some persons were alarmed would no longer be heard. So long as they did not allow an elector to give effect to his voice constitutionally, he was justified in trying to attract their attention. For his part, he said that before the last Reform Bill he thought an agricultural labourer was quite entitled to "booh" a candidate while he was making a speech, for he had no other way of showing that candidate that he disagreed with him. Now, however, he had no longer any such right to "booh" him. If he did so he was a public nuisance, because he had a remedy in his hands. If he did not agree with the candidate, he could now vote against him. So also if the hon. Member for Northampton had been incommoded by the arguments pressed upon him by certain ladies in this country, if he would pass this Bill, he had the remedy in his hands. He could say, "My dear lady, if you disagree with me, vote against me at the next election; do not trouble me with your arguments now." But that was exactly what the hon. Member feared. In spite of all his imposing attitude of manly courage, what was the real motive of the hon. Member for Northampton in opposing the Bill? It was very transparent. He said that if these ladies had a vote they would make the life of a candidate intolerable. What he meant was, that they would bring the Parliamentary existence of certain Members to an abrupt close. That was really the view of the hon. Member. Mr. Bagehot, in his work on the English Constitution, said that when Lord Eldon was Lord Chancellor of England the only political view he had was that things as they were were consistent with the continued existence of John Scott, Earl of Eldon; but if there were any change how did he know that they would be? So it seemed to be with the hon. Member for Northampton. Things as they were were consistent with his having a seat in that House, but if there was any change he might not any longer be very sure of his seat. [Laughter.] What was there in the present representative machinery of this country that claimed sentimental adherence? We spent many thousands a year to get barristers to interpret Acts of Parliament relating to our electoral system. The problem of Women's Suffrage would be presented to the same tribunal, and the technical difficulties which might be involved ought not to affect the decision of the House.

Sir BARRINGTON SIMEON (Southampton) asked how they were to be sure that ladies would not claim to sit in the House of Commons if they once had Parliamentary votes. If once there was "one man one vote, and every man a vote," how could they deny votes to women? Considering there were 1,100,000 more women than men, and that every woman would have a vote if ever one got it, were they to suppose that when women could swamp the votes of men they would be content to remain outside. If ever they got into Parliament the end of this country would not be far off. The immediate result, however, of this Bill would be the biggest creation of faggot votes ever known. Rich men would buy votes for their wives and daughters, while the wives and daughters of artisans, who were told at every election that they were the backbone of the country, would have no votes. This would work the greatest possible injustice, and he could not possibly vote for such a thing. If the working classes were the backbone of the country, why should not the female backbone of the country have votes. This present House of Commons contained more new Members (and he was one of them) than any previous House, and if they were as wise and sensible as their predecessors they would defeat this most unwise and pernicious Bill by a very large majority. [Cheers.]

Mr. JEBB (Cambridge University), in supporting the Bill, said he would confine himself to certain definite arguments for and against the principle of the Bill. Did women really want the vote or not? He remembered very well, in 1892, the last occasion upon which this question was discussed in the House, the present Leader of the House, as he was also then, in winding up the Debate, remarking that he did not know any way in which women could have manifested their desire for the franchise in which they had not manifested it, and he observed that when the agricultural labourers received the franchise in 1885 there was not then more evidence before the country of their desire for the franchise than there was now of such a desire on the part of women. No one knew exactly what proportion of women desired the franchise, but it was well known that a very large number of educated and intelligent women had been active in demanding it. In his opinion the demand among educated and thoughtful women had greatly increased even in the last five years, and at the present moment the number who desired the franchise as compared with the number who desired it in 1892 had very much increased. On what ground was the vote to be refused to women who had the qualification? Two grounds were mentioned, one of which was that women were of an inferior mental capacity to men. But that was no longer maintained. The other ground given was that women could not bear arms in defence of the country; but he submitted that, even in the case of invasion, there were large numbers of men who would probably not be capable of rendering very efficient service. Possibly, if the garrison of Inverness were in need of a librarian, for instance, he might offer himself for the post. [Laughter.] In the case of war, women, like men, would have their taxes raised, and he could not imagine that they should be refused the franchise on the ground that they could not bear arms. Then what was the force of the assertion that no legislation remained to be passed in the interests of women which would not have an equally good chance of passing, even if women continued to have no votes? It was an undoubted fact that much legislation in the interest of women had been passed in recent years, but it ought to be remembered that the attention given to that subject had been largely influenced by the fact that during the same period an active movement had been in progress for extending the franchise to women. But such a movement could not be relied on as a permanent force for keeping up the attention of legislators to the interests of women. He granted that legislators had in recent times had no desire whatever to refuse justice to women, but women were necessarily better judges of the needs of women than men could possibly be. It could not be denied that before the extension of the franchise to the agricultural labourer there was an earnest desire to do everything that was just for the agricultural labourer, but after he got the franchise the needs of his class were viewed for the first time from the point of view of that class; and the same was true of every successive extension of the Suffrage. If women had the Suffrage, legislators would legislate in the light of the directly expressed views of women on questions relating to the interests of women. ["Hear, hear!"] He had the honour of being a Member of the Royal Commission appointed to deal with certain educational questions. There were women members of that Commission, and one of the problems with which they had to deal was connected with girls' schools, and the male members found they had very much to learn from the women members. Women's Suffrage was especially desirable in the interests of those women engaged in employment which they shared with men, and in the interests of women who were candidates for employment as to their fitness for which men were at present the sole judges, and had the final power of excluding them. Large numbers of such women were not in a position to take any active part in demanding the Suffrage. The hon. Member who seconded the Bill referred to a large deputation of women which came up from the collieries to represent their views on the subject of female labour in collieries. Many of the women who had been leaders of the movement had taken that part not only because they themselves desired the franchise, but also in the interests of women engaged in such employments as he had mentioned. It was true that the omission of the Lodger Franchise from the Bill would exclude numbers of women for whom the Suffrage was especially desirable, but he submitted that this was eminently a question in which it was desirable to proceed circumspectly, and the omission of the Lodger Franchise was not a reason for voting against the principle of the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] It was said that women would be drawn out of their proper sphere. He did not see how voting would do that. They already canvassed and spoke on platforms, and candidates for Parliament were only too glad to get them as canvassers. It was further contended that domestic interests would be neglected; but did domestic life make larger demands on women than professional life on men? Then it was said that the relations between the sexes would be revolutionised. He was unable to see how that result was to follow. If anything they could do in that House was capable of subverting the fundamental laws of nature, the powers of the House were very much greater than he took them to be. A revolution in the relations between man and woman was not likely to occur until "human nature is other than it is now." As to the suggestion that women would claim seats in Parliament if they obtained the franchise, there was absolutely no logical or practical connection between giving women votes and giving them seats in Parliament. Clergymen had votes, but they could not sit in the House. It might be said that the Bishops represented them. Were men then to be looked on as Bishops, and women as a sort of inferior Clergy? It was said, again, that women would believe too much in the remedial power of legislation, and that if they had the franchise there would be some danger of increasing the tendency to over-legislation. What proof was there that women held that belief any more than men? And if they did, what reason was there to doubt that a little experience would cure them of the illusion? He now came to an argument which deserved respectful attention. It was that women were by nature more emotional and excitable than men. It was argued that a leaven of female voters in the electorate might be dangerous at times of crisis, when popular feeling ran high—as, for instance, at times when the issue of peace or war was in question. But what proof was there that women were on the average more emotional and excitable than men? It would certainly be difficult for them to be more so than some men, and he did not know by which process it was to be established that as a sex they were so. He should say that as a sex they were more practical than men. He would now introduce a few considerations on the other side. The calamities of war fell on women even more heavily than on men, because war desolated the home. At such a crisis as that supposed, women would have an even stronger motive than men for using their influence against any rash or precipitate movement of public opinion. ["Hear, hear!"] At such a moment women would, probably, be often a moderating force. Another case in which the supposed emotional temperament of women was represented as a danger was the case of suffering caused by improvidence or vice. It was alleged that women would lean towards an excessive and misplaced clemency. Now it was to be noted that women were not more lenient, but usually harder and more severe, than most men in their judgment of certain delinquencies; for example, in their judgment of suffering incurred by thriftlessness—for women were accustomed to the details of economy, and were apt to resent the absence of thrift with just severity. Again, women are more severe than men towards all offences against the life of the family. And, further, a wider consideration applies here. The women who had been most active in claiming the Suffrage were familiar with the arguments which had been used against their claim. They would be especially on their guard against justifying the objectors by committing those errors which their opponents asserted that women, as a sex, would be sure to commit. And the less educated portion of the female electorate would be influenced in such cases by the example of those women to whom they would look as their natural leaders in such a matter. Further, the political responsibility of the Suffrage would of itself tend to steady and sober the judgment of women. If, on some public questions, some women had shown a lack of that quality, this had not been due simply to the temperament of woman, but also to the fact that hitherto they had not had the direct responsibilities of active citzenship. It was objected that, as there were more women than men in this country, the votes of men might ultimately be swamped by the votes of women. This argument assumed that men and women voters would form opposite camps. But how, he asked, was this argument to be reconciled with the other argument that there was no reason for giving women votes, inasmuch as all that they could want had already been done for them by male legislators? For, if that were the case, why should the votes of all women be arrayed against the votes of men? The two arguments contradicted each other, and the first, that all women would vote on one side and all men on the other, was flagrantly absurd. What were the probable advantages of Women's Suffrage? An eminent writer had said that women were, on the whole, more conscientious than men. Without denying or affirming that, it might be said that the number of women who would vote with a real and intelligent sense of civic duty would probably be at least as large as the number of men who did so. When a woman had some definite duty set before her, she was at least as scrupulous in the discharge of it as the average man, especially if it demanded self-effacement and self-sacrifice. The new element which Women's Suffrage would add to the electorate would probably have the quality of conscientiousness in a high degree. The result would tend to increase the importance of character in public life, and that was a result which they would all welcome. It had been said by the hon. Member for Hereford that in the State of Washington the Suffrage was given to women and then taken away. He could not help wondering that the hon. Member who used that argument against this proposal to give the Suffrage to women did not see that it cut both ways, because the reason for the withdrawal of the privilege at Washington might have been that the male voters found the female voters more fastidious than they desired. Then women knew a great deal about the life of the poor, and if they obtained the vote questions affecting the social condition of the masses would come to the front. Women would be opposed by instinct to violent or revolutionary changes, and to Measures involving confiscation of property. Let no one suppose that he meant that women, as such, would collectively lean to one of the great parties in the State rather than to the other. He could imagine nothing more absurd than to predict that the female sex, if enfranchised, would prove to be collectively Conservative or collectively Liberal. What might safely be predicted was that the general influence of women would tend to moderate extreme tendencies on either side in politics. It would be no slight gain from Women's Suffrage if, through it, mothers who had taken an intelligent interest in the public affairs of their country, and in the duties of citzenship, were thereby better fitted to educate their children in such thoughts and aims as would tend to make them patriotic and public-spirited men and women. When he weighed the objections which had been urged against Women's Suffrage, and placed in the other scale the advantages which might reasonably be expected from it, he could feel no doubt to which side the balance inclined. He supported this Bill, not only because it was just, but also because he believed it to be expedient in the public interest. [Cheers.]

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I do not feel as if I ought to give a silent vote upon this Bill. It seems to me that if there ever was a question upon which people ought to have the courage of their opinions it is this. ["Hear, hear!"] They ought to form an opinion and act upon it according to their convictions. It has been agreed all through this discussion that we are not dealing merely with the details of this particular Bill. That, I think, is generally admitted by both sides. What we are dealing with is a principle of the highest possible importance and of the gravest possible consequences. We have to consider it not in the least, I should hope, with reference to speculations as to the effect of that principle upon political parties—["hear, hear!"]—but with reference to the result which it will have not only upon the present, but upon the future interests of this country. I suppose that if this Bill is intended to do anything it is intended to assert ultimately the identical rights of women to exercise the electoral franchise with men. I shall not discuss the question on the ground of the distinction between local and Imperial questions. Everybody must feel that there is a real and solid distinction between them. ["Hear, hear!"] You cannot import the mere fact of female suffrage in local matters as a substantial and far less a conclusive argument in favour of female suffrage in Imperial matters. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Why not?"] If that does not commend itself to the hon. Member he can answer me. To my mind the point is obvious. I decline altogether to enter upon invidious comparisons of the merits or capacities of the two sexes, for it requires a man with more courage than I possess to make distinctions of that kind. [Laughter.] But some Gentlemen have entered upon that dangerous ground. They will find abundance of such discussion in the modern literature of the day—[laughter]—conducted, I think, to a great degree, probably to the largest degree, by the more numerous sex. [Laughter.] I shall confine myself to one single point, a dry, statistical point, which is incapable of contradiction and introduces no controversy—namely, the numerical relations of the two sexes. That has been stated already over and over again in this Debate. There are in this country 1,200,000 more women than men. This is practically a Bill for the ultimate enfranchisement of that majority. [Cheers.] The hon. Member for

Durham argued upon that basis. He did not proceed with the caution of the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge, who held out as an encouragement to men in this matter that this would be such a very small Bill. It is not a small Bill in the consequences which it may entail. It is a very great Bill, for you cannot resist the ultimate results of this Measure. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Northampton referred to the Bill of my right hon. Friend the Member for the Forest of Dean. That is a Bill for universal manhood suffrage, and if that principle is ultimately accepted this Bill will lead as a consequence to universal female suffrage. There is not an arugument used by the hon. Member for the University just now which is not applicable to the ultimate extension of the suffrage to all women. That is the question upon which you are to vote to-day; that is the consideration that you ought to have in your minds. The hon. Member for the University asked what connection there is between voting powers and a seat in the Legislature. Well, there is the most intimate connection. My right hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, the greatest authority upon that question, tells me that in the American States, where the vote has been given to women the capacity for a seat in the Legislature has also been given as a matter of course. Therefore we can see what is the character and magnitude of this question. No man can doubt that at some time or other—it may be sooner, it may be later—all the restrictions, or most of the restrictions which are now placed upon male suffrage will be removed. These things wait sometimes a great deal longer than people hope, but they come quicker sometimes than people expect. But those restrictions will be removed. The hon. Member for the University of Cambridge says that it is not to be expected that all men will vote on one side and all women on the other. No man expects that, but is it not perfectly clear that where you have a majority of 1,200,000 those who possess that majority must in the long run have the determining voice? Then this is a very fundamental change in the constitution of the country. [Cheers]. No one can doubt that. It is to establish what I think was called in the course of this Debate a change upon an Amazonian basis; you are going to establish the electorate on a popular womanhood majority. In my opinion that may be a good thing or a bad thing, but it is not a thing to be disposed of on a Wednesday afternoon. [Cheers.] If a proposal so fundamentally affecting the whole Parliamentary Constitution of this country is to be entertained, not in a trivial Bill, but in a discussion of a great principle with enormous consequences, it ought to be produced on the authority of a responsible Government. [Cheers.] I do not see any indications to-day that Her Majesty's advisers are prepared to take the responsibility of making any such recommendation. [Laughter and Cheers.] Therefore it appears to me that this is not the manner and this is not the occasion to inaugurate the establishment of such a momentous change. This is a question which I think does not come within the ordinary category of these Wednesday debates, the value of which I entirely admit. I attach to it consequences which for good or for evil are of the most momentous character in the future of this Empire. I am not entitled at all to express any opinion as to what are the real sentiments of women on this subject. Each man must form his own judgment according to his own lights on that matter. Several hon. Gentlemen have expressed their opinions, among them the hon. Member for the Cambridge University. I am sure that his opinion is gathered from the most enlightened sources, but he qas not gathered it, I am afraid, from his eminent studies in the ancient classics, particularly in the pages of Aristophanes. [Laughter.] To my mind, and according to my experience of what I have observed and learned, I should say that the great majority of women do not desire to have the Parliamentary vote. [Cheers.] I have come to the conclusion, therefore, and I think it my duty to express it to the House, that it is not wise or expedient, nor is this a proper occasion for the House of Commons, by what I can hardly call in all respects a considerate vote, to endeavour to establish a principle of this kind, not on the responsibility of those who generally lead or advise the House, but by what I can only call on this occasion a catch vote to determine a question of this enormous consequence. I feel compelled, therefore, to give my vote against this Bill. [Cheers.]

*MR. LEONARD COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) thought that the advocates of this Bill were to be congratulated on the fact that his right hon. Friend had refused to give a silent vote on this occasion. He had, however, given a silent vote before now. Indeed, he had heard him declare that he would never undergo the degradation of speaking on this question. [Laughter.] Why had he spoken to-day? It was a good augury; they were going to win. [Ironical laughter.] What was the kind of argument addressed to the House whenever any discussion arose on women's suffrage? He always asked those who were debating the question to substitute men for women, and to see whether the same argument would not apply. His right hon. Friend, disdaining the question as to the moral constitution of men and women, based his argument on the firm principle of numerical superiority. They had heard that argument used in respect of men. [Cheers.] His right hon. Friend had in previous years heard the argument used with regard to the admission of the artisan class to the franchise and he had heard it said that the admission of the artisans would swamp the men of property and intelligence, and though they might impose what checks and limitations they chose to the progress of manhood suffrage, the artisans would overwhelm the other classes. He remembered that on one occasion Mr. Lowe used an illustration to the effect that the artisans were so numerous that it might be said, as Curran said of the fleas, "if united they could pull a man out of bed." [Laughter.] If, therefore, the artisans were united they could break down all the limitations which were against their wishes. Had they done so? Again, it was said that if the women united in that far distant time when there was absolute equality between men and women in respect of voting, the women might outvote the men. There was the same unfounded apprehension with respect to women as previously existed with respect to the labouring classes. He was astonished that his right hon. Friend, who had listened with disdain to similar arguments when applied to different classes of men, did not see how it disposed of the same question when it was based on the numerical argument. Then his right hon. Friend said that if the change were to be made at all it should not be voted on a Wednesday afternoon—[cheers]—and that it must be introduced by a responsible Minister. Did his right hon. Friend say that when the extension of the county franchise was proposed, or when household suffrage in the boroughs was brought forward? Not at all. Then it was a very proper exercise for the opinion of the House, if not to effect and promote legislation, at least to educate Ministers for the future. He hoped, therefore, that the House of Commons would disdain the notion that it had to wait for the Ministers of the Crown before it expressed its opinion as to whether women be enfranchised or not. The whole of these arguments were a thorough illustration of "the fears of the grave and the follies of the wise." They were afraid of a vast upsetting of human society, of overturning the relation of the sexes, and of altering the constitution of human nature. The House might do many things, but it could not achieve those ends. Those fears as to the dreadful consequences of this change recalled to his mind what was said by an even more advanced authority than his right hon. Friend 60 years ago. Hon. Members knew that before the old House of Commons was burnt down women were admitted to hear the Debates. There was a ventilating cylinder in the centre of the hall, and there was a gallery down which the ladies peeped and listened. When the question arose as to the rebuilding of the House there was a discussion as to whether there should be a gallery for the ladies. Sir John Cam Hobhouse declared then that "life would be intolerable if there was to be a Ladies' Gallery." [Laughter.] Those were the terrors which Sir John held out in those days, and they were just as substantial as those with which his right hon. Friend now tried to frighten the House. A former Speaker once interfered in a Debate in Committee to express his opinion that if a Ladies' Gallery were provided, society as at present constituted could not exist. [Laughter.] But society had existed in spite of the Ladies' Gallery, and it would exist in spite of the passing of this Bill that afternoon. [Cheers.]

*Mr. FAITHFULL BEGG rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

*Mr. SPEAKER: I think it right that the House should have an opportunity of saying whether it does or does not desire to come to a decision on the Bill. I, therefore, accept the Motion.

The House divided:—Ayes, 214; Noes, 170.—(Division List—No. 15—appended.)

AYES.

Abraham, William (Cork, N.E.)
Abraham, William (Rhondda)
Aird, John
Allan, William (Gateshead)
Ambrose, William (Middlesex)
Arch, Joseph
Arnold, Alfred
Arrol, Sir William
Ascroft, Robert
Austin, Sir John (Yorkshire)
Balfour, Rt. Hon. A. J. Manch'r)
Barlow, John Emmott
Barry, A. H. Smith- (Hunts.)
Beach, W. W. Bramston (Hants.)
Beckett, Ernest William
Bentinck, Lord Henry C.
Bhownaggree, M. M.
Bigham, John Charles
Bousfield, William Robert
Brigg, John
Brookfield, A. Montagu
Buchanan, Thomas Ryburn
Bucknill, Thomas Townsend
Burt, Thomas
Cameron, Robert
Carson, Edward
Cecil, Lord Hugh
Chaloner, Captain R. G. W.
Channing, Francis Allston
Clare, Octavius Leigh
Clough, Walter Owen
Cohen, Benjamin Louis
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse
Colville, John
Cook, Fred. Lucas (Lambeth)
Corbett, A. Cameron (Glasgow)
Courtney, Rt. Hon. Leonard H.
Cox, Robert
Cozens-Hardy, Herbert Hardy
Cross, Herb. Shepherd (Bolton)
Curran, Thomas B. (Donegal)
Currie, Sir Donald
Davenport, W. Bromley
Davies, M. Vaughan-(Cardigan)
Davies, W. Rees- (Pembrokesh.)
Davitt, Michael
Denny, Colonel
Dilke, Rt. Hon. Sir Charles
Dixon, George
Dixon-Hartland, Sir Fred. Dixon
Doogan, P. C.
Dorington, Sir John Edward
Drucker, A.
Dunn, Sir William
Edwards, Gen. Sir James Bevan
Fardell, Thomas George
Farquharson, Dr. Robert
Fenwick, Charles
Fielden, Thomas
Finch, George H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Firbank, Joseph Thomas
Fisher, William Heay
FitzGerald, Sir R. U. Penrose
FitzWygram, General Sir F.
Forster, Henry William
Foster, Harry S. (Suffolk)
Foster, Sir Walter (Derby Co.)
Fowler, Matthew (Durham)
Fry, Lewis
Galloway, William Johnson
Gedge, Sydney
Gilliat, John Saunders
Goddard, Daniel Ford
Gold, Charles
Goldsworthy, Major-General
Gordon, John Edward
Gorst, Rt. Hon. Sir John Eldon
Goulding, Edward Alfred
Gourley, Sir Edward Temperley
Graham, Henry Robert
Gray, Ernest (West Ham)
Green, Walford D. (Wednesb'ry)
Gull, Sir Cameron
Haldane, Richard Burdon
Hall, Sir Charles
Hazell, Walter
Hedderwick, Thomas Charles H.
Helder, Augustus
Hickman, Sir Alfred
Hill, Rt. Hon. Ld. Arthur (Down)
Hill, Rt. Hon. A. Staveley (Staffs.)
Hogan, James Francis
Holburn, J. G.
Holland, Hon. Lionel Raleigh
Houldsworth, Sir Wm. Henry
Howell, William Tudor
Howorth, Sir Henry Hoyle
Hudson, George Bickersteth
Hughes, Colonel Edwin
Jacoby, James Alfred
Jebb, Richard Claverhouse
Jeffreys, Arthur Frederick
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Johnstone, John H. (Sussex)
Jones, David Brynmor (Swansea)
Jones, Wm. (Carnarvonshire)
Kearley, Hudson E.
Kemp, George
Kennaway, Rt. Hon. Sir John H.
Kenyon, James
Kilbride, Denis
Kinloch, Sir John George Smyth
Lafone, Alfred
Laurie, Lieut.-General
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks.)
Lawson, Sir Wilfrid (Cumb'land)
Lecky, William Edward H.
Leng, Sir John
Llewelyn, Sir Dillwyn-(Swans'a)
Loder, Gerald Walter Erskine
Logan, John William
Lubbock, Rt. Hon. Sir John
Lucas-Shadwell, William
Luttrell, Hugh Fownes
Lyttelton, Hon. Alfred
Macaleese, Daniel
Macdona, John Cumming
Maclure, John William
MacNeill, John Gordon Swift
McKenna, Reginald
McKillop, James
McLaren, Charles Benjamin
Marks, Henry Hananel
Massey-Mainwaring, Hn. W. F.
Maxwell, Sir Herbert E.
Mellor, Colonel (Lancashire)
Melville, Beresford Valentine
Milbank, Powlett Charles John
Milner, Sir Frederick George
Milward, Colonel Victor
Montagu, Hon. J. Scott (Hants.)
Montagu, Sir S. (Whitechapel)
More, Robert Jasper
Morton, Edward John Chalmers
Murray, Col. Wyndham (Bath)
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Northcote, Hon. Sir H. Stafford
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
O'Kelly, James
Oldroyd, Mark
Orr-Ewing, Charles Lindsay
Parnell, John Howard
Perks, Robert William
Pickersgill, Edward Hare
Pinkerton, John
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Pryce-Jones, Edward
Purvis, Robert
Pym, C. Guy
Randell, David
Rankin, James
Rentoul, James Alexander
Ritchie, Rt. Hon. Chas. Thomson
Roberts, John Bryn (Eifion)
Robinson, Brooke
Roche, Hon. James (East Kerry)
Rollit, Sir Albert Kaye
Round, James
Russell, Sir George (Berkshire)
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Samuel, J. (Stockton-on-Tees)
Saunderson, Col. Edw. James
Schwann, Charles E.
Scott, Charles Prestwich
Sharpe, William Edward T.
Shaw, Thomas (Hawick B.)
Sidebottom, William (Derbysh.)
Smith, Abel (Herts.)
Smith, Abel H. (Christchurch)
Souttar, Robinson
Spencer, Ernest
Spicer, Albert
Stanley, Henry M. (Lambeth)
Stephens, Henry Charles
Stewart, Sir Mark J. McTaggart

Stirling-Maxwell, Sir John M.
Stone, Sir Benjamin
Strauss, Arthur
Strutt, Hon. Charles Hedley
Sullivan, Donal (Westmeath)
Thomas, Abel (Carmarthen, E.)
Thomas, Alfred (Glamorgan,E.)
Thorburn, Walter
Tritton, Charles Ernest
Wallace, Robert (Perth)
Walrond, Sir William Hood
Wedderburn, Sir William
Weir, James Galloway
Whiteley, George (Stockport)
Whiteley, H. (Ashton-under-L.)
Whitmore, Charles Algernon
Whittaker, Thomas Palmer
Williams, John Carvell (Notts.)
Willox, John Archibald
Wilson, Charles Henry (Hull)
Wilson, John (Durham, Mid.)
Wilson, John (Govan)
Woodall, William
Woodhouse,SirJ.T.(Hud'rsf'ld.)
Wortley, Rt. Hon. C. B. Stuart-
Wyndham, George
Wyndham-Quin, Major W. H.
Wyvill, Marmaduke D'Arcy

Tellers for the Ayes, Mr. Faithfull Begg and Mr. Atherley-Jones.

NOES.

Allen,W. (Newc.-under-Lyme.)
Anstruther, H. T.
Ashton, Thomas Gair
Asquith, Rt.Hn. Herbert Henry
Bagot, Capt. Josceline FitzRoy
Bailey, James (Walworth)
Baker, Sir John
Balcarres, Lord
Banbury, Frederick George
Barnes, Frederic Gorell
Bartley, George C. T.
Beach,Rt.Hn. Sir M.H. (Bristol)
Beaumont, Wentworth C. B.
Bethell, Captain
Bill, Charles
Birrell, Augustine
Blundell, Colonel Henry
Bolton, Thomas Dolling
Bonsor, Henry Cosmo Orme
Boulnois, Edmund
Bowles,T.Gibson (King's Lynn)
Brassey, Albert
Broadhurst, Henry
Brown, Alexander H.
Bryce, Rt. Hon. James
Butcher, John George
Buxton, Sydney Charles
Caldwell, James
Campbell, James A.
Causton, Richard Knight
Cavendish, R. F. (N. Lancs.)
Cavendish, V.C.W. (Derbyshire)
Cawley, Frederick
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon.J. (Birm.)
Chamberlain,J.Austen,(Worc'r)
Chaplin, Rt. Hon. Henry
Charrington, Spencer
Clark, Dr. G. B. (Caithness-sh)
Cochrane, Hon. Thos. H. A. E.
Coddington, Sir William
Coghill, Douglas Harry
Compton, Lord Alwyne (Beds.)
Cook, C. W. Radcliffe (Heref'd)
Crean, Eugene
Cross, Alexander (Glasgow)
Curzon,Rt.Hn.G.N.(Lanc.S.W.)
Dalbiac, Major Philip Hugh
Dalrymple, Sir Charles
Dane, Richard M.
Darling, Charles John
Disraeli, Coningsby Ralph
Doughty, George
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Dyke, Rt. Hon.SirWilliam Hart
Egerton, Hon. A. de Tatton
Evans, Samuel T. (Glamorgan)
Farrell, James P. (Cavan, W.)
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Ferguson, R. C. Munro (Leith)
Fergusson,Rt.Hn.SirJ. (Manch.)
Finch-Hatton, Hon. Harold H.
Flannery, Fortescue
Fletcher, Sir Henry
Folkestone, Viscount
Foster, Colonel (Lancaster)
Garfit, William
Goschen,Rt.Hn. G.J.(St. G'rg's)
Goschen, George J. (Sussex)
Gunter, Colonel
Hamilton, Rt. Hon. Lord Geo.
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robert Wm.
Hanson, Sir Reginald
Harcourt, Rt. Hon. Sir William
Hardy, Laurence
Hare, Thomas Leigh
Hayne, Rt. Hon. Charles Seale
Heath, James
Hoare,Edw.Brodie (Hampstead)
Hoare, Samuel (Norwich)
Hobhouse, Henry
Hopkinson, Alfred
Howard, Joseph
Hubbard, Hon. Evelyn
Hutton, Alfred E. (Morley)
Jessel,Captain Herbert Merton
Joicey, Sir James
Jolliffe, Hon. H. George
Kay-Shuttleworth,Rt.Hn.SirU.
Kenny, William
Kenyon-Slaney, Col. William
King, Sir Henry Seymour
Knowles, Lees
Knox, Edmund Francis Vesey
Lambert, George
Lees, Sir Elliott (Birkenhead)
Lockwood, Sir Frank (York)
Long,Rt.Hn.Walter (Liverpool)
Lorne, Marquess of
Lowther, Rt. Hon.James (Kent)
Loyd, Archie Kirkman
Macartney, W. G. Ellison
Maclean, James Mackenzie
McArthur, William
McCalmont,Maj.-Gen.(Ant'mN)
McDermott, Patrick
McEwan, William
Mappin, Sir Frederick Thorpe
Martin, Richard Biddulph
Mellor, Rt. Hon. J. W. (Yorks)
Meysey-Thompson, Sir H. M.
Monk, Charles James
Moon, Edward Robert Pacy
Morgan, J. Lloyd (Carmarthen)
Mowbray, Rt. Hon. Sir John
Mundella,Rt.Hn.Anthony John
Myers, William Henry
Nussey, Thomas Willans
O'Brien, P. J. (Tipperary)
O'Connor, James (Wicklow,W.)
O'Keefe, Francis Arthur
O'Malley, William
Paulton, James Mellor
Pease, Arthur (Darlington)
Pease, Joseph A. (Northumb)
Pease, Sir Joseph W. (Durham)
Penn, John
Phillpotts, Captain Arthur
Pierpoint, Robert
Pirie, Captain Duncan Vernon
Plunkett, Hon. Horace Curzon
Powell, Sir Francis Sharp
Pretyman, Capt. Ernest George
Provand, Andrew Dryburgh
Quilter, William Cuthbert
Reid, Sir Robert T.
Ridley,Rt.Hon.Sir Matthew W.
Robertson, Edmund (Dundee)
Robertson, Herbert (Hackney)
Roche, John (East Galway)
Russell, Gen. F.S. (Cheltenham)
Sandys, Lieut.-Col. Thos. Myles
Sheehy, David
Sidebotham, J. W. (Cheshire)
Simeon, Sir Barrington
Smith, Hon. W. F. D. (Strand)
Stanley, Lord (Lancs.)
Stanley, Edwd. Jas. (Somerset)
Stevenson, Francis S.
Stock, James Henry
Sturt, Hon. Humphry Napier
Sutherland, Sir Thomas
Talbot, John G. (Oxford Univ)
Tanner, Charles Kearns
Taylor, Francis
Thornton, Percy M.
Usborne, Thomas
Walton, John Lawson
Waring, Col. Thomas
Webster, SirR.E.(Isle of Wight)
Wharton, John Lloyd
Williams, Colonel R. (Dorset)
Williams, Joseph Powell-(Birm.
Willoughby de Eresby, Lord
Wilson, Frederick W. (Norfolk)
Wilson, Henry J. (York, W.R.)
Wilson, J. W. (Worc'sh. N.)
Wilson-Todd, Wm. H. (Yorks.)
Wodehouse, Edmond R. (Bath)
Young, Samuel

Tellers for the Noes, Colonel Lockwood and Mr. Labouchere

Question put accordingly, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question." The House divided:—Ayes, 228; Noes, 157. (Division List—No. 16—appended.)

AYES.

Abraham, William (Cork, N.E.)
Abraham, William (Rhondda)
Aird, John
Allan, William (Gateshead)
Ambrose, William (Middlesex)
Arch, Joseph
Arnold, Alfred
Arrol, Sir William
Ascroft, Robert
Austin, Sir John (Yorkshire)
Bagot, Capt. Josceline FitzRoy
Baker, Sir John
Balfour, Rt. Hon A. J. (Manch'r.)
Balfour, Gerald William (Leeds)
Barlow, John Emmott
Barnes, Frederic Gorell
Beach, W. W. Bramston (Hants.)
Bentinck, Lord Henry C.
Bhownaggree, M. M.
Bousfield, William Robert
Brigg, John
Buchanan, Thomas Ryburn
Bucknill, Thomas Townsend
Burt, Thomas
Cameron, Robert
Carson, Edward
Cavendish, R. F. (N. Lancs.)
Chaloner, Captain R. G. W.
Channing, Francis Allston
Clare, Octavius Leigh
Clark, Dr. G. B. (Caithness-sh.)
Clough, Walter Owen
Cohen, Benjamin Louis
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse
Colville, John
Cook, Fred. Lucas (Lambeth)
Corbett, A. Cameron (Glasgow)
Courtney, Rt. Hon. Leonard H.
Cox, Robert
Cozens-Hardy, Herbert Hardy
Cross, Herb. Shepherd (Bolton)
Curran, Thomas B. (Donegal)
Davenport, W. Bromley-
Davies, M. Vaughan-(Cardigan)
Davies, W. Rees- (Pembrokesh.)
Davitt, Michael
Denny, Colonel
Dilke, Rt. Hon. Sir Charles
Dixon, George
Dixon-Hartland, Sir Fred. Dixon
Doogan, P. C.
Doughty, George
Drucker, A.
Dunn, Sir William
Edwards, Gen. Sir James Bevan
Fardell, Thomas George
Farquharson, Dr. Robert
Fenwick, Charles
Fielden, Thomas
Finch, George H.
Finch-Hatton, Hon. Harold H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Firbank, Joseph Thomas
FitzGerald, Sir R. U. Penrose
FitzWygram, General Sir F.
Flannery, Fortescue
Forster, Henry William
Foster, Colonel (Lancaster)
Foster, Harry S. (Suffolk)
Foster, Sir W. (Derby Co.)
Fowler, Matthew (Durham)
Fry, Lewis
Galloway, William Johnson
Gedge, Sydney
Gilliat, John Saunders
Goddard, Daniel Ford
Gold, Charles
Goldsworthy, Major-General
Gordon, John Edward
Gorst, Rt. Hon. Sir John Eldon
Goulding, Edward Alfred
Gourley, Sir Edward Temperley
Graham, Henry Robert
Gray, Ernest (West Ham)
Green, Walford D. (Wednesb'ry)
Gull, Sir Cameron
Haldane, Richard Burdon
Hall, Sir Charles
Harrison, Charles
Hazell, Walter
Hedderwick, Thomas Charles H.
Helder, Augustus
Hickman, Sir Alfred
Hill, Rt. Hn. Lord Arthur (Down)
Hill, Rt. Hn. A. Staveley (Staffs.)
Hoare, Samuel (Norwich)
Hogan, James Francis
Holburn, J. G.
Holland, Hon. Lionel Raleigh
Hopkinson, Alfred
Houldsworth, Sir Wm. Henry
Howell, William Tudor
Howorth, Sir Henry Hoyle
Hudson, George Bickersteth
Hughes, Colonel Edwin
Jacoby, James Alfred
Jebb, Richard Claverhouse
Jeffreys, Arthur Frederick
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Johnstone, John H. (Sussex)
Jones, David Brynmor (Swansea)
Jones, William (Carnarvonshire)
Kearley, Hudson E.
Kemp, George
Kenyon, James
Kilbride, Denis
Kinloch, Sir John George Smyth
Laurie, Lieut.-General
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks.)
Lawson, Sir Wilfrid (Cumb.)
Lecky, William Edward H.
Leng, Sir John
Llewelyn, Sir Dillwyn-(Swnsea)
Lockwood, Sir Frank (York)
Loder, Gerald Walter Erskine
Logan, John William
Lorne, Marquess of
Lowles, John
Lubbock, Rt. Hon. Sir John
Lucas-Shadwell, William
Lyttelton, Hon. Alfred
Macaleese, Daniel
Macdona, John Cumming
Maclure, John William
MacNeill, John Gordon Swift
McDermott, Patrick
McKenna, Reginald
McKillop, James
McLaren, Charles Benjamin
Marks, Henry Hananel
Massey-Mainwaring, Hon. W. F.
Mellor, Colonel (Lancashire)
Melville, Beresford Valentine
Milbank, Powlett Charles John
Milner, Sir Frederick George
Milward, Colonel Victor
Montagu, Hon. J. Scott (Hants.)
Montagu, Sir S. (Whitechapel)
More, Robert Jasper
Morton, Edward John Chalmers
Murray, Col. Wyndham (Bath)
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Northcote, Hon. Sir H. Stafford
O'Brien, James F. X. (Cork)
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
Oldroyd, Mark
O'Malley, William
Orr-Ewing, Charles Lindsay
Parnell, John Howard
Perks, Robert William
Pickersgill, Edward Hare
Pinkerton, John
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Pryce-Jones, Edward
Purvis, Robert
Pym, C. Guy
Randell, David
Rankin, James
Rentoul, James Alexander
Ritchie, Rt. Hon. Chas. Thomson
Roberts, John Bryn (Eifion)
Robinson, Brooke
Roche, Hon. James (East Kerry)
Roche, John (East Galway)
Rollit, Sir Albert Kaye
Round, James
Russell, Gen. F. S. (Cheltenham)
Russell, Sir George (Berksh.)
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Rutherford, John
Samuel, Harry S. (Limehouse)
Samuel, J. (Stockton-on-Tees)
Saunderson, Col. Edw. James
Schwann, Charles E.
Scott, Charles (Prestwich)
Sharpe, William Edward T.
Shaw, Thomas (Hawick B.)
Sheehy, David
Sidebottom, William (Derbysh.)

Smith, Abel (Herts.)
Smith, Abel H. (Christchurch)
Souttar, Robinson
Spencer, Ernest
Spicer, Albert
Stanley, Edw. Jas. (Somerset)
Stanley, Henry M. (Lambeth)
Stewart, Sir Mark J. M'Taggart
Stone, Sir Benjamin
Strauss, Arthur
Strutt, Hon. Charles Hedley
Sullivan, Donal (Westmeath)
Tennant, Harold John
Thomas, Abel (Carmarthen, E.)
Thomas, Alfred (Glamorgan, E.)
Thorburn, Walter
Tritton, Charles Ernest
Vincent, Col. Sir C. E. Howard
Wallace, Robert (Perth)
Walrond, Sir William Hood
Wedderburn, Sir William
Weir, James Galloway
Whiteley, George (Stockport)
Whiteley, H. (Ashton-under-L.)
Whitmore, Charles Algernon
Whittaker, Thomas Palmer
Williams, John Carvell (Notts.)
Willox, John Archibald
Wilson, Charles Henry (Hull)
Wilson, John (Durham, Mid)
Wilson, John (Govan)
Wolff, Gustav Wilhelm
Woodall, William
Woodhouse, Sir J.T.(Hud'rsf'ld)
Wortley, Rt. Hon. C. B. Stuart-
Wyndham, George
Wyndham-Quin, Major W. H.
Wyvill, Marmaduke D'Arcy
Younger, William

Tellers for the Ayes, Mr. Faithfull Begg and Mr. Atherley-Jones

NOES.

Ashton, Thomas Gair
Asquith, Rt. Hn. Herbert H.
Bailey, James (Walworth)
Balcarres, Lord
Banbury, Frederick George
Barry, A. H. Smith-(Hunts.)
Bartley, George C. T.
Beach, Rt. Hn. Sir M.H. (Bri'l)
Beaumont, Wentworth C. B.
Beckett, Ernest William
Bethell, Commander
Bigham, John Charles
Bill, Charles
Birrell, Augustine
Blundell, Colonel Henry
Bolton, Thomas Dolling
Bonsor, Henry Cosmo Orme
Boulnois, Edmund
Bowles, T. Gibson (King'sLynn)
Brassey, Albert
Broadhurst, Henry
Brodrick, Rt. Hon. St. John
Brookfield, A. Montagu
Brown, Alexander H.
Bryce, Rt. Hon. James
Butcher, John George
Buxton, Sydney Charles
Caldwell, James
Campbell, James A.
Causton, Richard Knight
Cavendish, V.C.W.(Derbyshire)
Cawley, Frederick
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. J.(Birm.)
Chamberlain, J. Austen(Worc'r)
Chaplin, Rt. Hon. Henry
Charrington, Spencer
Clarke, Sir Edward (Plymouth)
Coddington, Sir William
Cooke, C. W. Radcliffe (Heref')
Cranborne, Viscount
Crean, Eugene
Cross, Alexandra (Glasgow)
Curzon, Rt. Hn. G. N. (Lancs.)
Dalbiac, Major Philip Hugh
Dalrymple, Sir Charles
Dane, Richard M.
Darling, Charles John
Disraeli, Coningsby Ralph
Donelan, Captain A.
Dorington, Sir John Edward
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Dyke, Rt. Hon. Sir William Hart
Egerton, Hon. A. de Tatton
Evans, Samuel T. (Glamorgan)
Evans, Sir Francis H.(South'ton)
Farrell, James P. (Cavan, W.)
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Ferguson, R. C. Munro (Leith)
Fergusson, Rt. Hn. Sir J.(Manc'r)
Fisher William Hayes
Fletcher, Sir Henry
Folkestone, Viscount
Garfit, William
Goschen, Rt. Hn. G.J.(St.G'rg's)
Goschen, George J. (Sussex)
Gunter, Colonel
Hamilton, Rt. Hon. Lord Geo.
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robert Wm.
Hanson, Sir Reginald
Harcourt, Rt. Hon. Sir William
Hardy, Laurence
Hare, Thomas Leigh
Hayne, Rt. Hon. Charles Seale-
Hoare, Edw. Brodie(Hampstead)
Hobhouse, Henry
Howard, Joseph
Hubbard, Hon. Evelyn
Hutton, Alfred E. (Yorks.)
Jessel, Captain Herbert Merton
Joicey, Sir James
Jolliffe, Hon. H. George
Kay-Shuttleworth, Rt. Hn. Sir U.
Kennaway, Rt. Hon. Sir John H.
Kenny, William
Knowles, Lees
Knox, Edmund Francis Vesey
Lambert, George
Lees, Sir Elliott (Birkenhead)
Long, Rt. Hon. Walter (Liverpool
Lowther, Rt. Hon. James (Kent)
Loyd, Archie Kirkman
Macartney, W. G. Ellison
Maclean, James Mackenzie
McArthur, William
McCalmont, Maj. Gen. (Ant'mN)
McEwan, William
M'Hugh, E. (Armagh, S.)
Mappin, Sir Frederick Thorpe
Martin, Richard Biddulph
Maxwell, Sir Herbert E.
Mellor, Rt. Hon. J. W. (Yorks.)
Meysey-Thompson, Sir H. M.
Monk, Charles James
Moon, Edward Robert Pacy
Morgan, J. Lloyd(Carmarthen)
Mowbray, Rt. Hon. Sir John
Mundella, Rt. Hon Anthony John
Myers, William Henry
Nussey, Thomas Willans
O'Brien, P. J. (Tipperary)
O'Connor, Arthur (Donegal)
O'Connor, James (Wicklow, W)
O'Kelly, James
Paulton, James Mellor
Pease, Arthur (Darlington)
Pease, Joseph A. (Northumb.)
Pease, Sir Joseph W. (Durham)
Penn, John
Phillpotts, Captain Arthur
Pierpoint, Robert
Pirie, Captain Duncan Vernon
Powell, Sir Francis Sharp
Provand, Andrew Dryburgh
Quilter, William Cuthbert
Reid, Sir Robert T.
Ridley, Rt. Hon. Sir Matthew W.
Robertson, Edmund (Dundee)
Robertson, Herbert (Hackney)
Sandys, Lieut.-Col. Thos. Myles
Sidebotham, J. W. (Cheshire)
Simeon, Sir Barrington
Smith, Hon. W. F. D. (Strand)
Stanley, Lord (Lancs.)
Stephens, Henry Charles
Stevenson, Francis S.
Stirling-Maxwell, Sir John M.
Stock, James Henry
Sturt, Hon. Humphry Napier
Sutherland, Sir Thomas
Talbot, John G. (Oxford Univ.)
Tanner, Charles Kearns
Taylor, Francis
Thornton, Percy M.
Usborne, Thomas
Walton, John Lawson
Waring, Col. Thomas
Welby, Lieut.-Col. A. C. E.
Wharton, John Lloyd
Williams, Colonel R. (Dorset)
Williams, Joseph Powell(Birm.)
Willoughby de Eresby, Lord
Wilson, Frederick W. (Norfolk)
Wilson, J. W. (Worc'sh N.)
Wilson-Todd, Wm. H (Yorks.)
Wodehouse, Edmond R. (Bath)
Young, Samuel

Tellers for the Noes, Mr. Labouchere and Colonel Lockwood.

Main Question put, and agreed to: Bill Read a Second time amid loud cheers, and committed to a Committee of the whole House for Monday next.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) (No. 2) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday next.

LICENSES (IRELAND) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday next.

WORKING MEN'S DWELLINGS BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday next.

POOR LAW OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION ACT (1896) AMENDMENT BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday next.

FACTORY ACT (FISHING TRADE) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1: Committee report progress; to sit again Monday next.

LEASEHOLDERS (PURCHASE OF FEE SIMPLE) (No. 2) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 12th February.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Committee deferred till Friday.

SUPPLY.

Committee deferred till Friday.

EDUCATION ENDOWMENTS (IRELAND) ACT (1885) AMENDMENT BILL.

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1: Committee report progress; to sit again upon Wednesday 16th June.

SHOP ASSISTANTS (HALF-HOLIDAY) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till tomorrow.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (IRELAND) (WOMEN) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Friday

MOTIONS.

TRUCK ACTS AMENDMENT.

Bill to amend the Truck Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Broadhurst, Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Havelock Wilson, Mr. Philip Stanhope, and Mr. William Abraham (Rhondda); presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 115.]

SUCCESSION SCOTLAND.

Bill to assimilate the Laws of Heritable with those of Moveable Succession in Scotland, and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Thomas Shaw, Mr. Haldane, Dr. Farquharson, Sir William Dunn, Mr. Edmund Robertson, Mr. Ure, Mr. Buchanan, and Mr. Hedderwick; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday 3rd March, and to be printed.—[Bill 116.]

House adjourned at Five minutes before Six o'clock.

An Asterisk (*) at the commencement of a Speech indicates revision by the Member.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, 4th February 1897.

MARINE INSURANCE BILL [H.L.].

A Bill for codifying the law relating to Marine Insurance, was presented by the Lord Herschell; read 1ª; and to be printed.—[No. 10.]

STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE.

Appointed: The Lords following, with the Chairman of Committees, were named of the Committee:—

M. Lansdowne.
E. Lathom.
(L. Chamberlain.)
E. Derby.
E. Denbigh.
E. Winchilsea and Nottingham.
E. Chesterfield.
E. Jersey.
E. Lauderdale.
E. Waldegrave.
E. Cadogan.
E. Belmore.
E. Harrowby.
E. Beauchamp.
E. Amherst.
E. Camperdown.
E. Wharncliffe.
E. de Montalt.
E. Crewe.
E. Carrington.
V. Sidmouth.
V. Oxenbridge.
L. de Ros.
L. Clinton.
L. Zouche of Haryngworth.
L. Balfour.
L. Boyle.
(E. Cork and Orrery.)
L. Ribblesdale.
L. Churchill.
L. Colchester.
L. Wigan.
(E. Crawford.)
L. Poltimore.
L. Kintore.
(E. Kintore.)
L. Belper.
L. Brougham and Vaux.
L. Fermanagh.
(E. Erne.)
L. Monk-Bretton.
L. Sudley.
(E. Arran.)
L. Northington.
(L. Henley.)
L. Monkswell.
L. Colville of Culross.

All Petitions relating to Standing Orders which shall be presented during the present Session referred to the Committee unless otherwise ordered.

STANDING COMMITTEE.

Ordered, that a Standing Committee be appointed for the consideration of such Public Bills as may be committed to it by the House.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR THE STANDING COMMITTEE.

Appointed: The Lords following, with the Chairman of Committees, were named of the Committee:—

E. Cowper.
E. Stanhope.
E. Waldegrave.
L. Balfour.
L. Boyle.
(E. Cork and Orrery.)
L. Ribblesdale.
L. Kintore.
(E. Kintore.)
L. Colville of Culross.

HOUSE OF LORDS OFFICES.

Select Committee appointed: The Lords following, with the Lord Chancellor, the Lord President, the Lord Privy Seal, and the Chairman of Committees, were named of the Committee:—

D. Richmond.
D. Saint Albans.
M. Salisbury.
M. Ripon.
M. Breadalbane.
E. Lathom.
(L. Chamberlain.)
E. Waldegrave.

E. Mount Edgcumbe.
E. Belmore.
E. Harrowby.
E. Bradford.
E. Camperdown.
E. Strafford.
E. Kimberley.
E. de Montalt.
E. Cranbrook.
E. Ancaster.
V. Oxenbridge.
V. Knutsford.
L. Balfour.
L. Boyle.
(E. Cork and Orrery.)
L. Churchill.
L. Colchester.
L. Ker.
(M. Lothian.)
L. Rosebery.
(E. Rosebery.)
L. Rowton.
L. Colville of Culross.
L. Herschell.
L. Welby.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ELECTIONS) BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1ª; to be printed, and to be read 2ª on Monday next. (The Lord Herschell)—[No. 12.]

ARMY (INCREASE OF STRENGTH).

*Viscount de VESCI rose to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to lay before Parliament proposals for an increase in the strength of the Army, and, if so, in what arms; by what number of battalions it was proposed to increase the strength of the infantry; whether it was proposed to add to the Brigade of Guards, and in what manner; and whether, if the strength of the Brigade of Guards was increased, it was proposed to place the brigade on the roster for foreign service in time of peace, and under what conditions. He congratulated the Secretary of State for War on the brighter prospects of the military measures of the Government this Session as compared with last, when the Bills brought in were, he might say, almost muddled out of existence in the arrangements made for public business. But even at the beginning of this Session the Government did not seem to appreciate thoroughly the importance of this question, for in the Speech from the Throne only a very cursory hint was given that these military measures were to be introduced. However, a change had now supervened, and there was some prospect that the measures introduced in another place would be perfected in the course of the present Session. The organisation of the infantry as it at present existed was, it would be remembered, first initiated in a memorandum of the illustrious Duke, the late Commander-in-Chief. Under that organisation territorial regiments were formed out of the existing two-battalion regiments of the Army, and by linking together the then existing single-battalion regiments. Depôts were also formed of two companies from each battalion. The scheme was that one battalion should always be abroad and one at home. This supposed symmetrical system was now out of joint, and practically was nowhere in working order. There might have been some numerical miscalculation as to the military needs and requirements of India and the Colonies, or it might be that those needs and requirements had increased since the establishment of the system. But the fact remained that it no longer worked. The Committee presided over by Lord Wantage, in 1892, called attention to the fact that, since 1888, there had been an average of about 11 battalions in excess abroad; and, in the following year, a work was published, under the authority of the Commander-in-Chief, and edited by General Goodenough, which stated that, out of the 141 battalions of the Army, 76 were then abroad, 52 being in India. In regard to the territorial system, his noble Friend would no doubt explain what was now the number of infantry battalions at home and abroad, and by what number of battalions it was intended to increase the infantry. The latter part of the question standing in his name on the Paper was of peculiar interest to many Members of their Lordships' House who had served in the Brigade of Guards. It was reported that the Secretary of State proposed to add two battalions to the Guards' Brigade, making nine in all.

Many of them would agree that that would be a distinct advantage, for he believed that in a very short time, with the reinforcements which they would receive from the Reserve, it would be possible to put into the field two efficient brigades of three battalions each. It was also reported that the Secretary of State proposed to relieve the strain on the battalions of the infantry of the line by putting the Guards on the roster for foreign service in the time of peace. In considering this subject it was necessary to remember the present condition of enlistment and service in the Guards. Most men were enlisted for three years with the colours and nine years with the Reserve. This system had succeeded in filling the ranks with a class of men who for efficiency and appearance, and in every other respect, were fully equal to any men he had ever known. The Guards were quartered in London, Windsor, and Dublin, and their duties were finding "guards," and what was known as "sentry go." The work was very onerous and trying to health. Now, when they considered the foreign service which was open to the Brigade, they found that it was only India, Egypt, and the Mediterranean stations to which they could be sent. As far as India was concerned, the whole system of recruiting the Brigade would have to be altered, for the men would have to go on the long-service system. But apart from that consideration, he should be glad if a Brigade of Guards were stationed in India. It would be very advantageous to have a brigade permanently stationed there, so that the men might become acclimatised, and inured to the conditions of Indian service. The advantage would be realised in the event of any great war in our Eastern Empire, when reliefs would be required. But as to the Mediterranean garrisons, it should be remembered how heavy were the duties there of finding guards, and of sentry work in the fortresses. It was the same kind of heavy work that the Guards had to perform at home. There would be no prospect or means of giving the men military field instruction in Malta or Gibraltar. To all these questions he had no doubt his noble Friend had given due consideration; and he would conclude by asking him to remember how necessary it was that the ranks of the Brigade at home should be kept full of thoroughly efficient men. ["Hear, hear!"]

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, I believe it has been pretty well understood for some time past that the Government had it in contemplation to add to the strength of the Army, and I am therefore quite ready to give my noble Friend the information for which he asks. I hope it will not be disappointing to him, because I have observed that of late there have been current statements attributing to us the intention of increasing the Army very far beyond what we believe to be the necessities of the case, and very far beyond what, considering the already very large expenditure for the purposes of Imperial defence, we think would be either proper or desirable. I think the nature and extent of the difficulty with which we have to deal is very well known. It is quite clear that it is well known to my noble Friend from what fell from him during the course of his speech. If I had to describe that difficulty in a single sentence I should say that it would be found in the inability of that portion of the Army which is at home to support that portion of it which is abroad. I wish in the few words which I have to say to confine myself mainly to that part of the case. Of course I am aware that there are many other important questions which may fairly be debated in this connection. There may be a difference of opinion as to the merits of the short service system as we know it here, there may be a want of agreement as to the force which we ought to be able to put into the field for home defence or for expeditionary purposes, there may be people who hold that the efficiency of our home Army is unduly sacrificed to the exigencies of the Army abroad, and who doubt the wisdom of relying so greatly on the Reserve for rendering the home Army fit for war. I shall be quite prepared, if your Lordships should desire it, to discuss these questions at the proper time, but in the few words which I wish to address your Lordships to-night I would rather limit myself to a more restricted aspect of the case, and to ask you whether, given an Indian Army of its present strength, given colonial garrisons of the strength at which our advisers tell us they ought to stand, given the withdrawal of a certain number of troops for special services in different parts of the world, have we left at home enough men to support the force which is thus continually absent from the United Kingdom? The answer must, I think, be in the negative. I believe it has been evident for some time, not only to military experts, that our present system of Army organisation has been worked under conditions which absolutely precluded the possibility of its success. If I may borrow an expression used by my noble Friend, I would say it has been evident for some time that our system has got a little out of joint. What was the fundamental principle of the short-service system introduced 25 years ago by Lord Cardwell, and accepted by successive Governments? That principle was that each of the double-battalion regiments of which the Army is composed would, under ordinary circumstances, always have one battalion abroad and another battalion to support it at home. That is the bed rock of the system. It ought to give us a battalion abroad at full strength and in a high state of efficiency, and another battalion at home on a lower strength, and containing a large proportion of young soldiers. A battalion whose first duty it is in time of peace to supply the linked battalion abroad with the necessary drafts, but which in time of war is completed for service by the addition of men from the Army Reserve The system contemplates and provides for the temporary absence of the home battalion whenever its services may be required out of the United Kingdom. The regimental depôt is then expanded to dimensions sufficient to enable it to supply the drafts required by the two absent battalions, both of which for the time have to depend upon the depôt. It cannot, however, be too clearly understood that this arrangement is intended to provide only for a temporary state of things, and is not appropriate for the purpose of supplying a chronic deficiency in the home establishment. It has numerous disadvantages. It causes, in the first place, that irregularity in the flow of recruits which was so strongly deprecated by the Wantage Committee. Recruits cannot be so effectively trained at a depôt as with a battalion. It supplies our foreign requirements at the expense of our effective home garrison. It entails the separation of the home battalion from the reserve which is vital to its efficiency for war. I have no hesitation in saying that the process of sending home battalions abroad and substituting expanded depôts, is one which can only be justified as a temporary expedient. My conclusion, therefore, is, if it can be shown that there is a permanent deficiency in the number of our home battalions. that deficiency should be met by a permanent increase in the Army. If this be so, it follows clearly that our normal condition should be one of equilibrium between the home and the foreign establishments. Our complaint is that this salutary rule has been ignored, and that at no time since 1872 has that condition of equilibrium been really maintained. I will not occupy the time of the House in explaining how this has come to pass. The requirements of the Empire have grown, special calls have been made upon the Army, troops have been sent abroad for temporary purposes and have not been restored to the home establishment, with the result that, instead of having maintained equality between the home establishment and the establishment abroad, we have at this moment a deficiency of no less than 11 battalions on the home establishment. We have now in all 141 battalions of infantry of the Line; of these India claims 52, while the already authorised garrisons of our coaling stations, some of which are in our opinion below their proper strength, absorb 18 more. In addition to this we have three battalions in Egypt and three extra battalions in South Africa. Your Lordships will see that these figures show that we have now 76 battalions abroad to 65 at home, or, in other words, a total deficiency of 11 battalions. This is a condition of things in which we are unable to acquiesce. It may, no doubt, be fairly assumed that some of the battalions now abroad are only temporarily absent, and pending their withdrawal, or until it is clearly shown that their absence is a permanent one, we may continue to provide for them by those temporary expedients which I explained just now. But in our belief the demand of the military authorities for some steps to be taken to improve the state of the account as between the home and the foreign establishment is irresistible. It is a demand which has been pressed upon us by the late, as well as by the present, Commander-in-Chief, by the whole of our present military advisers, and, I am almost tempted to add, by the opinion of everyone. whether soldier or civilian, who has ever paid serious attention to these questions. We have determined to do something to meet that demand, and we have considered, having regard to considerations of economy as well as of efficiency, in what manner it would be most advantageous to strengthen the home establishment. One proposal in particular has attracted our attention. It is not a new one, for it was put forward five years ago by the Committee presided over by Lord Wantage. I refer to the proposal that to the seven existing battalions of the Guards two new battalions should be added, and that of the nine battalions three should be stationed abroad. The advantages of such an arrangement are obvious. From the point of view of the Guards themselves, the increase is certainly in itself desirable. The present organisation of the brigade is faulty from the military point of view. If the number of the battalions be increased from seven to nine each regiment will have the same number of battalions, and the Guards will be strong enough, which they are not now, to send out for active service a division of six battalions, leaving three battalions at home. On the principle that you cannot have too much of a good thing, no one will, I take it, dispute that, if to the existing magnificent force which the brigade provides we are able to add some 2,000 officers and men, the brigade itself and the Army will be the gainers. It must, however, be clearly understood that we are able to recommend this increase and to justify the expenditure which it involves only upon condition that we are allowed to make use of the brigade to help us in overcoming our difficulties, and to require from it a reasonable contribution towards the relief of the present strain on the Army system. I say "a reasonable contribution" because we recognise that the position and traditions of Her Majesty's Guards are exceptional, and that it is not desirable to place them in respect to liability to service out of the United Kingdom upon the same footing as the rest of the Army. Our proposal, then, is that of the nine battalions of the Guards three shall be abroad. We propose that their tour of service out of England shall be a short one. The exact details are not yet settled. We shall spare no pains to settle them so as to disturb existing arrangements as little as possible, and to leave unimpaired the conditions and efficiency of the brigade. But on one or two points I can be more explicit. If the tour of foreign service is to be a short one it is desirable that the part of the brigade to be employed out of the United Kingdom should not be taken far from home, and we propose that it should be stationed in the Mediterranean. As to the length of the tour, it is obvious that if of every three battalions one battalion is always to be abroad, whatever the length of the tour may be, each battalion must spend one-third of its time away from home. The actual duration of the tour will require careful examination and adjustment, particularly with reference to the effects on recruiting, and on the men engaged for three years' service, of whom there are a large number in the brigade; and, must obviously depend to some extent on the station selected. Our idea is—and here we are doing what we have been given to understand will be most agreeable to the Guards themselves—that the three battalions should be stationed together, under a brigadier of the Guards, and we propose Gibraltar, in the first instance, as in these circumstances the most convenient station. It is clear, however, that subsequent experience may, even in the interests of the brigade itself, render a reconsideration of this point desirable. We propose this year to send one battalion only. That battalion we intend to relieve next year. We shall have ample time in which to consider the detail of the scheme before it is fully carried out, and I have no doubt that many useful suggestions will occur to the military authorities in the meantime. The result of bringing into use three Guards battalions for foreign service will be that three Line battalions now abroad will be brought home, and that three other Line battalions abroad will no longer be in the position of having no home battalions to support them. In other words, we shall diminish our account of foreign battalions of the Line by three, and increase our home establishment by the same number. The addition of two new battalions to the Guards will therefore enable us, in so far as the disparity between the home and the foreign establishments is concerned, to diminish the deficiency in the former to the extent of no less than six battalions, or, to put it in another way, if we had endeavoured to arrive at the same result by creating new battalions of the Line, we should have to create three new pairs of battalions, of which half would have been abroad and the other half at home. If we had adopted this course the cost to the public would have been very largely increased. I am assured that the extra annual charge would be about £200,000, and besides this an expenditure of about half-a-million for additional barrack accommodation would have been inevitable. It would be mere affectation on my part to deny that in some quarters the change which we propose to make is regarded with a certain amount of apprehension. I have heard it said that it will be detrimental both to the officers and to the men of the Brigade of Guards, and that we may expect a marked deterioration in both. As for the officers already serving in the Guards, I feel convinced that if this measure can be shown, as I believe it can, to be desirable in the interests of the Army as a whole, they will cheerfully submit to the sacrifice—[cheers]—if, indeed, it be one which they are required to make; and I readily admit that if they look askance at our proposal it is for no selfish reason, but because they honestly believe it to be detrimental to the efficiency and smartness of the brigade in which they take a just and pardonable pride. [Cheers.] We confidently look for their loyal and unhesitating assistance in securing the success of a measure intended to benefit the Queen's Army as a whole. With regard to the statement that this new liability will deter officers of the class who now serve in the brigade from joining it, I must confess that I am profoundly incredulous. We have heard such gloomy anticipations before. I recollect that, when open competition for commissions in the Army was first introduced, we were assured that the whole race of British officers would rapidly and disastrously deteriorate. We all know that nothing of the kind happened. If comparison is to be made, the present generation of officers has nothing to fear from it. I am convinced that the young men who join the Guards are animated by the same pride in their profession as the officers of other branches of the Army. Here and there we may find some gilded youth whose affection for the society or for the sports of his own country will be such that he may be unable to screw his courage up to join the brigade owing to the prospect of a banishment of a few months in the Mediterranean, but I am confident that in the long run, in spite of these gloomy forebodings, the Guards will continue to get the same sort of officers as they have obtained up to the present time. I ascribe greater weight to the arguments which are used with regard to the possible result of the change on the men of the brigade. I know that some high authorities hold that the prospect of service out of England may increase the difficulty of obtaining recruits of the proper stamp. On the other hand we have some grounds for thinking that the prospect of a little foreign service may prove even an attraction to many of the class from which the Guards are recruited. Time only can show which of these views is correct. Let me, however, say unhesitatingly that we should not propose this step if we believed that it would result in a permanent lowering of the standard of the height or the general physique of the Guards. The standard of height has been of late higher than it has ever been. We have had to raise it on account of the large number of recruits presenting themselves for engagement. The standard has always fluctuated, and must always fluctuate, according to the state of the labour market, but we believe that we shall be able to procure the additional number of recruits which will be required without lowering it below the normal level. I am strengthened in my hope that this result may not follow by the knowledge that the step we propose to take was recommended by the Committee of which Lord Wantage, himself a Guardsman, was chairman; while among its members were General Sir E. Bulwer and General W. Fielding (also a Guardsman), of whom the former had held, and the latter actually held at the time when the report was signed, the responsible office of Inspector-General of Recruiting. Then there is the argument that the foreign battalions will have their efficiency and smartness seriously impaired by a prolonged stay in a Mediterranean fortress. It is true that troops stationed at a place like Gibraltar must be at some disadvantage in respect of training and of practice in field firing, and that is no doubt a strong argument against keeping a battalion there for any length of time. We shall bear this point, the importance of which I fully recognise, carefully in mind. Another objection which has been freely urged is this. I have heard it said that our proposals will result in this depletion of the home battalions of the Guards in order to keep up the battalions which will be stationed in the Mediterranean. It is apprehended that the home battalions of the Guards will find themselves in the same position as the home batta- of the Line, which are subjected to a heavy and constant drain for the purpose of supplying the necessary drafts to their linked battalions abroad, and which consequently contain a very large proportion of young soldiers, and are, without their Reservists, unfit to take the field. I hope it will be understood that the case of the Guards and the Line is by no means the same. In the case of the Line the length of the foreign tour is 16 years, and during that time the home battalion is constantly pouring its best men into the foreign battalion at the rate of from 150 to 200 a year. The foreign tour of the Guards will, as I have already said, be short, and the burden, which in the case of the Line falls upon a single home battalion, will, in the case of the Guards, be divided between the two home battalions. [" Hear, hear ! "] What will be the extent of this burden? I think we may say confidently that it will not be unduly heavy, or of a kind likely to impair the efficiency of the home battalions. I wish, however, to state as distinctly as I can that, while I fully understand the objection which one battalion of a regiment may feel to undergoing wholesale depletion for the sake of another, I cannot for a moment admit that in no circumstances, even when the exigencies of the service require it, are two battalions of the same regiment to help one another by a mutual exchange of men. I do not regard an exchange of that kind as a depletion in the proper sense of the word. It is strictly an exchange. Let me illustrate my meaning. When a Guards battalion is sent to the Mediterranean, it will always have to leave behind a certain number of men, who, either because they have lately joined, or because they are within a few months of the end of their time, are unable to go abroad. How are these men to be disposed of? Obviously, they must be taken over by the home battalions in exchange for other men who do not labour under the same disqualifications. The transaction is in the nature of an exchange, or it may be in some cases a loan ; but it is not one which can properly be described as a serious depletion of the home battalions. I will only say one word more before I leave this part of the subject, and it is this— that we do not take this step without previous consultation with those whom we had a right to regard as able to advise us with the highest authority as to the effects of the measure upon the efficiency of the brigade. Their opinion—I am, of course, not speaking of matters of detail—gave us the strongest encouragement to believe that our scheme was in principle a sound one. Before leaving this subject I desire most emphatically to state that nothing can be further from our intention than to do anything which will permanently affect the traditional characteristics of the Brigade of Guards. [" Hear, hear ! "] We desire on the contrary, to maintain their status and efficiency. I need not repeat that we do not believe that the steps we contemplate will have the injurious effects attributed to them ; but the House may rest assured that we shall watch carefully and narrowly the results of these changes, and if the result should be other than what we expect, we shall most certainly consider ourselves bound to reconsider the position. [" Hear, hear !"] I will now leave the Guards, and mention another point at which it seems to us that an increase in the present establishment of the Army is called for. The House is aware that there are at this moment altogether 141 battalions of infantry, which give us 70 pairs of linked battalions and one odd battalion. The regiment which occupies this singular position is the Cameron Highlanders, which is the only one-battalion regiment in the Service. When it is out of the country it has no home battalion to support it. When, on the other hand, the battalion is at home, it has no battalion abroad to feed. We therefore propose to add a second battalion to this regiment, and therefore to increase by one the line battalions of the Army. The House will observe that the effect of these changes in regard to infantry will be that, whereas we have now 76 line battalions abroad to 65 at home, we shall have 73 abroad to 69 at home. That still leaves a deficit of four battalions; but that deficit, we think, may be fairly attributed in a measure to temporary circumstances, and we do not intend to provide for it at present by permanent measures. I wish now to say a few words on another subject. Our attention has very emphatically been called by the Standing Committee, which has for some years past advised the Government with regard to the strength of our colonial garrisons, to what the Committee regard as the weakness of some of the garrisons of the fortresses and coaling stations which we hold for the Navy. Their opinion is shared by our military advisers, and we have been recommended to make a slight addition to the strength of those garrisons. We propose a small increase at one or two stations in the infantry of the Line. We propose to add another battalion to the West India Regiment—a body of troops which have done most admirable service for the Empire under very trying conditions of climate; also another battalion of Malta Militia. But the deficiency is mainly in garrison artillery, and in order to carry out the views of the Committee, we propose to add to the strength of this branch of the artillery 3,600 men. I will not, on this occasion, enter at any length into the reasons upon which the Committee has based its recommendation. I can indicate them in general terms. There are certain points at which we have, from various causes which the House will scarcely expect me to discuss, become more vulnerable than of old. Then there is the fact that, in many of our defended ports, the conditions of defence have been altogether changed, owing to recent improvements in the science of artillery. The adoption of a new system of fire control and position finding, and the introduction of guns of an entirely new type, particularly quick-firing guns, which appear destined to play so large a part in future warfare, have rendered it necessary that we should reconsider the strength of the forces engaged in holding and defending these places. There is another point to which much attention has been paid by the Committee and by her Majesty's Government—I mean the undesirability of imposing upon the Navy, on a sudden outbreak of war, the duty of conveying reinforcements to our coaling stations and naval bases. It is this which leads us to the conclusion that the garrison of these places should be kept at their full strength in time of peace. I should like to say one word as to the policy by which we are guided in this matter. This point has been much controverted. I observe that there are two extreme schools of thought. There is the view of those who insist on the necessity of our maintaining the absolute supremacy of the sea, and who believe that, if our fleets are sufficiently strong for that we need take little or no thought for the land defences of the Empire at home or abroad. There is, on the other hand, the view of those who, in their anxiety that land defence should be properly provided for, seem to leave almost out of account the part which the fleet should take in warding off a naval attack upon our possessions. We cannot entirely accept either of these extreme views. I think it is clear that it is not part of our duty to increase the defences of these places up to a point sufficient to resist an attack from a large hostile squadron carrying with it a considerable expeditionary force; against such an attack it is the business of the fleet to protect them. If the fleet is not there, it is, presumably, because it is already watching or engaging the enemy's fleet elsewhere. The enemy's fleet, however, could not be at one and the same time watching or engaging our fleet and delivering an attack in force upon one of our coaling stations. On the other hand, there is no reason for ignoring altogether the question of land defence. The highest naval authorities hold, and no doubt rightly, that, our first object being to keep or to obtain the command of the sea, all other things must be subordinated to that object, and our admirals left free to use their forces as they find best for the purpose. Since this is the case, our coaling stations and colonial fortresses should be able to stand alone against any attack which is likely to be directed against them during the temporary absence of the fleet. I venture to sum up in the following propositions what appear to me to be the principles by which we should be guided. Let us maintain, above all things, our supremacy at sea. Let us next insist upon the mobility of our fleets, and impose upon them no duty which might restrict the freedom of their movements. Let us recognise that during their absence our coaling-stations will be exposed to what is commonly called a "cruiser attack" from the enemy. Let us, therefore, give them defences sufficient to insure their safety against any such attack. I must not forget to add one word with regard to field artillery. We propose to increase that arm by one new battery. We shall then have 45 batteries, or the full complement for the three army corps which we have been authorised to provide for home defence. I may sum up the increases which I have endeavoured to lay before the House. They consist of two new battalions of the Guards, one battalion of Cameron Highlanders, one battalion fo West Indian troops, one battalion of Malta militia, 3,600 garrison artillery, and one battery of field artillery. It only remains for me to say that we do not propose that these increases should be carried out in their entirety at once. Your Lordships must be well aware of the objections to sudden alterations in the establishment of the Army. Sudden increases are not only costly, but most detrimental to recruiting. A sudden influx of recruits at one moment is followed by a sudden efflux at another, and thereby we depart from the sound maxim laid down by Lord Wantage's Committee, that we should endeavour to maintain a constant and regular flow of recruits into the Army. We propose that the increases should be carried out during a period of three years. I have now stated what the proposals of the Government are, and I can only commend them to your Lordships' best consideration. [Cheers.]

LORD WANTAGE said he desired to take the earliest opportunity available to him in the Debate to say that the proposal to increase the strength of the Infantry of the Line, and the proposal to add to the strength of the Brigade of Guards, commended itself to his judgment. He wished specially to say a few words with regard to the latter proposal. He would go so far as to congratulate the Guards upon the proposed augmentation of their battalions, which showed the high value in which they were held. The privileges of the Guards had been from time to time greatly curtailed—indeed, he might say that they had, with one exception, entirely disappeared. But, although those privileges had been withdrawn, the efficiency of the Guards remained as great now as it ever had been in the past. The double rank, formerly borne by the officers of the Guards, and which was conferred upon them by a grateful country and an admiring Sovereign for distinguished services in great and victorious battles, had now been abolished, and the Guards and the Line, so far as officers' rank was concerned, were now on a precisely similar footing. But, although the Guards had no privileges of that nature over and above the Line, yet the duties of each branch of the Service and their establishments differed widely, because they were called upon to fulfil different functions. The duties of home battalions of the Line—and he referred specially to the duties of the officers and non-commissioned officers—were most onerous, and he would even say they were thankless. They were constantly engaged in the self-denying process of sending out heavy drafts of their best men to maintain the strength of their link battalions in India and elsewhere, and, although he had never heard an officer commanding a home battalion complain publicly of this self-denying and somewhat thankless task, he had often heard them in private lament the necessity of a process which left them in many cases little better than commanders of depôts of Recruits. The Secretary of State for War had referred in his excellent Speech to the case of India. England had deliberately put aside all proposals which had been made for the establishment of two separate armies—one to be Her Majesty's Army in India, complete in itself, with its training and recruiting establishments in England—and the other, Her Majesty's Army for Home and Colonial Service. Although this scheme had the sanction of many thoughtful persons, and had many obvious advantages attending it, yet he was convinced that its adoption would be by no means for the benefit of Her Majesty's Service generally. But the country, having elected to have one Army only for service—both in India and at home—must be prepared to accept the drawbacks and difficulties thereby entailed. The first and most obvious of these was that the linked battalions at home were merely nurseries for the battalions in India, and as such, quite unfit—as had been stated in evidence by the leading soldiers of the day—to undertake any fighting duties without being strengthened by men called up from the Reserve. Since Cardwell's scheme, framed in 1872, the Army in India had been from time to time permanently increased, and Egypt had been occupied and garrisoned by English troops, without any augmentation of the cadres at home. In this way the machinery which was intended to provide that every battalion abroad should have a corresponding linked battalion at home as a feeder, had been dislocated, and the utmost difficulty had been experienced in providing the accessory drafts which have to be sent out to keep up the Indian Establishment. The difficulty respecting drafts to India became most pressing in 1892, when Mr. Stanhope appointed a committee to propose remedies. At that time there were, and he believed at the present time there were 11 battalions abroad which ought properly to be at home. India was a hard mistress, and demanded her drafts to be regularly supplied, although the battalions at home might be quite unable to furnish them. Now the present proposal to send three battalions of Guards to the Mediterranean would greatly relieve the existing difficulty, and this plan was proposed in 1892, amongst other things, by the Wantage Committee. It would relieve the difficulty, because three battalions of the Line will be brought home, and will take their place in the proper position allotted to them. He would endeavour to explain in what manner a further advantage will be obtained. The three battalions of the Line that come home from the Mediterranean would then become feeding battalions, if he might use such an expression, instead of absorbing battalions—battalions requiring to be kept up by drafts from England, thus counting, to use a Parliamentary phrase, six in a Division. They had, therefore, the increase of two battalions of the Guards on the one side, against six battalions of the Line on the other—the financial balance in favour of the Guards scheme over the Line scheme showing a saving of £197,000 a year. The numbers of troops who were, from various causes, tied to the Militia, the Volunteers and the Yeomanry—home defence—as compared with those who were mobile, and available for immediate and active service abroad, were quite out of proportion; they had an abundance of the one and not enough of the other. That state of things required effective dealing with, and the proposal to add to the Guards was an important and decided step in that direction, and should, as such, be welcomed. The duties of the Guards, as he had already indicated, were fundamentally different from those of the Line. The former were relieved from all obligations of maintaining linked battalions abroad. The disastrous process of an annual depletion of their best men was spared them, and the consequence was, that the seven battalions of the Guards were the finest that could possibly be seen, fit, alone among Her Majesty's troops to go anywhere at the shortest possible notice. Lord Wolseley, speaking before the Wantage Committee of the young Line battalions not being fit for service, said:—

> "But I make one great exception, and that is in the case of the Guards. I think it is almost a necessary corollary to any short service system for our Army to have, say, nine battalions of the best troops always ready to do what you like with. The Guards are as well fitted for work now as I can ever remember, but there are only seven battalions of them. But I do not think it is possible to have in any army of the world a finer body of men."

He goes on to say he attaches the greatest importance to having battalions of specially superior troops for emergency. He says:—

> "I have long urged the advisability of adding two battalions more to the Guards, making three battalions for each regiment, by which means we should always have nine battalions of the finest troops possible to do anything with on a sudden emergency."

Having shown the superiority of the regiments of Guards over all other battalions of the Army at home, the course to be adopted seemed plain. The Commander-in-Chief, having obtained the sanction of Government for increasing the Army, naturally desired to select for augmentation those troops that most completely fulfilled the requirements for which they were needed. He therefore proposed to add to the Guards first, because they were the best troops we possessed; secondly, because they were the most mobile, and, therefore, most suited for immediate emergency, and he proposed to place one brigade of this augmented force at the entrance of the Mediterranean, as the spot where they would be more readily available. One great blot on our existing army system was that, with all our expenditure we could not, without having recourse to the Reserve, send out any number of Corps on a sudden emergency, the one exception being the battalions of the Brigade of Guards. While speaking of the Reserve, he should like to be allowed to quote from the Report of the Committee that went by the name of the "Wantage Committee." What were the functions of a Reserve? They were—

> "First, to raise units from peace to War establishment. Secondly, to take the place in the ranks of those men who being recruits are not fully grown. Thirdly, to replace in the ranks those men who are found to have become medically unfit for service in the field. Fourthly, after fulfilling the above requirements, to retain sufficient men in reserve in the second line, to fill up casualties occurring at the front, until such time as the recruits left behind are themselves ready to take their places in the fighting line."

The reserve was obviously never intended to be transferred at once into the fighting Line at the commencement of hostilities, which would be a necessity in the present condition of the home battalions of the Line. Having proved the special advantages attending an augmentation of the Brigade of Guards, they must, in his opinion, also accept that which followed, namely, the necessity and desirability of quartering a portion of the brigade away from the immediate proximity of the Sovereign. There was neither place nor requirement for additional battalions of Guards either at Windsor, London, or Aldershot. The privilege of the Guards to be the special guard of the Sovereign should, he thought, be interpreted in the broad sense of including not only Her Gracious Majesty the Queen, but also the State. This, he thought was established by the circumstance that when war broke out, the first troops ordered on service were invariably Her Majesty's Guards. But it was undoubtedly the privilege of the Guards, when at home, to be usually quartered in London or at Windsor, as the case might be. However much this privilege might be valued, and it was quite right it should be valued, it was not this in itself that had given the Guards their pre-eminence amongst other regiments. That the Guards had been enabled to inscribe on their colours the record of almost every great battle in which England had been engaged was due to the fact that they had always been on the spot, ready and prepared for action. In sending a portion of the Guards to Gibraltar, they would be practically or even more on the spot, in case of war, than they would be if quartered in England. Some minor objections had been raised to sending the Guards to Gibraltar, such as the want of rifle ranges and deficiency of drill ground; but if these existed—which he doubted very much—they applied equally to the Line, and ought in any case to be surmounted without loss of time. The proposal, therefore, which was now being discussed amounted to this, that the Government, amongst other things, proposed to augment the Guards from seven to nine battalions on the ground that they were the best troops we possessed, the best suited to their purpose, because their augmentation remedied the defects in the Cardwell scheme. He could not doubt, from his knowledge of the Guards, that when this proposal was shown to be for the advantage of the Army and the country, that a complete and cordial acceptance of the change would be accorded to it. He apologised to their Lordships for having dwelt on a portion only of this somewhat large question. But arguments which had occurred to him had been already made use of in the clear and admirable statement of the Secretary of State for War, which he was thereby relieved from alluding to. He saw in his place the noble Lord (Lord Methuen) who commanded the Brigade of Guards. No one was better fitted than he to speak on this subject, and he hoped he might not be unwilling to address their Lordships. There was one point on which he was sure the noble Lord would be at one with him, namely, in appealing to the Secretary of State for War to safeguard effectually the Brigade of Guards from being rendered less efficient than they now were by any undue depletion for the purpose of maintaining in full force the battalions serving abroad. [Cheers.]

LORD METHUEN said he need not apologise for addressing their Lordships on the present occasion, because his position as Commander of the Brigade of Guards gave him, he might say, the right to give his views on this matter. When the Secretary of State for War and the Commander-in-Chief were good enough to ask him his opinion, he answered that, whatever feelings he had as Commander were subservient to those which affected the interests and the welfare of Her Majesty's Army. [Cheers.] They could, however, sympathise with him, and with those officers of the Guards who had devoted their lives to maintaining the Guards in the state of efficiency in which they had been left by their predecessors, in regard to the anxiety which they felt. When they read the evidence of the present Commander-in-Chief, the Adjutant-General, and the late Commander-in-Chief regarding the efficiency of the seven battalions of the Guards and the attenuated state of the Line, surely they might have some feelng of anxiety with regard to the Measure now before their Lordships. In olden days the Line were told very clearly that nothing was to be done that would do them harm, and he would ask them whether the home army now was in the same condition as it was. But he had no wish to dwell on the efficiency or non-efficiency of the Army. He only wished that those officers and civilians who had been so liberal in their opinions, both verbal and in writing, had made themselves masters of the evidence given before Lord Wantage's Committee. Unless they had studied that mine of military information, he did not think their opinion could be of any great value. He recognised the kind feeling which the Secretary of State had shown, both when he had consulted him and in the speech which he had now made. Any scheme for the increase of the Army, if it was to be followed by any decrease in the efficiency of the Brigade of Guards, would be evil and not good. He did not for one moment say that the measures proposed were not likely to be advantageous to the Brigade of Guards. He held the opinion, and had received it also from others, that it would be distinctly to the advantage of the Brigade of Guards if they could send six battalions into the field, and they would also have a better chance of seeing service. But that advantage, he had always said, should not be obtained at the expense of efficiency. There were three dangers which occurred to them, and he spoke not merely for himself but also for the three commanding officers of regiments who had given him their able and admirable advice. He should deprecate any scheme which had for its object the tearing out of the vitals of the six battalions of England in order to put life into those which were at Gibraltar. Any depletion of the battalions in England would be fatal to the Brigade of Guards. As to the training of these battalions at Gibraltar, if he was told that in one and a-half years three battalions could be as efficient, or very little less efficient, as they were when they went out, what was the good of all the teaching they had received when they were told that if they were to be equal to European nations in the exigencies of modern warfare, they should be exercised throughout the year in all the practical work which really formed a soldier? He was entirely in favour of having Gibraltar as a quarter for one year or a year and a-half, and he did not think that a battalion coming back at the end of a year and a-half, at any rate, dangerously inefficient. But, he urged, let them have six efficient battalions in England and one thoroughly efficient battalion in Gibraltar. There were three evils in Gibraltar which existed in a greater degree than they did in London; the first was drunkenness, the second disease, and the third heavy duty. The question of recruiting was one with which he had nothing to do, but he did hope that if any difficulty was found in getting recruits, and if the Brigade of Guards was in consequence losing it present fine physique, some steps might be taken to stop any deterioration. It was by no means clear that these difficulties could not be got over, but whilst helping the Secretary of State in every way he could to carry out this Measure, he felt that he should not be acting rightly, either to the Secretary of State or to the Brigade of Guards, for whose efficiency he was responsible, if he did not point out clearly, on behalf of himself and of the officers, past and present, the dangers and difficulties in the way. ["Hear, hear!"] The Brigade of Guards were a body of troops that at all times had gained the respect and admiration of the country; they had always done their duty when called upon, and he felt sure their services would not be forgotten. He wished to disabuse the Secretary of State of the idea that there was any feeling amongst the officers of the Brigade of Guards adverse to going abroad. There were no officers whom he knew who would not as willingly serve their country in India or elsewhere as in England if called upon. [Cheers.] The only danger he foresaw was the loss of efficiency.

*LORD MONKSWELL said he rose to ask the noble Marquess one or two questions with reference to the statement he had just made, and also with reference to the statement made in the House of Commons the other day by the Under Secretary. He was particularly gratified to hear the noble Marquess bestow such high praise on the policy of abolition of purchase. Everyone must agree that it was very desirable to make the system of linked battalions as effective as possible; but he was not quite certain that the proposals of the Government would have that effect, because it seemed even now that the number of battalions abroad would still be permanently four in excess of the number of battalions at home.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I said particularly that we did not regard the deficit as composed of battalions which would necessarily be permanently absent, and, therefore, we do not propose to provide for it by any permanent measures.

*LORD MONKSWELL: At any rate there would be a considerable deficit for the present, and it seemed to him that, with the forward frontier policy which was being pursued by the Government, it was exceedingly unlikely that the system of linked battalions would be absolutely effective, even after the increase the noble Marquess proposed. But he came to what was really a great difficulty in the way of the noble Marquess, and that was recruiting. A note of alarm was raised as to that matter in a letter in The Times of last Saturday. The statement in the letter was to the effect that the Brigade of Guards was now under its establishment, that trade was improving, and that the probability was that, if guardsmen were made liable in the future to garrison duty abroad, it would, to a great extent, put a stop to recruiting in the Brigade. That raised another question. He would like to ask the noble Marquess whether or not he considered that it would be a breach of faith to send the present rank and file, without their consent, to serve in Gibraltar; whether it was fair that men enlisted for three or seven years under the present system should be so called upon? There was another matter connected with recruiting. The noble Marquess proposed to increase the garrison artillery by 3,600. He was told that the artillery was now considerably under its establishment, and that there was the greatest possible difficulty in getting recruits; he therefore would like to know how the noble Marquess proposed to raise these additional men. Then with regard to the Cameronian Highlanders. He was told that there was also great difficulty in recruiting for that regiment, and that the regiment was at present not a Highland regiment at all, but was recruited largely from London and other places. There were one or two minor points in connection with the speech of the Under-Secretary. It was proposed, it seemed, to incur large expenditure in building and enlarging barracks; and with reference to that a note of warning as to the system at present pursued was raised in the House of Commons by Sir John Colomb, who suggested that the Royal Engineers were sometimes employed in connection with the construction of barracks, in duties for which their training did not qualify them. They were called upon sometimes to act as clerk of the works—a post for which, he was told, their training did not qualify them. He did not intend to say anything in disparagement of the corps. Every officer in the Engineers must be a highly-educated and cultivated man, but he ought not to be put to perform highly technical duties in which he had had no experience. Possibly the House might wish to have a little more information with regard to the proposed fortifications of London. The suggestion came from the late Mr. Stanhope, and the scheme was carried on by the late Government; but even if two Governments had combined in thinking it a right suggestion, he did not know that that was absolutely conclusive in its favour. Although the Under Secretary said that these fortifications had been approved by the Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant-General, he did not say that they had been approved by the Inspector-General of Fortifications. He hoped the noble Marquess would tell the House whether that was so. Then the noble Marquess proposed to take a large area of land on Salisbury Plain for encampment and manœuvres. Sir John Colomb suggested in the House of Commons that it would be preferable to acquire lands on the coast, so that manœuvres might be carried out in conjunction with the naval forces.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE: I would venture to point out that the matter which the noble Lord discussed towards the close of his speech would more appropriately be brought before the House when the Military Works Loan Bill, now before the House of Commons, comes here. The speech of the Under-Secretary was delivered in bringing in that Bill, and it seems to me that any criticism upon it might well be deferred until it arrives in your Lordships' House. ["Hear, hear!"] With regard to the defences of London, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say that we are not adopting any new plans for this purpose. We are merely carrying out certain works of a very modest order which were first initiated in the Government of which Mr. Stanhope was a member—works which were very fully explained in Parliament by Mr. Stanhope, which were carried on by the late Government, and which are being still further carried on by the present Government. I wished to make that observation because there seems to be in some quarters an impression that a new and startling departure has been made in this direction. With regard to Salisbury Plain, if the noble Lord will tell me in confidence of any area possessing advantages at all corresponding to those which Salisbury Plain offers, and which also has the advantage of being on the sea coast, and therefore suitable for combined naval and military operations, I shall be extremely obliged to him. [Laughter.] But my inquiries have not led me to expect the discovery of any such terra incognita. As to the other questions of the noble Lord, I do not consider there would be any breach of faith in employing Guardsmen in service in the Mediterranean. As the noble Lord himself knows, they all engage for general service, and are therefore already liable for service out of the United Kingdom. Then the noble Lord asked me a question with regard to our anticipations as to the possibility of obtaining a sufficient number of recruits for the garrison artillery. I have no reason to suppose that those recruits, who will be procured gradually during the next three years, will be impossible to obtain. The last question the noble Lord asked me had reference to the proposal to create a second battalion of Cameron Highlanders. I am free to confess that I am a little sceptical as to the Highland character of the men of whom that second battalion might possibly be composed; but I must tell the House that rumours have reached me that the men now serving in the existing battalion are not all of unimpeachably Scottish origin—in fact I have heard it said that not a few of them are enlisted at no great distance from the House in which your Lordships are sitting at this moment. [Laughter.]

House adjourned at a Quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow at a Quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 4th February 1897.

FRANCHISE AND REMOVAL OF WOMEN'S DISABILITIES BILL.

Second Reading upon Monday next.

QUESTIONS.

BALINTORE HARBOUR.

Mr. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the engineers to the Fishery Board for Scotland failed during the construction of Balintore Harbour to require the removal of certain rocks, whereby fishing boats and other crafts are exposed to serious danger; and whether steps will be taken to secure the removal of these rocks at an early date?

*The LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. Graham Murray, Buteshire): I am informed by the Fishery Board that the engineers who planned the harbour, and who were appointed by the harbour trustees, do not know to what rocks this Question can refer, as the excavations were finished in accordance with the plans and specifications in September 1893, with the exception of a few yards of rock outside the harbour entrance, which were removed in February 1895.

PORT NESS HARBOUR (ISLAND OF LEWIS).

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is proposed to extend the harbour at Port Ness, Island of Lewis; and whether arrangements will be made to complete the works during the year?

*The LORD ADVOCATE: There is no intention to extend the harbour at Port Ness beyond what was proposed six years ago. As the hon. Member is aware, a dispute between the trustees and the contractors was referred to arbitration; and the decision has not yet been given to us. For the present it is impossible to say when the works will be finished.

CONTRACTS WITH FOREIGNERS.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he has succeeded in devising a better form for the annual return "Contracts with Foreigners," so as to inform the House not only what Government contracts have been placed with contractors outside the United Kingdom, but also what articles have been supplied from foreign countries by contractors or their agents resident in the United Kingdom?

*The SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. R. W. Hanbury, Preston): The present annual return is undoubtedly misleading. In the case of articles purchased abroad through English firms, it has hitherto treated them as being of English origin or manufacture, though really purchased abroad. On the other hand articles purchased direct from abroad have not been included unless they are such as were also manufactured in this country. If any return is given, it ought to be accurate, and it is proposed to show all articles purchased from contractors outside the United Kingdom. In the case of articles obtained from English firms or agents, it would of course be very difficult, and almost impossible to trace the history of every component part, but with that proviso there would be no objection to a return showing all articles not bonâ fide manufactured in this country.

MIDWIVES' REGISTRATION.

Mr. C. E. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government propose to take any action to carry out the Report of the Select Committee on Midwives' Registration (of 1893), which was of opinion that a large amount of suffering and death was needlessly inflicted on both women and children of the so-called working classes through the want of medical training amongst those practising as midwives?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir Matthew White Ridley, Lancashire, Blackpool): The Lord President of the Council informs me that the Association for promoting the compulsory registration of midwives intend to promote a Bill with this object during the present Session, and he has under consideration the question of receiving a deputation from the Association with regard to it.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been called to the following complaint, contained in a letter from a well-known gentleman at Belfast, with respect to the rejection of deposits of odd pence by the Post Office Savings Bank: "To be a real poor man's bank, there should be given every facility to the working classes to save pence as well as shillings and pounds. The other day I was asked to deposit a sum for a poor man—one pound one shilling and tenpence. The tenpence was refused; no odd number of pence under twelve—one shilling—could be received"; whether he is aware that the calculations for interest on deposits usually come out in odd pence, and that high officials of the department have declared that the acceptance of odd pence with a shilling or more would impose no great additional labour on the clerks engaged; and, whether, with a view to encourage thrift, especially among children and the poorest classes of depositors, he will recommend the abolition of the rule forbidding the acceptance of odd pence over and above the minimum deposit of one shilling?

MR. HANBURY: The exclusion of odd pence from an amount of Savings Bank deposit is prescribed by the Savings Bank Act of 1861, and not by a mere Departmental rule. The Postmaster General's attention has not been called to the remark attributed to a well-known gentleman at Belfast. The calculation of interest—which is entered only once a year—does of course include odd pence, but this is in no way comparable to the inclusion of odd pence in all the numerous deposit entries throughout the year. The Postmaster General is not aware that any high officials have expressed the opinion that the acceptance of odd pence with a shilling or more would impose no great additional labour on the clerks engaged. He is on the contrary advised by the high officials that such a change as the hon. Member suggests would enormously increase the labour and cost of the Savings Bank transactions. The Postmaster General believes that the system of allowing penny stamps to be affixed to slips to make up deposits of a shilling—originally introduced by Mr. Fawcett—is all that is necessary, and he has no intention of recommending a change in the law.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could state the name of the "well-known gentleman" in Belfast?

MR. HANBURY said he could not give the name.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON said that as a matter of explanation he might state that the name of the gentleman referred to was Mr. John Ward, J.P., of Lennoxvale, Belfast. The original letter was sent to the Postmaster General.

PETERHEAD HARBOUR.

SIR JOHN LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can explain why the available convict labour for the construction of the harbour at Peterhead is so much less than originally contemplated as to increase the estimated cost of the work by £160,000?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: I am informed by the Prison Commissioners that in 1882, when the Peterhead Scheme was suggested, it was estimated that the working party of convicts which would be available would be 500, whereas at present the total available number is 235. The falling-off is due to a decrease in the annual average of sentences to penal servitude, and in their average duration.

MAIL BAG SEALS.

SIR JOHN LENG: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that every sealed mail bag sent from the Post Office can be easily opened without breaking the seal or cutting the twine, and rifled of its contents, which can then be replaced wholly or in part with the seal still intact; whether an easy method of doing this has been demonstrated to Mr. Braid, postmaster, Glasgow; whether Mr. Peter Dunsire, of Buckhaven, has brought under the notice of the Department a simple invention which would make it impossible to rob a mail bag without cutting it: whether this invention could be applied at very small cost to each mail bag; and, on what grounds the Department have declined to secure the safe transit of Her Majesty's mails by refusing to adopt Mr. Dunsire's invention, or allowing the trial of it which was sanctioned by Mr. Mahon, Surveyor of the Edinburgh Post Office?

MR. HANBURY: It is not the fact that every sealed mail bag can be easily opened without breaking the seal or cutting the string. Mr. Dunsire, who was at the time sub-postmaster of Methil, was permitted to experiment on a bag in the presence of the Postmaster of Glasgow, and succeeded in drawing the neck of the bag through the string, but bags are now so made as to render such a manipulation of the neck impossible if ordinary care is used in tying the string. Mr. Dunsire's invention, which is similar to many others submitted for the consideration of the Department, was thoroughly examined by practical officers, but it was not held to afford any greater security than the present method, while the cost would be much greater, and more time would be required for closing the bags. The present method of fastening bags with string and wax is simple and satisfactory, and there is no risk attendant thereon which Mr. Dunsire's invention would remove.

SWANSEA POST OFFICE.

MR. BRYNMOR JONES (Swansea District): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether it is the fact that it is intended to erect new post office buildings in Wind Street, Swansea; whether the Postmaster General is aware that great dissatisfaction exists among the inhabitants of Swansea in regard to the plans of the proposed new buildings; and whether the Postmaster General will postpone any final decision as to the adoption of these plans until further opportunity has been given for laying before him the objections taken to them?

MR. HANBURY: It is a fact that it is intended to erect a new post office building in Wind Street, Swansea, at a cost of £47,000 for site and building. The plans have been shown to the Town Council, and the Postmaster General is not aware that great dissatisfaction exists among the inhabitants in regard to them. The Council, however, have suggested that the elevation should be of a more imposing character, and that the building itself should be set back on two sides. The Postmaster General is in communication with the First Commissioner of Works on these points, but he cannot hold out any hope that any addition will be authorised to the large expenditure of public money already authorised upon the building.

WATER SUPPLY (RURAL DISTRICTS).

SIR CAMERON GULL (Devon, Barnstaple): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the fact that, although statutory obligations are imposed upon rural district councils in respect of the supply of water to places within their district, it has been often found practically impossible for those councils to carry out their obligations in the absence of powers of compulsory purchase; and whether, having regard to the serious amount of sickness in country districts which is directly traceable to insufficient or impure water supply, he could introduce at an early date a short Measure enabling rural district councils to compulsorily acquire water rights?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I am advised that there have been cases where district councils have been placed at a disadvantage, and I have already caused the point to be noted as one of the matters which should be considered in connection with any Bill for the Amendment of the Public Health Acts; but for reasons already given on other matters I cannot undertake to bring in a Bill this Session.

SIR CAMERON GULL: Is there any immediate prospect of a Bill being introduced?

MR. CHAPLIN: No; I cannot say that.

CAVAN AND LEITRIM LIGHT RAILWAY.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.); I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the capitalisation of the shares of the Cavan and Leitrim Light Railway has yet been effected so as to give the relief intended by the Act passed in 1895?

Mr. HANBURY: The hon. Member refers no doubt to the Government contribution, not to the shares. I have heard nothing more from the Company on the subject. Their August Report stated that:

> "Owing to the high price of the Company's stock it has been found impossible to adopt with advantage to the ratepayers and shareholders the provisions of the Tramways (Ireland) Act, 1895, for redemption of the Treasury contribution to the Counties in aid of Baronial Guarantee."

ROYAL CANAL HARBOUR (LONGFORD).

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the many accidents which have occurred in the Royal Canal Harbour at Longford, resulting in the death of a great number of persons since it was first opened, he is prepared to give his assent to the introduction of a short Bill to enable Town Commissioners and other public bodies to enclose such dangerous places, which it appears they cannot at present legally do?

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. C. T. Ritchie, Croydon): Until I have seen such a Measure as is referred to by the hon. Member, I am not able to say what my attitude will be in respect to it.

STORNOWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that the Stornoway mail, which is dispatched from London with the Wick mail at 8.30 p.m., is thrown out at Dingwall at 11.14 a.m., and there delayed until 11.55 a.m., when it is sent on by a train stopping at all stations, with the result that it does not arrive at Strome Ferry until 2.10 p.m., whence it is dispatched by steamer to Stornoway, reaching the latter place too late in the evening to admit the business community to reply by the return mail leaving one hour after midnight; and, whether he will take steps to accelerate the Stornoway mail service, which not only affects a population of 30,000 in the Island of Lewis, but also a considerable population on the western mainland of Ross-shire?

Mr. HANBURY: The Stornoway mail is conveyed in the manner stated in the hon. Member's question, and is due to reach Stornoway about 9 p.m. A delivery of letters to callers at the Post Office is afforded the same evening whenever the steamer arrives in time for such delivery to be made by 10.15 p.m., and on such occasions opportunity is given for reply to urgent letters by the outgoing mail of the same night. To accelerate the arrival of the mail at Stornoway, as desired by the hon. Member, would involve heavy expenditure to the Post Office, which the circumstances do not warrant. Moreover, the earlier arrival of the mail would benefit, not the whole population of Lewis, but only the inhabitants of Stornoway.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY (VENTILATION).

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, if he will state whether the Departmental Committee to inquire into the ventilation of the underground railways of London has been appointed; and, if so, will he state the names of the Members of the Committee?

Mr. RITCHIE: The Committee was appointed on the 2nd of this month, and the names of the Members appeared in the newspapers yesterday morning. They are:—

Major Marindin, R.E., C.M.G. (Chairman).
Earl Russell.
Sir Douglas Galton, K.C.B.
Sir Charles Scotter.
Dr. John Scott Haldane.

METRIC SYSTEM.

Mr. A. J. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when he proposes to introduce the Bill of last Session for the metric system of weights and measures?

Mr. RITCHIE: I am unable at present to fix a date, but I hope its introduction will not be unduly delayed.

MEDITERRANEAN GARRISON (BRIGADE OF GUARDS).

Sir JAMES FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, as reported, to add two battalions to the brigade of Guards, and to station certain battalions of the brigade in a Mediterranean garrison; and whether any other additions to the Army are contemplated?

The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for WAR (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): It will be gathered from the Estimates presented to Parliament that it is intended to add a battalion each to the Coldstream Guards and Scots Guards, and to station three battalions of the Guards in the Mediterranean. It is also proposed to add a battalion to the Cameron Highlanders, which is the only single-battalion regiment in the Army. It is further intended to raise an additional regiment of Malta Artillery and to add a battalion to the West India Regiment, while the Garrison Artillery will be increased by 3,400 men. One field battery to complete the equipment of three army corps will also be raised. The Estimates, with a memorandum from the Secretary of State fully explaining these increases, will be in the hands of Members to-morrow morning.

Sir JAMES FERGUSSON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the employment of the Guards on foreign service in time of peace is intended to be exceptional, or whether it is intended to place them permanently on foreign service?

Mr. BRODRICK: This arrangement has been put forward by the military authorities as being the best and most economical scheme of meeting the needs of the Army. Its operation will require to be carefully watched, and should the effect on recruiting in the Guards be other than that which we are led to expect the whole position will be reconsidered. I need hardly say that we have no intention of doing anything to alter the historic character of the Guards. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) asked when there would be an opportunity of discussing the matter on the Army Estimates?

Mr. BRODRICK said the right hon. Gentleman must ask the First Lord of the Treasury that question.

*Mr. McLEOD (Sutherland) asked if the right hon. Gentleman could say where the Cameron Highlanders were to come from, seeing that the Government refused to introduce legislation to keep Highlanders in the country? [An Hon. Member; "Ireland."] [Laughter.]

Mr. BRODRICK: I hope they will come from the same source of recruiting as at present.

Captain DONELAN (Cork, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether there is any intention of establishing a battalion of Irish Guards?

Mr. BRODRICK: No, Sir. [Irish ironical cheers.]

PERSECUTION OF NESTORIANS.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government have any recent information regarding the persecution of the Nestorian Christians inhabiting the higher mountain regions of Assyria above the banks of the Zab and Habor; whether they are now surrounded, with the help of the Kurds, and their caravans prevented from leaving the country to procure food; and whether they are in great danger of perishing from famine?

*The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. Curzon, Lancashire, Southport): The latest reports on the subject of the Nestorians received from Her Majesty's Vice-Consul at Van were dated December 20th and November 15th, and in neither of them did Major Williams seem to anticipate the state of things suggested in this Question. He spoke of the Kurds as a terror to Christians and Moslems alike, but he took a more hopeful view of the situation as affecting the Nestorians. The latter, although they had suffered from Kurdish raids, had on the whole, in his opinion, come comparatively well through the recent troubles; and their condition was a happy one contrasted with that of the Armenian peasantry. There was no idea of coercing them if they remained quiet, and he did not think there was any cause for alarm on the part of their friends. In October last, on hearing from the Archbishop of Canterbury's mission of an intention to disarm the Nestorians in the Tyari and Ashiret districts, inquiries were made, and Her Majesty's Vice Consul at Van telegraphed that there was no truth in the reports. I may add that if the hon. Member has any private information on the subject which he cares to communicate to me I shall be happy to receive it.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, in view of the new time table for an accelerated mail service between England and Ireland, it would be possible to send on all mails for Cavan, Belturbet, and Enniskillen from Dundalk immediately on the arrival of the limited mail there each morning instead of, as at present, delaying the train's departure till 9 o'clock and then only sending the mails on a slow train?

Mr. HANBURY: The question raised by the hon. Member shall be examined in connection with the revision of the daily mail service between Dublin and Belfast, but if the only way of effecting the improvement is by the establishment of additional trains at the cost of the Post Office, I fear it will not be practicable to meet the wishes of the inhabitants.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: On behalf of the hon. Member for Dublin, College Green (Mr. J. L. Carew), I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he will see that provision is made in the new arrangement for the acceleration of the Irish mails for giving to passengers by the up and down day trains between London and Holyhead the same facilities for booking third class as are given at present to English and Scotch passengers by the same trains between London, Crewe, and Chester?

Mr. HANBURY: No, Sir; it must be left to the Railway Company to determine what classes of traffic they can carry by the mail trains consistently with the due performance of the mail service for which they contract with the Postmaster General. The wish of the Irish representatives that provisions should be made in the trains for third class passengers to and from Ireland is well known to the Railway Company, but they have hitherto stated that they cannot see their way to make such provision.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: When this train was first established it was specially for the conveyance of the passenger traffic to Ireland. Since then the Company began to use it for carrying English and Scotch passengers.

*Mr. SPEAKER: "Order, order!" The hon. Gentleman is replying upon the answer; he is not asking a question.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: With all respect, the right hon. Gentleman has not answered the question—whether the Postmaster General has not power to prevent the using of the trains for carrying English and Scotch passengers when the Company will not give facilities to Irish passengers?

Mr. HANBURY: What the Postmaster General has to consider is the carriage of the mails; he is not concerned with the passenger traffic at all.

ARMY PENSION (JOHN FITZPATRICK).

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office, if he can state the reasons which influenced the Paymaster General to stop the pension awarded to John Fitzpatrick, of Fartherin, Ballyconnell, county Cavan, and whether such action was in accordance with the regulations?

*The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Mr. Powell-Williams, Birmingham, S.): The pension of John Fitzpatrick, amounting to 6s. 5d. per week, was suspended by the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital during his imprisonment for contempt of Court, in not having paid a debt of 16s. 9d. on which judgment had been obtained against him two months previously. The Commissioners held that as he was able to pay the debt and had refused to do so, although ample time had been allowed, and that as his imprisonment involved his maintenance at the expense of the State, the case was one in which it was right for them to exercise the powers of temporary forfeiture conferred on them by Her Majesty's Warrant.

DIVISIONAL POLICE COMMISSIONERS (IRELAND).

MR. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): On behalf of the hon. Member for South Monaghan (Mr. JAMES DALY), I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state how many divisional commissioners of police there are in Ireland, and how much salary they receive; and, whether he can say if the reduction of the police force in Ireland will lessen the duties of the divisional commissioners; and, if so, whether he will reduce the salaries of the divisional commissioners accordingly?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): There are four divisional commissioners at present employed in Ireland, each in receipt of a salary of £1,000 per annum. The proposed reduction of the police force will not affect the duties or emoluments of these officers.

COTTAGE GARDENS.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board (1) whether it is the case that the provision in the Agricultural Rates Act admitting to any benefit of the Act, inter alia, cottage gardens exceeding one quarter of an acre, has been so affected by letters from the Inland Revenue, appearing to be based upon Article 5, Section 3, of the Local Government Board Order, as to exclude, in the parish of East Dean alone, hundreds of small freeholders from such benefit; (2) whether he is aware that Article 5, Section 3 (c), of the Order of the Local Government Board, by which it is directed that, in the case of premises consisting partly of agricultural land and partly of buildings, the minimum rateable value of the part consisting of the buildings shall be £3, has had the effect of excluding from the benefit of the Act all cottages with gardens of which the gross rateable value does not exceed £3; and (3) whether he will introduce such modifications into the Order that cottagers to whom the Act, by virtue of the definition section, expressly applies may not be excluded from its benefit?

MR. CHAPLIN: With respect to the first question, I am not aware of the facts mentioned as to the letters of the Board of Inland Revenue, and they are not within my knowledge. As regards the second question, I imagine that the cases of cottages with an area of land exceeding a quarter of an acre, where the rateable value of house and land would be less than £3, would be very exceptional, assuming that the hereditament is assessed at its proper rateable value. The case to which the right hon. Member refers is the only one that has been brought under my attention where it has been alleged that any hardship has occurred from the operation of the Order in this respect. Apart from any other consideration, no alteration of the Order of the Local Government Board could now affect this question. The several statements of value have been long since settled by the Assessment Committees, and the time for appeals has passed. The lists as settled will come into operation for all rates made after the 31st March next.

*SIR C. DILKE asked if the right hon. Gentleman would inquire as to the legality of the portion of the letter which professed to be based on the order of his Department, or should he address a question on the legality of the letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

MR. CHAPLIN was understood to answer in the affirmative.

INSANITY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: On behalf of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Tradeston, (Mr. A. C. CORBETT), I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the fact that the number of insane persons under official cognisance in the United Kingdom, Ireland included, have increased from 55,525 in 1862 to 128,896 in 1895, and that the ratio of insane per 1,000 of the population has gone up during the same period from 1·81 to 3·28; and whether, in view of the importance of the subject, he will take steps to convene an International Conference to ascertain what measures can be taken to arrest the spread of the disease?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I am aware of the great increase in the number of insane persons in institutions, and I would remind the hon. Member that on Febuary 28 last year I stated in this House that I should consult with the Lord Chancellor with a view to the attention of the Lunacy Commissioners being specially directed to the question. The Lunacy Commissioners have, I am informed, completed a special report on the subject, which is now in the printer's hands; and until I have had the opportunity of considering that report I should prefer not to reply to the second part of the hon. Member's Question.

MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) asked whether the inquiry would include Ireland?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: No, Sir; it will not include Ireland, because there was a special inquiry in the matter in Ireland before.

ILLEGAL SUPPLY OF SEAMEN (GLASGOW).

MR. JOHN BAIRD (Glasgow, Central): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the case of John Anderson, boarding house keeper, Broomielaw, Glasgow, who was tried at Greenock on 16th December last for supplying to the British ship King's County six seamen, five of whom were his own boarders; whether Anderson pleaded in defence that he was told two years before by Mr. Ross, Superintendent of Mercantile Marine at Glasgow, that if he only supplied men who were his own boarders, and charged no fee, he would not be interfered with, which statement was corroborated by Mr. Ross; whether with regard to the remaining seamen, it was proved that his own boarding house keeper had taken him down to Greenock; whether Anderson was convicted and fined £2 for each man; and whether, under the circumstances, he will advise that the fine be remitted?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: I have made inquiry into this case. All the statements made in my hon. Friend's Question were made before and examined by the Sheriff, who convicted, but imposed a modified penalty. I see no reason to set aside his decision.

DISTRESS (WESTPORT UNION).

DR. ROBERT AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called, by resolution of the Westport Board of Guardians, to the distress at present existing in the Louisburgh Division of the Westport Union, and to the need for establishing some remunerative relief works; and whether he would favourably consider the request of the Westport Board of Guardians, viz., to establish a line of railway between Westport and Louisburgh, which would have the effect of relieving the several congested districts between those two points, and of developing the fishing industry to the west of Louisburgh?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I have received a copy of the resolution referred to. The condition and prospects of the poorer classes in this district have received and will continue to receive, the very careful attention of the Poor Law Authorities, but it is not anticipated that it will become necessary to supplement the resources of the poor law by the establishment of relief works. With regard to the suggested construction of a railway between Westport and Louisburgh, I cannot hold out any hope that the line will be included in the allocation of the Grant provided by the Act of last year.

MR. DANE asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had received a report in reference to this district?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am continually receiving reports from all those districts.

DONEGAL PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. J. G. SWIFT MACNEILL (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether his attention has been called to a report of the Donegal Petty Sessions, held on Wednesday the 20th ultimo, where Constable Patrick Wall, of the Mountcharles Police Station, charged Patrick Gallagher, of Mountcharles, with being drunk and disorderly, and on the case being investigated by the Magistrates (Mr. Gerald Butler, R.M., presiding) they dismissed it, and censured the constable; (2) is he aware that within the past three months this constable has brought several charges against publicans and others, which on investigation by the Donegal Bench were dismissed; and (3) whether the authorities intend to take any, and, if so, what action in reference to the conduct of this constable?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I have been furnished with a report of the proceedings on the hearing of this case. Complaint having been made by the defendant as to the action of the constable, he was informed that he should take out a summons against the constable, on the charge of violation of duty under Section 19 of the 6 & 7 William IV., cap. 13, when the Magistrates in Petty Sessions could make a sworn inquiry into the case, and deal with it as provided for under the Statute. This step Mr. Gallagher proposes to take. The fact is not as stated in the second paragraph; of nine prosecutions brought by this constable during the past three months only two were dismissed.

MR. MACNEILL was understood to ask why, the Magistrates having censured this constable, the Constabulary authorities would not investigate his conduct with a view to some action?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said that a remedy having been provided by law, the suggestion of the hon. Member had no force.

COLLECTION OF LICENCES.

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the various licence duties which are now contributed in Great Britain to local taxation are collected by Imperial taxgatherers; and whether, as in Ireland, the licences are not devoted to local purposes, he is willing to give over the collection of these licences to the local authorities who now receive the proceeds, and so relieve the Imperial taxpayers generally and Ireland especially?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The licence duties which are now contributed in Great Britain to local taxation are collected by Imperial officers. This arrangement was part of the scheme under which the allocation of these licences to local taxation was made, and I see no reason at present for disturbing it. The transfer of the collection of licences to local officers would throw a considerable burden on the localities with a very small economy to the Imperial Exchequer. The assignment of local licences in Great Britain to local authorities was in lieu of certain grants in aid of local purposes which were discontinued. There has been no discontinuance of the corresponding Grants-in-aid in Ireland.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. LOUGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether instructions have been given to cease recruiting for the Royal Irish Constabulary, and to reduce the number of mounted men in that force; and, if so, will he explain what is the object of the Government in carrying out these economies?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I have already explained that it is proposed to effect a reduction in the Royal Irish Constabulary by allowing the force to waste down, through retirements and the stoppage of recruiting, by 605 men, after which it will stand at 10,830 men. The mounted section of the force will be reduced by 106 men. As to the last part of the Question, I should have thought that the hon. Member would have been among the first to recognise that economy is an end in itself where it can be effected with a due regard to the public interests.

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) how many head constables, sergeants, acting sergeants, and constables are at present serving in the Royal Irish Constabulary in Ireland who have completed their statutory time (29 years and over); and (2) whether their retirement will be directed in order to reduce the number of men at present serving in the force and lighten the burden of taxation?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The Inspector General states that much time and labour would be required to procure the information sought for in the first part of the Question. The men referred to are not, either by reason of age or length of service, incapacitated for duty, but are fully trained and vigorous men capable of continuing to render efficient service, and it is not proposed compulsorily to retire men of this class. To retire effective policemen who are willing to continue in the service would not be a desirable way of reducing the force where the same end can be effectually secured by stopping recruiting.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING (SCOTLAND).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will state the nature of the provisions which have recently been made for the better protection of the fishing beds off the coast of Scotland from the depredations of trawlers within the three-mile limit?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: The arrangements are not yet definitely settled; I shall, however, take the earliest possible opportunity of supplying the information desired.

INEBRIATE

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the State Home for Habitual Inebriates which has been opened at Foxboro, Massachusetts, and if he can obtain information with regard to its conditions of management, &c.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: My attention has not previously been called to this Home, but I should be pleased if my hon. Friend would speak to me on the matter, as I should be very glad to try and get him any supplementary information which may be procurable.

EXPERIMENTS ON LIVING ANIMALS.

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the annual Report of Experiments on Living Animals is published later and later every year; and whether, having regard to the fact that the last Vivisection Report for the year 1895 was published on the 6th August 1896, when Parliamentary intervention that Session was impossible, he will give an assurance that the Report for 1896 will be published in time for discussion on the Estimates?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I explained, in answer to a Question of the hon. Member last August, why last year's return was issued so exceptionally late. Every effort will be made to issue the return in future at an early date.

MR. MACNEILL asked if the right hon. Gentleman would, as far as he could, give him an assurance that it would come on in time for discussion on the Estimates?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said that there were exceptional reasons last year in consequence of certain returns not coming in from the hon. Member's own country.

MR. MACNEILL: There is no vivisection in Ireland.

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures were taken in respect to two men licensed to perform experiments on living animals during the year 1895, under the provisions of the 39 and 40 Vic., c. 76, who are stated in the report of the inspector, G. V. Poore, Esq., M.D., to have been guilty of irregularities as licensed vivisectors; what where the irregularities brought by the inspector in these cases under the notice of the Secretary of State; were any proceedings under the provisions of The Cruelty to Animals Act, 1876, taken against these persons or either of them; and, were the certificates granted to them by the Home Secretary for the purposes of vivisection revoked?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: The irregularities consisted, in the one case, in the licensee performing an operasion on a cat, without having the necessary certificate; in the other case, in the licensee performing two experiments necessitating a certificate, which he had omitted to renew. In the first case, the licence was revoked and not regranted until after an interval of three months and a half, and steps were taken to prevent a recurrence of the irregularity.

In the second case, the consideration of the application for a renewal of the licence was deferred for a month. In neither case was it thought desirable to take further proceedings.

MR. MACNEILL asked if it would not be competent for the right hon. Gentleman to institute prosecutions against both these men, who had been guilty of diabolical cruelty?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said he could not admit the diabolical cruelty; but, according to the best information that he had got upon these two cases, which occurred before he came into office—though in saying that he did not desire to make the least reflection upon his predecessor—there was, he thought, a great difference between them, a difference which was marked by the action of the Home Office. If there appeared any necessity whatever for putting in operation any other processes of the law for cruelty to animals, he could assure the hon. Member he would do so.

MR. MACNEILL: May I ask whether, as a matter of fact, both these men have at present licences for vivisection?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order order! The Question has been fully answered.

WIMBLEDON ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. J. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the public elementary schools at Wimbledon are overcrowded, the teaching staff insufficient, and the accommodation deficient; that children who cannot be received in the schools have to go to those at Merton and to pay fees, and the children in the Cottenham Park district have to walk a mile and a half; and whether, seeing that a final notice under Section 9 of the Act of 1870 was issued to the school district of Wimbledon calling for the supply of about 740 school places, which notice expired on the 30th November last, will he state what steps the Department has taken since then to give effect to Section 10 of the Act?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): There is a considerable deficiency of school accommodation in the Wimbledon school district. This is now being supplied with due dispatch.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION.

MR. PATRICK M'HUGH (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copy of a Resolution of the Dublin Corporation passed on 14th December 1896, protesting against the present system of Irish Private Bill legislation at Westminster; has the Government considered the question raised in that resolution; and can he inform the House whether it is proposed this Session to deal with the subject of Irish Private Bill legislation, in accordance with the assurance given by him to the Dublin Chamber of Commerce on 4th December 1896?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The Resolution referred to has been received. With regard to the remainder of the Question, I cannot add anything to the statement in Her Majesty's Speech at the opening of the present Session of Parliament. No assurance was given by me that the subject would be dealt with during the present Session.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION EXAMS. (IRELAND).

MR. RICHARD M. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) if he is aware that at the intermediate education examinations (Ireland) of 1896 the marking in English (boys middle grade) was unusually severe, 48 per cent. of the candidates being adjudged to have failed, some of whom would have gained exhibitions but for this, and that this result has been widely protested against by teachers; (2) if any reason can be assigned for such raising of the standard required, without previous notice, for some only of the students, and in a subject indispensable to passing the examination generally; and (3) if any steps are being taken by the Commissioners to prevent a recurrence of such results?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am informed by the Assistant Commissioners of Intermediate Education that it is the case that about 47 per cent. of boys of the prescribed age in the middle grade failed to pass in English in 1896, and that some students who failed in English would have retained exhibitions were it not for such failure. Representations on the subject from teachers were received and considered by the Board. As regards the second paragraph, the conditions of passing in the subject, English, were the same in 1896 as in the previous year. The question of the examination in English generally, and in English composition in particular, is engaging the attention of the Board.

LAND COMMISSION OFFICE, DUBLIN.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the rules which now govern appointments to the clerkships in the Land Commission Office, Dublin; whether the Chief Commissioner still, as formerly, exercises the power of nomination; and, if not, is an examination necessary; where and how often is such examination held, and by whom; and, when does the next examination take place?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: Vacancies in the clerical staff of the Land Commission are filled by open competitive examination held under regulations which may be obtained on application to the Civil Service Commissioners. The Land Commissioners do not nominate, as formerly, the examination being open to all natural-born subjects of Her Majesty who are of the prescribed age. Examinations are held by the Civil Service Commissioners whenever it is necessary to fill vacancies, and after public notification of the intention to hold an examination has been given.

SMALL-POX EPIDEMIC (GLOUCESTER).

Mr. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if Her Majesty's Local Government Board Inspector has yet reported on the recent small-pox epidemic at Gloucester, and on the sanitary condition of the city at the time; and, if so, whether he will lay the Report upon the Table of the House?

Mr. CHAPLIN: In view of the fact that the Royal Commission on Vaccination had sent a Special Commissioner to report on the epidemic of small-pox at Gloucester, the Local Government Board did not deem it expedient to instruct an inspector to make a Report on the same subject.

Mr. BAYLEY: The Local Government Board did send an inspector, I believe, is that not the fact?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, an inspector was sent at the time when the epidemic was at its worst, to assist in putting an end to the then state of things, but he was not instructed to make a Report on the general question, inasmuch as a special Commissioner was charged with the duty.

Mr. BAYLEY: Has he made a Report?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have not yet seen the Report, though I believe it has been printed.

NAVAL OUTFIT.

Mr. HUDSON KEARLEY (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has recently received representations from manufacturers, traders and workmen of the Three Towns and elsewhere as to the serious loss of trade and employment, that will be occasioned in consequence of the order lately issued at Devonport, prohibiting chief petty officers and other ratings of the Navy from purchasing their naval outfit from local outfitters as has been customary for so long a time; and whether, in view of these representations, he is prepared to withdraw the order?

The SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Mr. W. G. E. Macartney, Antrim, S.): Representations have been received as stated in the Question. The order is applicable not only to Devonport but to all naval ports, and directs that, in future, men upon first joining the navy are to obtain their outfit from the local government contractors; afterwards they may go where they please for their clothes. It is not proposed to withdraw the order which has been determined upon in the interests of the Service and the men, nor can I admit the assumption in the first paragraph of the Question.

NATIONAL GALLERY AND BRITISH MUSEUM (SUNDAYS).

CAPTAIN DONELAN: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware that the National Gallery and the British Museum are now closed to the public on Sundays; and, whether he will consider the desirability of recommending the Trustees to give effect to the Resolution adopted by the House of Commons on the 10th March 1896 at all seasons of the year?

MR. HANBURY: The hon. and gallant Member's information differs from mine, as I understand that the British Museum is open on Sundays all the year round. The hon. Member who moved the Resolution of March 10th 1896 has represented to the Treasury that to keep these institutions open only till dusk in winter is practically useless, as the working classes cannot well reach them till about half-past three. In the absence of any system of artificial lighting it would be useless to keep a picture exhibition like the National Gallery open for any sufficient time after that hour during any but the summer months. The hon. and gallant Member must not forget that any extension of the present arrangements would increase a charge upon the taxpayer which in provincial towns would be borne by the ratepayer. London is, therefore, already better off than the provinces in this respect.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that both the British Museum and the National Gallery were closed on Sunday last?

MR. HANBURY: I am informed it was open.

BOSCOMBE POST OFFICE.

MR. A. H. SMITH (Christchurch): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, what steps are being taken with a view of improving the post office accommodation at Boscombe; and, whether the Postmaster General will consent to the establishment of a new head office at Boscombe, independent of that at Bournemouth?

MR. HANBURY: The question of improving the accommodation at the Boscombe sub post office is now under consideration; and it is hoped that arrangements may shortly be made under which the whole ground floor of the present premises, part of which is now used as a shop, may be devoted to post office business. The circumstances would not justify the raising of Boscombe to the rank of a head office; nor, if such an arrangement could be made, would any improvement of service result from the change.

POSTAL FACILITIES (RUSHDEN).

MR. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the memorial from Rushden, presented last Michaelmas, and complaining that that town, with 10,000 inhabitants and considerable and rapidly-increasing commercial interests, still has all its postal arrangements carried on through the adjacent and smaller town of Higham Ferrers, involving great loss of time and restriction of postal facilities, has been considered; and whether steps will be forthwith taken to give to Rushden independent postal arrangements?

MR. HANBURY: The necessary inquiries on the subject of the memorial from residents at Rushden have not yet been completed, but the matter is receiving attention, and as soon as the Postmaster General is able to arrive at a decision, the result shall be communicated to the hon. Member.

MR. CHANNING: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the memorial was laid before the Postmaster General last September, and in view of the fact that five months have elapsed, can he give an assurance that a decision will be arrived at in a short time?

MR. HANBURY: I was not aware the memorial was presented so long ago. If the hon. Member will put down another question, I will get information.

CUSTOMS OUTDOOR OFFICERS (IRELAND).

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can say why the usual examinations for candidates for Customs outdoor officers have not been held in Ireland since October 1894; and when it is proposed to hold an examination?

Mr. HANBURY: Examinations for the post of Outdoor Officer have ceased because the post no longer exists, and intending candidates who apply to the Board of Customs are informed that—

> "The situation of Outdoor Officer in the Customs service will in future be styled Assistant of Customs, with an improved rate of salary. Owing to the number of redundant officers, no appointments to the new grade will be offered for competition for three or four years to come.
>
> "The limits of age for the first competition will be 19 and 25, but they may be altered after it has taken place."

It is still not probable that all the qualified redundant outdoor officers now in the Service will become absorbed into the new grade in a period of less than three years from the present date.

ALIENS EXPULSION ACT.

Sir ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the statement is correct that two Englishmen, named Edward Jessop and Thomas Body, were recently arrested and deported by the Boer authorities under the Aliens Expulsion Act, and treated with such harshness that one died and the other attempted suicide; and, if so, what steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Mr. J. Chamberlain, Birmingham, W.): I have seen a paragraph in the Cape Times, which is founded on one in the Natal Witness, making the statement referred to. I have telegraphed for information on the subject.

SCHOOL BUILDINGS.

Mr. ALFRED HUTTON (York, W.R., Morley): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether it is a fact that a number of school buildings erected by the aid of building grants from public funds have ceased to be used as public elementary schools; and, if so, how many; whether the terms upon which the building grants were made are being observed; and whether an inquiry can be made into all cases of such school buildings?

Sir J. GORST: The Committee of Council has no information on the matters referred to in the first and second paragraphs. If any specific cases can be brought before the Committee of Council, inquiry shall be made.

WEAK-MINDED AND IMBECILE CHILDREN.

Mr. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, how it is proposed to distinguish between the weak-minded children who are to be intrusted to the care of the new Board which is intended to be established in London and the imbecile children at present under the charge of the Metropolitan Asylums Board in their school at Darenth?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The children who are sent to Darenth are children in respect of whom the medical officer of the district or workhouse from which they are sent has certified that they are in his opinion chronic and harmless lunatics, idiots, or imbeciles. The distinction in this case would be that children who are of weak or feeble intellect, but are not certified to be imbeciles or idiots, would be subject to the new order.

REFORM PRISONERS (PRETORIA).

Sir E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether correspondence has passed between himself and the two imprisoned reform leaders still in Pretoria Gaol; and, if so, whether he will lay that correspondence upon the Table of the House?

Mr. J. M. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has placed himself in direct communication, through the British Agent at Pretoria, with the two British subjects detained there as political prisoners; whether he has ascertained that these two gentlemen refused to make an appeal for pardon to President Kruger because they believed they were promised when they laid down their arms that the Imperial Government would protect them from harm; whether he has informed them that the Imperial Government repudiates any responsibility on their behalf, and regards their surrender as unconditional; and whether he can state the substance of any correspondence that has passed on the subject?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I will lay the correspondence mentioned by the hon. Member on the Table of the House.

SLAVERY IN ZANZIBAR.

MR. JOSEPH A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the transfer of some thousands of slaves, who had been owned by the late Sultan of Zanzibar, to the present Sultan recently appointed by Her Majesty's Government, was carried out with the knowledge and consent of Her Majesty's Government, or the Resident British Representatives, in view of the fact that Clause 4 of the Decree of 1890 declares that slaves could only be inherited at the death of their owner by the lawful children of the deceased, and that Clause 1 of the same Decree declares that the Decree should be binding on the Sultan as well as on his subjects?

*MR. CURZON: The hon. Member has not quite correctly quoted Clause 1 of the Decree of 1890, which he will see upon reference enjoins upon the Sultan, as well as his subjects, all former Decrees and Ordinances, but does not similarly enjoin the Decree in question. Indeed, in the Proclamation accompanying the Decree, it is expressly stated that the latter is to be made known to and obeyed by all the Sultan's subjects, but there is no mention of the Sultan. It is, however, unnecessary to raise the question of the legal interpretation of the Decree, since it has always been held that the slaves of the Sultan pass with the Crown; and they have been so inherited on two occasions since 1890.

CORN SALES.

MR. JASPER MORE (Shropshire, Ludlow): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that a Select Committee which sat in 1892, 1893, on Corn Sales reported that the sale of all cereals, and the products thereof, should be conducted in Great Britain, as in Ireland, by the reference to the hundredweight, or 112 Imperial pounds; and that the members of the Corn Market at Glasgow passed a resolution in favour of the same; and whether he can see his way to promote the views of the said Committee?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir, I am aware of the Report of the Select Committee referred to by my hon. Friend, but I am not prepared to introduce any measure on the subject. I would remind my hon. Friend that there is nothing approaching agreement as to the abolition of the present local customs of sale by measure.

NEWBLISS COURT HOUSE (COUNTY MONAGHAN).

MR. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps have been taken to secure that the court house in Newbliss, county Monaghan, should not be used as an Orange Lodge, in accordance with his promise in the last Session of Parliament?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No promise was given by me of the kind stated in the Question. What I did undertake was to refer the matter to the Lord Chancellor. The Lord Chancellor drew the attention of the magistrates to the occupation on the 13th July last of the Justices' room at Newbliss by a number of members of Orange lodges. The Magistrates replied that it was most imprudent and objectionable that a building, portion of which is used as a court house, should have been utilised for a political demonstration. The Magistrates further pointed out that the building in question is private property, one room only being rented by the Grand Jury as a public justice room under the provisions of Section 8 of the Petty Sessions Act. I have no power to take further action in the matter.

CRETE.

MR. J. C. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Foreign Office are in receipt of any official information respecting the alleged attack upon, and the burning of, the village of Galata by armed bands of Mussulmen, and respecting the reported murder of a Christian judge, named M. Markoulakis, at Canea, on the 1st instant; and whether the representatives of the Powers have addressed representations or remonstrance to the Governor General of Crete on the subject of these disturbances?

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked whether the Foreign Office had received information that a large number of Mussulman villagers had been driven from their homes in the interior of the island and were now refugees in towns on the coast?

*MR. CURZON: It is true, according to reports we have received, that large numbers of Mussulmans from Mussulman villages have migrated from the villages to the towns, but as to the circumstances under which this has taken place, we have no information. As to the Question of the hon. Member for Cork, we have heard nothing of the reported murder of M. Markoulakis. Our last reports state that fighting continues at Suda Bay and round Canea. The rumoured massacre of Christians at Galata had exasperated their co-religionists. At request of the Porte and the Vali, Her Majesty's Ambassador sent instructions to Her Majesty's Consul to do his utmost to restore order. Consul Biliotti and some of his colleagues, at the Vali's request, went with him yesterday to Suda Bay to use their influence with the armed Christians. For some time the continued fire prevented direct communication with the insurgents. The latest news is that, a messenger having at last reached the chiefs, the latter promised to cease firing if the troops did so, and the Vali had given orders to that effect. The Consuls are continuing their efforts to-day. An additional British ship of war has been sent to Canea.

Mr. FLYNN inquired if the Vali had sufficient authority, or was he restricted by the Governor?

*Mr. CURZON believed the Vali had ample authority, which he was using to the best of his power.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked if the right hon. Gentleman would cause inquiry to be made as to the reports of Mussulmans being driven from their homes?

*MR. CURZON said the inquiries made had reference to maltreatment of both parties, and, from reports received from the Consular authorities, no doubt he would be able to give further information in a few days.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in view of his statement made on 23rd March 1896, to the hon. Member for East Tyrone, to the effect that the Irish Government would consider at an early date the recommendation of the Commissioners of National Education that the average attendance to qualify for an assistant in a national school should be reduced from 70 to 60, whether he will ask the Treasury to sanction the grant necessary to meet the views of the Commissioners before the expiry of the present financial year?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I have nothing further to add to the reply already given by me to the hon Member on Tuesday last. The Irish Government have been in communication with the Treasury, and I see no advantage in asking the Treasury to re-open the question during the present financial year.

LOSS OF LIFE AT SEA (MERCANTILE MARINE).

COLONEL DENNY (Kilmarnock Burghs): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) whether he can state the annual average number of masters and seamen killed and drowned at sea during the last ten years from registered steam and sailing trading vessels owned in the United Kingdom, and also the annual average number killed and drowned per thousand of men employed, including Lascars, but excluding yachtsmen, fishermen, and boy boatmen in both cases; and (2) will he also state whether the life loss has increased in proportion to the increased work done by British vessels during the same period?

MR. RITCHIE: The annual average number of masters and seamen, including Lascars, but excluding yachtsmen, fishermen, and boatmen, killed and drowned during the last ten years whilst under articles of agreement for service at sea in steam trading vessels, registered in the United Kingdom, was 876, of whom 472 lost their lives by wrecks and casualties, and 404 by other accidents; and in sailing trading vessels 998, of whom 629 lost their lives by wrecks and casualties, and 369 by other accidents. The annual average number killed and drowned per thousand employed was in steamers 6·028, of whom 3·248 were lost by wrecks and casualties, and 2·780 by other accidents; and in sailing vessels 15·173, of whom 9·564 were lost by wrecks and casualties, and 5·609 by other accidents. The last paragraph involves a question of opinion as to the amount of work done, and, therefore, I am not able to answer it.

Colonel DENNY: Arising out of this answer, may I assume that a statement made on January 25th, by the hon. Member for Middlesbrough that 93 in every 1,000 were killed or drowned is totally inaccurate? ["Hear, hear."]

[No answer was given.]

Mr. J. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough) was about to ask a Question as to the number of men who had died on shore from injuries received on board, when

*Mr. SPEAKER interposed, directing that notice should be given of the Question.

EGYPTIAN EXPEDITION (INDIAN TROOPS).

Mr. T. R. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India what has been the amount expended from the revenues of India on the Indian troops sent to Suakim?

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Lord George Hamilton, Middlesex, Ealing): The expedition of Indian troops to Suakim did not throw any charge upon Indian revenues, but it did not relieve Indian revenues of the ordinary pay and allowances of the troops so sent. The ordinary pay and allowances of the troops dispatched is estimated to be about £40,000 for the period during which they were stationed in Suakim, but we have not received the full accounts. The extraordinary expenditure defrayed from the Treasury chest of the Imperial Government is about £145,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN asked if the noble Lord's estimate of £5,000 a month had been exceeded?

Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: I think it is very nearly accurate. I estimated about £5,000 a month, and the troops were there 7½ months.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, whether he will state the items of charge for which the Supplementary Estimate is asked for the expenses of the Indian troops at Suakim?

*Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS: The details have not been received. The proposed Vote is based upon an Estimate of the extra expense incurred by the Indian Government, and is framed by it.

ERASMUS SMITH SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

Mr. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will at an early date give notice of the Amendments he proposes to move to the Bill of the hon. Member for Louth providing for the diversion of the endowments of the Erasmus Smith Schools in Ireland; and if he will give an undertaking that the Bill shall not be brought on without adequate notice and full opportunity for discussion?

Mr GERALD BALFOUR: I understand the Bill is down for Committee stage for the first Wednesday after the Whitsuntide holidays. The Amendments considered requisite by the Government are now in course of preparation and will be placed on the Paper in ample time to allow of their consideration before the Committee stage is reached.

*Mr. WILLIAM JOHNSTON: May I ask whether the Government will consider the statement sent by the Erasmus Board to the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary last year, and whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that an intense feeling of opposition exists to any unsettlement of an arrangement which has existed for two hundred years?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The representation in question was received and will be considered. Of course, I am aware that there is a strong feeling against any arrangement which might have the effect of disturbing the existing state of things.

HOUSE OF COMMONS (MEMBERS' SMOKING ACCOMMODATION).

Mr. G. W. WOLFF (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he has yet found time to give his attention to the very inadequate accommodation provided in this House for those Members who wish to smoke; whether he has any scheme for the improvement of this accommodation; and whether he will consider the advisability of allowing smoking in one of the compartments of the Library, as is done in the Library of the House of Lords?

The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS (Mr. Akers-Douglas, Kent, St. Augustine's): I have given a great deal of attention to this matter, but I regret to say that I have no practical proposal to make which is likely to meet with general approval, and I do not think any improvement can be obtained until some arrangement can be made for utilising one of the official residences for the direct service of the House. I have also considered the suggestion in the third paragraph of my hon. Friend's Question; but, bearing in mind the extensive use made of the Library by hon. Members generally, I fear it would not be possible to adopt it without causing great annoyance and inconvenience to many. [" Hear, hear !"]

Mr. REES DAVIES (Pembrokeshire) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would approach the House of Lords with a view of seeing if it was not possible to obtain one of the rooms of that House to be used as a smoking room for hon. Members?

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS did not think the matter rested with him. He would, however, put himself in communication with the House of Lords, though he did not think there was any room there which could be utilised by this House for the purpose suggested.

SOUTHWOLD (DAMAGE BY GALES).

Mr. HARRY FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the very serious injury to the coast of Southwold by the recent gales, which threatens disaster to the town unless prompt and adequate means of protection are provided against the further inroads of the sea, and of the inability of the town to provide the whole of the expense, he will cause immediate Inquiry to be made as to the extent of the danger and the best means of obviating it?

Mr. G. W. Wolff.

Mr. RITCHIE: The Board of Trade have been in communication with the Corporation of Southwold with regard to the steps to be taken by them to protect their coast against the inroads of the sea. I am not prepared at present to say that those steps will be inadequate, or that the Corporation will be unable financially to carry them out. Having regard, however, to the fact that there is some difference of opinion as to what should be done, and that any action taken at one part of Southwold may possibly have effect upon other interests, I have directed Sir George Nares to proceed to Southwold at the earliest possible date, to hold an Inquiry as regards the proposed works.

HOWELL'S CHARITY.

Mr. A. C. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomery): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education at what date the scheme for the Denbigh portion of the Howell's Charity was submitted by the Charity Commissioners to the Education Department; whether the doubts as to the area to which the endowment belongs were considered by the Charity Commissioners before they submitted the scheme; whether any similar doubts arose when the schemes dealing with the Cardiff portion of the Howell's Charity were under consideration by the Commissioners or the Department or are now entertained by the Department; what is the ground for the exclusion of the county of Glamorgan from the benefits of the Denbigh portion of the Howell's Charity; and, what steps the Department propose to take in order to obtain a decision on the question to whom the endowment belongs?

Sir J. GORST: The scheme was submitted in June 1895. I cannot answer for the Charity Commissioners, but the Glamorgan scheme was unopposed when approved by the Committee of Council. The Glamorganshire portion of the charity has already been dealt with separately by the scheme. The Committee of Council have informed the Joint Education Committee for Denbighshire and the governing body of Howell's Charity School, Denbigh, to suggest that some agreement might be arrived at between them.

Mr. HUMPHREYS-OWEN: Will similar communications be addressed to the other Welsh County Governing Bodies, who, under this scheme as drafted, have an interest in the Denbigh portion of the Charity?

Sir JOHN GORST: That suggestion shall be considered.

Mr. HUMPHREYS-OWEN: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last line of the question—whether any doubts are now entertained by the Department?

Sir JOHN GORST remarked that it was not the Department, but the Council, entertained doubts at this moment.

CROFTER COMMISSION (SCOTLAND).

Colonel RUSSELL (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can state what has been the cost to the public of the Crofter Commission in Scotland up to the present time; and, if he cannot state the sum, whether he has any objection to have a Return of the same laid upon the Table of the House?

Mr. HANBURY: It will take a little time to get out the figures, but if the hon. and gallant Member will move for a Return it shall be presented in due course.

LONDONDERRY CORPORATION STOCK.

Mr. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a consent order was on 7th December 1896, issued by the Local Government Board for the issue of stock by the Londonderry Corporation, without including among the sums to be raised £4,629 spent in obtaining the Londonderry Improvement Act, 1896; whether a new consent order was rendered necessary and was issued on 26th January 1897; whether he is aware that the loss to the Corporation owing to this delay, being the difference between the interest paid by the Corporation and the interest at which they will now be able to borrow, exceeds £120, in addition to the cost of the new order; and whether the Local Government Board will make up the loss due to their mistake?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. John Atkinson, Londonderry, N.): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this Question. The costs referred to were not included in the consent order of December 7th last, because the certificate of taxation was not signed until the 14th, and because they were not returned by the Corporation as an item to be covered by the proposed loan. It was not until the 29th of December that an application was made to the Local Government Board to issue an order to raise a loan for the amount of their costs. The only step taken by the Corporation in the matter after the 7th of December was the publication of advertisements calling a meeting of the Corporation to be held on the 29th January to create the stock. It was then considered better to issue a new order covering this sum of £4,629. The only costs incurred by the Corporation will be the costs of the fresh advertisement calling the meeting to create the stock, which can be held from 12 to 14 days after the 29th of January, the day originally named. The Corporation, and not the Local Government Board, are responsible for any delay which may have occurred, and any loss consequent thereon.

Mr. KNOX: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether an Irish Corporation, issuing stock under the Order of 24th May 1892, is empowered to contract for the sale of stock before it has been created or a consent order has been granted?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND: Neither 30th Vict., cap. 29, Sec. 1, nor the provision of the regulation passed under the Health Act of 1890, prohibits such sale. The reply to the Question is, therefore, in the affirmative.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, CORK.

Mr. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, pending a Measure for the settlement of the Irish University question, he will postpone making any appointment to the vacant Presidentship of the Cork Queen's College?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The passing of a Measure for the settlement of the Irish University question still belongs to the region of contingency. The course proposed by the hon. and learned Member is not, in my opinion, one which it would be practicable to pursue.

MUSGRAVE STREET POLICE BARRACKS (BELFAST).

MR. WOLFF: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a petition has been presented by the men stationed at the police barracks, Musgrave Street, Belfast, to the Inspector General, requesting that some notice be taken of the sanitary condition of the barracks, and that several men are laid up with illness in consequence of the defective sanitary conditions, and two men have died of typhoid fever since Christmas; and whether he will take the necessary steps to put the sanitary condition of the barracks in proper order?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am informed that such a petition has been received from the police stationed at this barrack. It is true that two of the men have died of typhoid fever since Christmas last, but there is no case at present of serious illness connected with the station. The medical and sanitary officers are now inquiring into the sanitary condition of the barrack, and the attention of the Board of Works has also been directed to the matter.

IRISH RESIDENT MAGISTRACY (MAJOR N. GOSSELIN).

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state over what district Major N. Gosselin, who appears in the official lists as an Irish resident magistrate, exercises jurisdiction; has he drawn pay as an Irish resident magistrate; and for how many years, at how much per year?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Major Gosselin is not employed as a resident magistrate in Ireland. He was seconded for employment on special duty some years ago, and does not receive any emoluments as resident magistrate.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if Major Gosselin is not on the list of resident magistrates in Ireland?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Yes, he is on the list.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Why is he?

[No answer was given.]

RATING OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY (LONDON).

MR. HARRY MARKS (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will state the amount voted for rates and contributions in lieu of rates on Government property in London in the financial year 1893–4, and the estimate of the amount required for rates and contributions in lieu of rates on Government property in London in the financial year 1897–8?

MR. MARKS also asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether he would state the amount voted for rates and contributions in lieu of rates on Goverment property in the United Kingdom in the financial year 1893–4, and the estimate of the amount required for rates and contributions in lieu of rates on Government property in the United Kingdom in the financial year 1897–8?

MR. HANBURY: In 1893–4 the amounts voted were:—For London, £94,630 gross and £85,980 net; for the United Kingdom, £248,490 gross and £237,690 net. The estimate for 1897–8 is as follows:—For London, £151,990 gross and £140,990 net; for the United Kingdom, £403,960 gross and £385,790 net.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what purpose the Government propose to devote the £120,000 provided in his financial statement for the current year for grants to the Voluntary Schools?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It will fall into the surplus of the year.

SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION (CASTLETON).

MR. ALFRED HUTTON (York, W.R., Morley): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to a letter of the Education Department, dated 23rd December last, addressed to Mr. R. Matthews, Castleton, in which the Department refused to allow a Wesleyan school to be reopened as a public elementary school on the ground that the building does not satisfy the present requirements of the Code; and whether, having regard to the fact that he has sanctioned the readmission of the St. Jude's National School to grants, although it does not conform to the rules of the Code, he will reconsider his decision with regard to the Castleton Wesleyan School?

SIR J. GORST: The question of the admission of the Castleton Wesleyan School to grants has not been finally decided. The managers have been asked to submit plans for submission to the architect of the Committee of Council. The St. Jude's National School has conformed to the rules of the Code, though it is not planned as a new school would have been.

RAILWAY EXTENSIONS (DONEGAL).

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can make any statement as to contemplated railway extensions in Donegal?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I do not think it would be expedient at present to make any statement regarding railway extensions under the Act of last year.

SHEFFIELD COTTAGE HOMES FOR CHILDREN.

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will lay upon the Table the Reports of the chief inspector, the medical inspector, and the architect, respecting the Sheffield Cottage Homes for Children, together with the reply of the Sheffield Guardians?

MR. CHAPLIN: If the hon. Member desires to move for a Return of the Reports referred, to and of the reply of the Guardians of the Sheffield Union, I shall be prepared to assent to the motion.

PRISONERS' PROPERTY FUND.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will lay upon the Table the Report of the Departmental Committee on the Prisoners' Property Fund; and whether he has come to any decision respecting the audit of the fund?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I have no objection to laying the Report on the Table if the hon. Member desires it. I hope to introduce a Bill dealing with the question of audit and other matters.

POOR LAW SCHOOLS (METROPOLIS).

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will defer his decision in the matter of the proposed Order respecting the Administration of Metropolitan Poor Law Schools until this House has had an opportunity of discussing the scheme, having regard to the fact that it sets up an entirely new central authority for the government of the Metropolis, whilst at the same time it does not carry out the essential recommendation of the recent Committee?

MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member is under a misapprehension if he supposes that the Local Government Board propose to constitute a new central authority for the government of the Metropolis. The Order which the Board propose to issue refers to an authority to undertake the charge of certain classes of children in the Metropolis who are now maintained at the cost of the rates, this being one of the recommendations of the Committee he refers to. I cannot give the undertaking which the hon. Member asks for.

LICENSED PREMISES (ADVERTISEMENTS).

MR. S. YOUNG (Cavan, E.), I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been called to a recent case in which the chairman of a bench of magistrates called on a firm of wine and spirit merchants and ordered them to remove at once certain wine, spirit, and beer advertisements which are affixed to the walls of the premises facing the public roads; and, whether licensing magistrates have power to order the removal of such advertisements from licensed premises?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Except by the Question of the hon. Member, my attention has not been called to the case to which he refers. Without fuller knowledge of the facts, I cannot express an opinion upon the merits of the case, but I am not aware of any general power possessed by the magistrates to order the removal of such advertisements.

ROYAL RESIDENCE IN IRELAND.

Mr. DANE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a resolution passed at the annual general meeting of the Irish Tourist Association, presided over by the Earl of Mayo, expressive of an earnest desire that on the occasion of the celebration of the sixtieth year of the reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty a Royal residence may be established; and whether the Government will take the matter into serious consideration?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Mr. A. J. Balfour, Manchester, E.) replied that his attention had been called to the resolution. He was afraid he could not discuss, in answer to the question, the pros and cons of the matter, but it had been brought under the attention of the Government both in Debates in the House and otherwise.

SUPPLY (IRISH ESTIMATES).

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, can he indicate the period at which he proposes to take the first Irish Vote in Supply; and what it would probably be?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY replied that he should be glad to consult, as far as possible, the convenience of hon. Members from Ireland. Without pledging himself, it might be convenient to employ the Friday in the week in which the financial relations of England and Ireland were discussed. He would consider that.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOL GRANT (IRISH EQUIVALENT).

Mr. FLYNN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can inform the House what amount will be allotted to Ireland as an equivalent for the considerable grant of money which will, under the Resolution before the House, become payable to Voluntary Schools in England and Ireland out of the general taxation?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, who replied, said if the matter were considered on the basis of equivalent grants it would be necessary to bear in mind the fact that Ireland already received a larger proportion of the total cost of national education from the Exchequer than either England or Scotland. But, as he had already explained in answer to questions, it was not intended to deal with the matter on the basis of equivalent grants.

Mr. FLYNN said the sum was an additional one.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: But if you get too much already you cannot expect more. [Laughter.]

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS GRANT (SCOTCH EQUIVALENT).

Mr. T. C. H. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, with reference to the Voluntary Schools Bill now before the House, it is proposed to make an equivalent grant to Scotland; and, if so, whether it is intended to make the proposal in the course of the present Session; and upon what ratio it is intended to base such equivalent?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I answered this question on Tuesday.

HOURS OF POLLING (METROPOLIS).

Mr. FREDERICK WILSON (Norfolk, Mid): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the number of working men employed in the City of London who do not leave work till after seven o'clock, many of whom are practically disfranchised by the present election law, he will consider the expediency of extending the hours of polling in metropolitan constituencies till at least nine o'clock.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: The grievance to which the hon. Member refers, has not been brought to my notice. But if it is, I will give it full consideration.

EPISCOPAL ELECTIONS (DISCREDITABLE SCENES).

Mr. HARRY FOSTER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the scenes which were recently witnessed at Bow Church at the confirmation of the elections of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London; and whether, with a view to prevent a recurrence of such scenes, the Government will at an early date introduce legislation for either abolishing the ceremonial or insuring that objections when invited shall be properly heard and adjudicated upon.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: My attention has been called to the discreditable scenes to which my hon. Friend refers, but I can make no pledge with regard to legislation on the subject.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS (AID GRANT, ETC.).

MR. MUNDELLA asked the First Lord of the Treasury a question arising out of his statement in moving the Education Resolution on Monday. He desired to know whether the words "not exceeding five shillings per scholar for the whole number of scholars in those schools" did not make the grant applicable to all children on the register, whereas all grants hitherto had been made on average attendance, the number on the register being nearly 600,000 children in excess of average attendance. There was no precedent for any grant except on the basis of average attendance. Would the right hon. Gentleman have the notice relating to the resolution in the Votes so amended as to make the point clear?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The right hon. Gentleman has correctly interpreted the speech I made on Monday. It is unnecessary to amend the Resolution, and if the right hon. Gentleman will wait until the Bill is printed, he will see that the point he takes is adequately dealt with. ["Hear, hear!"]

EXPLOSION AT WOOLWICH.

MR. WOODALL (Hanley) asked the Under Secretary for War if he had any particulars of a reported explosion during experiments with cordite at Woolwich?

*MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS replied that he had received no report on the subject, but one would be in his hands in a day or two. Meanwhile, he believed there was a great deal more noise than damage caused by the explosion. The explosion was caused during an experiment with cordite, carried out under proper precautions, to ascertain whether cordite under certain conditions would burn harmlessly away or explode.

ARMY ESTIMATES.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY answering a question which, in his absence had been addressed to the Under Secretary for War by Sir C. Dilke (Gloucester, Forest of Dean), stated that probably it would be convenient next Monday to get the Speaker out of the Chair on the Army Estimates.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

Captain John Sinclair, for County of Forfar.

Louis Sinclair, esquire, for County of Essex (Southern or Romford Division).

Samuel Woods, esquire, for County of Essex (South Western or Walthamstow Division).

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY (FOREIGN SHIPOWNERS) AMENDMENT BILL.

Second Reading deferred from Tuesday next till Tuesday 16th February.

MOTION.

TRUSTS (SCOTLAND)

Bill to amend The Trusts (Scotland) Act (1867) Amendment Act, 1887, ordered to be brought in by The Lord Advocate and Mr. Anstruther; presented accordingly, and Read the First time; to be read a Second time upon Monday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 118.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS [AID GRANT, ETC.]

Resolution reported:—

"That it is expedient—

(a) to authorise the payment out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of an aid grant to Voluntary Schools, not exceeding five shillings per scholar for the whole number of scholars in those schools;

(b) to repeal as regards day schools so much of section nineteen of The Elementary Education Act 1876, as imposes a limit on the parliamentary grant to Elementary Schools in England and Wales; and

(c) to make provision for the exemption from rates of Voluntary Schools."

Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

MR. H. H. ASQUITH (Fife, E.), who was cheered by the Opposition on rising, said: Sir, I make no apology for inviting the House at this stage to review the conclusions arrived at by the Committee and to decline to assent to the resolution in which those conclusions are embodied. Sir, we have throughout this matter maintained, I believe, a perfectly clear and absolutely consistent position from the first moment that the controversy originated. We are agreed that if it could be shown with regard to any integral factor of our national educational system the machine was being subjected to an undue strain, with the result that the work turned out was either deficient in quantity or quality, we would not be niggard nor ungenerous in making any provision from the public fund that might be necessary. ["Hear, hear"!] I say that, because to-night we are compelled to ask the House to negative this resolution. [Cheers.] We therefore might appear to be asserting that there is no class of the so-called Voluntary Schools which is in need of any further provision from Imperial funds. If we are compelled to take up that position the responsibility does not rest with us—it has been forced upon us by the method of procedure deliberately adopted and pressed upon us by the Government. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. and learned Solicitor General the other night quoted from a speech I made in moving the rejection of last year's Bill a passage in which I asserted that, subject to reasonable and adequate safeguards, we were perfectly ready to consider a proposal for giving further public assistance to denominational schools. But if, as appears to be the case, the hon. and learned Gentleman referred to that passage for the purpose of showing that we are receding from the position we took up, then I must at once correct that impression. I went on in the same speech to develop in detail what were the conditions and safeguards subject to which we were prepared to assent to this grant. There were several of them, but there were two in particular on which we laid then, as we lay to-day, a special stress. In the first place, we said, and we say now, that if public money is to be devoted to such a purpose it must be under such conditions as will secure its impartial distribution amongst all the necessitous claimants for it, and as will not disturb but will preserve the statutory equality which has hitherto existed between Voluntary and Board Schools. ["Hear, hear"!] The phrase "statutory equality" we owe to the Duke of Devonshire, but it has now apparently become a laughing-stock upon the Treasury Bench. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, and after him the hon. and learned Solicitor General, sought to convict their colleagues of a fallacy, or, at any rate, of a misdescription. And why? Because, forsooth, the 97th section of the Education Act of 1870 enables a special and limited provision to be made in the cases of necessitous School Boards, and because out of the total expenditure of £7,000,000 per annum on national education it has only been taken advantage of to the extent of £40,000. That is the extent to which the statutory equality has been dislocated and disturbed. We are perfectly ready, if any distribution of this fund is to be made between the two classes of schools on the one side and the other, that it should be debited in the first instance with £40,000 as you did in the Bill of last year. There is another condition on which we insisted then and on which we insist now. It was that whatever money is granted must be granted under adequate security that it will be spent entirely and exclusively on the improvement of our educational system. ["Hear, hear!"] What is the position in which we stand to-night? We have here a Resolution in which we are asked to declare that Voluntary Schools as a class without any distinction of denomination, are entitled to further provision out of the public funds, and the right hon. Gentleman will not allow us to annex to that declaration any of those qualifying and limiting conditions which, in our judgment, were last year, and remain to-day essential to secure the just distribution of the fund and its exclusive appropriation to the maintenance or the elevation of our national education. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor-General told us the other night that when we talked of safeguards we ought to wait until we see the Bill. But the Bill cannot possibly contain them. ["Hear, hear!"] The Bill must be limited by the Resolution. ["Hear, hear!"] The same argument does not in terms apply to the Amendments put forward with reference to the other point—namely, to secure the exclusive application of the money to educational purposes. What treatment have these Amendments received? [Cheers.] My hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon proposed to insert the word "necessitous" in the Resolution. That Amendment received scant courtesy from the Government and was rejected by an overwhelming majority. [Ministerial cheers.] Hon. Members opposite applaud that statement. [Ministerial cheers.] My hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland also put down an Amendment to the effect that the whole of this additional grant should be applied to the improvement of the teaching staff of the schools which would benefit by it, and he took the precaution to couch his Amendment in terms which he borrowed from the Bill of last year. What became of that Amendment? It was not allowed to cross the threshold of Parliamentary discussion, as the right. hon. Gentleman moved the Closure. ["Hear, hear!"] I say, therefore, that if we are to-night compelled to deal with this Resolution from the point of view and attitude of simple negation, the cause is to be found in the procedure adopted by the Government. ["Hear, hear!"] Now I will come to close quarters with the Resolution. And the first and main ground on which I ask the House to decline to agree with the Resolution is this—that the money to be granted by this Resolution is to be applied, not to the equal and impartial relief of necessitous schools of all classes, but to preferential relief of a particular category of schools. [Cheers.] We are told that in the interests of Parliamentary time it is expedient to proceed in a matter of this kind by two Bills instead of one. That is an argument so transparently fallacious that it does not impose on anyone on either side of the House. ["Hear, hear!"] What do you do? You have two Bills instead of one in order to save Parliamentary time. What is the necessary result of that operation? It is that you are going to create injustice by one Bill in order to remove it by another. [Cheers.] And this you put forward as an economical expedient to save time and trouble and to avoid unnecessary friction in our controversies. If the Government have both objects in view—I mean the relief of the Voluntary and the relief of the necessitous Board Schools alike—it is obvious to the merest tyro in Parliamentary procedure that they ought to have prosecuted the attainment of both objects concurrently as part and parcel of a single integral scheme. [Cheers.] The only argument that could have been resorted to by the Government to displace the hypothesis which we are obliged to suggest to the House—namely, that they do not attach equal weight to the two objects, and that while attaching more importance to the one they relegate the other to the uncertain hazards of a later period of the Session—is that it is necessary to pass the Bill before March 31 in order that the denominational schools shall not be deprived of the money which everyone is agreed they are entitled to. But that argument is gone. [Cheers.] The Government themselves do not pretend that it is necessary to pass the Bill by March 31, and it is obvious on the face of the Bill that it never was intended to come into operation by that time. [Cheers.] We have not yet had any adequate or even plausible explanation of the rise of the grant from 4s. last year to 5s. this year, except that the extra shilling was intended as some kind of compensation or solatium to the denominational schools for the postponed fulfilment of their long-deferred hopes. ["Hear, hear!"] I am glad it is frankly admitted by hon. Gentlemen opposite that that is the intention, as it certainly will be the effect, of carrying this Bill. [Cheers.] Now I come to my second and only other ground which I shall lay before the House for refusing to assent to this Resolution, and that is founded upon the method and machinery proposed for the distribution of this large sum of public money, a subject which, I think, has not yet been adequately discussed. [" Hear, hear! "] This purports to be a grant at the rate of 5s. a head per child to the denominational schools of the country. This 5s. per head, if it is intended to designate the measure of relief to be given to necessitous schools, is a misnomer, and, indeed, a fiction. The Government are not going and do not propose to give 5s. a head per child to the necessitous schools. I will show what it is proposed to do. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dartford, in the course of his interesting speech the other night—and I think we shall all agree that in the course of this Debate candid friendship has been more ebullient than party loyalty on that side of the House—[" hear, hear! "]—referred to a school in his own constituency where, owing to the operation of the enlarged fee grant, as compared with the fees charged before 1891, and the maintenance of the subscriptions at their old level—

SIR W. HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford): The whole of the Voluntary Schools; no particular school.

MR. ASQUITH: That strengthens the point. The case he put is not an isolated or exceptional, but a typical, case as regards a large number of denominational schools. This school, owing to the enlarged fee grant as compared with the fees charged before 1891, and to the maintenance of what I cannot help thinking is a very proper spirit which might be imitated in other parts—owing to the maintenance by subscribers of their old level of generosity this school is under no strain, but has got a large pecuniary surplus. That is the case of the whole of the Church Schools in the county of Kent, and, therefore, I quite agree it would have been an extravagant and unjustifiable thing if Her Majesty's Government had proposed to make this grant of 5s. all round. I want the House to realise how the 5s. comes in and where the 5s. goes out, because the 5s. is really a bogus sum. [Cheers.] The 5s. comes in in the form of a multiple. You take the whole number of children in average attendance. [" No, on the register."] I assume that, because the right hon. Gentleman is, I understand, going to say that is so. [The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: " I have said so."] You take the whole number of children in average attendance in all the Voluntary Schools of the country, necessitous or otherwise, including the schools in Kent, where they have the large surplus—then take the number of children in average attendance in every one of the Voluntary Schools, rich and poor alike, without any discrimination whatever, and you multiply it by 5s. and arrive at the sum of £616,000. What is the use of this nugatory and artificial process of multiplying by 5s. per head? Why cannot you say frankly at once, " We are going to give a lump sum of £616,000 to the denominational schools of the country " ? For what possible purpose is the 5s. brought in except to give an appearance of moderation in the amount of the grant you are going to dispense? We come to the question of distribution. You have some £620,000 to distribute. You are going to distribute it among necessitous schools, and among those alone. Does it not follow as a plain arithmetical proposition that, inasmuch as the well-to-do schools which had been counted for the purpose of multiplying the 5s., are to be excluded from the operation of the grant, the average grant to be given to necessitous schools must by the process of absolute and inevitable logic very largely exceed 5s. a head. [Cheers.] Then do not let us hear anything more about the 5s. grant. A right hon. Friend reminds me that the sum will increase year by year although the necessities may diminish. Although the idyllic state of things which prevails in the county of Kent may become well-nigh universal, this sum is going on automatically increasing. The sum granted may become larger every year. There is to be no maximum and no minimum. If that is so, does it not become all the more necessary that we should scrutinise somewhat closely the machinery by which this process of unfettered and unlimited discretion is to be carried out. I ask attention to a point, which has hitherto almost escaped notice, in regard to the machinery to be brought into existence for the purpose of distributing the grants. The £620,000 is to be doled out in lump sums to associations —voluntary and irresponsible associations —[cheers]—to be apportioned at their discretion, tempered by the supervisory control of the Education Department. [Ministerial cheers.] I have not forgotten that that is the ideal which is to be aimed at. Some schools will, no doubt, be allowed to remain in independent isolation and deal directly with the Department, but an indirect and most effective instrument of coercion has been provided, because any school which in the opinion of the Education Department unreasonably abstains from entering into one of these voluntary associations is to forfeit the whole of the grant which it would otherwise have. You may have a school which has complied with all the conditions of the Code, which is in every way efficient as an educational agency, but because its managers do not choose, for some ground which the Department considers unreasonable, to join an association it is to forfeit its title to public money. When I heard the right hon. Gentleman the other night unfold this extraordinary and unprecedented proposal I could not help asking myself, What does Lord Salisbury think? We know what his opinion of Government Departments, and of the Education Department in particular, was during the most fruitful and beneficent administration of my right hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham. [Cheers.] My right hon. Friend must now be somewhat amused to find that Archbishops and Bishops are tumbling over one another in their eagerness to give him certificates of character. [A laugh.] After being bespattered with clerical abuse he is now within measurable distance—if, indeed, he has not reached the point—of being synodically whitewashed. [Laughter and cheers.] Lord Salisbury spoke at Preston on the general question of the Departments at Whitehall, and of the Education Department in particular, and I want to quote to hon. Gentlemen opposite the language in which their Prime Minister and Leader described the Department which is to be the only safeguard as between an association on the one side and the taxpayers on the other for the proper distribution of this fund. He spoke of the Education Department as a despotic central department whose thoughts are wooden, whose system is red tape, and whose one hope is to reduce to perfect uniformity the actions of all under them into submission to conceptions which have been elaborated at Whitehall. He may think matters have changed for the better at Whitehall—["hear, hear!"]—under the mild and unobtrusive rule of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University. [Loud and prolonged ironical Opposition cheers.] I do not know, but I think that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council will not always be at Whitehall. [Cheers.] That provisional safeguard against the autocracy which Lord Salisbury describes in such scathing language must—I do not wish to anticipate the future—in the course of time be removed. We shall once more have to listen to the despotism which Lord Salisbury has characterised in the language which I read out a moment ago, and every school that prefers to its own independence absolute incorporation and mergence in these voluntary associations may, at the discretion of the Education Department, be entitled to a share in this grant. I am not, I need hardly say, using this argument by way of disparagement of the Education Department. Last year we fought the battle of the Education Department against Her Majesty's Government—["hear, hear!"]—and it was because we believed that the Education Bill of last year, by paralysing and crippling the energies of that Department in the sphere in which its energy and activity are legitimate and most useful, would have dealt a death-blow—well, at any rate, would have removed one of the most efficient safeguards for our national system of education—["hear, hear!"]—it was for that reason that we resisted it, and had behind us public opinion. [Cheers.] But you are seeking here to put on the Education Department functions which are not in the slightest degree analogous to those which it has hitherto discharged, and which it is totally out of the power of any public department properly to discharge. The right hon. Baronet (Sir W. Hart Dyke), who speaks with great experience, for he was several years at the head of the Education Department, has told us truly that the Department was in the habit of distributing large sums of public money every year to the primary schools in the country in the shape of grants, and asked, if they could trust them for that purpose, why could they not also trust them to distribute this money, or to hand it over to the associations? I say there is no analogy whatever as between the two cases. [Cheers.] The Education Department at present, in the distribution of the sum which is voted by Parliament every year as a grant in aid of elementary education, is subject to fixed rules which are embodied in the Code and in Acts of Parliament, and that Code is every year laid on the Table of the House and is subject to the direct control of Parliament. These tests are supplied by a body of inspectors appointed by the Education Department and responsible to it, and whose salaries are every year voted by this House out of the taxation of the country. ["Hear, hear!"] We have, therefore, in the distribution of the grant by the Education Department a function carefully safeguarded at every point by Parliamentary control, and into which it is impossible that abuses or shortcomings should enter without their being detected. But when you go and put the Education Department in the position of a kind of general superintendence with no defined powers or statutory functions—a general superintendence over a loose system of eleemosynary relief, which is to be carried out by means of voluntary associations which have no statutory authority and no responsibility to Parliament or the public—you are imposing on the Education Department a function which, however highly you may estimate its powers, neither it nor any other public department is fitted to discharge. [Cheers.] The result is that when you come to analyse the method and machinery by which these sums are to be distributed, you will find that that grant—not merely to be voted out of the taxation of the present year as an experiment or a temporary dole, but to be placed on the Statute Book as a permanent charge on the Consolidated Fund of the country—I say we have none of those securities which, in the interests of our constituents, we have a right and it is our duty to demand. It ought to be subject to Parliamentary control, and the money in its application ought not to be frittered away in favouritism and jobbery. [Cheers.] I have now said all that I have to say. I have not endeavoured to exhaust the ground or to direct the attention of the House to points which have already been exhaustively discussed. But I will say in conclusion, as I did at the beginning, that we take our stand for our resistance to this resolution, not upon any unwillingness to make good the admitted deficiencies of our educational system, whether they exist in the Voluntary or the Board Schools, but on the fact that this Resolution introduces a principle of invidious discrimination entirely opposed to the statutory equality which has hitherto prevailed, and provides methods and machinery that afford no adequate security that the intentions of the Legislature shall be carried out, and that the money of the taxpayers shall not be irremediably squandered. [Loud cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is certainly not the least ingenious debater amongst the most distinguished debaters which this House at present possesses. ["Hear, hear!"] But even his ingenuity was somewhat put to it to explain to the House why it was that, while he approved of a grant being given to necessitous schools, he was, nevertheless, going to vote against the Resolution, the passing of which he admits to be necessary in order that such benefit may be conferred. [Opposition cries of "No, no!"] The right hon. Gentleman repeated and emphasised the statement he made last year to the effect that, in his judgment, Voluntary Schools required relief, ought to have relief, and that that relief should come out of the Imperial Exchequer. We bring in a Bill which gives necessitous schools relief out of the Imperial Exchequer, and the first step the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends takes it to go into the Lobby in the hope of defeating, if they can, the Measure that they have admitted to be necessary, and without which their object cannot be carried out. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman says he will not have this Bill, because it does not go far enough. He objects to an instalment because he cannot get all he desires. ["Hear, hear!"] That is not politics; that is not statesmanship. [Cheers.] That is simply the exercise of an ingenuity on the part of an Opposition who are determined to thwart the Government in all their proceedings by the best means in their power. ["Hear, hear!"] If these means are not very effective, if the reasons by which they are supported must seem to be inconclusive, that is due not to the exposition which the right hon. Gentleman has just given, but to the difficulty of the case. Before I come to that part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech which dealt with the subsequent provisions for which this Bill is the preparation, I shall say a word, and only a word, upon what may be called some of the subsidiary questions in controversy which have been brought incidentally to our notice in the course of these Debates. In the first place the right hon. Gentleman has followed the speeches on that bench in thinking, if not positively asserting, that in bringing forward this Resolution as we have brought it forward, and in wording it as we have worded it, we have been guilty of some too clever trick by which legitimate Parliamentary criticism may be obviated. Sir, the man who makes that accusation in good faith—and I do not doubt the good faith of the right hon. Gentleman opposite—is either totally ignorant of, or has totally forgotten, the methods and traditions of the procedure of the House in cases like this. ["Hear, hear!"] As far as I am concerned I frankly tell the House I have always thought that this practice sanctioned by immemorial usage of introducing money Bills into Committee of the whole House, belongs to an ancient and, I think, a somewhat outworn portion of our Constitution, and might well be dispensed with—["hear, hear!"]—and nobody, so far as this particular case is concerned, would be more glad to have it dispensed with than I myself. ["Hear, hear!"] A whole Parliamentary week has been spent in the discussion. ["No, no!"] Well, four days—the best part of a Parliamentary week—which, but for these Resolutions, we should never have required to occupy at all, have been expended on this stage. When it is suggested by right. hon. Gentlemen opposite that I have departed from all Parliamentary practice and traditions for the solitary purpose of preventing them from introducing an Amendment, of which they gave me no notice before, it seems to me that they are charging the Government with refusing a demand which no Opposition has ever made before on any Government. [Cheers.] Are you to depart from every well-established rule for the solitary purpose of enabling unnecessary discussion to be indulged in by any Gentleman who wishes to do so? Our procedure on money Bills is settled by long tradition, from which we have not departed by a hair's breadth. The terms of this Resolution are settled by the officers of the House, over whom we exercise no control, and if there has been any inconvenience the fault lies with the methods of the House, and not with any peculiar use of those methods adopted on this occasion by Her Majesty's Government. So much for the form of the Resolution. With regard to the other subsidiary points that have been raised we have been told—I am especially told—that I have shown vacillation and inconsistency in the course I have pursued with regard to this matter. It so happens that in this particular case there has absolutely not been a shadow or shade of turning from the time when the Bill of last year was dropped till the time when the Bill of this year was introduced. Anybody who takes the trouble—I do not advise them to do it—to read the speeches which I have made upon the topic—I think, so far as I remember, there have only been three—one in the House when announcing the withdrawal of last year's Bill, another shortly afterwards in St. James's Hall, and the third at Rochdale in the autumn, will see quite clearly these two things. In the first place, that the only pledge, either in letter or in spirit, which I gave was that the Voluntary Schools should not suffer by the dropping of the Bill of last year; and, in the second place, that the Government were resolved not to weight this Measure for the relief of Voluntary Schools by adding to it extraneous provisions regarding other matters, however important or however excellent. ["Hear, hear!"] That may have been a wrong decision—I am coming to the question of substance before I sit down—but with regard to the question of consistency it has been my view throughout, the view I held last June, the view which I still hold, and the view which I believe best both for Voluntary Schools, the procedure of this House, and, I will add, for necessitous Board Schools. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down said that if Voluntary Schools ought to have 5s., why did not you give them 5s. last year, and if they ought to have only 4s., why do you give them 5s. this year; and he asked, "Is this not merely a dole and a sop to condole them for not getting the Bill before March 31?" Many Gentlemen in this House, no doubt, speak of the liabilities thrown upon the Exchequer with a happy irresponsibility, and I think one very excellent Friend of mine made a speech in this Debate in which he airily suggested that the whole cost of the education of all the children in all schools, Board and Voluntary, should be thrown on the Exchequer. That is a plan for which much may be said, but it is one which no Chancellor of the Exchequer is likely to look on with any great favour. But among those irresponsible expenders of public money, surely the right hon. Gentleman opposite ought not to be one. He has been a Member, and will, no doubt, again be one of the most important Members in an Administration responsible for the public purse, and he must know that the amount which the Exchequer gives to an object is not always, perhaps is not usually, simply and solely determined by the value of the object, but is largely determined, and must always be largely determined, even if this country was twice as rich as it is now, by the resources of the Chancellor of the Exchequer who has to give it. If that simple proposition be accepted, as I think it must be, the House will see that neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor I were in a position last June, nor until many months after last June, to say that we were in a position to promise an increased grant to Voluntary Schools. No doubt that uncertainty did carry a corresponding uncertainty into the exact form which this Bill should take, and the exact Parliamentary procedure that should be adopted in connection with it. When I knew that my right hon. Friend could give me the 5s.—which is not, in my judgment, one bit too much for the necessities of the case—[cheers]—many competent persons say it is too little for the necessities of the case—[cheers]—I confess I dismissed from my mind all anxiety as to the precise moment at which the Bill should become law, for I felt that the pledge given by the Government was not only redeemed, but amply redeemed, by the Bill we are introducing now. Let me add this, that, though it is not absolutely necessary that this Bill should become law by a particular hour or a particular day, it is of the utmost necessity that the Bill should become law soon—[cheers]—and that not merely in connection with the general programme of Government business—though in that connection its speedy passage is important—but also in connection with the Voluntary Schools which it is intended to assist. That machinery, so unjustly attacked by the right hon. Gentleman, by which we hope to make this money go as far as possible to help the necessitous portion of the Voluntary Schools, is not machinery that you can set up at a moment's notice. It must, in the nature of the case, take time, and as it is desirable that the money should be given to the Voluntary Schools as soon as possible, so it is eminently desirable that we should without a moment's unnecessary delay pass this Bill into law as it stands and make all preparations which are absolutely essential before the money which we design for these Voluntary Schools can be distributed among them to the best advantage. [Cheers.] I am bound to say that I think some of my old Friends have shown considerable innocence of mind in the manner in which they have received the criticisms of the other side with regard to this date of March 31. I think, if they will consider the matter, they will see that the irritation shown by Gentlemen opposite at the announcement that it was not absolutely vital, however desirable, to pass the Bill by that date was a disappointment not born of any regard for Voluntary Schools, but was simply and solely the disappointment of foiled Parliamentary tacticians. [Laughter and cheers.] I have not a doubt that they have been hugging to themselves all the autumn and in the early part of this present Session the thought that, by dint of those arts of which they are past masters, the Government might be driven over the fatal day or else might be compelled, in order to get it through by the fatal day, to adopt those methods which we have always done our best to avoid—[Opposition cries of "Oh!" and Ministerial cheers]—and which I have not the slightest doubt they would be delighted to see us practice. Let my hon. Friends remember that, on a question of Parliamentary tactics, what disappoints the Opposition should be hailed with pleasure by us—["hear, hear!"]—and no better proof of the wisdom of the course the Government has pursued—I am talking purely from the tactical point of view—will be found than the ill-concealed bitterness of the disappointment of hon. Gentlemen opposite. [Cheers.] I pass from the attacks of the right hon. Gentleman upon these extraneous and subsidiary matters to his criticism upon the substance of the Resolution itself and of the Bill to which it is preparatory. I will begin by dealing with his criticism upon the 5s. grant. I confess that when I heard him, after 48 hours' cool reflection, repeat again on Thursday the criticism which he made late on Tuesday, I listened to him with great surprise. He characterised it on Tuesday as something in the nature of fraud—or, at all events, deception. To-night he said it was a bogus 5s.

> "Wouldn't it," he said, "have been much simpler and much better to take your £620,000 or whatever it is, and distribute it as a fixed sum among the necessitous Voluntary Schools?"

Surely the right hon. Gentleman is capable of seeing that it was a far better plan, when you are passing a Bill of this kind, so to fix the Parliamentary contribution as that it shall have some relation to the needs of that for which Parliament contributes it. [Opposition cheers.] It is perfectly true that no conceivable system can be adjusted with absolute accuracy to any such purpose. It is perfectly conceivable that the needs of the Voluntary Schools instead of increasing or remaining stationary, in accordance with the number of children in the schools, may become less. Surely we may take it broadly that, if we can take a certain sum of money and distribute it at a rate which varies with the number of children in Voluntary Schools we are adopting a system far more elastic, far more adjustable to the varying needs of Voluntary Schools than any method of a fixed sum which could be introduced into a permanent till. ["Hear, hear!"] The number of children in Voluntary Schools has increased by 30,000, I think, since last year. It may increase, for anything I know to the contrary, by 20,000 next year. If you gave a fixed sum, if you put in a fixed and immovable sum, there is every probability that while the needs of the Voluntary Schools increase the amount given to those needs would be relatively diminished. Supposing the ill-concealed wishes of hon. Gentlemen were fulfilled and the Voluntary Schools were squeezed out of existence and universal School Boards took their place. It is manifest that, with your fixed sum in your till, there would be a great deal more money than would be required to meet the necessities of the case. I believe the actual method adopted by the Government, described by the right hon. Gentleman opposite as fraudulent on Tuesday and bogus on Thursday, is the simplest, the easiest, and the most obvious method by which the results desired can be attained. ["Hear, hear!"] I am convinced that the more the matter is considered—and, no doubt, it will receive consideration in Committee on the Bill—whatever other criticism may be passed on our scheme, that criticism at all events, is one which has very small foundation. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman went on to attack in detail our plan of associated schools. That plan was stated by me on Monday because I thought the House had better know the general bearing of the scheme proposed. But I must point out that in reality it does not come within the terms of the Resolution. I do not say that the right hon. Gentleman opposite was out of order in alluding to it, but it is really a question of machinery, and the proper time to discuss it is not when we are discussing the Resolution, but when we have the Bill before us and the machinery is there laid out in sight of all men, and it can be dealt with either generally or in detail. But the right hon. Gentleman has made an attack on the machinery of the Bill, and I do not want his speech to go forth without some reply. I could not quite make out what the general view of the right hon. Gentleman was, for it appeared to me that he was labouring to establish two mutually destructive propositions. When he wanted to attack the association he seemed to think that responsibility should be left to the Department, and when he wanted to attack the Department he said:—

> "How is it possible for the Department to bear this heavy load on its already over-weighted shoulders?"

Now, I am the last person to deny that the Bill does throw responsibility on the Department, and I will say further that if the Department had to consider the claim of every Voluntary School from one end of the country to the other, adjusting their mutual demands and satisfying their respective needs, the burden would be no doubt—I will not say more onerous than it could bear—but it would strain the machine very nearly to breaking point. What is the proper remedy? The remedy we have adopted—namely, to give every facility and every encouragement for the formation of these voluntary associations, by which association much valuable time will be saved, not only to Voluntary Schools composing the association, but to the Department responsible for the distribution of the grant among the associations. Let me repeat here in connection with association what I said on Monday—that it is inconceivable that the interests of the association and of the Department should not be identical. The association will have no other object than to keep the schools in existence and efficient, and that also is the object of the Department; therefore you are not calling into existence a body antagonistic to the Department; you are not cheating difficulties that may hamper the Department; you are calling into existence an association of persons every one of whose desires and interests fall into line with the general policy of the Bill. Association, whatever else it may do—and I hope it will do much for the schools—will give to the Department the advantage of advisers of the most disinterested character as to the needs of schools within their scope. I believe, therefore, as I said the other day, that the association part of the Bill, however much it may be attacked, is a part of the scheme from which I hope almost more than from any other part of it; and I trust that those who have to vote on the different stages of the Bill, will look to this part of the Bill with special care and impartiality; and I am convinced they will think that the Government have come to a wise conclusion in this matter, and that we ought to do everything we can where there is no Party involved to force schools into association, from which operation so much is to be hoped in the cause of both secular and religious education throughout the country. ["Hear, hear!"] I think there only remains, so far as I remember, to discuss in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman a theme he, following his predecessor, has developed at great length—I mean the comparative treatment of Board Schools and Voluntary Schools. The right hon. Gentleman fell foul of us on this Bench for saying there was no statutory equality between the schools in any sense relevant to this Debate before us. There is, of course, statutory equality between all public elementary schools with regard to distribution of grant, but there is not now, and there never has been since 1870, any other statutory equality whatever. [Cheers.] As my learned Friend pointed out on Tuesday, the very fact that one set of schools can and another set cannot draw on the purse of the ratepayers is in itself a distinction so far-reaching, so vital, that the idea of describing schools rate-aided and schools not rate-aided as being on an equality is really absolutely ludicrous. ["Hear, hear!"] That is not all; I have been taken to task by the late head of the Education Department, by the right hon. Gentleman who spoke to-night, and by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, by pointing out that Section 49 of the Act itself is absolutely inconsistent with the idea of statutory equality. All they can say or all they do say is "What you give under Section 97 to Board Schools is not a large amount." No, nor is it; but when you are discussing statutory equality what has the amount to do with the question? You have, as a matter of fact, had in existence ever since the passing of the Act of 1870 a clause by which poor Board Schools and Board Schools alone are assisted. You have submitted patiently to this inequality for 26 years, and yet you now utter these loud cries of indignation because, forsooth, we defer until the Voluntary School scheme is passed, a scheme dealing with poor Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] I cannot follow that reasoning at all. I may mention, in connection with the magnitude of the sum, it is a current fact that probably owing to our Bill of last year, and the attention called to Section 97 of the Act of 1870, the amount applied for and given to poor School Boards has doubled since last year. ["Hear, hear!"] A curious fact, showing that, at all events, Board Schools are alive to the circumstances and that they are not treated with statutory equality as compared with poor Voluntary Schools. There is another point clearly brought out in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman by anybody who takes the trouble to compare it with other speeches from that side, and notably with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Sir H. Fowler). Whenever Gentlemen opposite wish to embarrass Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House, who desire generally to relieve all poor schools, Board or Voluntary, they dwell solely on the fact that the Bill does not touch poor Board Schools; but when they deal with the broad question, then it appears—it appears, at least from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir H. Fowler)—that what they want is not equal treatment of poor schools, but equal treatment for all schools. [Opposition cheers.] Now upon what leg are you going to rest? [Ministerial cheers.] Which is the real policy of the Opposition? [Cheers.] Who speaks the voice of right hon. Gentlemen opposite—the Member for East Fife or the Member for Northampton? ["Hear, hear!"] The Member for East Fife (Mr. Asquith) says his view is you should give where necessity is shown to exist. The right hon. Gentleman(Sir H. Fowler) throws necessity absolutely on one side, and says—and many fragments of the speech of the late Minister for Education were in the same sense—that every public elementary school, be it Voluntary or be it Board School, be it rich or be it poor, be it in a state of destitution or be its coffers overflowing with money, all should be treated alike and treated in the same relation to an equal law; if you give 5s. to one you must give 5s. all through. That I admit is not the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fife, but it was of many hon. Gentlemen who have spoken from the other side. It is vain for them to pretend that they have one single policy on the subject, when from voices of equal authority we have two views put forward of what ought to be done, irreconcilable and inconsistent. [Cheers.] I am unable to imagine a more scandalous waste of public money than that which would be involved in the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir H. Fowler). Knowing as we all know that the resources of the Chancellor of the Exchequer are not illimitable, knowing as we all know that schools, whether Board or Voluntary, which require assistance are very numerous, surely it would be a most scandalous misappropriation of public funds if we were to pursue that equal treatment which alternately with other policies animates the speeches from hon. Gentlemen opposite. I am unable to understand how they can come before the House as a united Party with a united policy, or defend a policy which has found so much support among their ranks. The right hon. Gentleman is of opinion that it would be altogether shocking to deal with the question of poor Voluntary Schools until you accept a Measure dealing with poor Board Schools. That is his policy, but it is not the policy of all his followers. Of course, I admit there is great analogy from some points of view between poor Board Schools and poor Voluntary Schools. I admit also, and I have always admitted, and I may say we are the first Government that ever did admit since 1870 that poor Board Schools ought to have relief. But, while there are fundamental resemblances between the two cases, there are also not unimportant divergencies. In the first place, I do not think the same machinery can be made to apply to the two cases. In the Bill of last year there was an attempt to do it, and not, I think, on the whole successful. When we propose, as I hope we shall, a Measure for poor Board Schools, of course it will not be on the lines of our Bill for poor Voluntary Schools, because association would have no place in the machinery of the one, while it is absolutely essential to the machinery of the other. ["Hear, hear!"] In the second place let me point out this—it is perhaps a small matter, but one not to be lost sight of—while the Government are pledged, and while our Party is pledged, and has been pledged ever since the General Election, to deal with poor Voluntary Schools, the question of poor Board Schools never came up in general discussion until we attempted to deal with it last year. While the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Acland) pursued that distinguished career at the Education Department which brought on his head the blessings of the Bishop of Chester, I never heard that the right hon. Member for Rotherham ever suggested during the last two years to his colleagues or to the House that anything whatever should be done for the poor Board Schools. [Cheers.] I believe you might hunt through the election speeches and addresses of hon. Gentlemen of this House, and, except in the special cases of one or two districts like West Ham, I do not believe you will find one single speech or address, until we brought in our Bill of last year, in which the subject of poor Board Schools is so much as alluded to. [Cheers.] But there is a third point in this connection which I think ought not to be lost sight of. In so far as our grant is what I may call an eleemosynary grant, I hold all who have equal needs should be equally assisted. [Cheers.] Let it be observed, when you are dealing with the case of Voluntary Schools, there is something over and above the eleemosynary aspect which has to be considered. I am not going to repeat, even if it only be in summary, the fact that, in my view, one great justification of this Bill, one of the greatest necessities which make it urgent to deal with this problem, is that the Act of 1870 can only be maintained and is only tolerable if and so long as it gives room within its limits both for the Board and the Voluntary system. [Cheers.] There is, therefore, underlying this Bill an even larger and deeper question of principle than is involved in the treatment of poor Board Schools. I, at all events, consider myself as contributing, to the best of my ability, to keep up a system which I grant is fettered with many difficulties and which is absolutely doomed to destruction, in my judgment, if you allow the Voluntary part of our educational system to go down. That, in my judgment, would be the greatest blow which this country could receive from the point of view of those who, like myself, believe in denominational teaching; but it would be a not less blow, believe me, to those who, like hon. Gentlemen opposite, regard it as an accursed thing. [Cries of "No!"] Well, regard it as a thing so abominable that you may refuse to pay rates lest it should be carried out; a thing so abominable that you would be justified in breaking the law rather than see it carried into effect—that formulæ should be taught in Board Schools. Many have threatened to go to prison rather than pay for the support of schools in which formulæ are taught. I say that that part of the system which they cherish and which establishes undenominational Board Schools—the destruction of that system must follow the destruction, in my opinion, of the denominational Voluntary system in this country, and it is in the interest of Board and Voluntary Schools that this Bill is brought forward by Her Majesty's Government. [Cheers.] Therefore we have justification in this Bill going down to the very root of our educational system, and of even greater importance than those eleemosynary considerations which rightly animate us in our desire to assist poor Board Schools. The House will perceive that by rising, as I have done, immediately after the right hon. Gentleman, I have deprived myself of the luxury to which I confess I had looked forward, of speaking after the Leader of the Opposition at a later stage of the Debate. He will be able to explain, therefore, without power of reply on my part, what his view really is now with regard to the relief of ratepayers. [Sir W. HARCOURT made an observation which was inaudible in the Gallery.] Are not we to have the right hon. Gentleman's explanation? This is indeed a cruel disappointment. [Laughter.] If he and hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition Benches are going to vote against us tonight, it is, as I understand from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, not because they object to help Voluntary Schools, but because they think it is so important to help the ratepayers of poor School Board districts that that object must be associated with the other object. I really am interested to know, and it is very important we should know, when this process of silent conversion took place in the right hon. Gentleman's mind. [Laughter and cheers.] His last speech explaining that all relief to the ratepayer was a dole to the landlord—[laughter]—was made, I think, in November. His first speech on the subject was that in which he explained that a Bill which had given these doles to the landlords ought not to be considered by this House. His first speech in the other direction was delivered by way of an interjection, I think, or, at any any rate, briefly delivered on the Address this year. That is to say, on January 19—a short space in which to make the curve, even by a most practised hand. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman, I have not the least doubt, will explain to us to-night that the unsuccessful election—unsuccessful from our point of view—is due to the country awakening to the fact that we are treating Voluntary Schools with a preference which we do not give to Board Schools. [Opposition cheers.] The country was invoked in every speech of the right hon. Gentleman last year as holding with the conviction of which we should only understand the strength when the time of a General Election came near—with an unalterable conviction—that everything you gave to the ratepayer was a disguised, and scarcely disguised, gift to the landlord. [Laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman is, perhaps, capable of holding these two contradictory doctrines at the same time, but surely the country is not so capable. [Laughter.] I should very much like to know whether the election to which I have referred was due to the recollection by the voters of the speeches which he made last year, or the anticipation by the voters of the speeches he is going to make this year? [Laughter.] It is really a matter of more than personal curiosity on my part. I admit the personal curiosity exists, but I think it is really a subject of some public moment to know whether the Party who cheered the right hon. Gentleman when he made and repeated his speeches last year on this subject were sincere in their convictions? [Cheers.] If they were sincere then, we should like to know whether they have altered their convictions, or if the convictions—exactly opposite convictions—which they now express are as sincere as those which they gave vent to last year. [Cheers.]

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): They are exactly the same.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The right hon. Gentleman says they are exactly the same.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: Exactly.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Apparently it is right to relieve the landlord when the subject of relief is education, but it is not right to relieve the landlord when the subject of relief is the Poor Law—a doctrine of deep mystery, which it will require all the right hon. Gentleman's ingenuity, and all the ingenuity of the right hon. Gentleman the late Minister of Education to deal with when he replies to-night, as we are told he is going to. I have now, I think, kept the House sufficiently long, and have really traversed all the ground with which it is necessary to deal. I have, I hope, shown, in the first place, that the course of the Government has from first to last, ever since the dropping of the Bill of last year, been perfectly consistent. [Cheers.] I have shown, I hope, that there is no ground for thinking that Voluntary Schools have any reason to complain because we have found a method of dealing with this subject which does not give our opponents the Parliamentary advantage which a fixed date always does give to an ingenious Opposition. ["Hear, hear!"] I think I have also shown that the method of distribution to which the right hon. Gentleman objects is one which it is absolutely necessary we should adopt if the full benefit is to be extracted from this Measure; and, in the fourth place, I have shown that, pressing as the necessities of the poor School Board districts undoubtedly are, and anxious as we equally undoubtedly are to deal with them, the question of the Voluntary Schools has always been regarded as a separate question, and there are reasons why it still should be regarded as a separate question. ["Hear, hear!"] Finally, I have put a question to the Opposition, which I think demands an answer—namely, how it comes about that relief of the rates is legitimate when you are dealing with education, but illegitimate, monstrous, and mischievous class legislation when you are dealing with other rates? [Cheers.] These four propositions cover, I think, the whole field of Debate upon this Measure, and I hope, as I have attempted to deal with them fully, fairly, and candidly, that those who think we are not wrong in endeavouring to do our best, with the utmost speed, to help the Voluntary Schools, will give us at this stage, and all other stages of this Bill, that support which will not only insure its becoming law, but insure its becoming law at the earliest possible date. [Cheers.]

*MR. R. B. HALDANE (Haddington) observed that the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had referred to the accusations which had been brought against him of vacillation. They on that side had never made such an accusation, which, on the contrary, came from the great organs of the Unionist Party. The Times, the Morning Post, and the Standard had poured forth their diatribes morning after morning, calling for greater firmness on the part of the Government, under penalty of their supporters deserting them. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the criticisms that had been made as criticisms which, to impartial auditors, would be singularly inconclusive. Who were they who had made these criticisms? They were the followers of the right hon. Gentleman. He did not believe the objections of hon. Members on that side were more root and branch objections than some which had been brought forward from the other side. But at least they were objections that stood on their own footing. He did not wonder at the extent to which the Resolution had been debated. It proposed to take not a sum of money voted as part of the Estimates for a single year, but it was intended to be the foundation of a Bill which, if passed into law, could not be repealed without the consent of the House of Lords, and would impose on the Exchequer of the country a charge of £618,000 a year. That was equivalent to between twenty and thirty millions of National Debt. If on that side they were disposed to closely scrutinise the proposals for the application of this vast sum, surely it was not to be wondered at. With such a sum they could give to England such a provision for secondary education as existed in Scotland and, perhaps a better one, also the foundations of University education; it could be applied to the improvement even of the entire system of primary education in England. He should not have complained if the proposal of the First Lord of the Treasury had been simply to relieve necessitous schools all round, or if its application was to inure equally to the benefit of the two classes of necessitous schools, Voluntary and Board. He should not have complained if the proposal of the Government had been for the relief of Voluntary education generally. They came to the consideration of the matter in a freer spirit than used to be the case. They had left behind the days when the education controversy was simply one between Church and chapel. But there was one condition to which any proposal to establish an addition to the provision which already exists for education must be subject, efficiency in the kind of education provided must be the first thing looked at. When he remembered that this was a proposal to assist Voluntary Schools to carry out the lines of education that already existed, upon which Voluntary education was founded, that it was looked at askance by the whole teaching community, he could not help looking upon it with suspicion. The Government seemed to be very near interfering with the settlement of 1870. They were principles which should be carefully kept in mind in approaching the consideration of this Resolution. When Mr. Gladstone's Government in 1870 brought in the Elementary Education Act of that year, they allowed three months to elapse between the Second Reading and the Committee stage, that the Bill might receive full consideration in the country. The main feature of the settlement of 1870 was that there should be compulsory education out of the rates, and under popular control. In those days they would not have dared to propose that there should be aid out of the rates without popular control. What was the policy of the next Government that had to deal with education. The Education Act of 1870 was founded on the strict observance by the Government of the day of what Liberal Members believed to be the foundation of the system. When the Minister of the Crown responsible brought in the Bill he said:—

> "The House would agree that it would be hazardous for any Government to attempt to reverse the policy which had received the formal approval of the country unless they had the strongest evidence that the national policy had undergone a great change. Now that the franchise had been lowered it would be most unwise to allow people to believe that there would be a general reversal of policy whenever there was a change of Government."

What chance had the present Government given the country of considering their education proposals? They were not foreshadowed or talked of at the time of the General Election, nor had the Government followed the course adopted in 1870 of allowing a large interval to elapse between the earlier and later stages of the Bill that the country might form an opinion upon it. Their

Bill seemed, in its essential features, to be inconsistent with and going back upon the Bill of 1870, and it had not received adequate consideration by those interested. In that Debate several interesting things had been made clear. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said any surplus in connection with the Bill would go to the reduction of the National Debt. The 31st March was not essential to the passing of the Bill, and the Bill was brought forward for next year and subsequent years. Then they knew that the 5s. to be allocated was not for necessitous schools, but is to be raised for the whole of the children in the Voluntary Schools, to be applied at the discretion of the Association of Voluntary Schools. This money might be used in a rather startling manner. It would be possible, according to this mode of allocation, to pay the whole cost of the upkeep of certain schools out of the money so raised. A school had first to declare itself necessitous, and the scheme of the Government would leave the question to the district association to apply the funds under its control in paying the whole cost of the maintenance of that Voluntary School. If in 1870 anyone had suggested that the whole cost of a Voluntary School should be defrayed out of Imperial taxes the Parties would have been astonished at the departure their successors were taking, without appearing to realise that it was a remarkable departure from the principles of the settlement of 1870. This being the general character of the proposals of the Government why did they not let the House have some inkling of what was to be the rest of their scheme. Why did they not bring forward their scheme for aiding necessitous schools in a form which would enable them to judge of their educational proposals as a whole. There would be no difficulty in bringing in two Resolutions, and they need not be brought in at the same time. He agreed entirely in the criticism of The Times that—

> "it is essential to the advocates of their (the Government's) proposals that they should be what we know they are not, proposals meant to deal with the surplus of the existing year."

The Government were going to put a very large sum of money for ever in the hands of these associations, which were to advise the Education Department. He expected that the advice of the associations would guide the Department much as the advice of Her Majesty's Ministers guided Her Majesty in connection with the laws which she was supposed to enact. It was impossible for the Department to look into all matters itself, and it would not do so. If the Government really desired to assist Denominational Schools in some fashion which should be consistent with the manner in which this question had been dealt with for the last 25 years, why did they not adopt some other plan? Reference had more than once been made to Scotland, where there was Denominational education. It was true that Denominational teaching was given in Scottish schools, and that for Scotland there was no clause analogous to the Cowper-Temple Clause. But it was also true that the whole of that education was given under the control of the ratepayers. There was no school which received any large amount of State aid which was not under the direct control of a School Board. The School Board system was universal. If the Government meant what they said about Denominational education, why did they not try that Scottish system which they were always invoking? [The First Lord of the Treasury: "Hear, hear!"] Did the right hon. Gentleman mean that now, at the eleventh hour, he was prepared to put the assistance which was to be given to the Board Schools under the control of the representatives of the localities? He confessed that if the right hon. Member had adopted the Scottish system with its universal control over the schools, with the ratepayers electing their School Board in every parish and carefully controlling the Denominational education that was given, he for one would have approached the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman's proposals in a very different spirit. The Denominational system in Scotland did not work badly. What he and his Friends contended for was that the interests of education should be put first, whether there were Denominational Schools or not, and what they protested against was that church or chapel should be able to dominate the school, as if the school existed for the sake of the church or chapel, instead of for the purpose of education. If the Government would make it clear that school education must be the first consideration, and that the judges in the matter must not be the Clergy but the public concerned in the various localities, he should approach the consideration of the question in a very different way. They did not desire in Scotland to enlarge the power of the Clergy. They did not wish the Clergy to have a greater part than they had now in the management of schools, and they looked with a very cold eye upon a proposal to set aside a large sum out of taxes which were contributed by Scotland as well as England, for the purpose of setting up a system which was contrary to their principles. Not the least discovery which the Scottish Members had made in the course of that discussion was that there was to be no equivalent grant to Scotland. When this enormous sum of £618,000 a year was to be given to English schools in perpetuity, surely Scotland and Ireland deserved some consideration. Hitherto, as far as he was aware, whenever money had been allocated by the Government for education, the doctrine of equivalence had been in principle adhered to. But now, not only were they told that there was to be no recognition of that principle, but such comfort as was offered to them was given in a form in which it did not benefit them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the Government meant to do something for primary education in Scotland, but the Scottish Members did not desire that the money which Scotland was to have should be spent on primary education; for Scottish primary education was in a condition in which it did not require further subsidies. When last year the Government gave Scotland the equivalent grants for—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is entitled to use the argument that he objects to this Vote, because nothing has been said about an equivalent grant for Scotland, but he cannot go beyond that.

*MR. HALDANE said that the strong objection which he, as a Scotch Member, had to this Resolution, was that there was no equivalent grant, and that the only promise which had been held out to them was a promise to do something for elementary education, which they did not want. They had their own views with regard to secondary education, but those views the Chancellor of the Exchequer knocked on the head. He supposed that Scotland was a country which the Government did not care much to consider. The Government was not representative of Scotland. He was not aware that the Tory Party had ever had a majority in Scotland, and there was no sign at present that Scotland intended to form a new Conservative alliance. He took it, therefore, that they had little to expect on that occasion. Not only as a Scotch Member, but as one who was keenly interested in the educational system of this country, he deplored the course upon which the Government were entering. There were other alternatives open to them, alternatives which would not have shaken the compact which was come to in 1870, and from which Lord Sandon, in 1876, intimated it was not the intention of the Tory Party to depart. The Government might carry this Bill, but they would not carry public opinion with them. They were advocating a course for which they obtained no authority at the last General Election, and for which, if one might judge from the most recent elections, they had no authority from the country to-day. Let them take warning from the fate of some of their predecessors. In 1868 Mr. Gladstone came into power with a magnificent majority. The compromise which he effected in 1870 enabled him to carry his Bill, but in the end he wrecked his Government. There was nothing that sapped and destroyed the strength of an administration so much as tampering with the principles of the people upon the subject of education. In the interests of peace now and hereafter, for the sake of avoiding bitter strife and pain, he urged the Government to follow the advice of some of their own supporters, and to bring forward, whilst it was not yet too late, their education scheme in a form which would render it possible for the House to judge of it as a whole.

*COLONEL R. WILLIAMS (Dorset, W.) said that there was a fallacy underlying all the greater portion of the discussion, and that was the treatment of this Motion as if it dealt with education (whether given in Board or Voluntary Schools), and was not rather an attempt to apportion fairly the cost of that education. Until 1870, the national contribution to education was given by payment for results, which was all that the State did as such. All school buildings and appliances were left to be provided by those who would, and the friends of religious education practically did all that was required. But in 1870 the nation awoke to the fact that education was something which concerned everybody, and ought not to be left, as it was, to a section of the nation only—namely, to those keenly interested in teaching religion —and it was to bring home that responsibility to all that the Board system was established among us. By a compromise which he for one much regretted, and the result of which he thought was not foreseen, the religious teaching in those schools was made entirely undenominational; and, therefore, the support of the Voluntary system became the bounden duty of those who believed in denominational teaching. He did for one, and he believed that everyone in his heart to whom his religion was a reality, believed in denominational teaching, and the real secret of the cry for undenominational teaching was a fear that they should be taught anything else. Then why not give the parents the right to choose the religion of their own children? The friends of definite religious education had supported their Voluntary Schools. They had been content to do so, realising that was the price they had to pay for the privilege of having their children taught what they themselves believed. But since 1870 the conception of what education ought to be had grown enormously, and rightly, and with that increased conception the cost of education had also very largely increased and rightly grown, and no one who knew imputed to friends of Voluntary Schools any diminution in zeal or any want of knowledge of the real problems of education. Very much the contrary. In 1870 there were four sources of income—namely, school fees, Government grant, the rates, and voluntary subscriptions. The school fees had been practically swept away; the Government grant, the rates, and the subscriptions alone remained. The Government grant was paid, as earned, to all schools alike, but the rates and subscriptions came out of the pockets of the people; rates from those in School Board districts, subscriptions from those in non-School Board districts, as well as many who pay both rates and subscriptions. They might ask whether the price demanded from the friends of religious education was not too high, and whether it was fair that the nation should go on as it was doing, raising the price which it asked the friends of denominational education to pay for the privilege to which they were entitled. Was it not rather the truest justice to say to the friends of religious education—

> "You have paid enough for the privilege, and as in School Board districts you pay a double charge—and in non-School Board districts you cannot make those pay who differ from you and who are careless as to their responsibilities in educating their children—is it not right that the State should make out of the taxes some part of the increased taxation which the State is levying?"

He had supported the Bill of last year, but now, when it was too late, when the Bill had been quietly thought over without the blinding dust of party strife, they heard from a very important Member of the Opposition that the Bill had many good clauses which would have done much for education. The Bill, however, had been lost. It had been treated to a feast of Heliogabalus, in the shape of a lengthened Second Reading Debate, and also in the magnificence of the great majority by which it was carried; but, like the guests at that feast of old, it was smothered, not under a shower of rose leaves, but under a shower of Amendments. The Opposition had now the chance of rising above party spirit, and of saying that it would confer great benefits on our educational system, while exercising their right of criticism and doing their best to improve this Measure. He thought that on the Opposition rested the responsibility of having thrown back the cause of the improvement of our education for some years, and for having also made it more difficult, for the longer the saw of contention is drawn the hotter it grows. The House had heard something about givng relief to the landlord and to those who paid subscriptions. He did not think this was the case. The Measure would give relief to those in scattered and lonely country parishes, with no one to help them, and to those in overcrowded town parishes who were strivng to live as best they could among their people, on a miserable pittance, spending much time which should have been given to their purely spiritual work, in begging and scraping together the necessary funds from friends at a distance. It would enable these people to keep their schools going, in order that they might teach religious education as the first thing. He believed that the quality of the secular education in the Voluntary Schools was quite as good as that given in the best Board Schools, as far as their means would permit. The educational spirit was just as keen in denominational schools, and he supported the Bill because he saw in it great possibilities for the future, and because he believed it to be just.

*MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid) said the hon. Member forgot that the Bill shadowed forth by the Leader of the House this year, and to which this Resolution was a preparation, had not provided for denominational teaching at all except in the case of two or three sects. Last year's Bill gave parents the right of choosing even in Church of England Schools whether the particular dogmas of their own Church should be taught. But no such provision, so far as the House was informed, was to be incorporated in the Bill of this year, and the objection of those who opposed the Bill was that all the taxpayers of the country were to be called upon to still further than at present maintain schools chiefly for the Church of England and for the Roman Catholics, where the dogmas of those churches alone were to be taught, to whatever church the parents might belong. There was in this country an immense number of districts where the only school was that of the Church of England. He believed there were 8,000 parishes where no school at all was found except that of the Church of England; and yet the hon. Member argued in favour of the inalienable right of the parent to fix on the definite religious teaching to be taught to the child. The Leader of the House said that evening that he desired to introduce this Bill as much in the interests of the Board Schools as in the interests of the Voluntary Schools. But the House remembered what the right hon. Gentleman said last year—that all Board Schools should be extinguished in this country.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I did not say that.

*MR. SAMUEL EVANS said the House at least recollected the phrase used in the Debates last year by the right hon. Gentleman, when he expressed the pious hope that School Boards would gradually become extinct, and any other explanation than that he had indicated had not been found. The Government, however, had taken a very curious way of putting their desire to benefit both classes of schools into effect. It was a curious way to support Board Schools by bringing in a Bill which did not do anything for them at all, but which gave what was asked for the Voluntary Schools. And they gave the 5s. as a grant, not to the necessitous schools alone, but as a sum per head of the full number of children in average attendance at the Denominational Schools. Now what they asked was that if the Government took the average attendance in the whole of the denominational schools of the country, however ample their funds or big their subscriptions or endowments, as the basis of calculation they ought to take the same basis in the case of the Board Schools. He had no doubt they would be told by the Leader of the House if the Voluntary Schools Bill passed this Session, "Now if you do not bring such and such a discussion to a close remember the Board Schools will have nothing this Session." ["Hear, hear!" from the FIRST LORD of the TREASURY.] Indeed, he had great doubts whether the right hon. Gentleman would not desire to see protracted the Debates on other Bills in order that he might have the opportunity of withholding a Bill which he did not very much desire to see passed. ["Oh!"] The Opposition had a right to be sceptical as to the desires of the Government in regard to Board Schools. But in his opinion the opposition to this Bill had been put upon too narrow a ground. The Opposition had proceeded chiefly upon the ground that it was unfair to go on with the Bill for assisting denominational schools unless the Government were at the same time going on with the Bill for the necessitous Board Schools. For himself, he objected to the principle of the Bill, root and branch, whatever might be done with the Board Schools. The Bill was nothing less than an unblushing attempt to endow one form of religion in this country. He desired to consider the Bill, further, from the Welsh point of view. In Wales they were much nearer the attainment of universal School Boards than any other portion of the United Kingdom. In England there were many more children, he believed, in the denominational schools than in the Board Schools; in Wales the case was very different. In Wales, including Monmouth, the total population under School Boards was 1,428,000, while the total population of Wales and Monmouth in 1891 was 1,771,000, so that the population under School Boards was over 80 per cent. of the whole population of the Principality. The average attendance in the Voluntary Schools in Wales, according to the 1894 Return, was 98,829, and in the Board Schools 149,435. Now according to the average attendance, they had under the Bill a very considerable sum given to the Principality in aid of the Voluntary Schools, which were in the minority he had just stated. The sum would be £24,700 a year. Was it fair that in a country which, though poor in comparison with England, had supported its own education in large measure, had set up School Boards over such a large proportion of its area, so large a sum should be given to schools which taught the denominational teaching of the Church of England, and certainly the Church of the minority, while they gave nothing at all to the Board Schools? The number of necessitious Board Schools in Wales, at the same time, was larger in proportion than in England. If the 5s. grant were given to necessitous Board Schools alone—not taking the average attendance of all the Board Schools—Wales would be entitled to £20,705 per annum. Yet they were given not one penny, and a bigger sum was given to the support of the Voluntary Schools. And there was no security whatever that the subscriptions to the Voluntary Schools should be kept up. In fact, the Government were offering special encouragement for the abandonment of those subscriptions. These schools were called Voluntary Schools, but they were not Voluntary Schools in any sense. He could give endless figures to show that they were supported out of public moneys, although of course, they were under private and clerical management. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Who built them?"] In many cases they were built by subscriptions from the general population. [Cheers.] He could give the case of one school which was built and maintained in large measure out of the earnings of workmen, who worked in collieries belonging to Church people. That was a school which he had once attended himself. The average attendance at the school, according to the 1894 return, was about 800. What were the voluntary subscriptions now? £15 a year, representing the munificent voluntary subscription of 4½d. per child! In that case the school was practically maintained out of public money, and was ruled by a clergyman who was an ardent Churchman, and the House might take it from him that there had not been a pupil teacher in that school, whether he came from Nonconformist parents or not, who was not forced by the clergyman to go to the Church of England. During the last few years the people in the locality had built a Board School for themselves, and yet the result of the Bill would be that an additional £200 or £300 a year would be given to the clerical manager of the Church School, to which the people who had built schools for themselves would have to contribute. There was a parish in Glamorganshire called Ystrad in which the Board Schools were general, their average attendance being 10,447. There was only one Voluntary School, which had an attendance of 53. Was it fair that the people who already supported the Board Schools should have to contribute to an extra grant to the one Voluntary School? The same state of things obtained all over Glamorganshire. The total attendance in Voluntary Schools was 30,046 as compared with 71,310 in Board Schools. Therefore, as far as Wales was concerned, the injustice of the Bill would be more severe than in other parts of the country. It was said that last year the Opposition professed a willingness to help denominational schools. Whatever may have been stated by right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench, he and his friends did not wish to aid such schools unless they were put under effective popular control. This Bill was not conceived in the interests of education at all, but chiefly in the interests of one denomination. What security was there that the money voted under the Bill would go to further the interests of true education? None. There was no assurance that the teachers should be enabled to give their whole attention to educational interests, or that they should be selected and dismissed on educational grounds alone. In the last number of the Westminster Review there was an article by Mr. Macnamara, President of the Teachers' Association, showing what teachers had had to submit to at the hands of clerical managers. A number of advertisements were quoted, of which the following is a specimen:—

> "Wanted. Certificated master, with wife for infants; mixed National School; organist, zealous communicant. Salary £107, house and garden."

A table given in the article set out the duties which the teachers were often called upon to perform. These included the duties of organist, choir-master, parish clerk, Sunday School superintendent and teacher, bell-ringer, clerk to the County Council, postmaster, and secretary of the cricket club. Was it right to ask Parliament to vote £600,000 a year, as a minimum, to schools in which education was only one consideration. The Welsh Members were determined that this Measure should not pass without every effort being made to point out how unfair would be its operation, and to expose the motives with which it had been brought in.

*MR. B. L. COHEN (Islington, E.) said that the hon. Gentleman had based his opposition to the Bill on grounds which might be satisfactory to himself, but which the House would regard as irrelevant. When the hon. Member saw the Bill and found that Voluntary Schools were not to be placed under popular control—as he himself hoped they would not be—it would be time for him to complain. He wished to tender to Her Majesty's Government his warm, hearty, and unqualified thanks for having promised a Bill which would enable him to redeem the foremost and most binding engagement he had made with his constituents—an engagement made in 1891, before he became a Member. As to these proposals not representing public opinion, he would refer to the statement of the Secretary for the Colonies that there was not a single Member of the Unionist side who did not in a great measure owe his return to his undertaking to defer to the overwhelming sentiment of the country in favour of justice for the Voluntary Schools. Last year the Leaders of the Opposition denounced the then Education Bill because it was not a simple Measure for relieving Voluntary Schools; and in the speech of the late Home Secretary last year there was not a single reference to any desire to assist Board Schools. For his own part he desired to see precedence given to the claim of the Voluntary Schools. He had never been an enemy of Board Schools; he was their friend; and in that capacity he wished to express his conviction that the Board Schools could not exist, at any rate on the present lines, unless the Voluntary Schools were flourishing. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton in his powerful speech the other day, declared that the lamentations over the languishing condition of the Voluntary Schools were wholly groundless. The reason advanced for that assertion, coming as it did from a right hon. Gentleman remarkable for his practical and business qualities was certainly startling. The right hon. Gentleman asserted that the income of the Voluntary Schools had enormously increased. And why?—forsooth, because their expenditure had enormously increased. There were now two and a half millions of children attending the Voluntary Schools as compared with 1,200,000 in 1870, and because their expenditure had thereby increased the right hon. Gentleman jumped to the conclusion that their income had enormously increased. No doubt the income of the Voluntary Schools had increased, but why and how? Because the fervour and ardour of the convictions which permeated those who desired and required the existence of those schools led to their doubling and quadrupling their subscriptions. A great deal had been said in the course of the Debate by hon. Members on the other side in favour of what was called "statutory equality." But equality between Board and Voluntary Schools must be something else besides statutory. It must be real. There was no equality, statutory or otherwise between them at present. The Board Schools had the boundless resources of the rates to fall back upon, while the Voluntary Schools had nothing to rely upon but the small favours the Government gave them. He was very grateful to the Government for having given the Voluntary Schools the extra shilling. It would be accepted as a generous compensation for the disappointed expectation that the schools would get the grant during the current financial year. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Rotherham, in his speech attacking the proposals of the Government, taunted the London Members with the fact that London would get £40,000 less than Lancashire. But later on the right hon. Gentleman was indignant because the Voluntary Schools in Southwark would be exempted from rates to the amount of 1s. 6d. per child. It was, "Why should London get 1s. 6d. per child?" at the end of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, and "Why should London not have as much as Lancashire?" at the beginning of the speech. The details of the proposals of the Government would not lie before the House until the Bill was printed; but so far as he understood, he thanked the Government for them, and he specially thanked his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury for his determination to push the Bill through the House with all the speed he could command. [Cheers.]

*MR. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) thought the Party opposite were to be congratulated on the Leader they had in the First Lord of the Treasury. [Ministerial cheers.] After the signals of distress which had been hung out by the Solicitor General and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Dartford division in the previous discussions, he could not help admiring the thorough pluck, skill, and admirable argumentative powers with which the First Lord of the Treasury had attempted to defend a fortress already crumbling to ruin, and from which he knew full well he would be ignominiously driven in the course of a few weeks. [Ministerial cries of "No, no," and Opposition cheers.] One of the chief cries which the Prime Minister, the First Lord of the Treasury, and other leading members of the Conservative Party had used in the country was the cry of the enormous pressure of the School Board rate upon the unfortunate ratepayers of the country, but the proposals of the Government were an ingenious attempt to escape from the task of delivering the ratepayers from this burden. The First Lord of the Treasury complained of the protest made on the Opposition side of the House against the discriminating injustice as between Board Schools and Voluntary Schools. But he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that even the scheme adopted by the Bishops in the autumn, which the right hon. Gentleman had so contemptuously rejected at Manchester, would have given a grant of 6s. per head all round to Board Schools as well as to Voluntary Schools. It seemed to him that the proposals of the Government were evasive, and, in a certain sense, cowardly, and had reasonably disappointed everyone who was interested in the question of education. The supporters of the Voluntary Schools had expected to get during the current financial year the £120,000 which the Chancellor of the Exchequer held out to them last Session as certain to come into their treasury. The Supplementary Estimates showed where that £120,000 had gone. The Government, finding that they were condemned to make good the sum of £500,000 spent on that gigantic folly the Soudan Expedition, had appropriated the £120,000 which they offered last year to the Voluntary Schools. He should never consent to the scheme adopted by the National Society, but he should say at least for them that they had the courage of their convictions. They had presented a consecutive and comprehensive plan for the maintenance of the Voluntary Schools. But everyone knew that the relief to be given by this Bill would be but temporary, and that the evil day for the Voluntary Schools was but postponed. Several hon. Members on the other side of the House had referred to the injustice done to the supporters of Voluntary Schools in compelling them to pay School Board rates. He referred those hon. Gentlemen to the present Archbishop of Canterbury.

He said there was nothing in the point that those who subscribed to Voluntary Schools were unjustly treated because they also paid rates for the Board Schools, and that that was a necessary sacrifice in order to maintain the voluntary principle. Every addition to local charges placed upon the taxes was a transfer of burdens from the rich to the poor, and in effect the Government were asking the poorest class of the ratepayers to contribute through the taxes a large proportion of this aid to the Voluntary Schools. These proposals evaded the pledges given to the Church, the duty of the Government to the Board Schools, and the rights of parents. The Solicitor General had based his case on the claims of the parents, but what voice would the parents have in the appointment of these associations, their management or control, or the distribution of this sum of money? The right hon. Member for Fife in his able speech had repeated two of the conditions he laid down last year on which fresh grants to Voluntary Schools could be approved, but had omitted the third and most important—that there should be local representative control. The friends of National Education, too, were disappointed. These associations were self-appointed, irresponsible bodies, and probably the sum to be distributed would be allocated in large blocks, some to Cardinal Vaughan, and some to men like the Bishop of Chester, Mr. Riley, and to groups of those extremists who had been pushing forward this legislation. There was no guarantee of administrative educational reforms. By the activity of local managers at present, they might have good work done in isolated parishes, but under this system they were going to hand over to an irresponsible body the power of allocating money at their pleasure. The power of withholding the grant, if a school belonging to a certain religious body did not join the association of that body, was one of the most iniquitous proposals ever put forward in that House. The whole scheme was a blow to local Government, and was a serious injury to the cause of education, as it did away with the control even of local public opinion. The strongest reason he had for opposing these proposals was because the issue was put clearly before them whether they would maintain the Voluntary system as an independent and integral part of the educational system of the country. He thought the time had come for some Statesman, on one side or other of the House, to introduce one simple national system of schools in this country, so that the present miserable strife for personal and sectional objects, which was one of the greatest obstacles to education, might cease. The noble Lord the Member for Rochester had spoken of the Act of 1870 as no settlement, but as the starting of an educational civil war. He took it that the present question was whether they really wished to supply fuel to feed the flames of this perpetual struggle between two sets of citizens carrying on schools pitted against each other in a sort of educational cockpit; or whether they wished to use the funds of the country for the purpose of providing means for one educational system which would solve all these difficulties? Canon Bury had said that the Voluntary system was one of the greatest obstacles to educational progress, that wherever it excluded the Board Schools in the large towns education was starved, that the struggle was not for religious but for denominational education, the result of which, from a Churchman's point of view, was microscopic. "They could not make Churchmen in the national schools, and they had no right to do so in schools supported by public money." He challenged the right of any Government in the interests of education to provide money for Voluntary Schools on their present footing. There was an interesting rural conference held the other day by the Union of Teachers, at which the actual facts of the rural situation were brought forward in all their ghastly reality. He thought of the miserably starved village schools in his own county, and how the educational standard had been kept down, the teachers degraded, and every educational opportunity restricted by the selfish pertinacity of the Clergy in retaining their domination. It was said that Voluntary Schools were wanted by the country, but in his own division several towns had complained that they wanted their Board Schools enlarged, but the Education Department had refused permission to enlarge them, although they were crowded with children, and others sought admission. That was due to the fact that there were half disused Voluntary Schools in the parish into which the children had to be forced. In Yorkshire and Lancashire the Education Department actually had to force the children of Protestants who required free places into Roman Catholic Schools. The actual preference of the people in large towns for Board Schools had been demonstrated in one of the Reviews by figures as to the Voluntary Schools of a large town in the North by the Bishop of Ripon. Although the managers had clearly made efforts to bring up the Voluntary Schools to the standard required, that feeling was not sufficiently strong to enable them to raise the comparatively small sum still necessary to put them on an equality with Board Schools, while 5,000 children had been transferred to the Board Schools. The parents clearly preferred the most efficient schools, and did not care so much about their denominational character. This was a question of the interests of the children, and not of the sects. The Board School system existed in order to turn out well educated and capable citizens, while the Voluntary School system, by the admission of its own supporters, existed in order to form a bulwark round the Church of England, to provide a sort of hot-house for Church principles, to enrol fresh members of the Church. He was a Churchman, and wished to support all good Church work. He thought many of the clergy used the powers they had under the Education Acts in a most excellent and admirable manner in the interests of the children, but he maintained that religious interests ought to be provided for by the Church, and out of the pockets of Churchmen. He desired to ask any fair-minded man opposite two practical questions, namely, whether two struggling and insufficiently equipped schools could do as good work as one thoroughly equipped school into which all efforts were thrown, or whether the same sum of money when distributed over a large area and amongst small buildings with inferior staffs would produce anything like the same results as it would when concentrated upon one effectively equipped school. He passed a part of the last Recess in visiting some of the splendid common schools in the State of Massachusetts. He wished we could have in this country an educational system such as he saw there. Those magnificent and perfectly equipped elementary and technical and high schools were absolutely free to all children from five to 21 years of age. But what he wished to point out was that the tendency there at the present time was to close, both in town and country, the isolated and smaller schools, and to concentrate resources and efforts on large schools. The cost of conveying to the larger schools was actually being defrayed by the State. It was found better economy to give the children the full advantages of large schools, with numerous class-rooms and full equipment, and the stimulus of competition. He was assured that in the town in which the system was carried on the most effectively the Roman Catholics had given up, as a hopeless affair, the attempt to establish any parochial, or, in other words, denominational schools of their own, because the Catholic population would not withdraw their children from the splendid advantages given by the common school system. Why was it that here in England we could not have a system of that kind, which brought the highest advantages of education to every child? Why should the interests of the children in England be sacrificed, because of the squabbles between Churchmen and Dissenters, Catholics and Protestants? He regarded with suspicion the present proposals when he saw that distinguished prelates had said they could not trust teachers even from the training colleges if they had happened to go through the mill of the Board Schools. That was an indication of the spirit of excessive domination of private and irresponsible clerical bodies. Why should they not even now face the real question of National Education? He had had the curiosity to turn to the columns of The Times of 1870 to see what was said at the time. He would not weary the House by quoting an article in The Times on an Amendment which was moved by Mr. Walter during the passing of the Education Act of 1870, but he recommended hon. Members on the Government Benches to refer to that article. They would then see how, at the opening of this controversy, generous and broad were the views of even a newspaper like The Times. The proposal of Mr. Walter was that there should be universal School Boards, and that the way should be open to Voluntary Schools to merge themselves as regarded their secular teaching and retain religious teaching in their own hands. He asked the Government whether the door was still shut to some compromise which would lead us to a happy and ideal system. Were we to go on for ever piling up enormous expenses on one side and the other in maintaining the dual system? It was now suggested to give to the Voluntary Schools £616,000 in addition to what they now received. Two or three years hence there would be a high standard of education, Voluntary Schools would have increased in number, and Parliament would be asked for another million of money. By an absolute reversal of that common-sense policy of concentration which was making the State of Massachusetts such a paradise of education, the money here would be dissipated in all sorts of channels, in ineffectual education, and 10 or 20 years hence they would have to do the work which he asked the House of Commons to do now. Why not at once weed out the unnecessary schools in our towns and villages, and concentrate every effort on schools from which sectarian bigotry and conflict should be for ever removed?

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER, after the usual interval,

*MR. J. H. JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham) said few things had been more interesting, and, perhaps, more instructive, during these Debates than the anxiety of Members on the other side of the House to support some measure of relief for Voluntary Schools, to support this Measure indeed, if it could be altered in some slight and trivial degree to meet their own views and wishes. Curiously enough, though there was little desire among those hon. Members to support this Resolution, there was, with the exception of the hon. Member for Mid Glamorgan and the hon. Member who addressed the House last, not a single Member who found fault with the Resolution root and branch. He would not follow all the objections of the hon. Member who had last spoken, and who seemed to be rather like Martha—careful and troubled about many things. As to the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Glamorgan, his complaint seemed simply to lie in this, that a large quantity of the money to be allocated to the relief of Voluntary Schools would go to the relief of Church Voluntary Schools, and to one particular Church school, where he was educated, and of the excellence of the education given in which, as well as of its unsectarian character, he was one of the best proofs. He did not propose to enter into the details of the proposal, for it seemed to him to be unbusinesslike to discuss the details of a measure not at present before the House; but he might be allowed to say he did not think there would be any finality in dealing with the question, and he did not think they would have even the elements of finality until a clear and distinct dividing line was drawn between the elementary education every parent had a right to demand for his child, and secondary or technical education. He believed that until this line was drawn they would not have the elements of finality. The present proposal allocated a sum for the relief of Voluntary Schools, and did that in fulfilment of pledges given very largely last autumn—pledges which, indeed, seemed to be somewhat in the nature of Jephtha's vow. In spite of the very serious warning addressed to Members on that side of the House by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir W. Hart Dyke), and at the risk of adding to those disquieting phenomena which caused so much anxiety to his mind, he could not but say that he deeply regretted that the Government had not found it possible to introduce concurrently with this proposal some proposal for the relief of necessitous Board Schools. This he said as one absolutely unpledged one way or the other on the subject, and he said it as representing a constituency in which a very large majority of the schools were Voluntary Schools, many of them poor schools, and greatly needing the relief now proposed to be given. But, at the same time he could not be indifferent to the fact that there were—it might be a small number only, but still there were—a number of School Boards within the constituency the pressure of whose rate was extremely high, and the highest rate of all fell upon one of the poorest agricultural parishes in the whole district.

["Hear, hear!"] The average rate was 8d. in the £, but the rate in this particular parish was 1s. 1½d. He could not help contrasting this with the Voluntary School rate which he paid in respect to his occupation in another parish, which Voluntary rate was 1d. in the £. It was a school practically without subscriptions—a Voluntary School supported by a voluntary rate of 1d. in the £. He should very deeply regret to have to go and tell his constituents that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to vote for the relief of Voluntary Schools and yet they were not prepared to grant relief to poor Board Schools. The House had been told it was the full intention of the Government to deal with this question, and he would give them every credit for a sincere determination to do so, but he very much regretted that they could not go beyond intentions. He heartily wished Her Majesty's Government had been able to lay on the Table a proposal that would give the House some more definite assurance than any yet given that the Government intended to deal with the case of poor School Boards, particularly in rural districts, where the rates pressed with extreme severity upon the ratepayers. Feeling strongly on the subject, and entertaining these views, he was not able to support Her Majesty's Government on the main question the other night. He could not vote against them, for he would not be a party to withholding relief from Voluntary Schools greatly in need of it, but at the same time he could not vote with the Government, for he felt that the relief should be given, if possible, concurrently, and certainly almost immediately with that relief to poor School Boards. He still felt that as strongly as ever, but he recognised that if he voted against Her Majesty's Government on this occasion he would be playing into the hands of those who wished to delay or defeat this Measure, and not only so, but it might delay, or possibly defeat altogether, the expected relief to poor Board Schools. He believed Her Majesty's Government would take the earliest opportunity of redeeming pledges given to deal with the case of the poorer School Boards, and in this belief he would record his vote for the Government that night.

*Mr. HENRY BROADHURST (Leicester) felt very strongly in favour of assistance to Board Schools, and he did not limit himself by any means to what were called necessitous Board Schools; he would put in a plea for contributions to all Board Schools, both urban and rural. There were many towns where the school rate pressed heavily on the ratepayers, in conjunction with sanitary and other rates. In Leicester the School Board provided for the education of some 25,000 children, and there were two Board scholars for every scholar in a Voluntary School, and yet these Voluntary Schools would receive 5s. a head grant and the Board Schools nothing whatever, the ratepayers continuing to pay 14d. in the £, and in addition they would be called upon to pay their share of the taxation out of which this grant was made to Voluntary Schools. On the face of it this was a manifest injustice. The trade of Leicester was good, but it had to be sustained against severe foreign competition. The incomes of the workmen were but moderate, and it was hard upon them to be called to pay their proportion to the maintenace of schools in which they were not concerned, paying at the same time high rates for the education of their own children. He would deal with the rural schools. He was Chairman of a Parish Council in a village where they had a Voluntary School which belonged to a very rich and powerful family. The children from the adjoining village attended the school, the owner of the second village being also a rich man. In the village itself lived a Peer, who was a Member of the other House, and the school was surrounded on all sides by rich people, who were quite capable of maintaining it. He had also within his knowledge three Board Schools, all providing for rural populations, chiefly the children of agricultural labourers. Where they were situated there was not a single rich man or any that paid, or could pay, more than another. The whole of the rates had to be extracted from the pockets of the village tradesmen and labourers who, although they did not pay rates directly paid them by way of rent. These were the class of people charged with the maintenance of the Board Schools. By this Resolution they were going to give to the rich Voluntary School 5s. per head of the children in attendance, whilst the poor Board Schools in the agricultural villages of Norfolk, which were kept up with the greatest difficulty, were not to receive a single penny. Surely that was an evident injustice. He thought it a most unfortunate thing that a great question like that of education should be tinkered with by this piecemeal kind of legislation, this sort of Jack-of-all-trades policy, and master of none. If the Government had had the patience to wait so that they might have dealt with the whole subject at once, and given proportionate relief to all classes of schools, they would have found considerable support and encouragement from a number of hon. Members who were now forced by the circumstances to oppose the Government's present mode of procedure. As to the machinery they were to have what were called associations of Board Schools. In plain language, he understood that to be a federation of rectors, and if any school refused to associate with this federation of the vicars, the Education Department would be enabled to refuse to give that school any assistance from the grant. Suppose a Nonconformist School did not see its way to federate with Church of England and Catholic Schools, the Education Department would then be able to bring intolerable coercion to bear, and could refuse to give such a school a proportion of this money provided by Parliament.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the provision. We provide that a school shall be considered to have a reasonable ground for objecting to come into an association if the majority of the schools in that association belong to another religious denomination.

*MR. BROADHURST remarked that at any rate power was placed in the hands of the Education Department to deal with a possible Nonconformist School, a power which he entirely objected to unless the school for quite insufficient reasons—not based upon religious objections—refused to join, and purposely caused difficulty and trouble in the administration in this Bill. His fear was that these differences would not be necessary to the degree he had suggested, for the purpose of debarring certain schools from participation in their fair share of the national grant. The only other point with regard to the machinery was this: That the membership of the association of schools was to be composed entirely of the present managers and proprietors of these schools, and there was to be no elected representative of any kind whatever. That was the centre and pillar of their objection to the whole position. The Government were going to provide £600,000 a year, a sum which would probably be increased annually by a very large amount, and this money was to be allotted by people in all parts of the country who represented nobody except themselves, their prejudices and their own religious bigotry. This sum was to be placed in the hands of people without being subject to any control whatever. He could not look upon it in any other aspect than as a great system of additional endowment to the Church of England. They were going to give Clergymen and those who managed the rural and urban Voluntary Schools at the present time a far greater and more influential position than they now held. He entirely objected to voting money on these principles. He would suggest that the Government should follow the traditions which had hitherto invariably been followed when two Bills were to be devoted to the same subject, and that was to let the two Measures be dealt with at the same time. When this Bill had been read a Second time, and before the Committee stage was reached, let the Government bring in and explain to the House their whole scheme with regard to the proposed relief of the Board Schools. There could be no denying the fact that the people of West Ham, Walthamstow, and many other towns and places, and especially the rural districts, were taxed up to the hilt in the matter of education, and he hoped the Government would do what the Governments of both parties had done up to a recent date in the case of two measures closely related—namely, to get the Second Reading of the one and then bring in the other. By that policy no time was wasted, and business would be immensely facilitated. If the Government would do that, and concede, of course, the fundamental and elementary principle of public control following public funds, their great Education Question might be got rid of for a great number of years to come. If some such policy was not pursued, the Government which was in a chance majority to-day might find itself in the course of a few years in a grave minority, and then—he would venture to prophesy for once in his life, and only once—no Liberal Government that came into office could live for three years without reversing the proposals of the present Government if passed in their present form.

*Mr. GEOFFREY DRAGE (Derby) said he should not have addressed the House on the question of education had it not been for the continued hostility shown to this Measure by hon. Members who represented in a great measure the labour interest. However much the hon. Member who had just sat down might differ from him on constitutional questions, he would allow, at any rate, that he had the profoundest sympathy with the labouring classes. He wished, therefore, to explain the ground on which he supported the Government policy. There were certain aspects of the policy of the Government last year to which he would like to call the attention of the hon. Member. In the first place, by the Bill then introduced, an educational ladder was devised, by which a child might rise from elementary to technical, and from technical to secondary—from the lowest to the highest rung in educational matters. More than that, it was made possible for the inmates of Reformatories and Industrial Schools to take their place in the educational scheme of the country. The second point in connection with that Measure was the increased efficiency for which provision was made, not only in Voluntary Schools, but also in Board Schools. He would like to remind the House of the great importance of improved efficiency. The country was undergoing great changes in all matters connected with labour, and what was required now more than all was that a man should be ready to turn from one trade to another, and that there should be a wider appreciation of refinement and knowledge, not only amongst the workers themselves, but amongst the leaders of trade unions and societies and the captains of industry. The hon. Member opposite seemed to think that there was a desire on the Ministerial side of the House to give the Church an undue advantage over Nonconformists in the Government scheme. His impression of the scheme was that it gave the Nonconformists privileges which up to that time they did not possess, and which the Church party were unanimous in wishing that they should have. He recognised from the bottom of his heart the great services Nonconformists had rendered to the cause of education and religion in the country. It was impossible for any man not to see that in labour and educational questions the Nonconformists had been more than once the watch-dogs of humanity and religion. The hon. Member could rest assured that, so far as it was a question of maintaining the just rights of the Nonconformists, there would always be ample support to be looked for from the Conservative side of the House. Another part of the scheme was referred to by the hon. Member, and that was the provision made for the complete democratic local control which the hon. Member desired. That control was to be in the hands of a Committee of the County Council, a body which, he would remind the hon. Member, was elected on a more democratic basis than the School Board. Those on his side of the House were anxious to support local control of education for this reason—that those countries which, like Germany, had made so much advance in education, owed a great amount of that advance to the public control of their institutions, and they were anxious to see Lancashire and Yorkshire as proud of their local institutions as they were of their cricket and football elevens. There were some minor points in this connection in which the hon. Member took a great interest, and for which he should have thought the policy of Her Majesty's Government would have enlisted the hon. Member's co-operation. There was the raising the age of the half-timers in the Bill of last year.

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is hardly speaking to the question before the House.

*Mr. DRAGE bowed to the ruling of the Chair. He would say no more on that subject except to remark that it appeared to him that in the scheme of the Government last year, as laid before the House, there was much to appeal to the labour leader. With regard to the present Bill, which was the first earnest of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, it had been urged more than once that any help given to Voluntary Schools should be adequate. He was of opinion that when hon. Members looked into the Vote they would see that the help was adequate. It had also been claimed that the help should affect poor schools only, and be subject to public control. In all these matters the Government had provided proper conditions in the Vote now before the House. Of course, in many respects those on his side of the House would not expect all hon. Members opposite to agree with them in their support of this Measure. There were peculiar reasons why they should support Church Schools—technical, financial, and religious reasons. The variety brought by Church Schools into the management of education was a matter for congratulation, and he felt that as Churchmen they could not be too thankful to the officers of Church Schools who had, on inadequate stipends, carried on their work regardless of the higher stipends they might have got by transferring their services to School Boards. Above all, they had on his side of the House reasons why they should support anything that would give renewed vigour to the system of Voluntary Schools; for many of them had had the advantage as schoolboys of those great Church institutions known as the Public Schools, and of subsequently going to Oxford and Cambridge. He only hoped that the attacks on the Church would be continued, so that the value of the religious side of the institutions in which they had been brought up, and from which they had derived the most valuable lessons of their lives, might the more be brought home to them. In supporting Her Majesty's Government in the Resolution now before the House, he felt convinced he was supporting a Resolution which, so long as he took a part in public life, he would never have cause to regret. Whatever changes in detail might be necessary in the Bill now before the House, he only hoped that hon. Members on his side of the House would look at it from the same point of view as he did, and, sinking all differences, would join with Her Majesty's Government in supporting a Measure which he firmly believed was for the advancement of the country, and of a cause which was above even that of country—namely, the advancement of Christianity.

*MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs) said the view that there was no case for an equivalent grant in regard to Scotland was not likely to be generally adopted there. It would be felt deeply in Scotland that whereas there they had been departing from the policy of sectarian and approaching the policy of national education, in England they were departing from a policy of national education and approaching more nearly to a sectarian system. In that way suspicion and dread were aroused in Scotland, and, owing to the helpless position of the Scotch Liberal majority, it was not to be wondered at. The Bill proposed that a burden of about £70,000 a year should be laid on Scotland. mainly for the advantage of Church of England schools. Because a proportion of well-to-do Englishmen belonging to the Church of England found their subscriptions to their schools a burden to them, and because many Englishmen would not contribute locally to purposes of education, therefore the people of Scotland, who contributed freely and fully through their local rates to maintain their own schools, were to be called upon to contribute through Imperial taxation to the maintenance of Church of England schools. [Cheers.] What was the "intolerable strain" upon the pockets of Churchmen? In the county he formerly represented the education rate had been 6s. 8d. in the pound. It was still several shillings. And yet the Government were going to call upon Presbyterian crofters in the most poverty-stricken districts of Scotland to contribute towards the relief of well-to-do Church people in England. The present was a peculiarly unfortunate moment to select to add to the burdens of the people of Scotland, not to speak of adding to them in the form of a grant to an alien system of education, which was specially designed for the service of an alien Church. The Scotch people were of opinion that the time had come for inquiry into those burdens under which they considered that they had been overtaxed, and also into the condition of the public service in Scotland, which they considered to have been starved. They regarded the proposed levy upon them, not only as unjust, but the purpose towards which that levy was to be devoted as destructive of the best interests of education, and subversive of the true principles upon which any national system of education should rest. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. T. P. WHITTAKER (York, W.R., Spen Valley) said the Bill had been put forward on the ground that the need of Voluntary Schools was urgent, and that unless aid was forthcoming, these schools would die out. Some of them were prepared to admit that they would not be agonised a great deal if some of them did die out. But in the special circumstances of the case they were not prepared to oppose a further grant for education to Voluntary Schools if that was made under what seemed to them to be satisfactory conditions. He admitted that as the nation demanded increased efficiency from these schools, and thus put them to increased cost, it was not unfair that the nation should be called upon to bear that increased cost. But he would remind the House that the "intolerable strain" of which they heard was not the result of the increased demands of the Department, but was due to the grasping policy of sectarian managers and promoters of these schools. Their subscriptions were less per head now than they were 20 years ago, which meant that in order to keep out School Boards in various districts of the country they had undertaken more educational work than they could find subscriptions for. Thus districts which to-day were paying a heavy School Board rate were to be taxed in order to enable other districts to avoid paying these rates. That was a gross injustice, and it was especially unjust because he believed it was the wealthiest districts that had most Voluntary Schools, and the poorest districts that had most School Boards. Another principle indicated by Mr. Balfour was somewhat extraordinary. He said they were going to differentiate between town and country districts, and that towns were to have the advantage and country districts were not. It seemed to him that any privilege or advantage should go to the country districts which were poorest, and not to the towns. They were told that if they crushed out the Voluntary Schools a great burden would be thrown upon the country. No doubt the cost of supplanting these Voluntary Schools would be considerable, but upon whom would it fall? It would not fall upon the nation as an Imperial charge, but upon the localities where the schools were. It would mean that in those districts where they had kept out School Boards the people would have to do as other districts had done. But this Bill involved a charge on districts which had already provided their own Board Schools. The Government said that they were going to aid the Board Schools, and again and again they had been asked why they did not do so now? It was no good for them to say that it was a question of time or of difficult machinery. If they would bring in a Bill giving satisfactory corresponding assistance to Board Schools they would get it through the House. There would even be no difficulty about introducing the necessary machinery into the present Bill. The real difficulty in the way was that the Government knew that they were not going to assist the School Boards in a satisfactory manner. They knew that their scheme was not going to be just to all Board Schools. The fact was that they were only going to help the necessitous schools, and they did not say to what extent and under what conditions. They did, however, say that the aid would not be given under the same conditions as they had laid down for the Voluntary Schools. But, even with regard to these necessitous schools, the deeds of the Party opposite spoke louder than their words. The words of the Government were bad enough; but their deeds were worse. They had been told that there had been a great increase in the number of necessitous schools, the real fact being that there had been an increase in the number of such schools that had discovered that they were entitled to a grant as necessitous schools. The discussions last year showed the managers of these schools that they were entitled to relief under the 97th Clause. The attitude of the Government with respect to the managers' rights under that Clause showed pretty well what value was to be attached to their promises regarding necessitous schools. Many schools had discovered that they had been entitled for years to a grant under Section 97, but when they applied for payment to the Education Department they were refused, on the ground that the application was "out of date." It was not legally "out of date." Why did not the Government defray the arrears to which the necessitous schools were entitled with the £120,000 that the Chancellor of the Exchequer said must now go to the National Debt Fund? By doing that they would give the country some proof of their good intentions. As matters stood the Education Department were allowing Protestant Nonconformist children to be driven into Roman Catholic Schools. The House had no guarantee that if they voted the money which was now asked for it would be spent in improving the efficiency of schools and the education of the people. They had heard a good deal about the intolerable strain that must be relieved. Did that mean that the pockets of the subscribers to Voluntary Schools were to be relieved? If so this money was going to benefit those subscribers, and not the children. Clergymen had recently been pointing out in appealing circulars that their appeals for assistance to the Voluntary Schools would no longer be necessary when the Government had fulfilled their pledges. That showed the way in which they thought that the money would go. Their idea was that this extra grant would go practically into the pockets of the subscribers. It was said that an effort ought to be made to maintain these denominational schools, because there was a great desire on the part of the people of this country for denominational education. His view was that that desire was very much exaggerated, and that these schools were not maintained from a desire for denominational education. They were largely maintained by clergymen and Churchmen for political and sectarian purposes. The subscriptions were no criterion of the desire of the people for denominational education. What they did indicate was that there were large numbers of people who feared a School Board rate, but not that those persons had any love for denominational education. This dread of a School Board rate was an instructive comment on the love of hon. Members opposite for religious liberty. In hundreds of parishes they strained every effort to prevent School Boards from being established, and that meant that they were driving Nonconformist children into denominational schools. Any additional assistance to be given to Voluntary Schools ought to come from the rates. The localities ought to find the extra money that was required, for localities which already provided for the education of the inhabitants out of a School Board rate ought not to be made to bear a share of the expenses of places where Board Schools had not been established. Why were the Church Party opposed to rate aid? It was because they knew that if a local rate were levied to support the Voluntary Schools it would decimate their subscription lists. If a rate were levied the subscribers would stop their donations, because many subscriptions were given in order to avoid a rate, which must be accompanied by some sort of local control. That was what the sectarian party feared. Of course it was said by hon. Members opposite that the Voluntary Schools were quite as good as the Board Schools. So they were where their supporters were compelled to make them equally good. It was the compulsion of competition that had raised the standard of education in Voluntary Schools, and it was that compulsion of competition which was the intolerable strain of which their supporters complained. Wherever there was a sectarian majority on our School Boards, or whenever there was a sectarian majority in that House, efforts were made to check the progress of the Board Schools and of Board School education. It was the desire of the Church Party—they had indications of this last Session—that a curb should be put upon Board School Education, and that was why the Prime Minister had recommended the Church party to capture the Board Schools in order that those schools might be held back, and that the competition with their own schools might not be so keen. The Church Party in their jealousy would check and hamper education at the very time when the country needed a better education than ever, in order that it might hold its own in the commercial world, and the worst feature in the case was that those who would do this would do it in the name of religion.

*Mr. HARRY FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft) thought that the Debate had been most useful, because it had revealed the true attitude of the Opposition towards the Voluntary Schools of this country. It was true that now and again some tardy admissions were made by Members of the Opposition of the desirability, and in some cases of the necessity, of the continued existence of Voluntary Schools. One very important admission of the kind was made last Session, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fife stated that the Voluntary Schools were an integral part of the system of primary education in this country. Here and there then they heard a kind of hollow admission that these schools did some sort of good work. Too often those admissions had been accompanied by a very thinly disguised feeling of hostility to the Voluntary School system, but the great majority of speeches, like the speech of the last hon. Member, merely showed that there was a desire to see the gradual extinction of the Voluntary School system in this country. The right hon. Member for Dartford said that he had not heard many speeches thanking the Government for this partial measure of justice—["hear, hear!"] that was to say, partial, inasmuch as the scheme was not a complete measure of justice, but that it only rendered to the Voluntary Schools some instalment of that measure of justice to which they were entitled. The Government, no doubt, would better appreciate the votes of their followers as indicated by the division list last Tuesday than by speeches indicating a superabundance of gratitude. For his part, he tendered to the Government his very sincere gratitude for this Measure. He thought that, having waited as the Voluntary Schools had done for more than a quarter of a century—under a system in which the Board Schools had been the protected and favoured schools so far as public money was concerned—it must now be gratifying to the supporters of the Voluntary Schools to find that the time had arrived when a Measure was produced in which the country recognised the just claims of the Voluntary Schools to some further measure of recognition from the public purse. A great deal had been said about rate aid. Personally he was not afraid of rate aid, nor was he afraid of popular control—[cheers] —subject to the reservation made by the hon. Member for East Mayo, that no attempt should be made to interfere with what hon. Gentlemen opposite called the sectarian teaching adminstered under the Conscience Clause. Subject to that reservation he had no fear; on the contrary, he rather welcomed some measure of popular control of those schools. As to public control, since the Act of 1870 both Board Schools and Voluntary Schools had been under the control of the Education Department. Both were working under the same Code, and both were turning out the same educational results. [Cries of "No, no!"] That being so, they were both doing the same work which Parliament had required of them, and therefore on principles of abstract justice, they were entitled to share to the same extent the public money. Yet the Voluntary Schools received, even under this Bill, nothing like their share of public money. It was true sometimes that the friends of Voluntary Schools had been forced into the position of appearing to be retrogressive. But why? If the Government laid upon elementary schools of all classes increasing requirements, justice required that they should provide all those schools alike with the same means of carrying out those requirements. The right hon. Member for Bodmin, in the interesting and instructive speech which he delivered the other night, made a remarkable admission which ought to carry weight when he said that on principles of abstract justice, if once the wishes of the parents were made manifest, and they showed a distinct intention to maintain the Voluntary and denominational schools, then the foundation of our scheme of national education would have to be enlarged in order to take them in. The right hon. Gentleman meant by that that the time would probably come when the Voluntary Schools would be granted by Parliament—not, as he said, at the hands of the Conservative Party, but at the hands of the Members of the Opposition —that same measure of public support to share public money as the Board Schools were now enjoying, and that they should be entitled to come on the rates for a full measure of the educational work they were fulfilling. How had the wishes of parents been expressed? Although those favoured and protected Board Schools had been in vogue for more than a quarter of a century, and had had behind them not only the public money of the Exchequer, but also the unlimited purse of the ratepayers, the Voluntary Schools, labouring under the enormous disadvantage of having to find continually a larger sum out of their own pockets, in addition to the sums they were contributing to the school rates in the district—the Voluntary Schools had not only been enabled to hold their own, but to show that out of the 5,000,000 of children in the public elementary schools, no fewer than 3,000,000 were being educated in our Voluntary Schools. The right hon. Member for East Fife taunted them that this grant was intended to relieve the pockets of the subscribers to Voluntary Schools, and spoke about stimulating the consciences of the supporters of Church Schools. What were the facts? In the last 80 years the supporters of those schools had contributed 40 millions sterling for the establishment and maintenance of those schools, and the subscriptions were upwards of £20,000 a week at this moment. In face of those facts, such taunts were unmerited and unjust. The Member for East Fife had suggested that the needs of the Voluntary Schools for aid might decrease in the future, but it was absurd to suppose that the necessities of these schools would decrease, and he objected to seeing public money granted as it had been hitherto to one class to the gross disadvantage of another. [Ironical cheers.] And if ever there was a class which had suffered gross injustice at the hands of Parliament, it was the Voluntary Schools. Every turn of the screw put on at the Education Department had been felt by the Voluntary Schools, because it meant more subscriptions, and their supporters had not, like the Board Schools, any power of raising money from the rates. As to the future necessities of the Voluntary Schools and their position under this grant, it must be remembered that one class on whom the strain had fallen very largely had been the teachers in the Voluntary Schools, and undoubtedly the effect of the Bill would be that those teachers would get a substantial part of the grant in the shape of increased salary. During the past 12 months the requirements of the Education Department had been relaxed to some extent because of the financial position of the Voluntary Schools, but when this Bill was passed, it was certain that whichever Party might be in power, those requirements would then be enforced, and properly enforced, wherever schools were inefficient, whether as regarded their sanitary condition, the staffing, or anything else. In his opinion the Government had exercised a wise discretion in making the sum depend not on the existing necessities, but on the total number of children who might be from time to time in the Voluntary Schools. A great deal had been said about statutory equality between the two systems of schools. This was absurd, because in one case they supplied the means of complying with the demands by giving recourse to the rates, and in the other they supplied no such means whatever. It was because Voluntary Schools had suffered gross inequalities, and because, after this Bill had become law, they would be placed in a more equal though still a far less favoured position than the School Boards, that he thanked the Government for this instalment of justice. All friends of Voluntary Schools would feel a deep debt of gratitude to the Government for what they had done.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee) said that he did not know whether it was by accident or design that for the last few hours the Minister left in charge of the Bill was not the Minister of Education, and not even an English Member, but a Scotch gentleman filling an office which had nothing to do with the question under discussion. He hoped, however, that the Solicitor-General had been present for the purpose of answering the claim made an behalf of Scotland by the Members for Leith and Haddingtonshire, and he hoped that the Solicitor-General would display as much ingenuity and achieve more success than characterised his efforts the other night. Scotch Members had complained that the Government, by the procedure which they had adopted, had unfairly limited the range of the Debate; because it was impossible to submit to the House the proposition that aid to Board Schools ought to go hand in hand with aid to Voluntary Schools. The answer of the Solicitor-General to that complaint was that to make the scope of the resolutions wider than that of the Bill to be founded on them would be contrary to the practice and traditions of the House. If that were so, then the resolutions reeked with disorder; because there was hardly one of them which was not of larger scope than the Bill. The only thing the Government had taken care to limit was the application of the 5s. grant to Voluntary Schools. The resolutions might equally apply to Scotland and Ireland as well as England, but the Bill was to apply only to England. Therefore the argument of the Solicitor-General was refuted by the resolutions themselves. Scottish Members had another substantial grievance in the course which the Government had adopted. In 1888 grants in aid of the rates were made in certain proportions to England, Scotland, and Ireland. The Scottish Members—led by Mr. Hunter, whose absence and the cause of it they all deplored—demanded that the Scottish grant should go in aid of free education. That led to the claim for free education in England, and when the claim was granted, Scotland again received an equivalent grant. It was the departure from this practice on the present occasion that Scottish Members complained of. When the Bill of last year was under discussion, the Government gave a vague assurance that, if that Bill passed, something should be done for education in Scotland, though there would be no equivalent grant. If that "something" were needed, why was it not done on its own merits? And if not, why was not Scotland given her equivalent grant in the proportion to England's of 11 to 80? No answer had been made to that demand. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had this year repeated the unsatisfactory declaration which he made last year, that the principle of the equivalent grant did not apply, but that, if the Bill passed, something should be done for education in Scotland. The forms of the House would not permit the Scottish Members on the Opposition side of the House—who, in this matter represented the opinion of Scotland—to enter their protest against that declaration in the form of an Amendment to the Resolution; and the fact would be an additional stimulus to the strong opposition they should offer to the Bill, invidious as it was in its general purpose, but particularly in its dealings with Scottish interests. What was the Bill for which they were to make the large sacrifices that were demanded of them? They had not seen it yet, and the exposition of its provisions by the First Lord of the Treasury had not been so lucid that it was completely apprehended even on the right hon. Gentleman's own side of the House. This much, however, was clear. It was a Bill bristling with discriminations. There were discriminations between Board and Voluntary Schools; between town and country, and between associated schools and non-associated schools, for the latter were, in some mysterious way, to be penalised. It was conjecture on his part, but he believed it was true, that, as in the case of the Agricultural Rating Bill of last year, as in this case, the Government had changed their intention since they had laid their proposals before the House. The Government proposed a grant to Voluntary Schools of 5s. per head on the whole number of scholars in such schools, but it now appeared that in some way, certainly not comprehended on that side of the House, the grant was to be so manipulated that the main portion of it was to go to the necessitous Voluntary Schools. He should like to know what was meant by "a Voluntary School." The First Lord of the Treasury had not condescended to tell the House.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Wait for the Bill.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: Yes, but any step they took on the Bill would be governed by this Resolution and by the meaning attached to the word "Voluntary." In the Bill of last year the definition of a Voluntary School was a school not supported by a School Board rate. On this matter he held the opinion of a distinguished Member of the Government which was responsible for the proposals now before the House. Not many years ago it was said:—

> "The efforts of all lovers of justice and all friends of education must now be directed to the establishing of the principle that representation shall go hand in hand with taxation, and that no grant of national or local funds shall be made to any school, the majority at least of whose managing body does not consist of representatives elected by the district for that purpose."

The distinguished author of that creed was the Colonial Secretary. Was the right hon. Gentleman still "a lover of justice and a friend of education?" If he were, how was he going to justify his position in a Government which proposed to give National funds to schools that had no representatives of the people upon their governing bodies? What was the position of the Government? They had to borrow money to carry out their proposed urgent military defences. When the time came for the discussion of those borrowing proposals it would not be forgotten that the necessity to borrow had been brought about by the policy of the Government in squandering the surplus reserves of the Nation upon sectarian and class purposes—last year in the relief of agricultural rating, and this year in the relief of Voluntary Schools.

Mr. JOSEPH A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside) entered his humble protest against the rapidity with which the proposals of the Government were to be rushed through the House, and also against the limited scope of the Bill. Nothing had been left undone to limit the scope of the Measure and to suppress criticism. Last year a grant in aid was proposed nominally to aid agriculture. Safeguards and conditions to secure that end were not proposed, and the Amendments moved on the Opposition side of the House were rejected by the Government. The money had gone to increase the purchase value of the landlords' agricultural estates. This year there was a grant in aid proposed nominally to aid education. There were no safeguards or conditions proposed to secure that end; and again the Amendments of the Opposition were clotured, and they were unable to move them on the Committee stage of the Resolution. He thought that, just as in the case of the Landlord Relief Bill, the money they were now asked to vote would not go to the purposes for which it was intended, but would go into the pockets largely of the parsons and their friends. [Cheers.] They must recollect that six out of every seven of the denominational schools were managed and controlled by the Church party. If the House was to be again closured before full discussion had been secured, they would, at any rate, have the satisfaction of knowing that the country would take every opportunity of expressing its disapproval of the proposals of the Government in the same way that Walthamstow expressed its opinion. [Cheers.] They were told that if they allowed this Bill to slip through, another Bill might follow by which some Board Schools might receive some aid; he, for one, was not prepared to take the shadows instead of the substance. His constituents had authorised him to say that they believed in Voluntary and Board Schools being treated alike by the State, but the public pledge which the Government had given seemed to him to be absolutely inadequate to the equal treatment of those schools. He favoured an increased contribution for the promotion of education in Voluntary Schools, and he thought the Roman Catholics ought to receive special consideration at the hands of the State. But he would not be a party to proposals to endow private schools unconditionally. Those schools already received over seven-tenths of their maintenance from public funds, and he believed that this Bill would promote injustice between Board Schools and Voluntary Schools. In the parish of Walthamstow the Board School rate was 1s. 9d. in the pound, and if Board Schools were to be given an equivalent grant to Voluntary Schools that Board School district ought to receive £3,000. Was it surprising then that the Government proposals should have been emphatically condemned the day before at the ballot box? The right hon. Gentleman opposite would like to see Town Councils managing School Boards, for he admitted that in the discussion on the Bill of last year. He himself did not believe that a Town Council was a suitable body to control the management of education.

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now discussing the Bill of last year.

Mr. J. A. PEASE said that it appeared to him that under this scheme the School Board districts which had declined to rate themselves were to be rewarded. Those who had promoted educational progress were to be discouraged. They were apparently going to do nothing to maintain voluntary subscriptions. The First Lord of the Treasury said every school would get some grant.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: No, I distinctly said that schools that did not require a grant would get no grant under the Bill.

Mr. J. A. PEASE begged the First Lord's pardon. He thought the right hon. Gentleman stated that every school would get some grant, but it would be a varying grant. He at once accepted the contradiction. He understood that 1,061 Voluntary Schools at the present time received no subscriptions, 674 received subscriptions of under 1s. from voluntary sources, 1,095 under 2s. 6d., and 967 under 5s. That was to say that of the total number—14,145—of Voluntary Schools in the country, nearly one-third received subscriptions of less than 5s. The total subscriptions of the country from charitable sources amounted, he was told, to £622,000, almost the exact sum which Her Majesty's Government proposed to take out of the pockets of the ratepayers in order to hand it over to the managers of Church Schools. It seemed to him that the Government were endeavouring to supplant voluntary subscriptions by State money. Under the present proposals there was no check whatever upon the expenditure of the grant, and there was no guarantee that the money would go to the promotion of education. There was to be no local supervision. The confessional might be instituted in the schools, creeds might be taught, extraneous duties might be required of teachers and insisted upon by managers, and all at the public expense. The Archbishop of Canterbury, in introducing a deputation to the Prime Minister in November 1895, said, "We are willing to have a certain proportion of subscriptions insisted upon as a condition of grants," but the Government were not proposing that there should be any proportion of subscriptions insisted upon as a condition of their grant. No, they seemed to be callous to the interests of education and merely concerned to relieve the pockets of the wealthy supporters and managers of denominational schools. He objected to the proposals of the Government on one other ground, namely that this money came out of the taxpayers' pockets, out of the pockets of the poorer classes of the community. Seven pounds out of every £10 of taxes came from the poorer classes, and therefore it was not only a question of injustice being done to those who were interested in Board School education, but of injustice done to the taxpayers of the country. He appealed to the Government, although he knew their appeals were of very little use, before it was too late, to withdraw this proposal as it at present stood. If the Government would only deal equally between the Board Schools and Voluntary Schools, he could assure them hon. Members on the Opposition side would approach the scheme in a very different spirit from that in which they were inclined to approach it now; they would endeavour to approach what they admitted to be a difficult question in a way which would enable them to make a satisfactory and permanent, so far as it reasonably could be expected, settlement of this great question.

*Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: My right hon. Friend the Member for Fife, early in the afternoon, stated, with his usual clearness, the position that Gentlemen on this side of the House occupy, and desire to occupy, with reference to the proposed additional grant to Voluntary Schools. We have always stated, and we state again, that to the assistance which is averred to be required—and I have no doubt is required—by Voluntary Schools, we offer no opposition if the grants are made upon conditions that are fair to other parties and in respect of the schools themselves. I may state compendiously what our position is. We take our stand upon the compromise, as it is called, or the settlement of 1870. ["Hear, hear!"] It has worked for the development of the new system of Board Schools, and it has worked certainly not injuriously to the Voluntary Schools which, year after year, have increased in their resources and in their number. Can anybody deny that the number of Voluntary Schools has increased since 1870? Well, therefore, the phrase that the Voluntary Schools, which have increased and are increasing in number every year, are being starved out of existence, is one which does not correspond at all with the facts of the case. [Cheers.] You may say that they have not the predominance you desire, you may say that they have not the monopoly of the scholars in this country, but to state that the Voluntary Schools under the operation of the settlemen of 1870 have been starved out of existence, is a statement which is absolutely contrary to the fact. We had addressed to us the other night a speech which I venture to think is amongst the most valuable which has been made in this Debate, I mean the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dartford. The right hon. Gentleman said:—

> "he had always felt, and he felt it most acutely during the six years he was in the Education Department, that if in the slightest degree that machinery" speaking of the settlement of 1870—

> "was disturbed great friction might inevitably result, leading probably to the utter disorganisation of our whole educational system."

Now that was the right hon. Gentleman's opinion of the danger of disturbing the machinery of the Act of 1870. He says:

> "To-day we were in the midst of one of those educational controversies which cause deep anxiety to all who have Party instincts and deep consternation to those who had good education uppermost in their minds."

I believe that is a perfectly correct description of the present situation. Why is that the situation? Because you are doing the very thing the right hon. Gentleman deprecated—namely, disturbing the machinery of the settlement of 1870. It is not to be said that we maintain there should be no modification of the Act of 1870. There was a great modification made in the year 1876, when the alteration was introduced in respect to the 17s. 6d. limit. That modification in 1876 was perfectly consistent with this principle of the Act of 1870 in regard to the necessity of voluntary subscriptions. There was a most important modification introduced in the Act of 1891 when free education was granted. But these modifications were absolutely consistent with the fundamental principles of the Act of 1870. What were those principles? The Duke of Devonshire referred to one of them, when he said that the equality between Board Schools and Voluntary Schools in respect of the Government grants was a statutory equality. It is quite obvious what the Duke of Devonshire meant. He meant that the equality created by that statute in respect of Government grants was an absolute equality between the two classes of schools. When you came to give a large additional grant of 10s. by way of free education you adhered to that principle, and you gave equally to the Board Schools and to the Voluntary Schools. Therefore, up to this time you did adhere strictly to the principles of the Act of 1870. What we maintain is that this Bill is in fundamental violation of that compromise, inasmuch as it is about to give a great grant from the Exchequer—£600,000—to one class of schools and not to the other. That is the ground upon which we condemn this Bill. We say that all the difficulties that have arisen, and will arise, with reference to this grant, come from your violation of what the Duke of Devonshire justly called the statutory equality established in 1870. The failure of the Bill last year arose from the general feeling that it would operate as a measure of hostility to the Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] Our opposition to that Bill was founded on our belief that it would operate injuriously to the Board Schools, and the moment it was felt in the country that that would be its effect, the fate of that Bill was sealed. [Cheers.] Our opposition to this Bill is on the same ground, not because it favours Voluntary Schools, but because in its operation it is intended relatively to depress Board Schools. [Cheers.] That is the clear ground of our opposition to this Bill—that is the gist of our opposition. Is it on my statement alone that this Bill is unjust in its exclusion of Board Schools? It is not the language of a political opponent; it is the language of a man who, I venture to say, has rendered more service to education in this country than any other man probably in this House. I mean the hon. Member for the Edgbaston Division of Birmingham. What is his language? Sitting actually behind the First Lord of the Treasury, the other night, he said it was a Bill of "unexpected and extraordinary injustice to the Board Schools of this country." That is not the factious language of a political opponent; it is the condemnation of a man most competent to judge on such a subject—a loyal supporter of the Government. [Cheers.] Some examples have been given of this injustice. The right hon. Member for Bodmin quoted the experience of the constituency he represented. Let me give an example of the operation of this Bill upon the constituency I have the honour to represent—West Monmouthshire. [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] Has it come to this, then, that hon. Gentlemen opposite intend to clamour down a man who states figures in the interests of his own constituents? [Opposition cheers and Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] There is a great deal too much of this intolerance from Gentlemen on the other side. [Opposition cheers and Ministerial laughter.] We have no intention of allowing the discussion of this Bill to be treated in that manner. [Cheers.] Though we may be in a minority, we are entitled to decent treatment, and, if not with concurrence, we have at least a right to expect good manners. [" Hear, hear ! "] I shall proceed, in spite of the clamour, to state the figures—[Ministerial laughter]—and if necessary I shall ask your assistance, Mr. Speaker, to enable me to proceed. [Cheers and Ministerial cries of " Go on."] You had better have the Closure at once. [Cheers.] If you are not going to have discussion in this House, have the Closure at once, and I will sit down. [Cheers and Ministerial cries of " Go on ! "]

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W).—The clamour is all on your side. [Opposition cries of " Oh ! " and Ministerial cheers.]

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: If that is the support Members of the Cabinet—[cheers]—are going to offer their supporters—[Ministerial cries of " Order ! "]—we have very little hope of discussions being carried on in a reasonable way. [Cheers.] I should have thought that at least the right hon. Gentleman would have desired that the discussion—[Ministerial laughter and cries of " Order ! "]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: If I am out of order—

*MR. SPEAKER: I was not calling the right hon. Gentleman to order. I was calling to order those who were interrupting him. [Loud Opposition cheers.]

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Perhaps, Sir, by your authority, I may be allowed to proceed. I am going to give the figures of the schools in West Monmouthshire and what they will receive out of this £600,000. There are two School Board districts in West Monmouthshire—one of them has in Board Schools 3,184 children, and in Voluntary Schools there are 466 children. Now, in respect of the 3,184 children, out of this £600,000 nothing will be received—[" hear, hear ! "]—and in respect of the 466 children there will be £116 paid. [" Hear, hear ! "] In the other districts there are in the Board Schools 5,055 children, in respect of whom nothing will be paid, and there are 287 children in the Voluntary Schools, in respect of whom £72 will be paid. [" Hear, hear."] Therefore, out of a total number of children of 8,992 in a district upon which there are School Board rates paid to the extent of £10,320, the whole amount of aid grant will be £188. [Cheers.] Is that not a confirmation of what the hon. Member for the Edgbaston Division described as a case of unexpected and extraordinary injustice? I will take another not far distant district—the Rhondda Valley. In that district there are 14,500 children in Board Schools and 58 in Voluntary Schools, and that industrial valley—not a rich country at all, and with a trade that has recently not been flourishing—will receive out of this £600,000 the amount of £15. [" Hear, hear ! "] That is the way in which this principle of equality will actually operate. I take three other districts together, in which there are 28,000 children in Board Schools, and in respect of whom nothing will be paid, and in which there are 1,662 children in Voluntary Schools in respect of which £416 will be paid. That is the contribution to a district which pays in School Board rates £23,000. [Cheers.] Do you expect that treatment of that kind is going to be accepted by the country? That is the history of the districts which, in consequence of their poverty, and which, in consequence of not having wealthy residents, have not Voluntary Schools, and that is what they are to receive out of this £600,000. I take you to another county with which I am also acquainted—the county of Oxfordshire. There the case is almost exactly the reverse. There are 26,000 children in Voluntary Schools, and there are 2,600 children in Board Schools. In that county what will be received out of this grant is £6,500, against the £416 given to the poorer districts in Wales. [Cheers.] Do you really think that we are going to accept a settlement of this kind as an act of justice as between the rich and poor? Is it not obvious on the face of it that the scheme of the Bill is to give to the rich districts where Voluntary Schools flourish almost all the money and to give nothing at all to the poor districts? [" Hear, hear ! " and " No, no ! "] These are facts that are to be known. [" Oh, oh!"] Do you deny the accuracy of these figures? They are supplied to me as, and I believe they are, absolutely correct. If they are inaccurate have them altered, but if they are correct the conclusion is inevitable. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has complained that he has been suspected of a direct intention to exclude this which is the gist of the whole matter from discussion here by the form of this financial Resolution. Well, I need scarcely assure the right hon. Gentleman that he will never hear from my mouth any imputation that he has intentionally dealt unfairly with the House. [" Hear, hear!"] But at the same time let me remind him that this imputation has come, not from us, but from his own supporters. [" Hear, hear!"] The moment this Resolution appeared political notes and leading articles in Unionist journals declared what an acute man the First Lord of the Treasury was, and complimented him upon what they call in America his "smartness," and said how cleverly he had managed to shut out the Opposition from discussing anything that might be inconvenient. [" Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman's reproaches ought to be addressed to the proper quarter, not to us who are not the authors of these doubtful compliments. The right hon. Gentleman has said, and has repeated it over and over again, that it was not from any such intention, but from the necessary character of the Bill; but that is just what we complain of, that the Bill is framed on a principle of one-sided justice, that the Resolution reflects that injustice and shuts out of consideration matters which ought to be included. [" Hear, hear!"] Will the right hon. Gentleman excuse me for saying that if he wanted to pass a Bill peaceably and quietly through the House he ought to have dealt with it in a different manner? [Laughter.] He was trying to state the case fairly. [The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: " Hear, hear!"] I say you ought to have brought before the House, and to have enabled the House to consider, both these questions together. You have not done that, and in not doing that you have greatly retarded, and will greatly retard, a settlement of this question. You say you are suspected of injustice to Board Schools, and, of course, that suspicion is founded on your Measure of last year. Having proposed a Measure that was greatly unjust to Board Schools, and as such was defeated, you now come forward with a scheme for Voluntary Schools, deliberately abstaining from telling us what you are going to do with Board Schools. How, then, can you complain that we are suspicious of the course you will pursue towards Board Schools? But then the right hon. Gentleman said to-night that of course he did not take particular account of Board Schools because nothing was said about them at the elections; all the pledges were for Voluntary Schools. [" Hear, hear!"] I dare say some right hon. Gentlemen did not say anything to their constituents, but the First Lord of the Treasury, at all events, is the last man who ought to make that statement. What has become of the East Manchester programme of the Unionist Party? [" Hear, hear!"] There was nothing in it about Voluntary Schools, but one of the 15 articles of the East Manchester programme was that all rates of Board Schools were to be paid out of the money of the Exchequer. [Opposition cheers.] And the right hon. Gentleman says he said nothing about Board Schools at the election. [The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: " Hear, hear!"] Does he disavow this Manchester programme, this Unionist programme? [" Hear, hear!"] Well, I suppose there are recent experiences which have rather superannuated that programme. ["Hear, hear!"] I should like to know if all the 15 articles are disavowed, or is it only this one article referring to education and Board Schools? What a wretched pretext is this now put forward for not dealing with Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] He also said to-night that we were greatly disappointed on this side of the House because the Bill was no longer such a Bill as was necessary to be carried into operation by March 31. No, Sir; we are not disappointed; I have heard Gentlemen on the other side of the House say they were. [Cheers.] But we are not disappointed at all; we are greatly pleased, because it deprives the right hon. Gentleman of the only pretext which he could have plausibly alleged for not including Board Schools. [Cheers.] At first we heard nothing of what was going to be done for Board Schools. There have been some vague insinuations as to what may or may not be done for them. There was nothing said in the opening statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, but after the first night's Debate, and after what I should call the loud uneasiness of the Borough Members on the other side of the House, it was found necessary to say something about the Board Schools, though nothing had been said at the elections. Something, therefore, was to be put forward which would quiet their discontent; and when the right hon. Member for Dartford got up and applied partly soothing and partly castigation, appropriate to his ancient profession, to the Gentlemen who sit below the Gangway, he told us that he understood that a pledge, and a perfectly distinct pledge, would be given by the Government in the course of the Debate that a similar Measure would be applied to the necessitous Board Schools. Well, we are waiting for that distinct pledge still. [Cheers.] We have some very indistinct statements, but we are as far as ever from knowing what it is the Government are really going to introduce into their Bill for the Board Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] If the Government have made up their minds, why do they not tell us so? They say it is more convenient to have two Bills. That is a very curious Parliamentary proceeding. ["Hear, hear!"] It was not necessary; but even if they had determined to have two Bills they might have told us the general principles which were to govern the other Bill, which was the necessary complement to the Bill they have introduced. They have been compelled by the pressure of their own supporters to hold out expectations of measures which they have never explained. I can only say that it is not a conciliatory manner of introducing this Bill or one calculated to disarm criticism. If they had only told us what sort of justice—I do not say the details or machinery by which it is done—it is what they contemplate giving to the Board Schools they would very much facilitate the passing of the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] All they tell us is that they will do something for the necessitous Board Schools. Great emphasis is put upon the adjective "necessitous," but when we asked the other night that the same adjective should be applied to Voluntary Schools they said, "Oh, no; that is quite out of the question." ["Hear, hear!"] What is the meaning of that? It shows they do not mean to deal with Board Schools upon the same terms as they are dealing with Voluntary Schools. [Cheers.] The very introduction of that limitation shows perfectly well that equal justice is not to be meted out to the two classes of schools. Are they going, in the words of the right hon. Member for Dartford, to give "similar treatment to the two schools?" Until you tell us that you cannot expect to get on with this Bill. We have a right to demand that we should be told if the Government mean similar treatment to be given to the two classes of schools and an equivalent grant. ["Hear, hear!"] What was the plan for the Voluntary Schools? I think at last we understand it very well. They are going to give 5s. a head—that is the measure of the grant—for all children in average attendance in all the Voluntary Schools; and then they have got machinery for distributing that. Are they going to give to the Board Schools

5s. a head upon the children in average attendance and distribute that? [An Hon. Member: "No."] They are not. Very well. We understand, at all events, what they are not going to do, but they have not told us what they are going to do. The right hon. Gentleman has explained to us how he is going to distribute the £600,000 among the necessitous Voluntary Schools. I will not at this time of night go into the extraordinary plan of the voluntary associations which are not voluntary, but which are penalised. I will not inquire into the happy concert of these boards when they meet together, and some of whom, as the right hon. Gentleman has just explained, are to get nothing at all and others a great deal. They are to advise the Education Department, and the Education Department is to settle the quarrels among these contending voluntary associations. ["Hear, hear!"] We shall no doubt have some very amusing discussions upon this extraordinary plan, which seems to be a special favourite of the right hon. Gentleman. I do not know that the right hon. Gentleman himself has any very special acquaintance with the working of the Education Department. I should rather like, and I think the House is entitled to have the opinion of the Minister responsible—[loud cheers and laughter]—for the Education Department upon the happy prospects of this ingenious system. When the time comes no doubt he will be put forward to defend it; but, in the meanwhile, and until I have heard the vindication of this scheme, I shall adhere to the opinion expressed on the first night of the Debate by the hon. Member for Islington—that it is a plan which will be impracticable and unworkable, and will disappear before Committee. [Cheers.]

Mr. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I never said anything of the sort. I referred to the way in which the money was to be distributed.

*Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: That is the very thing. [Cheers.] The money is to be divided amongst these voluntary penalised associations under the advice and control of the Minister responsible for education in this House. The hon. Gentleman does not deny that that is the opinion he formed of this plan, and I entirely concur in that opinion. When I asked: "What are you going to do for the Board Schools?" the right hon. Gentleman said that he could not put it into the same Bill, because it would require different machinery. Surely you might have different machinery in the same Bill, but I hope it will be more reasonable and rational machinery. ["Hear, hear!"] But I did not ask about the machinery; I asked, "Are you going to give to the Board Schools pro rata out of this Government grant the amount that is due to them—5s. per head?" That is what is demanded by the principles of the compromise of 1870. ["No!"] Yes, it is; and that is what you decline to give. When you gave the 10s. grant for free education you gave to all schools alike without discrimination. You gave to Board Schools, to Voluntary Schools, and to rich and poor schools alike. [Cheers.] That has been, and is, the statutory equality of which the head of the Education Department spoke, and the extraordinary thing is that every principle and every detail in this Bill is contrary to the opinion of the chief and the second in the Education Department at this moment. [Cheers.] We want a reply to that question. If it is "No," and if I understand the Colonial Secretary's interjection, you do not—

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon; I have not interjected anything. [Cheers.]

*Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: I thought I had ascertained from an interjection of the right hon. Gentleman that it is not the intention of the Government to give to the Board Schools on the same footing. ["Hear, hear!"] But let us see how—and that is the really important matter—how much you are going to set aside for the Board Schools. You told us that you were going to set aside as much as the Chancellor of the Exchequer could spare. If that is so, of course the Manchester programme is abandoned. When the right hon. Gentleman came in contact with the Chancellor of the Exchequer he found the Manchester programme was not practicable. [Cheers.] What the Chancellor of the Exchequer could spare was £600,000. That is going to be given to the Voluntary Schools. What remains, then, for the Board Schools? Last year you could scrape up £2,000,000, and you gave it to the agricultural interest and left the towns to wait for what they could get. ["Hear, hear!"] You are proceeding upon the same policy now. You are going to sweep up for your favoured friends everything that can be got, and the Board Schools are to wait and see what is left for them. I commend that to the consideration of the boroughs. [Cheers.] This is the second time they have been left out in the cold and told to wait. First the towns were told to wait for assistance in their general rates, and now the towns are to wait for assistance in their rates under the School Boards; but gentlemen who are the fortunate owners of land—they get their £2,000,000 down on the nail; and those gentlemen who are the principal promoters and proprietors of Voluntary Schools, they get their £600,000 in cash down. [Cheers.] But for the rest, the towns, with their heavy rates, they are to wait. It will be all swept up by the two classes who have the advantage of being favoured by Gentlemen opposite. These are the things we ought to be told. We ought to be told what residue you mean to devote for the benefit of the Board Schools. I should like to ask why is the public money, to the extent of £600,000, to be given specially to districts which have refused to rate themselves—[cheers]—which decline to subscribe, and none is to be given to districts like those in West Monmouth and Cornwall and many others which have made the greatest sacrifices to support Board Schools? This question ought to be answered—[cheers]—and we should understand exactly what is the policy of the Government in the matter. Then the right hon. Gentleman, I suppose with a view to shorten their Debates and add to their tranquillity, dragged in Walthamstow, and asked me whether I thought this Bill had anything to do with it.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: No; I did not.

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Why was Walthamstow introduced?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: If the right hon. Gentleman wants to know, I will tell him why. I was interested to know whether Walthamstow was influenced by the creed of the right hon. Gentleman last year on the effect of the relief of the rates, or whether by his creed of this year, which is exactly the opposite. [Laughter and cheers.]

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: As the right hon. Gentleman has introduced a subject of which I confess I know something, and attributes to my and your creed—[turning to the Opposition Benches]—an influence which he supposes it has had in the result which we have witnessed in the polling at Walthamstow—if my creed has had that result I am proud—[cheers]—I have some information at his disposal, and I will tell him what that information comes to. This Bill had a great deal to do with the election at Walthamstow, not only in its educational aspect, but specially because it is another example of that pernicious spirit of class legislation—[cheers]—which the present Government have persistently promoted since they have been in office. [Renewed cheers.] You began with the Agricultural Rating Bill under which you gave two millions of money to one class; under this Bill you are going to give £600,000 to another class. These are the illustrations of the policy you are pursuing; that is the creed which has destroyed you in Walthamstow. [Cheers.]

And you may add to it the miserable failure of your social legislation as instanced in the Truck Bill and the Conciliation Bill. [Renewed cheering.] That is what has destroyed you in Walthamstow. The right hon. Gentleman challenges me to discuss the question of the incidence of rates. That is "a large order" at this time of night. But as the right hon. Gentleman has challenged me I will give him a brief answer. I do not know that the right hon. Gentleman has ever made the doctrine of rates his special study. He has a colleague on that bench, the First Lord of the Admiralty, who is one of the greatest authorities upon it, and if he would address himself to him he would receive a far clearer explanation of his difficulties than I can venture to offer. But I will tell him as well and as shortly as I can that everything I have ever said on the subject of rates last year is precisely identical with that which I have said and intended to say with reference to rates on this occasion. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] That is the way you meet me when I am going to answer a question of the right hon. Gentleman. In dealing with the rates last year, first of all you dealt with the rates of only one class, not of all classes. That is the complaint I make of you under this Bill—you deal with only one interest and not with both. Then the right hon. Gentleman said truly that I had said the agricultural rate fell on the owner. So it does. Let him ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, who is a great authority on the subject. He is the author of the doctrine of the hereditary rate. He pointed out how all the old rates which for the most part prevail in the agricultural districts fell on the owner, and distinguished from them the new rates, and especially the education rates, which fell on the occupier, and which prevail especially in the towns. He evidently does not know the elements of the doctrine of rating. If the right hon. Gentleman could only procure the work of the First Lord of the Admiralty—[laughter]—he would there find all about the doctrines of rating. One of the great canons laid down by the First Lord of the Admiralty is, that the rate had a different incidence in the country and in the town. In the country comparatively little falls upon the rate for Board Schools, whilst a great deal falls upon it in the towns. Therefore it is obvious that the relief ought to be given chiefly in the towns, and not in the country; and yet you have gone and given your relief where the rates are low in the rural, and none where the rates are high in the eastern districts. ["Hear, hear!"] If the right hon. Gentleman does not understand this, it is thoroughly understood in Walthamstow—[cheers]—where they have the most practical reasons for understanding it; and if the right hon. Gentleman had to pay the education rate that they pay in Walthamstow, he would understand it too. I have now—I hope without unduly occupying the time of the House—[cries of "Oh!" and cheers]—indicated my views on the subject of rates, and I have also indicated to the right hon. Gentleman where he can obtain that fuller information of which he stands much in need. [Laughter.] Then you say that you prefer two Bills to one. That is a matter of taste, but it is a procedure that will occupy very much more time. However, as long as you intend to conceal what you purpose to do for the Board Schools, we shall persist in endeavouring to extract from you that information, and what fund you intend to set apart for the purpose. ["Hear, hear!"] You say you are going to introduce a Bill for the Board Schools. The right hon. Gentleman the other day spoke in a tone of virtuous indignation because the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton had suggested that it was possible that that Bill might come to grief in another place. I do not see that that could be intended as an imputation upon the Government unless, indeed, it is taken for granted and asserted that the Government have got the House of Lords in their pockets. I do not know that that would be a very discreet assertion to make—["hear, hear!"]—and there were indications last year that it is not always the case. But there is a much more immediate danger to any Bill that provides funds to do justice to Board Schools, and that comes from a large section of the supporters of the Government in this House. Do they desire that equal justice should be done to the Board Schools? I should like very much to know the opinion of the noble Lord the Member for Rochester, and of the noble Lord the Member for Greenwich, par nobile fratrum. According to the language we have always heard from them, what they desire is to destroy the competition of the Board Schools; but if you give equal justice to both kinds of schools you do not destroy that competition. At the great Church conference which he attended the noble Lord opposite protested against the resolution for giving equal aid to Board Schools and Voluntary Schools, to which he would only consent on the condition of rate-aid. But then he is not going to have rate-aid. If the noble Lord will now get up in his place and say that he desires a Bill that will give equal aid to Board Schools and Voluntary Schools, then I might believe in the probable success of a Bill in favour of the Board Schools. But if he will not, and I do not think it likely that he will, the obstruction to that Bill will come from the benches below the Gangway opposite. Well, that Bill is to be introduced late in the Session, and what assurance have we that such a Bill as that would ever pass into law? I am extremely sceptical on that subject, and it is the fault of the Government that we are sceptical on this subject. If they have made up their minds as to what they are going to do, why do not they give us more information? If they would tell us what are the principles upon which they are about to deal with the Board Schools, if they would give us some satisfactory assurance, they might then get on with this Bill. There is one other point to which I must refer. I was going to say that if the Government will join these two Measures together—not, if you like, in the same Bill—but if they will only have what is called a "bi-metallic tie"—although I should not like to have the bi-metallic principle applied where one party gets the gold and the other the silver—[laughter]—if they will do that we shall be thankful. But if they will not do that we must, of course, offer resistance to a Measure which otherwise we might be willing to support. [Ministerial cries of "Oh."] When the right hon. Gentleman makes an assertion I accept it, as I feel bound to accept it, because those are the good manners of the House of Commons. But why should there not be a reciprocation of the compliment, and why when I make a statement of that kind should it be met with jeers and clamours? [Cheers.] It used not to be so when I knew the House of Commons first. The behaviour then was extremely different from what it is now, and I must be excused if I prefer the ancient manners of the House of Commons to those now in vogue. [Cheers.] The second principle which was enshrined in the settlement of 1870 was that Voluntary Schools should always be called upon to make subscriptions of a substantial character. That was the object of the 17s. 6d. limit. You are going to remove it. What security are you about to give for the voluntary subscriptions? Is it not a remarkable fact, considering what a capital point this is in the whole question that the right hon. Gentleman, in his opening speech, did not say a word about it? He spoke for half an hour expounding the details of this wonderful voluntary association, but on those securities to be given for voluntary subscriptions, he was silent. [Cheers.] The right hon. Member for Dartford said—

> "he could not but allude to the question of subscriptions to Voluntary Schools. It was perfectly obvious that they must not allow this Measure to go forward as a relief to subscribers of Voluntary Schools. ['Hear, hear!'] He thought it should be a sine quâ non in all cases in which assistance was to be given to the locality that there should be some guarantee on the part of the locality that the existing subscriptions should be maintained."

Everybody feels that is one of the vital and most fundamental conditions of this great question, and on that the Government are absolutely silent. [Cheers]. That carries with it another vital principle, and that is the question of popular control. [Cheers]. Why is it that the Voluntary Schools are allowed to be conducted without popular control? Is it on the ground of their voluntary subscriptions? [Cheers.] But you are attempting, so far as we know, to get rid of the necessity for voluntary subscriptions and yet to exclude popular control. There again this Bill runs directly and diametrically contrary to the fundamental principles of the Act of 1870. I confess that I heard with great satisfaction the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for East Mayo as to popular control. On the part of the Roman Catholic Church, which is not less denominational than the English Church, he declared in favour of the principle of popular contral. ["Hear, hear!"] Why, I should like to ask, is the Anglican Communion more afraid of the people than the Church of Rome in this country? [Cheers.] Yet this is a most important declaration made by the hon. Member for East Mayo, and I have seen it made in public by Cardinal Vaughan—

MR. J. DILLON (Mayo, E.): And by all the Bishops.

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes, and by all the Bishops. Here then are the Bishops of the Church of Rome who are not afraid of the people—[Ministerial cries of "Oh, oh!" and counter cheers]—while the Bishops and the clergy of the Church of England are the enemies of popular control. ["No, no" and cheers.] Then you are willing to accept popular control. [Cheers.] We must ascertain, it is clear, how that matter stands. If the Government want this Bill to pass easily let them be frank with the House; let them tell us what they are going to do with the Board Schools. It is not a question of the stopping of their legislation with reference to Voluntary Schools; we have no power of moving Amendments in favour of the Board Schools; but they cannot be surprised that, in the obscurity in which they keep the question, we and the country should believe they are not going to mete out equal treatment to the two kinds of schools. The right hon. Gentleman spoke about a permanent settlement; he said that he wished for a permanent settlement. I think that every one wishes for a permanent and friendly settlement. [Cheers.] But the right hon. Gentleman knows, and every one knows, that there cannot be a permanent settlement unless we come to an understanding. I might appeal to the principle of your Conciliation Bill, which is to bring the two parties together in order that they might respectively exchange their view. If the right hon. Gentleman or his friends were to come forward and tell us how—I do not say in detail, but generally—they are going to deal with the Board Schools, then there is a possibility, nay, a high probability—though we might differ as to details—that a settlement of this question might be arrived at; and then, instead of that friction which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dartmouth so greatly deplores, we should have a friendly discussion across the floor as to the method of dealing with both classes of schools. I must say if the Government persist in holding back their intention—["No!"] Why do you say "No"? Do you imagine you know? If so, the Gentleman who says "No," must have had some private communications from the Government. [Laughter]. Can anybody pretend that the Government have told us what they are going to do for the Board Schools, how much money they propose to set apart for them, and on what principle they are going to deal with them? Let the Government make those declarations and then we shall have some hope that these discussions upon education will be conducted in the spirit we all desire they should be conducted, and the House of Commons will be able to act without any friction or Party feeling in discharge of its duties in regard to this great subject. [Cheers.]

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: At this late hour of the evening I certainly should not have presumed to detain the House more than a few minutes, but the speech of the right hon. Gentleman will, I am sure, be felt by the House to deserve some reply. [Cheers.] I think on the whole we are indebted to him for that speech. Of course I am a prejudiced listener, but I thought it was a bit discursive—[laughter]—and that some parts were a little superfluous. ["Hear, hear!"] I thought it was quite unnecessary that the right hon. Gentleman should lecture the House of Commons in the spirit of Mr. Turveydrop upon its deportment. [Laughter.] It seemed to me not to deserve the criticisms which the right hon. Gentleman addressed to it. But I think we are indebted to the right hon. Gentleman, because there was after all in his speech an indication of the main issue, which he, at all events, wishes to be considered as the question between the two sides of the House. The right hon. Gentleman tell us, as many Members on that side of the House have told us, that they are quite willing to give assistance to necessitous Voluntary Schools. They have shown their willingness by obstructing this Bill. [Cheers and laughter.] But while the right hon. Gentleman is deeply attached to the future of Voluntary Schools, and while he is desirous to go as far as the Government in preserving them from extinction, he is afraid lest we should do an injustice to the Board School system; and he said that the great object of his Party is to prevent us from depressing the Board Schools and from infringing the principle of equality which was set up by the Act of 1870. Equality is a very fine thing, but it requires a little definition; and I should like to know what the right hon. Gentleman means by equality between the Board Schools and the Voluntary Schools of the country. [Cheers.] The Voluntary Schools and the Board Schools are, as he says, at present absolutely equal in regard to their claims upon the Imperial Exchequer.—[cheers]—and the Voluntary Schools cannot get a penny from the rates. Is that equality?

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I was speaking of equality as established by the Act of 1870 and as defined by the Duke of Devonshire. [Cheers.]

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The right hon. Gentleman is always anxious to throw off responsibility upon absent people. [Cheers and laughter.] I know nothing about what the Duke of Devonshire may have said on this particular point. [Opposition cries of "Oh!"] But I will answer for him to this extent—that he never said and never pretended and thought that the condition of things as between Board Schools and Voluntary Schools were equal in regard to the rates. [Cheers.] That is one point then as to which equality has to be specially defined before we can call it equality at all. It is equality in inequality as defined by the Act of 1870, which never pretended to be equal. ["Hear, hear!"] But that is not all. The Board Schools at the present time have under the Act of 1870 recourse to extra assistance from the State when they are necessitous. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman spoke as the Member for West Monmouth; and he has studied some extracts bearing upon the educational condition of West Monmouth. But he has not gone far enough. I do not know whether he went as far as what I am going to tell him. Last year the Board Schools of Monmouthshire were either paid or there was payable to them £1,400 over and above the grant—[cheers]—under the exceptional clause of the Act. Is that equality? [Cheers.] Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to pay at the same rate to all the Voluntary Schools of the country? Why, Sir. we are removing inequalities. [Cheers, and Opposition cries of "Oh!"] I am almost afraid to say it, but we are an equalising and a levelling Government. [Laughter.] Now we go a step further. The right hon. Gentleman says that he is quite in favour of assisting Voluntary Schools which are in danger of extinction. That is the object of this Bill. [Cheers and ironical laughter.] We are so far carrying out the earnest desires of the right hon. Gentleman. [Laughter.] Then why does he denounce us for a job? Why does he denounce us for class legislation? Why does he say we are giving this money to our friends?

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: You are giving it only to them.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, it is absolutely untrue. We are not giving it to our friends. [Cheers and cries of "Oh!"] I doubt very much whether hon. Gentlemen opposite are logicians. [Laughter.] They are admirable politicians and partisans, because they cheer everything that comes from their Leader. [A LIBERAL MEMBER, "We stick to our own side."] When we gave relief to agriculture, if it were true, as the right hon. Gentleman contended, that that relief went to the landlords—which we always deny—[cheers]—but if that relief went to the landlords, you might truly say we gave it to our friends, because it went into the landlords' pockets. But into whose pockets will this grant go? Who will be peculiarly and particularly benefited by the grant to Voluntary Schools? [Opposition cries of "The Parsons."] No, it is not. The people who will benefit by the grant are the whole community of the ratepayers. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman talks about the ratepayers being injured by this grant to the Voluntary Schools, as if we were taking money from the taxes of the country and putting it into the pockets of private individuals. We are doing nothing of the kind. [Cheers.] Let me take a concrete instance. Here is Birmingham, about which I know as much—well, as the right hon. Gentleman knows about West Monmouthshire. [Loud laughter.] We have got School Boards in Birmingham. We are proud of it. We are proud of the Board Schools of Birmingham as institutions of the town, and anything that was calculated to depress them or to do any injustice to them would be resented by every elector in the town. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That is why the Chairman of the School Board voted against you. [Loud Opposition cheers.]

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The Chairman of that Board is a follower of the right hon. Gentleman himself, and he is not in the House. [Prolonged Ministerial cheers and laughter.] I am not afraid to face my constituency on this subject, I have done so already. [Cheers.] What is the state of the case in Birmingham? It is, that while we have Board Schools which deal with the larger proportion of the children of the city, we have also very efficient Voluntary Schools. ["Hear, hear!"] I doubt very much whether there will be a large claim on behalf of the necessitous Voluntary Schools in Birmingham. ["Hear, hear!"] But if these Schools were necessitous, and if they were allowed to be extinguished, the result would be that the School Rate, which at the present moment in Birmingham is 1s. 0½d. in the pound, would be raised to 1s. 9d. [Cheers.] The question for the ratepayers, which I have put before them, and by which I am content to stand or fall, is whether they would prefer to give a small grant as contributions to the Voluntary Schools, in order to preserve these schools from extinction, or whether they would pay

1s. 9d. in the pound as school rate in order to have a theoretically complete and uniform system? [Cheers.] And what is the position of the right hon. Gentleman? Although he goes out of his way most unnecessarily to taunt us with motives in this matter, he agrees with our conclusion and object, and is willing to give the money which is necessary to preserve the Voluntary Schools from extinction; but he says there must be equality in regard to the Board Schools. [Opposition cheers.] I quite agree. Only, perhaps, my definition of equality may be somewhat different from that of the right hon. Gentleman. [Laughter.] Are the Board Schools in the same position as the Voluntary Schools? The Voluntary School has no resource beyond the Government grant and the voluntary subscription. If those two are exhausted and its funds are still insufficient, it must go to the wall. What is the position of the Board School? The Board School has the grant, and it has in addition the almost bottomless purse of the ratepayer—["hear, hear!"]—and, Sir, until you can show in regard to the Board School that the purse of the ratepayer is not bottomless, or, at all events, that the demand on the purse of the ratepayer has already gone to the extreme limit of justice, you cannot pretend that the Board Schools are necessitious. [Cheers.] It is perfectly absurd—perfectly absurd. You contend in Birmingham, for instance, where there is now a shilling rate, that you are called upon to come to the aid of the ratepayers of Birmingham, and to give us 5s. a head upon all the children in the Board Schools, Well, Sir, we never asked for anything of the kind, but if we did, and if that is your view, what is that you are doing? What is it that is proposed? It is not a grant to Board Schools. I do not see my hon. Friend and colleague the Member for the Edgbaston Division here, but it is not as he seemed to suppose a question of Board Schools against Voluntary Schools—the Board Schools in any case are safe—but it a question between the ratepayer and the Imperial taxpayer. ["Hear, hear!"] The question is not in any district as to whether the Board School should be extinguished—that is impossible; but the question is whether a particular ratepayer should be burdened beyond what is just, and whether in his case an additional charge should be thrown upon the Imperial taxpayer. ["Hear, hear!"] Now, if I have made that clear the whole case of the right hon. Gentleman falls to the ground. [Cheers.] My hon. Friend the Member for the Edgbaston Division, whose capacity, whose interest in the subject, and whose convictions on the subject we all respect, rested his argument upon the fact that the Board Schools and Board School education is going to be injured. I say that is absolutely impossible. I say that there is nothing in this Bill, if it were to be passed to-morrow, that could by any possibility damage or put in a worse position than now any single Board School in the country. As to whether ratepayers in certain Board School districts are being unfairly taxed, that is a question which is well worthy the attention of the House of Commons, and to which the Government have promised to call your attention. But to put the two things in the same scale, to say that one thing cannot be dealt with without the other, is to attempt to compare two things which are incomparable, and is surely absurd and a fraud upon the intelligence of the House. (Cheers.) Let me make my way clear so far as I have gone. I think I have shown that, whatever may be the case for the poor Board schools, it does not affect the Board school education; it is a totally different question; it is an economic question; it is the ratepayers' question. ["Hear, hear!"] Very well; then I say we are entitled to deal with it separately, we are entitled to deal with it at a separate time; and we are entitled, if we like, to put it second; but we have not attempted to put it second, except in point of time. [Ironical Opposition cheers]. Well, our time is not wholly our own. [Laughter.] But we at all events pledge ourselves to this—if hon. Gentlemen opposite will give us reasonable time we will deal with this matter, even although it is not as I have shown, as urgent and as pressing, and we will deal with it in the same Session. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman says, "Oh, that is not enough for us. We are of a suspicious disposition. [Laughter.[We do not trust you." [Opposition cheers.] We never asked for your confidence. [Loud Ministerial cheers.] "No," says the right hon. Gentleman,

> "we must have assurances. We must see your Bill. Bring your Bill before us. Lay it on the table. Let us see what it is, and then you cannot conceive what success we will bring you, how we will rush through this Bill, what room we will make for the other legislation, for those social reforms which we are taunting you with not bringing forward."

I confess that nothing amuses me more than the different views which the right hon. Gentleman takes according to the quarter of the House in which he sits. [Ironical laughter.] Why, Sir, we are to bring forward this Bill which does not deal pari materia with the other; we are to bring it forward at the same time; produce it and show it. The right hon. Gentleman was, I think, in the Cabinet which brought forward the last Reform Bill. Does he remember the position which he and the Government of Mr. Gladstone took upon that occasion with regard to Redistribution and the Franchise? ["Hear, hear!"] He was challenged then to produce his Redistribution of Seats Bill before he went on with the Franchise Bill. He absolutely refused to do so, and why did he refuse? Because, he said, the Opposition of that day would use the Redistribution Bill to delay the Franchise Bill. He said, "We will get our Franchise Bill through and then we will produce the Redistribution Bill," and we say the same. [Cheers.] We well get our Voluntary Schools Bill through before we produce the other Bill; but when we produce our Board School Bill we will deal equally with it in this sense—where there is a necessitous Board School, and a necessitous Board School district, we will give it adequate assistance, and, having done that, we shall have done exactly the same for the Board School that we are now doing for the Voluntary School. I have only one word more to say before I sit down. I confess I looked forward to the right hon. Gentleman's speech with especial interest, for I expected an apologia from him on the subject of the inconsistency with which he has been charged. Sir, the consistency of the right hon. Gentleman is one of the priceless possessions of the House of Commons. [Laughter and long and continued Opposition ironical cheers.] I regret that the explanation he gave was not entirely satisfactory to my mind. He was challenged with saying that grants that go in relief of the rates were relief of the landlord.

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I said the relief under the Agricultural Rates Act was relief of the landlords.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Well, the right hon. Gentleman was charged with saying that the relief of the rates was relief of the landlord in the case of the Agricultural Rates Act. It is curious that the Agricultural Rates Bill dealt with all these rates, and it dealt with the very poor districts with which we are going to deal with in this Bill. It is a most singular thing that the right hon. Gentleman now endeavours to establish a difference between the position of the identical ratepayer in the case of the Agricultural Rates Bill and in the case of this Bill. He says that when a man receives, say, 6d. from the Agricultural Rates Bill it goes immediately through him into the pocket of the landlord; and when he receives 6d. out of this Bill it stops in his own pocket. [A laugh.] That is an explanation which I do not understand, and which to me explains nothing. [Laughter.] It appears to me that the argument is clear that the incidence of the rate must be the same in all cases, and if it goes into the pocket of the landlord in the case of the Agricultural Relief Bill, it goes into it equally in this case. Of course the right hon. Gentleman will say that I have made no special study of this subject. I imagine that knowledge on it is confined exclusively to the right hon. Gentleman and to my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty. [Laughter.] I am convinced of this—I could find many speeches of the right hon. Gentleman opposite in which he has again and again alluded to this view of his—that the rate falls ultimately not upon the occupier, but on the man behind him. And although it may be convenient for the purposes of argument, it is nevertheless extremely illogical to apply a different test to the two Bills. Sir, the moral of this Debate is this—that, although it may be lawful to learn from an enemy, it would be extremely unwise to take their advice. [Cheers and laughter.] We have our own course to pursue; we are governed by our own pledges—[cheers and counter-cheers]—and we shall proceed to carry them out. [Cheers.] We have brought in a Bill which will give effect to one pledge that appeared in the great majority of the addresses of our own party; which will save the Voluntary Schools from extinction, and bring aid, and adequate aid, where it is most needed. We know that this Bill is an effective way of securing that object, and we believe that, making all allowance for Parliamentary procedure, it is the quickest way. We are quite certain that we shall not hasten our procedure or improve the prospects of our policy by accepting the advise of the right hon. Gentleman and bringing in another Bill at the same time. [Loud cheers.]

*MR. JOHN McLEOD (Sutherland) on rising was received with loud cries of "Divide." After a vain effort to make himself heard, the hon. Member shouted out, "Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the Adjournment of the Debate." [Ministerial laughter and Opposition cheers.]

*MR. SPEAKER: I could not put that question. [Ministerial cheers.] At the same time, I hope the House will give a hearing to the hon. Gentleman. [Opposition cheers.]

*MR. McLEOD said he desired to call attention to a matter that was of very great, even of supreme, importance to the part of the country from which he came—namely, where Scotland came in in this matter. That question had not been answered during the Debate. On Monday evening the Chancellor of the Exchequer made an explanation to the effect that there was to be no equivalent grant to Scotland in regard to the grant from public funds to voluntary schools in England. On the following day a question was put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject by a supporter of the Government, and he then replied that whilst the Treasury did not admit that Scotland had a right to an equivalent grant they would be prepared to give fair aid to primary education. But primary education was already provided for in Scotland. ["Hear, hear!"] This meant getting no aid at all. The statement that Scotland was not entitled to an equivalent grant was entirely out with the facts. How the matter stood was laid down by the late Mr. Craig Sellar in his "Manual on the Education Acts." The hon. Gentleman then quoted from Mr. Sellar. It was perfectly clear therefore that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was entirely wrong in saying that the Treasury were never committed to an equivalent grant for education in Scotland; as a matter of fact in every single case where a grant in aid had been made to Scotland a portion had been devoted to educational purposes. It was impossible for a Scotch Member to be too early in taking exception to the dictum of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he made his protest against what he thought a most iniquitous proceeding on the part of the Government. [Interruptions which rendered the HON. MEMBER inaudible.] He did not pretend to be an educational authority or a financial expert, and English Members must settle the matter of giving aid to denominational schools with their constituents, but as a Scotch Member, he would feel himself unworthy of a seat in the House if he did not protest in the most emphatic manner against a proposal to do Scotland out of her equivalent grant. The House was aware that, in the financial relations between England, Scotland, and Ireland, Scotland was at a much greater disadvantage even than Ireland.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot enter upon the general question of the financial relations.

*MR. McLEOD regretted that he had trespassed. Still the point he wished to make was this, that in his humble judgment the House should show more than ordinary consideration in this matter, inasmuch as, according to general opinion, Scotland had been very hardly treated in other financial relations. [Loud cries of "Divide"] He again asserted the claim of Scotland for an equivalent grant for the aid of secondary education, and appealed in turn to the First Lord of the Treasury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Solicitor General, to make some statement before they asked even their own Scottish supporters to vote for a proposal which would extract money from the Scottish taxpayer without returning any equivalent.

Question put, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution:"—The House divided; Ayes, 283, Noes 99.

The announcement of the figures was received with loud Ministerial cheers. (Division List—No. 17—appended.)

AYES.

Abraham, William (Cork, N.E.)
Aird, John
Allhusen, Augustus Henry Eden
Allsopp, Hon. George
Arnold, Alfred
Arnold-Forster, Hugh O.
Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Ellis
Atkinson, Rt. Hon. John
Baden-Powell, Sir Geo. Smyth
Bagot, Capt. Joceline FitzRoy
Baillie, James E. B. (Inverness)
Balcarres, Lord
Baldwin, Alfred
Balfour, Rt. Hon. A. J. (Manch'r)
Balfour, Gerald William (Leeds)
Banbury, Frederick George
Barry, A. H. Smith- (Hunts.)
Bartley, George, C. T.
Bathurst, Hon. Allen Benjamin
Beach, Rt. Hn. Sir M. H. (Bristol)
Beckett, Ernest William
Bemrose, Henry Howe
Bentinck, Lord Henry C.
Bethell, Commander
Bhownaggree, M. M.
Bigwood, James
Bill, Charles
Bolitho, Thomas Bedford
Bond, Edward
Boscawen, Arthur Griffith-
Bowles, Capt. H. F. (Middlesex)
Brodrick, Rt. Hon. St. John
Brookfield, A. Montagu
Brown, Alexander H.
Bullard, Sir Harry
Butcher, John George
Campbell, James A.
Cavendish, R. F. (N. Lancs.)
Cavendish, V. C. W. (Derbyshire)
Cecil, Lord Hugh
Chaloner, Captain R. G. W.
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. J. (Bir.)
Chaplin, Rt. Hon. Henry
Charrington, Spencer
Chelsea, Viscount
Clare, Octavius Leigh
Clarke, Sir Edward (Plymouth)
Cochrane, Hon. Thos. H. A. E.
Coghill, Douglas Harry
Cohen, Benjamin Louis
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse
Colomb, Sir John Charles Ready
Colston, Chas. Edw. H. (Athole)
Compton, Lord Alwyne (Beds.)
Condon, Thomas Joseph
Cook, Fred. Lucas (Lambeth)
Cooke, C. W. Radcliffe (Heref'd)
Cox, Robert
Cranbourne, Viscount
Crean, Eugene
Cripps, Charles Alfred
Cross, Alexander (Glasgow)
Cross, Herb. Shepherd (Bolton)
Currie, Sir Donald
Curzon, Rt. Hn. G. N. (Lanc. S. W.)
Curzon, Viscount (Bucks)
Dalbiac, Major Philip Hugh
Dalrymple, Sir Charles
Dane, Richard M.
Darling, Charles John
Davenport, W. Bromley-
Digby, John K. D. Wingfield-
Dillon, John
Disraeli, Coningsby Ralph
Doogan, P. C.
Dorington, Sir John Edward
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Drage, Geoffrey
Drucker, A.
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Dyke, Rt. Hn. Sir William Hart
Edwards, Gen. Sir James Bevan
Egerton, Hon. A. de Tatton
Farrell, James P. (Cavan, W.)
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Fielden, Thomas
Finch, George H.
Finch-Hatton, Hon. Harold H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Fairbank, Joseph Thomas
Fisher, William Hayes
FitzGerald, Sir R. U. Penrose
Fitz Wygram, General Sir F.
Flannery, Fortescue
Fletcher, Sir Henry
Flower, Ernest
Folkestone, Viscount
Foster, Henry William
Foster, Colonel (Lancaster)
Foster, Harry S. (Suffolk)
Galloway, William Johnson
Garfit, William
Gedge, Sydney
Gibbs, Hn. A. G. H. (City of Lon.)
Gibbs, Hon. Vicary (St. Albans)
Gilhooly, James
Gilliat, John Saunders
Godson, Augustus Frederick
Goldsworthy, Major-General
Gordon, John Edward
Gorst, Rt. Hon. Sir John Eldon
Goschen, Rt. Hn. G. J. (St. G'rg's.)
Goschen, George J. (Sussex)
Goulding, Edward Alfred
Graham, Henry Robert
Gray, Ernest (West Ham)
Green, Walford D. (Wdnesbury)
Greville, Captain
Gull, Sir Cameron
Gunter, Colonel
Halsey, Thomas Frederick
Hamilton, Rt. Hon. Lord Geo.
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robert Wm.
Hardy, Laurence
Hare, Thomas Leigh
Havelock-Allan, General Sir H.
Heath, James
Helder, Augustus
Hermon-Hodge, Robert Trotter
Hickman, Sir Alfred
Hill, Rt. Hn. Lord Arthur (Down)
Hoare, Edw. Brodie (Hampstead)
Hoare, Samuel (Norwich)
Hobhouse, Henry
Hornby, William Henry
Holdsworth, Sir Wm. Henry
Howell, William Tudor
Hubbard, Hon. Evelyn
Hudson, George Bickersteth
Hunt, Sir Frederick Seager
Hutton, John (Yorks, N.R.)
Isaacson, Frederick Wootton
Jameson, Major J. Eustace
Jebb, Richard Claverhouse
Jeffreys, Arthur Frederick
Jessell, Captain Herbert Merton
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Johnstone, John H. (Sussex)
Jolliffe, Hon. H. George
Kemp, George
Kenny, William
Kenrick, William
Kenyon, James
Kenyon-Slaney, Col. William
Kilbride, Denis
King, Sir Henry Seymour
Knowles, Lees
Knox, Edmund Francis Vesey
Lafone, Alfred
Lawrence, Edwin (Cornwall)
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks)
Lea, Sir Thomas (Londonderry)
Lecky, William Edward H.
Lees, Sir Elliott (Birkenhead)
Llewelyn, Sir Dillwyn (Swansea)
Lockwood, Lt.-Col. A. R. (Essex)
Loder, Gerald Walter Erskine
Long, Col. Charles W. (Evesham)
Long, Rt. Hn. Walter (Liverpool)
Lorne, Marquess of
Lowles, John
Loyd, Archie Kirkman
Lucas-Shadwell, William
MacAleese, Daniel
Macartney, W. G. Ellison
Macdona, John Cumming
Maclean, James Mackenzie
Maclure, John William
M'Calmont, Maj.-Gn. (Ant'm. N)
M'Dermott, Patrick
M'Hugh, Patrick A. (Leitrim)
M'Killop, James
Malcolm, Ian

Martin, Richard Biddulph
Massey-Mainwaring, Hn. W.F.
Mellor, Colonel (Lancashire)
Milbank, Powlett Charles John
Miller, Sir Frederick George
Milward, Colonel Victor
Monckton, Edward Philip
Monk, Charles James
Montagu, Hon. J. Scott (Hants)
Moon, Edward Robert Pacy
More, Robert Jasper
Mount, William George
Murdoch, Charles Townshend
Murray, Rt. Hn. A. Graham (Bute)
Murray, Charles J. (Coventry)
Myers, William Henry
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Northcote, Hon. Sir H. Stafford
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
O'Brien, P. J. (Tipperary)
O'Connor, T. P. (Liverpool)
O'Malley, William
O'Niell, Hon. Robert Torrens
Orr-Ewing, Charles Lindsay
Parkes, Ebenezer
Pease, Arthur (Darlington)
Penn, John
Phillpotts, Captain Arthur
Pierpoint, Robert
Pinkerton, John
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Pollock, Harry Frederick
Powell, Sir Francis Sharp
Prettyman, Capt. Ernest George
Purvis, Robert

Rankin, James
Rasch, Major Frederic Carne
Renshaw, Charles Bine
Rentoul, James Alexander
Richardson, Thomas
Ridley, Rt. Hon. Sir Matthew W.
Ritchie, Rt. Hon. Chas. Thomson
Robertson, Herbert (Hackney)
Roche, Hon. James (East Kerry)
Roche, John (East Galway)
Round, James
Russell, Col. F. S. (Cheltenham)
Russell, Sir George (Berkshire)
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Rutherford, John
Samuel, Harry S. (Limehouse)
Saunderson, Col. Edw. James
Savory, Sir Joseph
Scobel, Sir Andrew Richard
Seely, Charles Hilton
Seton-Karr, Henry
Sharpe, William Edward T.
Sheehy, David
Sidebotham, J. W. (Cheshire)
Sidebottom, William (Derbysh.)
Sinclair, Louis (Romford)
Skewes-Cox, Thomas
Smith, Abel H. (Christchurch)
Smith, Hon. W. F. D. (Strand)
Stanley, Lord (Lancs.)
Stanley, Edw. Jas. (Somerset)
Stewart, Sir Mark J. M'Taggart
Stirling-Maxwell, Sir John M.
Stone, Sir Benjamin
Strauss, Arthur

Sturt, Hon. Humphry Napier
Sullivan, Donal (Westmeath)
Sutherland, Sir Thomas
Talbot, Lord E. (Chichester)
Talbot, John G. (Oxford. Univ.)
Taylor, Francis
Thornburn, Walter
Thornton, Percy M.
Tomlinson, Wm. Edw. Murray
Tritton, Charles Ernest
Valentia, Viscount
Vincent, Col. Sir C. E. Howard
Wanklyn, James Leslie
Warkworth, Lord
Warr, Augustus Frederick
Webster, Sir R. E. (Isle of Wight)
Welby, Lt.-Col. A. C. E.
Whiteley, George (Stockport)
Whiteley, H. (Ashton-under-L.)
Whitmore, Charles Algernon
Williams, Colonel R. (Dorset)
Williams, Joseph Powell-(Birm.)
Willoughby de Eresby, Lord
Willox, John Archibald
Wilson, J. W. (Worc'sh. N.)
Wodehouse, Edmond R. (Bath)
Wortley Rt. Hon. C. B. Stuart-
Wyndham-Quin, Major W. H.
Wyvill, Marmaduke D'Arcy
Younger, William

TELLERS FOR THE AYES, Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

NOES.

Acland, Rt. Hon. A. H. Dyke
Allen, Wm. (New.-under-Lyme)
Arch, Joseph
Asquith, Rt. Hn. Herbert Heny.
Atherley-Jones, L.
Austin, Sir John (Yorkshire)
Bayley, Thomas (Derbyshire)
Beaumont, Wentworth C. B.
Birrell, Augustine
Bolton, Thomas Dolling
Brigg, John
Broadhurst, Henry
Bryce, Right Hon. James
Buchanan, Thomas Ryburn
Burt, Thomas
Buxton, Sydney Charles
Caldwell, James
Cameron, Robert
Channing, Francis Allston
Colville, John
Davies, M. Vaughan-(Cardigan)
Davies, W. Rees- (Pembrokesh.)
Dilke, Rt. Hon. Sir Charles
Doughty, George
Dunn, Sir William
Ellis, John Edward (Notts.)
Evans, Samuel T. (Glamorgan)
Evans, Sir Francis H. (South'on)
Farquharson, Dr. Robert
Fenwick, Charles
Ferguson, R. C. Munro (Leith)
Foster, Sir Walter (Derby Co.)
Fowler, Rt. Hn. Sir Hnry. (Wol'n)
Gladstone, Rt. Hn. Herbert John
Goddard, Daniel Ford

Gourley, Sir Edward Temperley
Griffiths, Ellis J.
Haldane, Richard Burdon
Harcourt, Rt. Hon. Sir William
Harrison, Charles
Hayne, Rt. Hon. Charles Seale-
Hazell, Walter
Hedderwick, Thomas Chas. H.
Holburn, J. G.
Humphreys-Owen, Arthur C.
Hutton, Alfred E. (Morley)
Jacoby, James Alfred
Joicey, Sir James
Jones, William (Carnarvonsh.)
Kearley, Hudson E.
Kinloch, Sir John George Smyth
Lambert, George
Lawson, Sir Wilfrid (Cumb'land.)
Leng, Sir John
Lloyd-George, David
Lockwood, Sir Frank (York)
Logan, John William
Lough, Thomas
Luttrell, Hugh Fownes
Lyell, Sir Leonard
M'Ewan, William
M'Kenna, Reginald
M'Leod, John
Maden, John Henry
Morley, Charles (Breconshire)
Morley, Rt. Hn. John (Montrose)
Morton, Edward John Chalmers
Oldroyd, Mark
Paulton, James Mellor
Pease, Joseph A. (Northumb.)

Pease, Sir Joseph W. (Durham)
Perks, Robert William
Pickard, Benjamin
Pirie, Captain Duncan Vernon
Priestley, Briggs (Yorks.)
Provand, Andrew Dryburgh
Randell, David
Reckitt, Harold James
Rickett, J. Compton
Roberts John Bryn (Eifion)
Roberts, John H. (Denbighs.)
Robson, William Snowden
Samuel, J. (Stockton-on-Tees)
Scott, Charles Prestwich
Sinclair, Captain John (Forfar)
Spicer, Albert
Stanhope, Hon. Philip J.
Stevenson, Francis S.
Tennant, Harold John
Thomas, Abel (Carmarthen, E.)
Thomas, Alfred (Glamorgan, E.
Wallace, Robert (Perth)
Warner, Thomas Courtenay T.
Whittaker, Thomas Palmer
Williams, John Carvell (Notts.)
Wilson, Frederick W. (Norfolk)
Wilson, Henry J. (York, W.R.)
Woodall, William
Woods, Samuel

TELLERS FOR THE NOES, Mr Thomas Ellis and Mr. R. K. Causton.

MR. SPEAKER: Who will prepare and bring in the Bill?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir John Gorst, the Solicitor-General, and myself.

Bill to provide for a Grant out of the Exchequer in aid of Voluntary Elementary Schools, and for the exemption from rates of those schools, and to repeal part of Section 19 of The Elementary Education Act 1876; presented accordingly, amid renewed Ministerial cheers, and Read the First time; to be Read the Second time upon Thursday next, and to be printed—[Bill 119.]

MILITARY WORKS (MONEY) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Tomorrow.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Tomorrow.

BERRIEW SCHOOL BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Tomorrow.

MILITARY LANDS ACT (1892) AMENDMENT BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Tomorrow.

LAW OF EVIDENCE (CRIMINAL CASES) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

SHOP ASSISTANTS (HALF-HOLIDAY) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Tomorrow.

MOTION.

WORKING MEN'S DWELLINGS (NO. 2).

Bill to facilitate the acquisition by Working Men of their own Dwellings, ordered to be brought in by Sir Alfred Hickman, Sir Howard Vincent, Mr. Heath, Mr. Ernest Spencer, and Mr. Galloway; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday, 5th May, and to be printed—[Bill 120].

PUBLIC PETITIONS.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed, to whom shall be referred all Petitions presented to the House, with the exception of such as relate to Private Bills; and that such Committee do classify and prepare abstracts of the same, in such form and manner as shall appear to them best suited to convey to the House all requisite information respecting their contents, and do report the same from time to time to the House; and that the reports of the Committee do set forth the number of signatures to each Petition only in respect to those signatures to which addresses are affixed; and that such Committee have power to direct the printing in extenso of such Petitions, or of such parts of Petitions as shall appear to require it; and that such Committee have power to report their opinion and observations thereupon to the House.

The Committee was accordingly nominated of—Mr. Biddulph, Major Brymer, Colonel Cotton-Jodrell, Sir Thomas Carmichael, Sir Charles Dalrymple, Mr. George Doughty, Dr. Fox, Colonel Kenyon-Slaney, Mr. Herbert Lewis, Sir Henry Meysey-Thompson, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. W. F. D. Smith, Mr. Tollemache, and Mr. Henry J. Wilson.

Ordered, that Three be the quorum—(Sir Charles Dalrymple).

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, 5th February 1897.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

The Lords following, namely,

E. Chesterfield,
E. Waldegrave,
V. Oxenbridge,
L. Colville of Culross,

with the Chairman of Committees, were appointed a Committee to select and propose to the House the names of the Five Lords to form a Select Committee for the Consideration of each opposed Private Bill.

POST OFFICE CONSOLIDATION BILL [H.L.].

Read 2ª (according to Order).

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ELECTIONS) BILL.

Second Reading (which stands appointed for Monday next), put off to Tuesday next.

House adjourned at Twenty-five minutes before Five o'clock, to Monday next, a Quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 5th February 1897.

NEW WRIT.

For the County of Surrey (Chertsey Division), v. Charles Harvey Combe, esquire, Chiltern Hundreds.—(Sir William Walrond.)

BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA.

Special Report from the Select Committee brought up, and read by the Clerk Assistant (Mr. Archibald Milman) as followeth:—

The Select Committee on British South Africa have agreed to the following Resolutions:—

"(i.) That any persons or body deeming themselves interested, who wish to appear by Counsel, shall make application in writing to the Clerk on or before Tuesday next, stating the grounds upon which they desire to appear;

"(ii.) That the Committee propose retaining the conduct of the inquiry referred to them entirely in their own hands, but will accept the assistance of Counsel when they think it necessary;

"(iii.) That all Witnesses, except as hereinafter mentioned, will be called and examined by the Committee;

"(iv.) That if the evidence of any Witness shall affect the interests of any person or body represented by Counsel, application may be made to the Committee for leave to cross-examine such Witness;

"(v.) That if it be desired to call any Witness not examined by the Committee, Counsel must apply for permission to call such Witness, who will be examined as the Committee may think fit;

"(vi.) That the extent to which Counsel may address the Committee will be determined at a later stage of the Inquiry."

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.—[No. 64.]

QUESTIONS.

BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (IRELAND).

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is proposed to establish the Agricultural Board for Ireland in conjunction with other Dublin Castle Departments, or as a separate and independent Board responsible directly to Parliament?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): Pending the introduction of the Bill dealing with the establishment of an Irish Board of Agriculture, I cannot make any statement as to the provisions or scope of the Measure.

POSTAL FACILITIES (COUNTY LONGFORD).

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether a memorial has been received from the inhabitants of the parish of Clonbroney, county Longford, signed by several magistrates, clergymen, &c., asking the post office authorities to establish a sub-office at the house of James Donnelly, Moateferrall; and whether, as more than 30 letters per day have for years been left at this man's house the prayer of the memorial will be granted?

The SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. R. W. Hanbury, Preston): A memorial has been received asking for the establishment of a post office at Moateferrall. The matter is being inquired into, and the result shall be communicated to the hon. Member.

EVICTION (COUNTY LEITRIM).

Mr. PATRICK M'HUGH (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he is aware that Andrew M'Sharry, farmer, of Dargoon, Drumkeeran, county Leitrim, was evicted from his holding on 5th May last, although he offered two years' rent and costs in settlement of the landlord's claim, which offer was refused by the receiver, Mr. Hewson; (2) is he aware that M'Sharry is suffering from bodily infirmity, and that a collection was raised by his neighbours to enable him to make the offer referred to, and that since the eviction the receiver, Mr. Hewson, has let a portion of M'Sharry's holding to a man named Felix Magourty; and (3) whether it is within the competence of the Land Judge's Court to restrain the receiver from pressing the landlord's claim to the extreme limits of the law in a case of such hardship, and where an offer now recognised as fair was made by the tenant?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The fact is as stated in the first paragraph. I cannot say whether a collection was made for M'Sharry. The receiver reports that the alleged offer of two years' rent and costs was not made to him, nor does it appear that M'Sharry is suffering from bodily infirmity. The proceedings by the receiver must have been undertaken by direction of the Land Judge, who has power to approve of any settlement that the tenant may be willing to make.

QUARANTINE.

Sir WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will state the circumstances under which prolonged quarantine was imposed at Durban on the steamships Courland and Naderi, which recently arrived from Bombay with clean bills of health; whether he is aware that the agents of the steamers protested against such quarantine as illegal; that a riotous demonstration took place to induce certain passengers to return to India, and that these passengers when landing were attacked and threatened with lynching; and whether he will state what steps have been taken to prevent the recurrence of such incidents?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Mr. J. Chamberlain, Birmingham, W.): The Courland and Naderi having arrived at Durban from Bombay, a port infected with plague, were placed in quarantine, and I have no reason to believe that there was any irregularity in the manner in which the quarantine law was enforced. I am not aware whether the ships' agent protested against the quarantine. Upon the arrival of these ships considerable excitement existed at Durban, and meetings were held to protest against the passengers by these ships being allowed to land and to organise a demonstration to prevent their landing. On the day when the ships came into harbour about 5,000 persons assembled and threatened to forcibly prevent the landing, but the authorities induced them to disperse and the landing took place without opposition, except in the case of one person, who was assaulted but not seriously hurt. This incident did not take place at the ordinary landing-place. I have no reason to doubt that the Natal Government will take all possible precautions to prevent any violation of the law should any other ships arrive from Bombay.

Sir W. WEDDERBURN asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he could assure the House that there was no reason to think that the responsible authorities of Natal had in any way countenanced the popular movement against the Indian immigrants, and that they would make it clear that the Indian immigrants were entitled to protection like any others of Her Majesty's subjects?

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not think that is really a proper question to put. The hon. Member is catechising me with regard to the intentions and motives of the Government of a self-governing colony. I have no doubt the Natal Government will do all it ought to do; at the same time, I am not responsible for them. ["Hear, hear."]

Sir WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to two telegrams (1) from Gibraltar to the effect that vessels from India will not get pratique there, and will not be allowed to land passengers or goods; mails and specie will be landed in quarantine, and coals and provisions supplied in quarantine; and (2) from Malta that from 6th February inclusive, vessels from India, having no cases of plague or suspected cases of plague on board, will communicate with Commino Island, where passengers can be landed to undergo 21 days' quarantine, their clothes and linen being disinfected, such vessels will coal at Comingott's Islet; and, whether he will communicate with these Crown Colonies with a view to the adoption of more scientific and convenient measures for the protection of public health, and also with the view to prevent an example being set by the Crown Colonies to Foreign Governments calculated to encourage the imposition of restrictions on British commerce?

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: My attention has been called to the quarantine orders in Gibraltar and Malta referred to in the Question. The Governor of Gibraltar informs me that the stringent regulation adopted there is necessary to prevent quarantine being enforced by Spain against Gibraltar, which would put a stop to the Admiralty work on the harbour. As regards Malta I may refer the hon. Member to my answer to his Question on January 26. I am glad to say that the Colonial Government have to some extent relaxed the stringency of the measures at first adopted, and I trust that, although they are placed in a position of some difficulty by the very strong feeling of the inhabitants of all classes in favour of the antiquated system of strict quarantine, they may be induced by degrees to adopt more enlightened methods of protecting the public health.

FACTORIES AND WORKSHOPS ACT (PARTICULARS SECTION).

Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what trades have, since his reply to a question last Session, applied for the extension of Sub-section 6 of Section 40 (the particulars section) of the Factories and Workshops Act of 1895; and, whether any further extension of the sub-section by order has taken place?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir Matthew White Ridley, Lancashire, Blackpool): Since my reply to the question asked by my right hon. Friend last June, applications for the extension of this section have been received from the handkerchief and apron makers, the felt-hat makers, the nail and chain makers, and the lock and key makers. In the first of these cases, I have decided to make an order extending the section. The draft has been prepared and will be published immediately. In the other three cases inquiries are still pending.

ROAD CONTRACTS (COUNTY LEITRIM).

Mr. PATRICK M'HUGH: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) if he is aware that Mr. Wilton Waugh, a grand juror of the county of Leitrim, is interested in road contracts in that county; and (2) is it in accordance with the law that a grand juror should be pecuniarily interested in a contract which he has a voice in granting?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I am informed by the secretary to the grand jury that the gentleman named in the Question is not in any way pecuniarily interested in road or other contracts in the county of Leitrim, the expenses of which are payable out of county cess. The reply to the second paragraph is in the negative.

LANE-FOX ESTATE (COUNTY LEITRIM).

Mr. PATRICK M'HUGH: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that processes for rent due on the Lane-Fox Estate, in the county of Leitrim, are accustomed to be filled up by clerks in the rent office at Dromahaig, and that legal expenses for such processes have been charged against, and paid by, the tenants; whether he is aware that such a practice is a violation of the rules and regulations of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland; and will he direct the attention of that body to the system carried on in the rent office referred to?

*The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. J. Atkinson, Londonderry, N.): The practice in the office named is, I believe, as stated in the Question, but I am not sufficiently informed of the facts to enable me to form an opinion whether there is anything illegal in the demand made for costs, which are much less in amount than those receivable if a solicitor were employed. If there be, the tenants have a remedy against the landlord or his clerk. I am not aware whether the practice is a violation of the rules of the Incorporated Law Society, but if it be that body is quite able to take care of its own interests.

Mr. PATRICK M'HUGH: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what is the remedy of the tenants?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND: To sue for the recovery of the costs:

Mr. J. C. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the County Court judge of Limerick has not had cases of this kind, and—

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order; notice must be given of that Question.

CASTLEPOLLARD PETTY SESSIONS.

Mr. RICHARD M. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Thomas Culligan was recently brought under arrest before a court of petty sessions held at Castlepollard, county Westmeath, presided over by three local justices, charged by the constabulary with the larceny of two calves, also with having the same unlawfully in his possession, and there being no evidence against him, and the owner of the cattle having sworn that the prisoner was a well-known and respectable cattle dealer, and that, having inquired into the matter he believed him to be not guilty of either having stolen them or of having received them knowing them to be stolen, the justices refused to hear the solicitor who represented the accused or the evidence tendered by him, but insisted upon the prisoner giving an undertaking not to take any proceedings against the prosecutor as a condition precedent to refusing informations; and that, upon the prisoner declining to give such, the said justices returned him for trial to quarter sessions at Mullingar, where, after being put to great expense and inconvenience preparing for trial, he was discharged, the county court judge and justices being of opinion there was no case whatsoever against him; whether a resident magistrate will be directed to attend the Castlepollard petty sessions in future; and, whether any means exists of recouping Mr. Culligan the serious expense he has incurred?

*Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The evidence proved against Culligan, was that the cattle had belonged to John Sullivan, that they had been stolen from him, and that a few days afterwards they were found in the possession of Culligan. What Sullivan stated was that he did not believe that Culligan would steal the cattle. The justices did not refuse to hear the solicitor for accused, as alleged, nor is it true that they insisted upon the prisoner giving an undertaking to the effect stated. The jury found that the cattle belonged to Sullivan, but acquitted the accused. The Crown cannot recoup Mr. Culligan the expenses incurred by him in this case. It is the duty of a resident magistrate to attend, so far as his time admits, all petty sessions in his district. The resident magistrate in whose district Castlepollard is situated was on leave of absence when this case was heard at petty sessions, and his locum tenens was employed elsewhere on the occasion.

FAIR RENT AGREEMENTS (IRELAND.)

MR. DANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he is aware that the Irish Land Commission refuse to receive and file agreements entered into between landlords and tenants fixing a fair rent for a second statutory term where such agreements have been executed before the expiration of the first statutory term; and (2) whether, in view of the desirability of facilating amicable arrangements between these two classes, he can do anything in the matter?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: There is no foundation for the suggestion in the first paragraph. Under Sub-section (6) of Section 8 of the Land Law Act of 1881 such agreements may be entered into during the last 12 months of a statuory term, and the Land Commission have always received agreements fixing a fair rent for a second statutory term which appeared to have been executed during the last 12 months of the first statutory term or after its expiration.

SANITARY ACCOMMODATION (CLONES, COUNTY MONAGHAN.)

MR. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if he is aware that a large proportion of the dwelling-houses in the town of Clones, in county Monaghan, are deficient in ordinary sanitary arrangements and accommodation, and generally unfit for human habitation; and will he send an inspector of the Local Government Board to investigate and report upon this matter, so that in the not unlikely event of the town being visited by an epidemic the officers of health may have a chance of successfully combating the disease?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The Local Government Board have received no complaints in this matter, but they have instructed their Medical Inspector to visit Clones and report to them as to the general sanitary condition of the town.

AMALGAMATION OF POOR LAW UNIONS (IRELAND).

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when he proposes to introduce the Bill dealing with Amalgamation of Poor Law Unions in Ireland; has any commission yet been appointed to consider the subject, and has it made any report; and would he explain the cause of delay?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I hope to be able to introduce this Bill without undue delay, but cannot at present fix the exact date of its introduction. No commission has yet been appointed.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that that is the same answer he gave twice last Session?

SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION (LETTERGULLEN COUNTY LONGFORD).

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state whether the Board of National Education have yet decided to erect a new school at Lettergullen, County Longford, in response to an appeal made for increased school accommodation in 1895; whether he is aware that, in consequence of the bad roads and the poverty of the district, numbers of children are at present unable to obtain instruction except that imparted at a night school, and that 94 families are affected by this want; and, if he will request the Board of Education to make a grant for the school in the usual way?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The case of the school to which this question refers was very fully explained by me in answer to a Question put by the hon. Member on the 12th June last. There is no evidence that a new school is required in the locality, four vested school houses having been already established there, with building grants from the Commissioners, and the distances of these schools varies from two-and-a-half to three miles only.

LABOURERS' ACTS (COUNTY LONGFORD).

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Local Government Board purpose enforcing their compulsory powers, under the recent Acts of Parliament, to provide proper house accommodation for William M'Donnell, of Caldragh Electoral Division, in the Union of Longford, who has been over ten years striving to get a labourer's cottage built for himself and family.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The Local Government Board have not received any application from the person named in the Question since the beginning of 1895. It appeared on communication with the Guardians, that he was then in possession of a substantial house in a state of good repair.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL asked whether it was absolutely necessary to have the advice of the Local Government Board to secure redress?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: That I am unable to say. If he applies to the Local Government Board, no doubt the case will be enquired into.

CHARGE OF LARCENY (COUNTY CORK).

Mr. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the arrest of a water bailiff named Sweeny, residing near Banteer, county Cork, on the charge of larceny of a watch; is he aware that the accused was discharged without bail, and an order made that he should be summoned; and, what explanation have the local constabulary authorities to offer why the accused has not been so summoned?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: In this case I am informed that Sweeny upon whom the watch was found, was taken before a Magistrate who discharged him without bail and stated that the owner should take such proceedings as she was advised. The owner refused, however, to take action, and the District Inspector of Constabulary then brought the case before the Magistrates at Kanturk Petty Sessions on the 23rd of January who referred the District Inspector to the Justice before whom the case had been originally brought. The latter did not however, consider the case strong enough for the police to prosecute, as there was no evidence that Sweeny had committed a larceny of the watch, which has been returned to the owner.

ENNISKILLEN FUSILIERS (ENLISTMENT).

Mr. JOHN HAMMOND (Carlow): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War with respect to the case of John Joseph Reilly, a private in the Enniskillen Fusiliers, now stationed at Omagh, who enlisted on 12th January last, and is under the regulation age, being only 16 years old on 28th December last, will he authorise his discharge from the Army, seeing that he is anxious to return to his home to enter upon his father's trade?

*The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Mr. Powell-Williams, Birmingham S.): The youth referred to appears to have been enlisted when under 17 years of age, but he stated his age as over 18 and had all the physical characteristics of that age. No difficulty would be made as to his discharge, but he strongly objects to that course and refuses to return home to his father.

SEED RATE (IRELAND).

Mr. E. CREAN (Queen's Co., Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a resolution from the Mountmellick Board of Guardians requesting the Board of Works to extend the time for repayment of the seed rate for one year in consequence of the low prices for every description of farm produce; and, whether he will advise the Local Government Board to meet the views of the Guardians in the matter?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: A copy of the resolution in question has been received. The rate to provide for payment of the second instalment of the loan advanced to the Guardians, which amounts to £510 12s. 6d., was assessed on the 19th September last, and as payment of this instalment is not due until the 1st August next, ten months were allowed to the Guardians to collect the rate. There is a balance at present to the credit of the Union of £2,134, and there seems to be no reason why the instalment referred to should not be paid when it becomes due in August.

INLAND MONEY ORDERS.

Mr. H. C. F. LUTTRELL (Devon, Tavistock): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that by the Post Office Official Circular issued on 19th January 1897, under which the charges for ordinary inland money orders for sums not exceeding £1 have been raised from 2d. to 3d., not only causes inconvenience but is open to evasion by the use of postal orders and stamps at a less cost than 3d.; and, whether, if this be the case, he will take steps to secure the rate of commission to what it had been previous to the issue of the Official Circular of 19th January 1897?

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster-General is obliged to the hon. Member for giving him this opportunity of explaining the reasons for the alterations in the money order rates prescribed by the new regulations laid upon the Table of the House on the 27th ult. It was found after careful inquiry that the cost to the State of issuing any money order was not less than 3d., and this conclusion, arrived at after independent inquiry, was in accord with the conclusions of a committee of officials and bankers which sat under the presidency of Mr. George Moore, a well-known merchant, in 1876, and whose report was presented to Parliament at the time. It followed, therefore, as the service had not been conducted at a loss, the remitters of large sums must have been taxed for the assistance of the remitters of small sums. This appeared to the Postmaster-General to be both unjust and unnecessary because Parliament had provided a cheap and convenient means of remitting small sums by postal orders. He cannot, however, regard the use of a postal order as in any sense an evasion of the Money Order Regulations.

MR. LUTTRELL asked, was it not the case that this tended to restrict the use of money orders?

MR. HANBURY said that might be so, but it did not matter to the Post Office. The same difficulty arose under the lower scale, it was quite possible to pay less for a postal order than for a money order.

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENTS.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, having regard to his reply to a question put by the hon. Member for South Islington previous to the Recess, to the effect that the Report of Lord Tweedmouth's Post Office Committee would be laid before Parliament, when such is likely to be the case?

MR. HANBURY: I have already answered similar questions. The Report is involving the consideration of many details, and I do not think it can be presented within a fortnight, at any rate.

ADVANCE TO THE EGYPTIAN GOVERNMENT.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether representations have been made by the French and Russian diplomatic agents at Cairo to the Egyptian Government on the subject of the advance of £500,000 from the British Exchequer; and, if so, what was the effect of those representions?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): We understand that official letters have been addressed by the French and Russian Consuls General at Cairo to the Egyptian Government inquiring whether the latter have requested or will accept pecuniary assistance from England, and expressing the opinion that under the terms of previous Decrees such application should be made through the Caisse de la Dette to all the Powers. These letters have not been communicated by either Power to Her Majesty's Government.

MR. MORLEY: Do I understand that Her Majesty's Government are not aware whether an answer has been given?

*MR. CURZON: No, I believe no answer has yet been returned.

RAILWAY EXTENSION (IRELAND).

MR. J. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if Galway county is to be included in the Irish Railway extension scheme of the Government; and, if so, what is to be opened up?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: As already explained, I cannot at present make any announcement on the subject, though I may say that negotiations are in progress relative to various schemes.

INDIAN FAMINE.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will state the number of deaths from famine officially recorded during the last great famine; whether he will explain according to what test a death was then recorded as caused by famine, and state how many deaths from famine, judged by the same test, have been reported to him during the present famine; and whether he will each week lay upon the Table of the House a statement showing the number of such deaths, if any, in each province?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The estimated abnormal mortality and loss of population (including decrease of births) caused by the famine in 1877-78 was calculated by the Famine Commission to be about 5,850,000. I need not remind the House that any estimate of this kind must necessarily be regarded as approximate only. This particular estimate was arrived at partly by test censuses in typical areas, and partly by a comparison of the number of births and deaths which occurred in given areas during the famine with the normal number of births and deaths for the same areas and for similar periods. The Government of India have been asked to furnish periodical reports of any abnormal mortality which may occur in any part of the present famine area. These reports will be included in the further papers which I propose to lay on the Table at intervals of six weeks so long as the famine lasts. I am afraid that it is impossible for me to undertake more than this.

EXPERIMENTS ON LIVING ANIMALS.

MR. J. G. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretray of State for the Home Department (1) whether the two men stated in the report of the inspector to have been guilty of irregularities as licensed vivisectors are now in the possession of licences enabling them to perform experiments on the bodies of living animals without anæsthetics, and without being obliged to put the animals to death after the operation; (2) what was the nature of the operation performed by one of these vivisectors before he had obtained a licence; to what penalties did he expose himself by his conduct, and why were not proceedings instituted against him; why were the names of the two vivisectors not published in the report; and (3) will the Home Secretary now declare the names of these persons?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): Both the gentlemen referred to now hold licences, one of them with the addition of certificates which enable him to perform experiments without anæsthetics, the other with the addition of certificates which dispense with the obligation of killing the animal after the effect of the anæsthetic has passed off. As regards the second paragraph of the question, both gentlemen held licences at the time of performing the experiments, but had omitted to obtain the certificates which were also necessary under the Act. The experiments were such as would be allowed, and, in fact, have been allowed to be performed by properly qualified persons, and both gentlemen had previously held the certificates which in the cases in question they had omitted to obtain. The penalties are those provided by the Act of 1876, namely, fine for a first offence, fine or imprisonment for subsequent offences. The irregularities were committed before I came to the Home Office, but I see no reason for dissenting from the opinion of my predecessor, that in the particular circumstances the withholding of the licence for a time, and the warning given were sufficient punishment. It was decided on the same ground not to publish the names, and I am not prepared to do so now.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS (BUILDING GRANTS).

MR. ALFRED HUTTON (York, W.R. Morley): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he will grant the Return relating to building grants to public elementary schools which stands on this day's Paper?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University) said he would arrange with the hon. Member as to the form in which the Return could be given.

IMPORTATION OF DRUGS (CEYLON).

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any, and what, steps have recently been taken to restrict the use of hemp drugs and opium in Ceylon; and, whether there are any Papers on the subject which could be presented to Parliament?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The Ceylon Government have recently decided, with my approval, to prohibit the importation of hemp drugs in Ceylon and to raise the import duty on opium from one rupee to two rupees per pound.

MR. H. J. WILSON asked if any Papers would be presented on the subject?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN said he thought the fact of the decision would be sufficient, and that it was not worth while to publish Papers.

ASSOCIATIONS OF WORKMEN (CONTRACTS).

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when Mr. Schloss's Report on Contracts given out by Public Authorities to Associations of Workmen, which was presented in August last, will be issued to Members?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon): I am informed that the Report in question will be issued on Monday next.

POOR LAW SCHOOLS (METROPOLIS).

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can now make any statement as to the result of the communications which in July last he stated were proceeding between the Local Government Board and the Education Department respecting the transfer to the latter Department of the duty of inspecting the education in Poor Law Schools?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): No arrangement for the suggested transfer has as yet been made. The Local Government Board have not filled up the vacancy which has occurred in the office of school inspector for the Metropolitan District; and temporary arrangements until the end of the financial year have been made, pending a final decision on the subject.

MR. PICKERSGILL asked if communications were still proceeding between the Education Department and the Local Government Board.

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether, before he included in his draft order respecting Metropolitan Poor Law Schools children who are remanded to the workhouse by justices, previously to being sent to Industrial School, under Section 19 of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, he was advised that such children are "Poor," within the meaning of the Metropolitan Poor Act, 1867?

MR. CHAPLIN: The children who are temporarily detained in workhouses, under remand by magistrates, prior to being sent to Industrial Schools, are placed under the charge of the guardians, and whilst they are under their care are maintained at the cost of the rates. I am advised that they are children to whom the provisions of the Metropolitan Poor Act 1867 would apply.

HOUSE OF COMMONS (SALE OF INTOXICANTS).

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I beg to ask the noble Lord the Member for the Westhoughton Division of Lancashire (1) whether the Kitchen Committee have decided to ask the Attorney General to draft a Bill dealing with the illegal sale of liquors at the House of Commons bars; and (2) if so, when the Bill will be introduced?

LORD STANLEY (Lancashire, Westhoughton): The answer to the first part of the hon. Member's question is "Yes"; and the answer to the second part is, "As soon as possible."

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: May I ask the Leader of the House if he will let us have facilities for discussing this Bill?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think I must wait and see.

QUEEN'S REIGN (GIFTS OF REAL PROPERTY).

Sir JOHN BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consider the advisability of introducing a Bill to extend the powers of limited owners to make gifts of real property for purposes of public education and recreation in furtherance of the National desire worthily to commemorate Her Majesty's long reign?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: However excellent the object which the hon. Gentleman has in view, I could not advise the House to embark upon the discussion of all the interesting and intricate questions that would be raised by such a legislative proposal.

QUEEN'S REIGN (TREASON-FELONY PRISONERS).

Mr. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether Her Majesty's Government will advise Her Majesty the Queen, following the precedent of the Czar of Russia on the occasion of his coronation, to signalise the commemoration of the sixtieth anniversary of Her Majesty's accession to the throne by a liberal exercise of prerogative of pardon in the case of prisoners, more especially of prisoners convicted under the Treason-felony Act?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: If my memory serves me aright, I answered a Question from the hon. Member similar to this a few days ago, and I have nothing to add.

Mr. MACNEILL; No; that was quite distinct.

NECESSITOUS BOARD SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND).

Mr. J. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in any Measure which the Government may bring in for giving relief to necessitous Board Schools in England, the Government will introduce the principle, which is of universal application in Scotland, of levying the school rate one half upon the owner and the other half upon the occupier?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: The statement of the law as it obtains in Scotland is, of course, perfectly accurate; but I do not think the occasion for relieving poor Board Schools offers a particularly relevant opportunity for making the change in England even if that change were recognised in the House as in itself desirable.

MOTIONS.

REGISTRATION OF PARLIAMENTARY VOTERS.

Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Registration of Voters for Parliamentary Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brigg, Sir John Leng, Sir Albert Rollit, Sir Walter Foster, Mr. George Whiteley, Mr. Strachey, and Mr. Whittaker; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Thursday, 4th March, and to be printed.—[Bill 121.]

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT.

Bill to amend the Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Seton-Karr, Mr. Tomlinson, and Mr. Dane; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Tuesday, 2nd March, and to be printed.—[Bill 122.]

SMALLER DWELLINGS (SCOTLAND).

Bill to amend the Law in reference to the system of House Letting in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Alexander Cross, Sir John Stirling-Maxwell, Sir William Arrol, Mr. John Wilson (Govan), Colonel Denny, Mr. Faithfull Begg, and Mr. T. P. O'Connor; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Friday, 5th March, and to be printed.—[Bill 123.]

REGISTRATION OF FIRMS.

Bill for the Registration of Firms, ordered to be brought in by Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir John Leng, Mr. Rankin, and Mr. Philip Stanhope; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday, 17th March, and to be printed.—[Bill 124.]

NEW WRIT.

For the Borough of Glasgow (Bridgeton Division) v. Sir George Otto Trevelyan, baronet, Manor of Northstead.—(Mr. Thomas Ellis.)

SUPPLY (POINT OF ORDER).

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) desired the Speaker's ruling on a point of Order, involving, as he thought, a matter of some importance. On the Order Paper for the day appeared the notice:—

> "Army Estimate, 1896-97 (Suakim Expedition). Supplementary Estimates in the name of the Under Secretary for War."

In the memorandum circulated by command there appeared—

> "Statement of further amount required during the year to meet expenditure not provided for in the original Army Estimates for Suakim Expedition."

In the preceding notice they had under the heading "Civil Services, 1896-97," "Egyptian Expedition (Grant in Aid)." But when he referred to the memorandum which had been equally circulated among Members of the House, he found that this notice was either redundant or misleading. It was a notice regarding the Civil Service Estimates of 1897, but in the memorandum there was not a word as to the Civil Service Estimates of 1897, and, instead of following the example he had quoted with regard to the Supplementary Estimate, when they came to this memorandum they found no reference whatever to any Estimate of the current year at all. It was headed,

> "Estimate of the amount required in the year ending 31st March 1897, as a grant in aid of the expenditure incurred in connection with the Egyptian Expedition to Dongola."

In the Vote in which this sum was accounted for they had no mention of a Civil Service Estimate, but there was an entirely new heading—namely, the heading of "Egyptian Government, £798,802." His first position was that this £798,802 did not even claim to be part of the Estimates of last year or in any way supplemental to those Estimates. It was an entirely new Estimate under an entirely new head. It was not an Army, a Navy, or Civil Service Estimate; it was an Egyptian Government Estimate. He begged respectfully to call attention to the fact that under Standing Order 56 the Speaker was held to have left the Chair on the Estimates for 1896-97, and consequently when a Supplementary Estimate or excess vote came on, Mr. Speaker left the Chair automatically, but his submission was this was not a Supplemental Estimate. It was supplemental to nothing. It was an entirely new kind of Estimate not known before, which was presented to the House for the first time, and consequently it came under the rule relating to a new sum, and before Mr. Speaker could leave the chair it would be necessary to make a Motion to that effect, which would be liable to amendment and debate. His submission was that, although Mr. Speaker was out of the Chair with regard to matters belonging to and growing out of the Estimates of 1896-97, this was not part of those Estimates, and did not claim to be part. It was an Estimate under an entirely new head, and consequently, before going into this matter, a Motion must be made that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman has taken two objections. The first is as to the description of the Vote on the Paper. The Vote is, in fact, a Vote for the service of the year ending 31st March 1897, supplemental or additional to those Votes which have been already dealt with for that year, and that it is so sufficiently appears on the Paper. I think there is no doubt that if this, instead of being an additional Estimate, formed part of the original Estimates, it would appear upon the Civil Service Estimates. As regards the suggestion that it is a new matter altogether, and should be dealt with as a separate and original, and not supplemental, Vote, plenty of cases are to be found in which additional Estimates of this kind have been voted by the House upon notices similar to this. In March 1895 there was a grant in aid for Cyprus—a matter upon which there had been no previous opportunity of discussion upon the Estimates. That was brought on in March as an additional Estimate just as this is brought on here. Therefore, as regards that part of the hon. Member's contention the matter is perfectly in order. ["Hear, hear!"] As regards the other point, that there should be a Motion that I now leave the Chair, with opportunity for Debate before I leave the Chair, I think that objection also is groundless. The Standing Order 56, to which the hon. Member refers, expressly says that,

> "Whenever Committee of Supply stands as an Order of the Day on Monday or Thursday," or now, under the Sessional Order, on Friday, "Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without question put." To-day, Committee of Supply is an Order of the Day, and therefore Standing Order compels me to leave the Chair without question put. The invariable practice has been, that when the Motion has been carried that "Mr. Speaker now leave the Chair" upon first going into the Estimates, any additional or supplementary Vote in Committee of Supply afterwards for a further expenditure in that year, is put to the Committee without the question being put that I leave the Chair. Therefore I think the notice and procedure are quite in order, and I shall now leave the Chair without putting any question.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Considered in Committee.

[The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, in the Chair.]

CIVIL SERVICES, 1896-7.

EGYPTIAN EXPEDITION.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed:—

> "That a sum, not exceeding £798,802, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for a Grant in Aid of the Expenditure incurred in connection with the Egyptian Expedition to Dongola."

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.), who was received with Ministerial cheers, said: Before I state to the Committee the reasons which have induced Her Majesty's Government to make the proposal which has been read from the Chair, I should like to inform the Committee what is the actual cost of what may be properly called the Egyptian expedition to Dongola. I do not include in that cost the sum of £145,000 which, as the Committee will see, stands in a subsequent Estimate for garrisoning Suakim and neighbouring places by the Indian troops. That is an item which has nothing to do with the Egyptian Government, except, of course, that the services which the Indian troops were thus able to render were of very great importance and usefulness to the Egyptian Government in successfully carrying on the Dongola campaign. ["Hear, hear!"] But I think the Committee will feel that under any circumstances it would not have been right for us to have imposed that expenditure upon the Government of Egypt. [Cheers.] Therefore it is proposed now as a separate Vote altogether, and has no reference to the expenditure which I am about to explain to the Committee. The cost of the expedition, properly so called, was £733,000. That included the extension of the railway and telegraph from Sarras to Abu Fatmeh, on the way to Dongola, of £185,000 and also the cost of the gunboats purchased for the purposes of the expedition. I need not remind the Committee that both these items are, so to speak, still to the good and will render valuable service in the future. ["Hear, hear!"] They altogether form nearly one-third of the total cost of the expedition. The cost of the expedition in another and more important way was, I think, equally small when compared with the results achieved. No more out of the whole Egyptian force than 47 persons were killed in action, 235 fell victims to cholera, and rather more than 100 to other forms of disease during the months the campaign lasted. Probably with regard to that latter point, as many lives would have been lost if the troops had remained at home. I do not think that any more complete success was ever obtained by any expedition that was ever undertaken. [Cheers.] I do not say this as wishing to take any credit whatever to Her Majesty's Government. The credit is due, of course, to Sir Herbert Kitchener—[cheers]—and the gallant officers and men under his command, and last, but by no means least, to Lord Cromer and the authorities at Cairo. [Cheers.] I think when we compare the cost which I have quoted with the anticipations which were held out upon the subject to Parliament last spring, there is a good deal to be said, or rather a good deal that might be said. I remember that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose Burghs told us, in so many words, that the Cabinet must have gone mad in sanctioning this expedition. I remember that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton, in a Debate upon the Budget, criticised me very severely for not having made any special provision for this expenditure. But why? Because he said that in the year 1884 Parliament had to be called together in the autumn to increase the income tax by 1½d. in the pound in order to pay the expenditure then incurred in the Soudan, and again in the year 1885 a Vote of Credit of no less than £4,500,000 was taken for the same purpose, when the Sinking Fund had actually to be suspended in order to provide it. Those were the anticipations the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Gentlemen opposite held out to the country last spring as the probable expenditure upon this campaign. Those expectations have been absolutely falsified. One thing, and one thing alone, has proved correct, that is, the anticipation that I should be called upon to ask this House to vote a certain sum of money. The right hon. Member for Wolverhampton said that if history repeated itself in policy it would also in cost. I ventured then to say that history had not repeated itself in policy, that we and the Egyptian Government had taken warning by the occurrences of 1884 and 1885, and the manner in which this expedition had been planned, and the mode in which it had been conducted, were not the same as the policy of those days, and that therefore the result would be very different. But I should like to point out to the Committee that if the anticipations which I had every right to form at that date had been realised I should not have had to ask the House to vote a single penny of the cost of the expedition. I have said it has cost £733,000. As the Committee will recollect, £512,500 in English currency was advanced by the Commission of the Caisse to the Egyptian Government for the purposes of the Dongola expedition. That sum, together with the surplus fund at the disposal of the Egyptian Government, would have practically enabled it to have defrayed all the cost of the expedition. The Committee are well aware why it is I stand before them asking for this Vote. The decision at which the Commission of the Caisse arrived—that this expedition was, so to speak, extraordinary expenditure, which they were justified in aiding by a grant from the reserve fund at their disposal—was set aside by the Mixed Court of Appeal in Egypt, and the Egyptian Government were directed to repay the Caisse the sum advanced, with interest. That sum, as the Committee will see in the Paper that has been circulated, amounts to £528,000, and as soon as that decision had been arrived at by the Court, as soon as the Egyptian Government had intimated—and I think it was quite right to intimate—that having agreed to abide by the jurisdiction of the Court it was bound to carry out its judgment, and therefore to repay the money, we lost not a day in informing the Egyptian Government that we would, as far as we were concerned, hold them harmless in the matter—[cheers]—and ask Parliament to recoup them the expenditure they had to repay. I do not wish—I could not speak with authority—to say anything as to the legal merits of the judgment of the Mixed Court of Appeal. The view of the Egyptian Government and their legal advisers has been ably set out in the Papers presented to the House. But, I am bound to say that, in my opinion, a situation has been created in Egypt, by that decision, of a remarkable kind. The Committee are well aware that the Egyptian Government is practically, in financial matters, in leading strings under the authority of the Great Powers, and that authority is largely exercised by the Commission of the Caisse (which is a Commission composed of the representatives of the Great Powers), and among the duties specially delegated to that Commission was the duty of receiving a certain portion of the annual surplus accruing to the Egyptian Government and devoting it to a reserve fund for unforeseen contingencies, primarily, I suppose, in the interests of the bondholders. But they were specially authorised to devote from time to time, on the application of the Egyptian Government, a portion of that reserve fund to meeting any extraordinary expenditure which might be required by that Government beyond the ordinary expenses of the Budget of the year. Acting on that authority, which was specially vested in them by the Great Powers whom they represent, the Commission of the Caisse by a majority (as they have often decided before by a majority) voted £512,000 to the Egyptian Government. After considering the matter, they deliberately resolved that the expedition to Dongola might properly be included among the extraordinary expenditure to which the reserve fund might properly be devoted. But what has been the decision of the Mixed Court of Appeal? That Court, acting, as far as I can understand, upon the view that there is a certain difference between the terms of the decree of 1876 and the Law of Liquidation of 1880—a difference which Lord Cromer, who himself took part in drawing up the Law of Liquidation of 1880, asserts to his own knowledge was not a real difference, but a mere drafting difference not intended to make any real difference at all—acting, I say, upon that view, the Mixed Court of Appeal have decided that any one member of the Commission of the Caisse might appeal to them against the decision of all the rest of the members of the Commission, and might thus enable this Mixed Court of Appeal—which itself is the creature of the Great Powers in Egyptian affairs—to override and set aside the decision, all but unanimous, of the Commission of the Caisse on a matter which was specially entrusted to them by the Great Powers. [Cheers.] The decision seems to me to be almost absurd. Here is a reserve fund which, at the time of the Dongola expedition, amounted to £2,750,000. A considerable part of it was not needed for any other purpose. It had been accumulated by the wise financial administration of the Egyptian Government acting under our advice. Its very existence was due to no other cause. ["Hear, hear!"] The Egyptian Government decided that it was necessary that part of this fund should be applied to the cost of the Dongola expedition. We, who are responsible after all for the safety of Egypt—a responsibility in which no other Power shares with us anything at all—[loud cheers]—we supported the view of the Egyptian Government. The majority of the Great Powers took the same view, but the whole thing is overturned and set aside by the decision of the Mixed Court of Appeal. I am bound to say that, in my opinion, when next year the time arrives at which the constitution and the powers of these Mixed Courts have to be reconsidered, a very grave question ought to and must arise as to what shall be their powers and authority in the future—[cheers]—and whether they shall be allowed in this way to interfere in affairs which have been deliberately entrusted by the Great Powers to another tribunal altogether. That is for the future. For the present the Egyptian Government had no option but to repay this money, and we felt that we had no option but to recoup them. The terms upon which we have made the advance are these. We have made an agreement with the Egyptian Government that while the advance is outstanding—and in the advance I include £270,000 included in the estimate to which I will subsequently allude—while the advance is outstanding they shall pay 2¾ per cent. interest on the money, being the same rate paid on our own Funds, and that it shall rest with the two Governments from time to time to agree as to the repayment by the Egyptian Government of the capital sum by such instalments as may be found possible and convenient. ["Hear, hear!"] The Egyptian Government have willingly accepted that proposal. [Opposition laughter.] I hear a suggestion that it is not surprising that they should. The hon. Member for Northampton will probably find fault with me for advancing the money on too easy terms. [Mr. LABOUCHERE: "No."] He may say there is no technical security. That is perfectly true. Owing to their financial fetters the Egyptian Government are unable to give any such technical security. But we have the word of the Egyptian Government, which we trust, and we have this further fact—that we are in occupation of Egypt —[laughter and cheers]—and the fact that we have been compelled to make this advance, through, certainly no fault or action of our own, is, I think, rather likely to prolong that occupation. [Renewed cheers and laughter.] I have no doubt that will be regarded by Gentlemen opposite with great objection. I have never concealed my own opinion that if you regard the occupation of Egypt solely as an abstract question there is not a little to be said against the advantages of that occupation to this country. But the matter has long passed beyong the region of abstract questions. Owing to a long chain of events, for which no Minister and no Government can be held specially responsible, Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues were forced into the occupation of Egypt. From that day to this, though Governments have been in office whose leading members ardently desired that that occupation should cease, this country has never been able to terminate it either with honour or safety. What is the main cause of the prolongation of that occupation to the present day and the probability of its prolongation much longer than was anticipated? I believe mainly this—that France, especially, has never allowed us a free hand in Egypt.

MR. HENRY LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Why should she? [Opposition cheers.]

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Why should she? Because she voluntarily declined to join us in going to Egypt, and she cast upon us by that act the sole responsibility for the safety of Egypt, and I have always felt that we might justly have demanded that we should have a free hand to perform that responsibility. But there is one thing to be said. I cannot understand how anyone who objects to allowing the Egyptian Government to use half a million of its own surplus—which is not wanted for any other purpose—in the recovery of its lost province of Dongola, and insists that the Egyptian Government shall be bound hand and foot by financial fetters, which prevent it from profiting by those conversion economies which are due to its admirable financial administration—I cannot understand how anyone who holds the view that the Egyptian Government must continue to be so fettered, can at the same time contend that Egypt is fit to stand alone. I do not wish to dwell more on the past or even the present. Now I come to say something as to the future. Of course, the fact that the Egyptian Government has been refused permission to use its own surplus in this way has an important effect on the financial situation, and we have had very carefully to consider whether we should sanction a further advance in the policy which was adopted last year, or whether that policy should be reversed. What was our policy last year? It was, for reasons which seemed to us sufficient, the restoration to civilisation of the province of Dongola. ["Hear, hear!"] But since that expedition was undertaken we have never concealed, either from Parliament or from the country, that in our view there should be a further advance in the same direction—[cheers]—and that Egypt could never be held to be permanently secured so long as a hostile power was in occupation of the Nile Valley up to Khartoum. [Cheers.] We have had to consider whether that policy should still be pursued. I think there is one thing of which we and others may be quite certain. If we believe any policy to be right with reference to Egypt this country will not be worried out of it—[cheers]—by hindrances and difficulties such as the refusal of this money. [Cheers.] We believe that the policy is right, and we intend that it shall be still pursued. [Cheers.] But we intend that it shall be pursued prudently and gradually, for it certainly would not be either to the political or financial advantage of Egypt that more territory should be restored to her than she can properly administer or properly defend, and, therefore, what we propose is that the policy shall be continued in the coming season first of all by an advance to a very important point of the Nile called Abu Hamed, which lies to the north-east of the extreme limits of the present province of Dongola. I ought to say, however, that that advance will be an Egyptian advance. Hon. Members, no doubt, will remember the rumours that were spread about widely last year as to the enormous preparations that were being made in this country for expeditions to the Soudan and other matters of that kind. The same rumours have been repeated, and the names of eminent commanders have been suggested for the work. These rumours now are as void of any foundation as the rumours were last year. [Cheers.] This is to be as that was, an Egyptian advance in the first place to Abu Hamed, and afterwards possibly beyond. [Cheers.] How far I do not think it right to say. But this I will say, that in our opinion the main work to be done in the coming season should be, firstly, the consolidation and connection of the districts already under the dominion of theKhedive; and secondly, the acquisition of important strategical positions which may be of the utmost value in the future. [Cheers.]

We propose to contribute to the work to the extent that has been named in the Estimate—£270,000. How is that money to be expended? It is to be expended in purchasing material for a light railway between Wady Halfa and Abu Hamed across the chord of the great bend of the Nile, along a route which for generations has been the main caravan road from Cairo to the interior of Africa. The Egyptian Government will construct that railway, and they will bear all the other expenses that are likely to be incurred in the coming season. I have had conferences both with Sir Herbert Kitchener and with Mr. Dawkins, of the Egyptian Financial Department, and I have satisfied myself both as to the nature of the operations to be undertaken, their probable cost, and the means of the Egyptian Government to meet them; and I can state that it is not in our contemplation to ask Parliament during 1897 for any further expenditure in this matter than that which is now proposed. We believe that in the policy which I have indicated and in the Vote which we propose towards carrying it out we shall be meeting the desires of the great majority of the people of this country. [Cheers.]

MR. LABOUCHERE asked what the total cost of the railway was estimated to be.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: That I am not prepared at the moment to tell the hon. Member. But the main cost of these railways is always the material, and the vote which we propose will be for all the material required for the railway. That line, we believe, will not only be of very great value for military purposes in the comparatively near future, it will, we hope, some day be a commercial highway of great importance between Egypt and the interior of Africa. [Cheers.] I do not suppose that I shall be able to convince right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite, who have always consistently opposed this policy, that we are right in our belief that it is necessary for the security of Egypt that a hostile Power should not permanently be situated at Khartoum or that we have acted wisely in undertaking this task; but I think I may venture to appeal to hon. Members who approved of our policy last year whether the result of that policy—whether the success of that expedition in the manner which I have described does not justify them in reposing in us confidence for the future. [Cheers.] There is one word I would venture to say even to the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouthshire, in speaking on the Address in answer to Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, was good enough to compliment me on the possession of common sense in this matter. But, then, he went on to say that I had deviated into philanthropy. Has philanthropy no claims upon us in this matter? [Cheers.] I do not wish to underrate any of our responsibilities, let us say for the Armenians or for any of the subjects of the Sultan of Turkey. But these responsibilities are not nearly so great or so special as our responsibility for the inhabitants of the Soudan. This country solely, deliberately, and, I think, unwittingly compelled the Egyptian Government to abandon the Soudan. Our people were told at the time by Mr. Gladstone and others, who, I have no doubt, believed it, that it was a proper thing to relieve the inhabitants of the Soudan, who were rightly struggling to be free, from the tyranny of the Egyptian Government. But what do we see now? From the reports of those who have been so unfortunate as to be prisoners of the Khalifa; from the condition to which the once fertile province of Dongola has been reduced under that Government; from the delight of the population at welcoming back that Egyptian Government who were supposed to appear to them in the light of tyrants; we may be quite sure that there never was a case in any part of the world in which an unfortunate and helpless population groaned under a more ruthless, more barbarous, and more fanatical tyranny than the peaceful inhabitants of the Soudan under the rule of the Khalifa. [Cheers.] Is it because the skins of these men are black, is it because the religion is Mohamedan, that the claims of humanity, which were so strong with the right hon. Member for Montrose in the matter of Armenia, are nothing to us now? [Cheers.] I will not believe it. I am no believer in the mission, even of so powerful a country as this, to redress the wrongs of humanity all over the world. But here is a case in which the task is ready to our hand. Here is a case in which, as the right hon. Gentleman himself has said, there is reason to believe that this baleful power of the Khalifa is of itself crumbling to decay. Here is a case in which we may fulfil that responsibility which undoubtedly rests upon us. I believe the great majority of our people will desire that that task should be undertaken and that responsibility fulfilled. [Cheers.]

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I think no one in the House will conceal from himself the gravity of some of the language which has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. [Cheers.] I should have thought that if ever there was a moment at which it was most desirable not to allow a whisper to fall that might break the harmony amongst the European Powers, this was the moment. [Cheers.] If ever there was a moment when neither by word nor by act should you increase the irritation felt notoriously in some quarters, I should have thought that this was the moment. [Cheers.] How can the right hon. Gentleman suppose that the language that he used in the earlier part of his remarks about the action of France and Russia in relation to the affair of the Caisse can be regarded as anything but a direct, and I venture to think, a most imprudent challenge to these Powers to question the sincerity of our plea for remaining in Egypt—a direct challenge to them to take up a new position? The First Lord of the Treasury, the Secretary for the Colonies, and other Gentlemen opposite have done us the justice to say that since the present Government has been in office we on this side have been scrupulously careful to use no language and take no action that should in any way multiply difficulties or make embarrassments for Her Majesty's Government in respect of foreign policy. Have they done us that justice? I hope they will believe that in the remarks which I have already made, and in those which I shall proceed to make, there is no desire whatever to take party advantage of those most delicate and dangerous transactions. It is impossible to deny that the position in Egypt is, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said, an absurd position, that it is of a very intolerable character, and so on; but it is precisely because we hold that view, because we hold that the position is absurd in its present attitude towards France and other Powers in respect of Egypt, that we question the expediency of an indefinitely prolonged occupation there; and that is the very foundation of our case. [Cheers.] That is our general case; and I am not now going into the general question of the occupation of Egypt, because after all the general question is entirely secondary, and merely incidental to the particular question which we are called upon to discuss this afternoon. But it makes me wonder the more that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is generally distinguished by strong common sense, should have gratuitously and without occasion raised it, not only for our consideration, but for the consideration of foreign Powers who think themselves interested in the large general question. I will only say this upon it. I know many hon. Gentlemen opposite think that those who hold the view that the time may come when we shall have done our work in Egypt, and who question the expediency of the expedition to Khartoum, are almost guilty of high treason. ["Hear, hear," and laughter.] I confess that I have never heard upon the general question a full, an intelligent, and a deliberate statement, either on this side of the House or on that of the precise gains which the people of Great Britain get out of our occupation of Egypt. I am not saying that is the only view that ought to be taken. We have responsibilities there which we cannot avoid; I know it full well, and I have no desire to evade them; but if you are going to raise, as the right hon. Gentleman has done, the general question, I do hope the House and our constituents will ask explicitly and plainly what are the advantages we are to gain from an indefinite, prolonged occupation of Egypt against the consent of some of those who, rightly or wrongly, think themselves interested. That is a question well worth considering and discussing, and I expect that, after a few weeks are over, after the language of the right hon. Gentleman, it is a question which will be unpleasantly forced upon us. As to the prophecies of last year, the right hon. Gentleman was very magnanimous, or at least thought himself so, when he said that he had no desire to recall them and their falsification which events had brought about. The right hon. Gentleman reminded the Committee that I had used the word "madness" in connection with the action of Her Majesty's Government in undertaking the Dongola expedition. But I am not yet repentant for the use of that word. I am by no means repentant, because it is perfectly clear that what we foresaw last year is going to come true, and the Dongola expedition is now avowed to be the first step of a large, prolonged, costly, and dangerous set of operations which it is nothing short of madness in the present position of the world for the Government gratuitously and without any active occasion to plunge into. [Cheers.] We were not the only persons who prophesied last year. We were assured last year by, I think, every hon. Gentleman who spoke from the Bench opposite that this expedition was to be an Egyptian expedition, conducted by the forces of Egypt alone, and to be defrayed out of the resources of Egypt alone. There was your error, which we pointed out at the moment. You have forgotten when going into the prophecies which you think have been falsified that there were other warnings and remonstrances used. I particularly made a pointed charge that you had embarked on this enormous enterprise, so far as we knew, without making sure that you carried the Powers with you, and especially one particular Power. Then the First Lord of the Treasury said,

> "That is not so; we have no reason to suppose that the Powers make any objection to the step on which we have embarked."

The Colonial Secretary used language of the same kind on the same occasion, and, I think, the Chancellor of the Exchequer also. But it is now clear that our warning, our prophecy if you like, in March last was abundantly justified. The very circumstance that has compelled you to come to the House to-day to ask the sanction of the House for this advance, as you call it, exactly shows that our warning was well inspired, that your confidence that you had the Powers with you and carried them along with you, sanctioning, approving, and aiding this expedition, was entirely wrong, and—most important point of all—of the prophecies made last year your prohecies have been falsified, and not ours. [Cheers.] Nothing could be more explicit. There was the confident language used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that Egypt would be able to defray the expenses of the expedition and that no penny would come out of the pockets of the British taxpayer. He has referred to the discussion that took place between my right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton and himself across the table, but he did not quote the strongest and most definite expression of my right hon. Friend's opinion. My right hon. Friend said,

> "If the Committee think that Egypt is going to pay when all is done, they will be very gravely disappointed. Sooner or later England will have to pay, for the policy that has been adopted is yours, and the initiative is yours."

[Cheers.] Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer got up and said, "The Egyptian Government have undertaken this expedition"—what a farce it is to talk of the Egyptian Government; all through the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech to-night he made me smile when he spoke of the Egyptian Government undertaking this or that, because it means Her Majesty's Government and no other—

> "With their own forces and at their own cost. . . It is probable that some charge may be imposed upon us in connection with the dispatch of special service officers in the movement of the British troops now in Egypt, but I, at any rate, have no reason to anticipate that any of the terrible prognostications of the right hon. Gentleman will be fulfilled."

Does the right hon. Gentleman now contend that my right hon. Friend made a false prophecy when he said "sooner or later England will have to pay?" The Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us—the particulars are not over full, but they are still sufficient—the conditions under which that advance has been made. As I understand it, £733,000 has been advanced. ["No, no!"]

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: £733,000 was the total cost of the expedition.

MR. J. MORLEY: Then £528,000 has been advanced at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. interest, to be paid, I suppose, in the ordinary way, and the principal to be repaid in instalments as may be convenient to the Egyptian Government. But I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman expects the Egyptian Government to make provision for the repayment of the instalments. No date is fixed when the Egyptian Government are to repay. I wonder how the Egyptian Government, which, remember, has no money to spare from current purposes, is to be expected to be ever able to repay those instalments. I do not believe that money has ever been advanced on security so childish as this, because we all know that the Egyptian Government will not be able, without starving those services which we are proud to see undertaken for the benefit of the people of Egypt, to repay those instalments. [Cheers.] Why do you not have the courage of your own policy and say to the House: "It is our policy; the initiative was ours; all these philanthropic pretensions which we make are ours; we will pay for them?" Surely, if all those operations are to be undertaken for the satisfaction, as the right hon. Gentleman has told us, of our own philanthropic instincts, it is rather hard that Parliament should be called upon to pay £500,000 for the past satisfaction of our philanthropy, and to advance a number of half-millions of money before those operations come within sight of a close. [Cheers.] I do not know why in this Estimate the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not add the £145,000 to be repaid to the Government of India for the extra expenses, and which are to be left out of the cost of the operations. ["Hear, hear!"] If those expenses were added, the public at home would see what the real cost of this expedition has been. It has been over £900,000; and the arguments used in defence of that expenditure, if they are to be worth anything at all, are arguments why the British taxpayer should find the money and why we should not go through this empty formality of veiling it under the form of "an advance." Let us look at the pleas which the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends advance for what has been done. The first was the defence of the frontier. It now appears that the frontier was in no sort of danger. The second plea was that the primary object of the operations, as Lord Cromer called it, was to relieve the Italian army from pressure at Kassala, and so prevent the possibility of that place falling into hostile hands. But there is a great deal of evidence to show that, though the Italian Government in the first instance did, no doubt, press Her Majesty's Government to render them some aid, the Italian Government and their military officers on the spot desired nothing so much as to leave Kassala and evacuate the territory round about it at the very moment when Her Majesty's Government were saying that the relief of the Italians was one of their great objects. It is very difficult to suppose that anything could have happened in Kassala after the Italians evacuated it, as they desired to do, which would have affected that policy. The third plea was that the "fertile granary of Dongola was to be added to the Egyptian territory." Now, this year, we have got an entirely different set of arguments. The old arguments are all dropped, because everyone can see how hollow they were. The first of the new arguments is that we are going to continue these operations in order "to avenge the follies of our old Soudan policy." Lord Cromer, I think, used language about "the shade of Gordon beckoning us on to Khartoum." And Lord Salisbury, in another place, said that our object under this head was "to efface" what had taken place 12 or 13 years ago. But there again, if you are going to avenge your own follies, you ought surely to pay. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not understand upon what principle the people of Egypt, the Egyptian Treasury, is to be loaded for the present, and with the prospect of an indefinite load for the future, in order to avenge our policy. The second new argument is that we are going up the Nile in order to "extirpate a vile and cruel despotism, compared with which the worst performances of the Palace at Constantinople are bright and saintly deeds." Then, thirdly, the occupation of Dongola is justified because it is "on the highway to Khartoum." Does it not strike the House, as I am sure it will strike the country, as a most ambiguous and equivocal course, that while we had one set of arguments for the Dongola expedition last year we now have another set of arguments used retrospectively about the Dongola expedition and prospectively as to projected expeditons to places named by the right hon. Gentleman on the way to Khartoum? But we are not to stop even at Khartoum. The First Lord of the Treasury carries us still further. I confess I heard his language with considerable alarm on the opening night of the Debate on the Address. The right hon. Gentleman said on that occasion:—

> "We hold that the position of Egypt cannot be regarded as satisfactory until the control of the country over large parts at all events of the Soudan has been re-established."

["Hear, hear!" from the FIRST LORD of the TREASURY.] We are not to stop at Khartoum, and I am glad the right hon. Gentleman cheers that.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not quite follow. I made no geographical limitations.

MR. J. MORLEY: But surely going to Khartoum is one thing, and acquiring control over large parts of the Soudan when you get to Khartoum is another. And I think the right hon. Gentleman is right in using wider language than was used by the Prime Minister and even that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. For when you get to Khartoum, what will you have to do? Undoubtedly your first task will be solidly to establish an Egyptian Administration there. Do you suppose, when you have got an Egyptian Administration there, that there will be no frontier difficulties? It is as certain as anything can be that the old difficulties and conditions will return, and I was glad that the right hon. Gentleman frankly faced that and was prepared not only to admit that the policy of the Government is to go to Khartoum, but all the liabilities which going to Khartoum will involve. The Secretary for the Colonies last year distinctly said that if Egyptian statesmen had their way, or were able freely to declare their opinion and judgment, they would not be content, or Egypt could not be regarded as secure and as possessing full guarantees of prosperity, unless they had their old Soudanese territory restored to them in its entirety. Having regard to all the facts and forces of the situation, I greatly fear an extension of your operations will be forced upon you by the necessities of the case. The Chancellor of the Exchequer twitted us with being deaf to the claims of philanthropy and humanity in dealing with these unfortunate people, and said—How is it you can be so anxious about Armenians while you forget the victims of worse despotism in the Soudan? There is no discrepancy whatever between the attitude taken by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House and in both Parties as to Armenia, and the position taken with regard to the Khalifa. When you taunt us with being deficient in philanthropy, with being indifferent to the fate of these unfortunate people, I would remind you of the language used by Lord Salisbury only nine years ago. On March 16, 1888, in another place, Lord Salisbury said:—

> "We do not depart in any degree from the policy of leaving the Soudan."

and with regard to the question of restoring the country to civilisation declared that that

> "could only be carried out by a large and costly expedition, entailing an enormous sacrifice of blood and treasure, and for the present a continuous expenditure."

[Ministerial cheers.] The question of humanity must, after all, be settled; your decision must be guided by considerations of policy, and you may depend upon this, that you will not carry out your expedition to Khartoum and all your operations incident thereto without inflicting an amount of suffering, and perhaps causing an amount of disorder and chaos which will far outweigh any advantages you have got out of your present partial, and possibly temporary, expedition. As far as the Armenians are concerned, there you had definite responsibilities which were imposed upon you by your own action. I am not one of those who desire to carry out all these obligations regardless of all the diplomatic and military hazards which might befall. [Ministerial cheers.] I desire that England should take her share in putting down desperate atrocities in Armenia, but I hold she should, at all events, choose her time for executing these humane and philanthropic operations in the Soudan. This is the point which I have strongest in my mind, that you could not possibly have chosen a more inopportune moment than you took last year and than you are taking now for these operations. The House will remember the language of the Queen's Speech with regard to the condition of affairs abroad and the language of the Colonial Secretary as to the anxieties of his own Department, and yet this very moment, when there is good ground—I do not say for anything like alarm, but for anxiety and circumspection—this is the moment at which you announce a policy which, if carried out, will have military effects which will certainly involve locking up a considerable, probably a great, body of troops and will also involve you in diplomatic difficulties; this very moment when you know, we all know, that we are within sight and measurable distance of new conditions of sea-power, new conditions in regard to the balance of marine power in the Eastern Mediterranean—this is the moment which you choose to take a step which will endanger more than ever it has been endangered before your military and naval policy in the Eastern Mediterranean, and which will make it more difficult to readjust that policy, as undoubtedly it will be found necessary in some respects to do, and this change is announced in language the most inopportune and imprudent. [Cheers.] Under cover of your military success in the Dongola expedition—a success which, from a military point of view, we all admire, whether we approve or disapprove of the expedition—under cover of the natural satisfaction and exultation which it has created inside and outside the House, you are embarking upon a policy which has been before now repudiated and condemned not only by Mr. Gladstone, but by the present Prime Minister himself. [Cheers.] I do not want to say more. I have been for about 12 or 13 years from time to time raising protests — unsuccessfully, I admit — against this Soudan policy. But I have not been wholly unsuccessful. We withdrew from the Soudan policy of Mr. Gladstone in 1885; and that withdrawal was entirely approved of by Lord Salisbury himself. Not only that, but in 1887, remember, he took steps which, if the French and Turkish Governments had been wiser, would have terminated our occupation of Egypt. ["Hear, hear!"] After all this, it is deplorable to see steps being boldly announced, and likely to be taken, which will embark us on what I think to be a series of costly, perilous, and thankless operations. [Cheers.] And, quite apart from the thanklessness, the cost, and the bloodshed involved, these operations are to take place at a moment in the history of the world and of diplomatic relations when they must be fraught with the gravest risks. We shall be very fortunate if we escape from them—for they will be long operations—without repulses and humiliations of which what happened the other day in the affair of the Caisse was only a beginning. ["Hear, hear!"] I put a question to-day to the Under Secretary as to the action taken two days ago by the Governments of France and Russia. The right hon. Gentleman informed us that the Russian and French Consul Generals had told the Egyptian Government that, if they wanted an advance, their business was to get it from the Caisse, and that they had no right, according to the law, to take the advance directly from Great Britain. I express no opinion as to their legal position; but the House will feel, I am sure, that the fact that such action has been taken by France and Russia at this moment—though not, perhaps, momentous in itself—is a sufficient indication of the temper of the Powers with which we have to deal—a temper which will not, I fear, be improved by what has taken place in this House this afternoon. [Cheers.]

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said that everyone now knew where the £120,000 promised to the Voluntary Schools had gone. It had gone into the sands of the Soudan. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose had quoted some of the pledges given on this subject last year by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But he had not quoted the strongest words of all. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was pressed over and over again to say whether Parliament would be asked for money in connection with this expedition in the present year. The right hon. Gentleman was warned as to the probability of a difficulty in connection with the Caisse; and yet he insisted on replying that he had no reason to expect that any call would be made on Parliament in the present year, except for the salaries of a few special service officers. "There would be no obligation to provide any large expenditure." Now the right hon. Gentleman came down with the cheerful announcement practically that an expedition was going to Khartoum. [Cries of "No!"] Well, the expedition was going forward, and the opinion and intention of Her Majesty's Government were that eventually the expedition would reach Khartoum. The right hon. Gentleman said it was an Egyptian expedition; but the expedition which the House was now asked to pay for was also an Egyptian expedition. The graver part of the case was that the right hon. Gentleman had entirely departed from the past policy of prudent Leaders of the Conservative Party on this question. He said that we were not going to be worried into leaving Egypt. It was quite proper not to be worried into anything opposed to our interests; but the Government had declared over and over again that the occupation of Egypt was contrary to our military interests, and, in the words twice expressly approved by Lord Salisbury, was "a burdensome drain" on us. It really looked as though the Government had been worried into remaining in Egypt against the dictates of wisdom and prudence. The statement that what had occurred was likely to prolong our occupation, made in the menacing language and in the formidable and distinct manner adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was, he feared, a declaration that the policy of the Conservative Party on this question had changed since 1888. A very important book had recently appeared by Sir G. Clarke and Mr. Thursfield, and in the introduction to that book the authors jointly signed a statement discouraging the idea that the occupation of Egypt could be in any way a strength to this country. The Under Secretary had hitherto been inclined to go beyond the other Members of the Government in his defence of this policy of remaining in Egypt. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman in bringing the other Members of the Government gradually into agreement with him. But the right hon. Gentleman had gone out of his way to attack him and the right hon. Member for Montrose during the Recess for their statements on this question last year. Personally he wished to say that he adhered to every word that he said last year on this question, because he believed his predictions as to the nature of this expedition were being completely justified. He said then that if the expedition were merely going 200 miles it was doing what was not necessary for the defence of Egypt; that, "elated by apparent success at first, the expedition would be pressed on to Khartoum and Darfur, and that ultimately a British force would have to be sent." He did not believe in these alarming reports as to the dangers to Egypt which were conjured up last year. Let the Committee remember the extreme variety of the excuses which had been made for this expedition. Last year it was said that the Egyptian frontier at Wady Halfa was indefensible and liable to Dervish raids, which were a positive danger to Egypt. The Government were told, when they said this, that the present frontier would be still less defensible. They had the Sirdar now declaring that the present frontier was no better than the old; that Dongola was a province that would be subject to raids, and that the Egyptian Army had been increased by four battalions, two squadrons, and one battery for the purpose alone of holding Dongola. Did not that confirm the statement which had frequently been made on the Opposition side that the occupation of the province was never likely to be anything else but a serious drain on the finances of Egypt? It was first said that the object of the expedition was to help Italy out of her difficulties in Abyssinia. There was no evidence that the Italian Government had ever asked us to undertake the expedition. On the contrary, it was opposed to the Italian policy, which was to quit the country, as both the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary of Italy had since declared. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had now advanced a new reason for the expedition. The right hon. Gentleman talked about civilisation and philanthropy. In the case of countries so far removed from the strong arm of England as countries in the interior of Africa, there was no more dangerous doctrine than the doctrine of a crusade on behalf of civilisation and philanthropy. All the Powers of Europe had decided to undertake such a crusade in Africa, and there was not a man who was acquainted with the state of affairs in that country that would not say that the Powers had done more harm than good; and that it would have been far better, in the interests of civilisation and philanthropy, if Africa had been let alone. [Cheers.] There had, in fact, been a most extraordinary reversal of policy on the part of the Government.

Lord Salisbury had made a speech declaring that we would gladly accept a present of Egypt from Russia.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): When?

*SIR C. DILKE: In the House of Lords at the opening of the Session. If the hon. Gentleman has not read the principal speech of his own Leader it is a curious thing. [Laughter.]

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: It does not mean what you said.

*SIR C. DILKE said he was only a plain person of plain intelligence, and he was so astonished at the statement of Lord Salisbury that he read three or four different reports of the speech. The noble Lord referred to the offer made by the Emperor Nicholas of the partition of Turkey, in which our share was to be Egypt, and said that if that offer were renewed it would be gladly accepted. That was a complete change of front on the part of the Government. ["Hear, hear!"] In fact, there seemed to be no real, definite policy behind this expedition. Some hon. Members on the other side of the House supported it because it would strengthen our hold on Egypt. [Ministerial cheers.] Yes, but there were others who advocated it on exactly opposite grounds. The hon. Member for North Lambeth (Mr. Stanley) had declared that it was our interest to quit Egypt; but that we should never be able to do so until we had reconquered the Soudan, put down the Dervishes, and crushed the Khalifa. Every reason that had hitherto been given for the expedition—to give assistance to the Italians, to improve the Egyptian frontier, to add a rich province to Egypt—had all broken down, and it was impossible not to believe that the new reason advanced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the cause of civilisation and philanthropy—was simply put forward in the hope that it would prove a good popular cry. [Cheers.] The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had attacked him on two occasions for having suggested that it was impossible to stop short of Dar Fur, and that they would have to go on until they had joined one great sphere of influence with another. That view, however was confirmed by Captain Lugard, who knew Africa thoroughly and who had defended the expedition. Lord Salisbury had given up the idea of the route through Africa, and the idea of leasing a strip of country had fallen through. The country they were going to was a disputed country, a no-man's land. The Government were not only running the risk of enormous and perpetual expansion without any prospect of sufficient gain to the country, but they were also running the risk of international complications. He repeated that there had been an absolute change in the foreign policy of the Government, and especially in that portion which bore upon the retention of Egypt. It had been a sudden change, and it had not been a change which could have been rightly affected by the opinion of foreign Powers, because it involved change as to a matter of fact—which was the military interest of this country in the occupation of Egypt. As late as 1888 Lord Salisbury twice approved this language upon the question—that it was a drain on the military and financial resources of England, and that it was a perpetual drain on the home resources. Yet within nine years, without the smallest attempt at consecutiveness in their foreign policy, the Government turned right round on this question, and seemed rather glad of the excuse they had given for remaining, he feared permanently, in Egypt. [Cheers.]

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said he was always glad to follow the right hon. Gentleman, because the right hon. Gentleman had a way of ignoring important facts. He thought it had always been the view of hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House that if this movement was begun they should go to Khartoum. But the right hon. Gentleman very carefully passed that over. The right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion had asked if it was not likely that they would be drawn on step by step, that the Egyptian forces would be attacked and the British officers sacrificed, and he said also that there lay in front of the Egyptian army one of the most frightful powers in the whole world. From that utterance they might obtain a verdict as to the character of the right hon. Gentleman as a prophet. Other speeches which had been made had been equally violent, and had proved equally wrong, especially that of the right hon. Member for West Monmouthshire. The conscription of to-day was not a burden on the Egyptian people. The Egyptian army was welcomed by the Egyptians of the present day because it was well paid.

*SIR C. DILKE: That is the case with the Nubian recruits, I admit; I was speaking of the Egyptian fellaheen. But the Nubians are a limited class.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said the service was welcomed by the Nubians, and as there was no great difficulty in getting them as recruits the conscription was not a serious burden on the Egyptian fellaheen. The right hon. Gentleman was thinking of the Egyptian conscription at the time he was in office, when these poor wretches of fellaheens were dragged in chains—[Sir C. DILKE: "So they are now"]—from Cairo and other parts of Egypt down to the Red Sea, and there dispatched unarmed to be butchered by the Dervishes. The right hon. Gentleman apparently knew very little about the state of Egypt now. [Cries of "Oh!"] The right hon. Gentleman should be cautious before he made such speeches as that to which they had just listened—[laughter]—because he was responsible for the terrible blundering, the muddling, the slaughter, and the cost that took place in regard to Egypt and the Soudan. It was the right hon. Gentleman's policy of alliance with France alone that had caused these results.

*SIR C. DILKE said he had stated in that House, and had repeated the statement again and again, that it so happened that he was absent from the country on business of the Crown at the time, and that he never saw the Joint Note until after it was issued.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said that was the first time the right hon. Gentleman had made that statement in that House. [Laughter.]

*SIR C. DILKE: No, no.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said he recollected the statements of the right hon. Gentleman much better than he did himself. [Laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman had frequently told them that he was not responsible for a special alliance with France, but the statement with regard to his absence from this country they heard that night for the first time.

*SIR C. DILKE: No, I made it in this House before. [Laughter.]

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said that as Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs the right hon. Gentleman was the guiding spirit of the foreign policy of the Government of that day. The Foreign Minister of the time was in the other House, and was a very able but easy-going gentleman, who did not take very much control of foreign affairs—[laughter]—and the right hon. Gentleman forced his policy upon the Government in every phase, and his policy and that of the then Government was to go behind the backs of the other Powers to present a Joint Note with France to the Khedive on January 6, 1882. It was repudiated by all the other Powers and by the Suzerain, and it led directly to all the troubles which followed. The forced evacuation of the Government of that day cost the lives of over 100,000 people, who were slaughtered under circumstances of the greatest cruelty. They knew what General Gordon's protest was, and how he asked how as a gentleman he could do this thing. The right hon. Gentleman was a prominent Member of that Government, and he held him responsible for what had happened. The right hon. Gentleman had attacked the Government for giving as a ground for their movement in the Soudan that they wished to help Italy, a member of the Triple Alliance, and said distinctly that he objected to that policy. [Sir C. DILKE: "I made no attack on the Triple Alliance."] The right hon. Gentleman practically implied that he would revert to a similar policy as had been adopted in the past. [Sir C. DILKE: "No."] Then the right hon. Gentleman had no policy except that of scuttle. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had used language which, he was sure, was approved by everyone on the Government side of the House, because he distinctly stated that this country would not be bullied out of its policy and its position. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: "Hear, hear!"] Oh, of course. [Laughter.] They perfectly understood the right hon. Gentleman's cheer. They knew that he would be bullied out of anything by a foreign Power. [A laugh.] They did not expect the approval of the right hon. Gentleman, and it was positively refreshing to have a statement from the Treasury Bench which had met his approval. He sincerely hoped the policy of the Government would be persistent and tenacious, and that nothing would check the forward movement until we had obtained possession of Khartoum. He confessed there was one point upon which he did not quite understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In respect of it he hoped some further explanation would be given, though he would not press for any declaration if, in the opinion of the Government, such a declaration would do harm. Lord Salisbury had clearly said it was the intention of the Government to go to Khartoum. There seemed to be some drawing back in the matter on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He trusted he was mistaken. He was persuaded that if any Member of the Government was able to assure the House there was no intention to stop short of Khartoum, the declaration would be received with unanimous favour on the Ministerial side of the House. In all the language the right hon. Gentleman used with regard to the necessity of a firm and consistent dealing with the aggression and opposition of other countries he had the entire support of hon. Members on his own side. If similar language were used with regard to other items of policy the Government would occupy a stronger position in the country than they had recently occupied, and certain very deplorable events would not have happened.

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I had not intended to take any part in this discussion, for I was entirely satisfied with what has been said by my right hon. Friend the Member for Montrose and my right hon. Friend the Member for the Forest of Dean, in whose opinions I entirely concur, but this Debate has taken an aspect of a far larger and more formidable character than anything connected with an expedition even to Khartoum. The Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to the liberty I had taken in complimenting him upon his prudence and common sense, but I am sorry to say that he has to-night preferred to earn the applause of the hon. Member for Sheffield. [A laugh.] We know what the policy of the hon. Member for Sheffield is; he has stated it pretty plainly to-night; he has said that what we have to do is to hold language towards France and Russia such as I regret to say has been used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Now, I rise for the purpose of protesting against that language; I say it is mischievous language, it is dangerous language. As I said in the Debate on the Address, these are questions which involve not £500,000 but millions if you choose to embark in a spirit of defiance and hostility upon this Egyptian question with the great military Powers of Europe. It is because the language the Chancellor of the Exchequer used to-night on behalf of the British Government, and which has been applauded by the Member for Sheffield, who has put upon it that interpretation which will be put upon it to-morrow by Europe—[Sir ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: "Hear, hear!"]—that the vote I shall give to-night will not be mainly concerned with the question of an expedition either to Dongola or Khartoum. I shall register my vote against this Motion because I desire to make a public protest against the language of menace and defiance which has been employed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I had hoped and believed it was the intention and the labour of Lord Salisbury and of Her Majesty's Government that those Powers—particularly Russia and France—with whom we have formerly had differences, should be brought into harmony with the British Government for purposes of the greatest importance, and, therefore, I desire to protest in the most emphatic manner against the language that has been used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-night.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must entirely disclaim having used any language of menace or defiance. [Cheers.]

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Let us see what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has said. The question as to the appropriation of this money arose before the Caisse. The right hon. Gentleman admits the financial arrangements in Egypt are arrangements in which the Great Powers of Europe have a recognised voice. The question arose whether or not in the Caisse the voice of the majority was to prevail or whether the minority had a veto upon it. That was referred to the tribunal, which it is not disputed is the legal tribunal, to determine that question. They determined, not in our favour, but in favour of the protest of Russia and France. That was a legal decision. The language which the right hon. Gentleman has used to-night is a protest against that legal decision. What did he say? He said that legal decision is one that will induce Her Majesty's Government at an early period to do what they can to raise the whole question of Egyptian administration before Europe and the reversal—["Oh!"]—I am extremely alert not to misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman. He will have an opportunity of replying, and I trust he will take the opportunity of removing that impression, which, I confess, unless it is removed, I regard as one of the greatest dangers to which it is possible to expose this country at this moment.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Really, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has misunderstood me on this point, very likely through my own fault. I alluded to the necessary revision, in the year 1898, of the powers of the Mixed Tribunals, owing to the expiry of the term —I believe it is a five years term—for whch certain powers and duties are given to these tribunals—and I said upon that revision this matter must be reconsidered.

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: In a sense that should be a reversal, that should be in derogation of the rights of the Great Powers.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, not at all. I protest against that. In order to defend the authority of the superior and international tribunal in the Commission of the Caisse.

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That is to do away with or reverse what has been done, and legally done, on the appeal of Russia and France in this matter. What can be the consequence of this at this moment, when you ought to have desired more than anything else to have left this question alone? When you should not have allowed these sleeping dogs to lie, but up rises the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon this Vote and without any reason whatever demands the raising of the Egyptian question in Europe. He told Europe that we are dissatisfied with the arrangements at present existing as between the Great Powers. What is the situation? We have a legally and internationally established trust deed, under which these proceedings have been taken. There has been a legal decision, the legality of which has not been disputed, and now Her Majesty's Government come forward and make the public announcement that, like a defeated litigant, they are determined to overthrow the final court, and they demand in the face of Europe that the existing arrangements in Egypt shall be overthrown. What for? To prevent Russia and France doing again what legally they have done on the present occasion. Do you think that that is going to be upheld? How is it possible to suppose anything of the kind? After all, this action against which the eloquent denunciation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was directed belongs to the present international law governing the relations of the Powers in Egypt. The hon. Member for Sheffield applauds the Government for having, as he says, told Russia and France that we will not be bullied. That is a very natural interpretation of the unwise language which has been used. [Cheers.] It is still more unwise to point to the fact that immediately upon this decision being contrary to our wishes we demand at once a reversal of that decision.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Reconsideration is necessary.

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The reconsideration that the right hon. Gentleman holds out is one to deprive the Powers of the rights that they at present hold. Surely the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot be of opinion that I have ever been a captious critic of his sentiments and opinions, but I cannot fail to day to express my great regret at the use of language which I hope will not bear the interpretation that it conveys to my mind. I trust we shall have a very different statement from the Government which may avert consequences that I cannot help thinking would be of the gravest character. ["Hear, hear!"] Certainly, unless that is so I must record my vote against this proposal, not principally in reference to the character of the proposal itself, but as a protest against the spirit in which it has been introduced and the consequences which I believe might follow. ["Hear, hear!"]

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. GEORGE CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The Chancellor of the Exchequer has already, on his own behalf, repudiated what I believe the majority of the House will consider to be the most unwarrantable interpretation that the right hon. Gentleman has put upon his words. Those hon. Members now in the House who had the advantage of listening to the clear and emphatic statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot have found in that speech one word which can legitimately be said to have been provocative of irritation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer repeated what is a historical fact, that our responsibilities and position in Egypt arose from the fact that after the rebellion of Arabi Pasha in 1882 France, who had previously shared the condominium with ourselves, declined any longer to take part with us. Rightly or wrongly, she deliberately desisted. We were thereby left alone. [" Hear, hear ! "] Since that time, it is true that we have not, either at Cairo or Paris, received from the French Government the support which we should have been glad to receive, and which might have facilitated our task. [" Hear, hear ! "] It is true also, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that if we had had a free hand we might have proceeeded even further than we have done in fitting the Egyptian people for self-government. To rest upon that the interpretation of something imprudent, something provocative to France, is to place on the statement an interpretation which neither the words nor the sentiment behind them for a moment justified. [Cheers.] But the leader of the Opposition says that the particular phrase which excited his ire, and which to-morrow will raise the consternation of Europe, was the intimation by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that when the time for the revision of the Mixed Tribunals comes in the natural course of events, we shall take into consideration the manner in which the recent decision was arrived at. As we are on the subject of the Mixed Tribunals, let me add one word which may possibly be of information to some hon. Members. The right hon. Member for Montrose reproached us for having embarked on this Egyptian policy last year without making sure that we had the consent of the Powers. Well, Sir, when we had embarked on this policy we very soon ascertained that we did have the assent of the majority of the Powers. [Cheers.] Nothing could more clearly prove that than the fact that the Caisse of the debt advanced the £500,000 ; a decision which was given by four to two of the Commissioners of the Caisse—England, Germany, Austria and Italy being on the one side, and France and Russia on the other. Now comes the important point. What we have been dealing with to-night is not the decision of the Caisse, but of the Mixed Tribunals. On the tribunal which decided against the majority of the Caisse neither England nor Austria was represented at all. [" Hear, hear ! "] It has appeared in the Blue Book on Lord Cromer's authority, and it has been currently reported, that the decision of the tribunal to which so much legal authority has been attached, was one in which the two parties were equally divided. There were eight members of the Court—five Europeans and three natives—and as the vote was four to four, by a course that is not enshrined in law, but has grown up in practice, the decision was given to the side having the majority of Europeans. It has been assumed throughout this Debate, and cannot be denied, that the decision, in its consequences, if not its motives, was affected by the political predilections of the Powers. [Opposition cheers.] If, then, it can be shown that among the Powers that voted on the tribunal two Powers who took part in the original decision were not represented at all, and if it is admitted that the decision was mainly political and not judicial, can there be anything very astonishing in the Chancellor of the Exchequer saying that when a year hence the time comes for revision we shall have to take into account the constitution of the tribunals and the manner in which the decision was arrived at? [Cheers.] Passing on to other points, I may say that I cannot help noticing a very marked contrast between the tone and phraseology of this Debate and that of our similar proceedings a year ago. Then the House was crowded on both sides, and loud were the cheers as adjective after adjective from the repertoire of right hon. Gentlemen opposite was hurled at our devoted heads. [" Hear, hear ! "] This evening, at any rate, the Benches opposite cannot be said to be crowded—[" hear, hear ! "]—and, with the exception of the remarks the right hon. Gentleman has directed against the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the invective used has been of a very chastened order. [" Hear, hear ! "] The right hon. Member for Montrose still adheres to his conviction that we are mad. [Laughter.] A more sensible form of lunacy than a campaign conducted to this brilliant issue I can scarcely imagine. [Cheers and laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman thinks we are mad because, in the present condition of the world, we have undertaken this expedition in the Soudan. Was the moment any less inopportune when last autumn right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen opposite were continually urging us to undertake a single-handed expediton in another part of the world? [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman has asked whether these advances to the Egyptian Government are ever going to be repaid; and he said we shall not be able to obtain repayment without starving the Egyptian Government. [" Hear, hear ! "] There seems to prevail an idea among some hon. Members that the Exchequer of the Egyptian Government is in an improverished and depleted condition. What are the facts? What are the financial resources at the disposal of the Egyptian Government? They have, in the first place, a Reserve Fund —through the successful conversion of some parts of the debt in 1890, and from the interest on the money thus accumulated, of £2,305,000. They have further, a General Reserve Fund, constituted by the decree of 1888, which, at the present moment, after deducting liabilities, shows a surplus of £2,235,000; and, finally, there is a Special Reserve Fund in which there is at the present moment a sum of £255,000. This is the impoverished Government which we are alleged to be starving and to which we are making an advance that cannot be paid. I admit that these funds are not at its sole disposal—[Opposition cheers]—but it has behind it resources amounting to £4,795,000. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman alluded to what no doubt is a very unfortunate fact in the situation —namely, that Egypt financially, and as a consequence politically, is, to adopt the phrase of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, held in leading-strings by the Powers of Europe. [" Hear, hear ! "] But it cannot be contemplated that those powers possessed by other nations—at any rate, it is not likely—will be permanently used by them to the detriment of Egyptian success and advancement, and it is scarcely likely that, when measures are being taken by us to recover to Egypt her old provinces and to secure for her that commerce of which she has been deprived, and to make a still further advance in her prosperity, merely political considerations or the prejudices of the Powers should permanently tie up this great sum which she has saved by her own economies and which she must one day be permitted to use to her own advantage. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose went on to say, "Why do you not pay this sum yourself?" I do not know whether that is a serious question. I noticed it did not excite a single cheer on his own side of the House, and I do not think it would have been received with enthusiasm upon either side. So long as the Egyptian Government are willing and anxious to pay I do not think we need needlessly disturb susceptibilities here by discussing whether or not we should pay. I come to another point in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in which I must correct a very grave misapprehension into which he and the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean fell. That was with reference to Kassala. I must say I admire the courage of the right hon. Gentleman in mentioning Kassala at all, because last year, when we said that one of the purposes of this expedition was to bring relief to the Italians in their beleaguered position, he said—

> "What a preposterous assumption it is that you can give any relief to the Italians at Kassala by making a military movement 500 miles away!"

It had precisely the effect we anticipated and which we desired. [Cheers.] There is not a shadow of doubt that our advance up the Nile did detach from Kassala the Dervish forces who were at that time threatening Kassala. It cannot be doubted that the fact that the Italian troops are still in the occupation of Kassala is due to the advance we made up the Nile. We had received communications from the Italian Government in which they urgently requested us to make some forward movement in order to assist them.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: Will that correspondence be laid on the Table of the House?

*MR. CURZON: That I cannot say.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: This is a very important point. The Under Secretary is making a statement in reference to communications from a foreign Government asking our intervention and in respect of which military assistance was given. I venture to suggest to him that, having made that statement to the House in contradiction of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, he is bound to lay that correspondence on the Table of the House. [Cheers.]

*SIR C. DILKE: May I also be allowed to explain that that statement is in contradiction of personal knowledge which leaves no doubt on my own mind as regards the Marquis di Rudini and of the statement made by the Duke of Sermoneta at the time of his resignation?

*MR. CURZON: I am not aware whether the principle laid down by the Leader of the Opposition is a correct one. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House tells me that the principle applies where a quotation is made. I have made no quotation. [Cheers and Opposition cries of "Oh!"] I have stated the fact, not for the first time in this House, and I have stated it on my responsibility as a Minister of the Crown, and I therefore cannot accept the contradiction of the right hon. Baronet. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose says that we have dropped our old arguments and have adopted a set of new arguments. We have done nothing of the kind. The arguments which we employed to justify the advance last year are the arguments which, in so far as they have not been rendered obsolete by our success, we continue to use to-day. [Cheers.] Last year this expedition was justified by the Government on the ground that it would protect the frontiers of Egypt from a danger by which we believed that they were threatened. That danger has, we are glad to say, turned out to be much less than we anticipated, and therefore that need for the advance has disappeared. The second cause was the desire to render assistance to the Italians. That we have succeeded in doing, and therefore that cause has also receded into the background. The third cause was that we hoped to recover for Egypt a part of her lost provinces in the Soudan. That we are engaged in doing, and that course we hope to continue to a successful end. [Cheers.] But we are now told this evening, for the first time, that new arguments have been used, and that the argument that we should atone for our mistakes and follies in the past and that we should endeavour to rescue the poor people of Khartoum from the tyranny of the Khalifa involves an entire change in the situation. Those are the considerations which were present to our minds last year, just as they are present this year. ["Hear, hear!"] The arguments upon which the advance was justified stand exactly where they were. What has occurred since last year only goes to prove that we were right, and to add force and intensity to them. ["Hear, hear!"] There only remains one more point with which I need deal. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean laid the very greatest stress upon an allegation that the speech which has been made this evening by the Chancellor of the Exchequer indicated a total reversal of the policy of the Government. None of us on this Bench were conscious of such a reversal having been accomplished. ["Hear, hear!"] I listened with interest to hear the right hon. Gentleman's evidence, and it amounted to this—that Lord Salisbury, in another place, had made a speech in which he raised a purely fanciful and hypothetical condition, and said that if an offer, made many years ago, were repeated now it was one that might be accepted. Are we really, on the basis of this hypothesis, to accept the view that the whole of the Cabinet have entirely reversed their policy of last year? But there was another reason, another proof, given by the right hon. Gentleman, and that was that I—poor I—[laughter]—had brought the Government to this change. I am bound to confess that my influence has never been estimated by myself, and I believe not by anybody else—[laughter]—at that value. It is, indeed, a new character which is put upon me to-night—which I must modestly repudiate—of being the person to lead the Government, so to speak, by the nose to adopt a policy which they had previously repudiated and with which they would otherwise be in disagreement. It is not the case. There is no change in the policy of the Government. [" Hear, hear ! "] The policy of the Government as regards Egypt and as regards the Soudan remains exactly where it was last year, exactly where it has been at every point since the rebellion of Arabi in 1882 and since the rebellion of the Mahdi in 1884 and 1885.

Mr. MORLEY: Do you mean to say that Lord Salisbury's declaration of 1888, which I have just read, is the policy of to-day?

Mr. CURZON: The right hon. Gentleman quotes what was said in 1888, but he does not pretend that the conditions are not entirely changed. [" Hear, hear ! "] Undoubtedly Lord Salisbury said in 1888, as everybody said, I believe, on both sides of the House, that the Soudan could not be reconquered, and that it would be inadvisable, if not impossible, to do so. But those circumstances have changed, because, not merely has the Egyptian Government made strides in the recovery of her financial credit and in the improvement of her resources which no one could have anticipated, but the powers which at that time were dominant at Khartoum—the powers of the Mahdi—are a very different thing from the powers of the Khalifa at the present time. [" Hear, hear ! "] What was impossible in 1880 turns out to be feasible now. But that does not indicate a change of policy. The policy of the Government has always remained the same. As I understand it, the policy of the Government in Egypt is, by persevering stages, to fit the Egyptian nation for the task of self-government—[Irish laughter and Ministerial cheers]—and to enable them in future to be ruled by an independent Government based on the affections and attachment of their own people. [" Hear, hear ! "] In pursuit of that object, the British Government have already conquered great difficulties. They have enormously improved the financial and judicial administration of Egypt; they have given peace and prosperity to her people, and they are now engaged in the task of endeavouring to recover for them the frontiers which, owing to our mistaken policy in the past, were lost to them. [Cheers.] That is the continuity of policy which has been observed and to which the Government will adhere—[cheers]—and I cannot believe that this House would ever give its support to any Government which was so faint-hearted and so selfish as to abandon that work. [Cheers.]

Mr. LEONARD COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said he desired to address a few words to the House, and he would endeavour to do so in measured and careful language, because he conceived that some of the heat developed in the Debate had arisen from misconception of the words which had been employed, and that that heat and misconception might easily pass from the area of that Assembly and excite persons elsewhere, and lead to consequences which we should all most sincerely regret. [" Hear, hear ! "] He understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that, when the question of the reconstitution of the Mixed Tribunals came up 12 months hence, it might, in view of the character of the judgment just given, be necessary to consider the composition of those tribunals and their competency to undertake such a question as was submitted to them. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: " Hear, hear ! "] That in itself ought not to excite resentment elsewhere; it was necessary; it was inevitable. It was provided that from time to time these tribunals should come under international review and the scope of their jurisdiction would have to be considered, but he thought the connection of this question with the judgment recently delivered might excite, and justly excite, some feeling unless there was further explanation.

Sir W. HARCOURT: The words used were " We will not be worried." [" Hear, hear ! "]

Mr. COURTNEY hoped they would be allowed to get out of that atmosphere. [" Hear, hear ! "] He thought his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and others who had spoken had a little misconceived the ground of the judgment and the situation in reference to which that judgment had been delivered. His right hon. Friend said Egypt was in leading strings, Egypt was under bonds and could not do as she liked with her own, and he used other phrases of a similar character. But how was it that Egypt was under leading strings? Egypt was bankrupt, and the position would be best understood if he likened the law of liquidation to a deed of assignment for the benefit of the creditors of Egypt. Under that law Egypt was to be carried on as a going concern, its wants to be provided for, and its surplus revenue was to supply a fund to meet contingencies and provide for redemption of debt. But the contingencies that might arise were to be those that arose from the carrying on of Egypt as a going concern. For example, there might be a low Nile, and then recourse might be had to the reserve to make good the loss; or if there arose any internal difficulty bringing about an increase of expenditure or a decline of revenue, then the temporary difficulty might be met by recourse to this fund. It was only for contingencies that arose in Egyptian territory that the reserve was to be employed. He had, speaking elsewhere, used an illustration to make the position clear, and this he repeated. Suppose a going concern in the shape of a colliery and trustees invested with the management of that colliery, these trustees being under conditions of appointment required to provide for the expenses of working the colliery, and lay aside profits to provide a fund to meet contingencies and for the redemption of debt. If an accident occurred in the working of that colliery that was obviously a contingency arising out of the working of that colliery, and the expenses would be met out of the reserve. But suppose the trustees, wisely or unwisely, resolved upon working a pit a mile off which had been abandoned years before, would that be within the functions of the trustees and the range of their duties under the deed of arrangement? ["Hear, hear!"] Surely to set about the working of the distant pit would be ultra vires on the part of the trustees, and they would naturally go back to those from whom they derived authority before taking action outside their trust. ["Hear!"] The judgment of the Court proceeded on the ground that the Caisse had not competency to undertake to support a transaction which lay outside the original going concern. If new enterprises were undertaken they must go back to those who created the deed of arrangement. This was the view taken by the Court. He had an opportunity of talking about this to one of the most distinguished international lawyers in the country, who was entirely in favour of the advance to Dongola, and he held the judgment of the Court to be entirely right. There was another name he might mention, not that of a lawyer, but of a gentleman thoroughly conversant with the history of these transactions, and it was a name that would command respect in the House, and again the opinion was that the judgment of the Court was just. It was useless to quarrel with the Court, and we could not alter the law. To do that we must go back to the Powers that created the law. He wished to dispel the idea that Egypt belonged to the Egyptians; that was not so now; it belonged to the creditors, and it was not for us to shake off the fetters the creditors of Egypt had put upon the country. ["Hear!"] The money had to be repaid, and then arose a question which had to be considered in the light of the limitations laid down by the Court. Egypt under the new law of liquidation could not borrow, and yet we were going to advance money to Egypt which Egypt was going somehow to repay. How could that be? It appeared to him like the experiences we had had in the history of the development of railways. When a railway company some years ago exhausted its borrowing powers, or could not raise money under them, it still got into debt and gave certificates of indebtedness under the system known by the phrase now passed out of use—Lloyd's Bonds. If, in accordance with the law of liquidation, satisfaction of this debt could not come out of the surplus any more than the original sum, then the satisfaction of the debt interest and instalments must come out of curtailments of ordinary expenditure.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER reminded his right hon. Friend that Egypt had power to borrow to a certain extent.

MR. COURTNEY said this was for contingencies in respect to which she could fall back on the fund, contingencies that happened in ordinary administration. We were to be repaid under some sort of Lloyd's Bond. He would not vote against this payment; we must make it, whether it be repaid or not. In respect to the £270,000 for the railway, he asked when was that railway going to be made? Not before March 31? ["Hear!"] Surely, then, this should come into the next financial year.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained it was for purchase of material.

MR. COURTNEY said then would come the cost of making the railway. The situation was not encouraging. One hon. Member found encouragement in the language of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and deduced from this language that there was a change of policy.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said he did not refer to a change in the Egyptian policy or the policy in regard to Egypt; he was referring to the change of tone and manner in dealing with it by the Treasury.

MR. COURTNEY said the hon. Member appeared to think the tone and manner of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, contrasted with that of last year, would affect the judgment of the country. The judgment of the country was fickle, some people said; but he thought the judgment of the country appreciated sobriety of judgment and would not support a policy where this was lacking. In the spirit of that old-fashioned sobriety of judgment he held the opinion as to this expenditure which he had expressed last year, that it was impolitic, inexpedient, and dangerous. He did not wish to keep the Soudan in a state of oppression and discomfort any more than any other part of the world. But was this country able to do what the Under Secretary talked of? Were they able to conquer the Soudan and hand it over to Egypt, and, having trained Egypt in self-government, could they leave her with anything like equanimity to administer the Soudan so conquered? ["Hear, hear!"] He thought that Lord Salisbury in 1888 measured the forces better than he did to-day. He was not able to entirely persuade himself that Lord Salisbury changed his views, in spite of the language which his right hon. Friend said he used on the first night of the Session. He had some reason to believe that Lord Salisbury was no more fond of this forward policy than he was himself. ["Hear, hear!"] If his Lordship had his own way, he believed he would maintain the moderate and sober position which he occupied nine years ago. The change of circumstances which had ensued did not warrant any change in the attitude to be adopted. The policy of moderation and abstinence from enterprise of a wild and visionary character was, above all, the policy to be maintained in relation to the other Powers of Europe; and was most important to their position, not only in Europe, but throughout the whole world. He hoped the course of the Debate would not tend to worsen the position of this country in relation to other Powers. He should be deeply sorry if any words of his tended to excite worse feelings than existed. His sole purpose in rising was to endeavour, if possible, to state a view of the case which might lead some fellow Members on his side of the House to understand how things were looked at differently by other people than they were here, and to inquire whether there was not some reason for the attitude they assumed when they in this country were sometimes disposed to think they were too suspicious, too angry, and too intolerant in their judgment of the British people. [Cheers.]

MR. LABOUCHERE hoped Her Majesty's Ministers would take heed of the wise and sober words which had fallen from one of their most distinguished supporters. ["Hear, hear!"] That debate, it seemed to him, would not be useless if the Committee could get some clearer explanations than they had at present from the Government. The whole history of the relations of the Government towards this expedition in the Soudan had been a position of evasion. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had said he spoke as a Minister of the Crown. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman would be an excellent Minister of the Crown; but as a matter of hard fact he was not a Minister of the Crown—[laughter]—but was in that House as Lord Salisbury's secretary—[renewed laughter]—and, he assumed, did his best to express in his own words the views of Lord Salisbury. The Under Secretary fell foul of the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean because he complained of what had transpired last year with respect to the Italian demand to this country to aid them in retaining Kassala. The Under Secretary told the House last year that such a demand had been made.

*MR. CURZON: Request.

MR. LABOUCHERE said that the Italian Ministers themselves confronted the right hon. Gentleman with a denial that any such demand or request was made, and he, therefore, desired to know under what circumstances this very hole-in-the-corner demand, which was put forward now as a plea for this country engaging in vast expense in order to subdue the Soudan, was made. ["Hear, hear!"] Would the right hon. Gentleman give them the Papers? Was there any communication made by the Italian Ambassador to Lord Salisbury? Was there any communication made by the Italian Ministry to the Ambassador of this country in Italy? Was it a private or personal demand on the part of those who reigned but did not govern? Was it a demand made through another Emperor? Was it a demand made through the German Emperor? [Ministerial cries of "No!"] He wanted this matter to be cleared up. The right hon. Gentleman had been referring to documents. [MR. CURZON: "No!"] At any rate, he did refer to some species of document, but he would not tell them if the communication was verbal or in writing, and the Government seemed to be absolutely ashamed of what they had done. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] Then let them produce their documents. It was a fair and reasonable demand to ask the Government to lay before the House of Commons, which was responsible for the action of the Government, the statement which they said was made, either in writing or verbally, to induce them to engage in an expedition for which they were now asking a million sterling and would have to ask for more. Such a positon had never before been taken up by any Government. He was sorry to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer speak as he had done. He had always believed the right hon. Gentleman was a wise, sober, and cautious man, but he seemed to speak that night with the reckless zeal of a convert. Who had got him over? Was it the Leader of the House or Lord Salisbury, or the Minister of the Crown—[laughter]—who sat next him? To put it vulgarly, this guardian of the purse appeared to have been "got at." The Chancellor of the Exchequer had thrown down the gauntlet to Egypt. He told them he wanted to change the Egyptian tribunals. In 1898 there would be an opportunity of reconsidering the whole matter as to what tribunals were to decide in questions relating to Egypt. Why did the right hon. Gentleman want to change them? Because they went against this country. Simply and solely because the Courts in Egypt decided against them they were going to ask Europe to alter the nature and character of those Courts. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that we were in Egypt and had a right to decide everything.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I did not say that. I said we were in Egypt, but I never said we had a right to decide everything.

MR. LABOUCHERE remarked that he took down what the right hon. Gentleman said at the time, but he could not now make out his own writing. [Laughter.] At any rate the right hon. Gentleman said they were in such a position in Egypt that they were bound to look after the safety of that country, and they had a right to do so. He believed the right hon. Gentleman went as far as that.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: That is a very different thing.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked had it not reached the right hon. Gentleman that several Powers in Europe considered this country had no right to be in Egypt, that they remained there against their pledges, and were dishonouring themselves by doing so? "Temporary" as far as our occupation of Egypt was concerned, meant 15, 20, or 30 years, and there was not the remotest intention at present of leaving the country. It had been said we were there by the wishes of Egypt. But its Ministers and Assembly protested whenever they had a chance against our being there. The Ministers were told they must understand that their places depended on being our subordinate instruments and slaves, and to talk of the country having any voice in the matter under such circumstances was ridiculous. Then it was said we were occupying Egypt to teach the people self-government. Let the people of Egypt learn self-government by governing themselves. We have not yielded to the Egyptians a vestige of self-government. We had distributed well paid employés all over the country, and we governed by those employés who could not say their souls were their own. He joined with the right hon. Member for Bodmin in hoping that the Egyptian Government would not be recouped. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said they had the right to borrow up to £1,000,000 sterling. They had the right to temporarily borrow that sum for current expenses and issue Treasury bills. But this Vote was not in the nature of Treasury bills but a permanent loan, only to be paid off when they had the money. It was most desirable that the Egyptian Government should understand that it could not wage wars and bully the money out of others. [Cheers.] Dr. Johnson said that patriotism was "the last refuge of scoundrels." [Laughter.] The last refuge of a Minister when he had no better reason to give for his policy was a general plea of philanthropy. [Renewed laughter.] When the Chancellor of the Exchequer got down to that he had got down to the lowest abyss. Were we to go careering about the world to look for a country which was in difficulties, and when we had found one to undertake an expedition to make that country our own? If that was the right hon. Gentleman's philanthropy it should, like charity, begin at home. If Armenia had been as easy to get at as the Soudan we should have made an expedition there. The Chancellor of the Exchequer sneered at the Armenians. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] He said, "Are black men nothing?" He himself believed the Soudanese were brown rather than black—[laughter]—but what did it matter whether a man was a Mahomedan, Buddhist, or Christian? He would prefer to spend money in defending the Armenians than the Soudanese. He understood the Soudanese were ready to be killed rather than submit to foreign rule. It was said we remained in Egypt because the Egyptians were not capable of governing themselves. Yet we were going to impose on the Egyptians the obligation of governing the Soudan. There were two reasons why the expedition to Dongola was undertaken. The first was that we might keep well with France and Germany, and the next that we might back up the Triple Alliance. But a stronger reason still was that we ourselves might extend our territory on the southern frontier of Egypt and increase the area of our dominion in that part of the world. It was perfectly absurd to tell the House that we were likely to get out of Egypt quicker because we had undertaken this Soudan expedition. He intended to do his utmost by his vote—a miserable way of doing it when in such a minority—to show that Radicals would have no part in this policy of continuous occupation of Egypt, and still less in this expedition which was undertaken by a vague jingo feeling to be developed and kept up every year to first take one country and then another. The right hon. Member for Bodmin said he did not think Lord Salisbury had changed his mind. But there was no question but that Lord Salisbury had changed his policy. A few years ago Lord Salisbury declared that it was impossible to conquer the Soudan. The answer was now, "We are showing you we can conquer it." That was a gambler's answer. It was no argument that we should conquer the Soudan because we could do so. But we had not conquered the Soudan. He believed Lord Salisbury was a more sensible man than the majority of his Party. [Ministerial laughter.] Lord Salisbury had made a concession, but he had always noticed that concessions Lord Salisbury made to hon. Gentlemen were in words rather than deeds. There were only two strong Little Englanders in this country—Lord Salisbury and himself. [Much laughter.] Lord Salisbury in the exigencies of his position as Leader of the Conservative Party had changed his policy but had not changed his own opinions. The right hon. Member for Montrose said that the Government must have been mad in undertaking this expedition to Dongola. Hon. Members might have heard of a monarch called King Cambyses, who, having acquired and squatted Egypt, tried to conquer the Soudan. The consequence was that when he got there his friends came to the conclusion that he was mad, and he disappeared. [Laughter.] The Government had only to go on asking for money for these expeditions, and they would cease to live as Ministers of the Crown. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) thought we should pause before we went any further in the Soudan. We had pledged ourselves over and over again as to what our policy in Egypt should be. He had refreshed his memory as to the terms of those pledges, and they were such as, if made between honourable men in private life, would constitute a strong obligation. He would like to put this question to a simple test. He would like to take his own, or any other constituency, and try to ascertain if 90 out of any 100 persons could put down on paper what were in their opinion the advantages to be gained, not by Egypt but by the people of Great Britain and Ireland, by the policy of the Government. Though it was possible that the other 10 might be able to formulate reasons which would satisfy themselves, he undertook to say that every one of them would differ. No doubt the English officers in Egypt had been doing magnificent work; but wherever a British officer was put down to do a piece of work he did it well, and made the country in which he worked better than he found it. The work they had done in Egypt might be a very good thing for Egypt, but was it an equally good thing for the people of this country; for, after all, he had an infinitely greater regard for the people of this country than he had for the people of Egypt. It was suggested that the waterway of the Nile and that the commerce of Egypt were of great importance to this country, but he did not see that we need lose the commerce of Egypt if some international arrangement was arrived at, and even if we had ten times the amount of commerce which Egypt offered to us, it would not compensate for ten minutes of the international conflict that might be forced upon us by our remaining in the country without some such arrangement. It could not be contended that Egypt was of any military advantage to this country. There was a consensus of opinion on that point. That was the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief and of the Prime Minister, and it was only common sense to say that it could not be a source of strength to this country to have 3,000 men in Egypt, with a base 4,000 miles from the centre of the power of this country, and separated from it by powerful and it might be hostile Powers. Moreover, it was also the universal opinion that the very idea of using the Canal as a means of communication in time of war was preposterous. It was clear, therefore, that, from a military point of view, no advantage accrued to this country. On the other hand, there could be no doubt that the danger which was inherent in the situation was something extraordinary. He had always held very strongly that there were matters on which we came into conflict with French opinion, to combat which it was undoubtedly right that the whole power of this country should be used; but he admired the French nation and had no desire to run the risk of a quarrel with them on this matter. It might be shown that we had a good argument here and there, but the main fact remained that we were pursuing this policy in direct hostility to France and Russia, whether they were right or wrong. No one had a greater belief than he had in the power of this country. He believed that still, even in the changed state of the world, the British Empire was the strongest Power existing, on one condition and one condition only, that the whole force and power of the Empire was exerted with the consent and enthusiastic support of the Anglo-Saxon population, and he did not think it possible to secure the support of the country in a campaign arising in Egypt on this question with that unanimity which could alone justify the Government in undertaking it. There might be reasons for this policy which had not been confided to the House and which might throw a totally different light on the question, but if that was so, he did not see why the House should not be told of them. There was an old fable of the giant who recuperated his strength every time he touched Mother Earth. He would reverse that fable and say that every yard we went from the only element which was the source of our strength, we endangered our position in the world. He had no wish to appear as an alarmist about dangers from abroad, but he would point out that in India we were governing a great country that was a great strain on our powers. We kept up there 70,000 British troops and a native force of 200,000, and we did not find that excessive for the purpose. Were we now to take in hand a second India, were we to undertake the administration of another great country without taking any of those precautions which experience had taught us ought to be taken? He could not see any compensation held out at the present moment for the efforts we might be compelled to make, and he would feel much happier in his mind if he thought that Her Majesty's Government realised that there were only two alternatives in this matter. One was that by the diplomacy of their great chief, some arrangement might be made by which this bone of contention between the Powers of Europe might be removed, and by which this country might administer Egypt with the full consent of the Powers of Europe. The other alternative was to continue their policy in defiance of the other Powers of Europe. If the Government were going to adopt the latter course let them, at all events, take ordinary, reasonable precautions, such as reasonable men of business would take when undertaking a great risk. Let them double the army and double the navy, strengthen the Mediterranean garrisons, and make all the preparations necessary for a contingency which every man in the House knew was not inconceivable and not altogether improbable; for, he contended, when the Government were deliberately adopting a policy which brought them into constant and irritating conflict with two great Powers, they did run risks which it was absolutely futile to ignore.

*Mr. H. M. STANLEY (Lambeth, N.) said that if his hon. Friend below him was not an alarmist of an extreme character, he did not know how he would define the word. [" Hear, hear! "] He thought the hon. Gentleman was even more so than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose. "What are you doing in Egypt?" they asked one after another. "We do not understand your policy. You are offending France and you are offending Russia, and you are preparing for a great war." That was the meaning of the speeches he had heard so far. He entertained the very opposite view, and he could see nothing at all alarming in the situation in Egypt or in any purview of the world he could take round about it—[" hear, hear! "]—and, if we kept our temper, he did not see why we should not emerge successfully from the dismal possibilities that were suggested. The British troops were merely acting as policemen in Lower Egypt. They were Egyptian troops, under the leadership of British officers, who were marching up the Nile. There was nothing at all alarming in the position of affairs. Two P. and O. steamers could, if necessary, bring away the entire British force; and all the fleets of France and Russia could not prevent them. In going to Abu Hamed and building a railway from there to Wady Halfa the Government were taking a more important step than even the march upon Dongola. At Abu Hamed they would command the entire White Nile. It was a splendid strategical position, and, possessing it, they might be said to cut the Soudan in two. The right hon. Member for Montrose took an extremely dismal view of the case. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman what were the Government doing in Egypt more than Russia was doing in Siberia, or France between the Senegal and the Niger? They were building railways to exploit their territories. Egypt was doing exactly the same thing, and the British Government merely stood by approving and advising. The same tone of exaggeration was heard now that had marked the discussion last year, when it was said that we were locking up our forces in the Soudan. The right hon. Member for Montrose said these were delicate and dangerous transactions. What was delicate and dangerous? Staying in Egypt until we thought it absolutely necessary that we should leave? The only imprudent language used had been that of the right hon. Gentleman himself. As he listened to the right hon. Gentleman he got a beautiful insight into the causes of the instability and vacillation of the Gladstonian Government of 1880. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to him to be saying:—

> "It was I who caused all that vacillation; it was I who caused that railway to be laid down and then taken up again; it was I who sent the expedition too late to Khartoum; it was I who caused General Gordon to be lost; it was I who sacrificed the interests of the Soudan."

Mr. J. MORLEY: May I remind the hon. Member that I was not a Member of the Government of that day?

*Mr. STANLEY said the right hon. Gentleman had stated that he had been for the last 12 or 14 years a most energetic opponent of these Soudan expeditions.

Mr. J. MORLEY: Yes, from the quarter where the hon. Member is now speaking. [" Hear, hear! "]

*Mr. STANLEY: As an adviser of the Government.

Mr. J. MORLEY: I moved an Amendment against Mr. Gladstone's Government on this very subject.

*Mr. STANLEY repeated that he read in the right hon. Gentleman's remarks the reason for the vacillation of the Gladstonian Government. That Government showed the same singular timidity which was manifested by the right hon. Gentleman now. The present Government knew exactly what they were going to do. [Ironical Opposition cheers.] They were not going a mile further than their strength would permit; every advance would depend on financial and political considerations. At present their objective was Abu Hamed, and it was as easy of access as his house was from there. [Laughter.] He appealed to hon. Gentlemen opposite to take courage; he had studied the question as much as any man in the House, and he believed this expedition to Abu Hamed would result in remarkable consequences, not only to Egypt and the Soudan, but to the whole world.

Mr. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) moved to reduce the Vote by £72,500, which was approximately the amount that Ireland would have to contribute.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: As I informed the hon. Member the last time he tried to raise that question, it would be distinctly out of order on a Supplementary Estimate.

Mr. KNOX pointed out that in this case there had been no previous estimate before the Committee.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: The matter cannot be discussed on this Vote; it is not relevant. Even if the hon. Member succeeded in diminishing the amount it would not relieve Ireland from contributing her share.

Mr. KNOX said he would move the reduction as a matter of protest. This was a question for the taxpayers. The taxpayers of England could look after themselves; but on behalf of the taxpayers of Ireland he objected to this enormous expenditure on a futile expedition. Unless they attacked the expenditure year after year, and voted for economy, however unpopular it might be, they would not release the people from the burden of taxation that was pressing on the country. He did not take the extreme line of contending that Ireland had no interest in any Imperial expenditure outside her own shores. Ireland was as much interested as any other part of the Kingdom, in expansion in regions where white men might labour and flourish. But he denied that the mass of the people either in Ireland or Great Britain were in favour of expansion in the Nile Valley. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had used language about the tribunals of Egypt which would have been out of order if applied to the Courts of this country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that he intended to consider whether the Court that had decided against him could not undergo some change. Many international lawyers were of opinion that the decision of the Court was right; yet the right hon. Gentleman said that when the opportunity arrived he should upset the Court. Against such language he protested, because it might be expensive language for Ireland as well as Great Britain. The threat to establish a different sort of mixed tribunal, or perhaps an exclusively English tribunal, was a threat deliberately directed against France and Russia. They had been told that the first cause of the expedition to Dongola was to relieve the Italians, but as against that there was the statement of the late Minister for Foreign Affairs in Italy, that the Italians did not want our intervention. There was, he knew, a conflict of opinion as to what was really said at an interview at the Foreign Office, but whether the Italians asked for this aid or not, Irishmen had no desire to pay for what had been done or to do anything that would encourage the Italian Government in their disastrous policy in Africa. The real object of British policy had been to checkmate France. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that France and Russia would not "worry" England out of Egypt. Well, he did not suppose that they would be able to worry England into keeping her pledges by anything short of force. Irishmen knew by long experience that force was the only thing that would make the English people keep their plighted word. When the Government said to the French and Russians that they would not be worried out of Egypt, they were telling the French and Russians that if they wanted to get the British out of Egypt they must take more formidable measures than worry, and must use their armies and navies to do it. As the representative of a country which had to pay far more than its full share of Imperial expenditure, and which contributed far more than its fair share of fighting men to the Army that in the case of war would be sent to wage a hopeless contest against Powers that were infinitely stronger than England, he protested against the right hon. Member's note of menace against France and Russia. In Ireland they had no reason to regard France in any other light than in that of an old ally and friend, and for the last 80 years France had been, on the whole, more friendly to England than Germany had. France had shared with England the folly of the Crimean War, and had helped her on many other occasions. He failed to see any ground for the Government taking this attitude against France on the present occasion, unless it were that they were the catspaw of Germany. Of course the German Empire had supported the action of England before the mixed tribunal, but it was not out of love for this country. It was because Germany knew that anything that would embroil France and England would be to her advantage, for a dispute between the two countries would divert the attention of France from her lost provinces and the attention of the people of this country from affairs in South Africa. It was thus to the interest of Germany to aid England in making this new departure in her Egyptian policy. Ministers had said that England would clear out of Egypt as soon as the Egyptian people were fit to govern themselves. It amused Irishmen to hear of this preparation of Egypt for self-government. For 700 years England had been teaching the Irish people how to govern themselves, and apparently they were not yet fit to do so. At any rate, England refused them self-government. If England was not to fulfil her pledges to Europe by leaving Egypt until she had fitted the people for self-government, 700 years, judging from Irish experience, might elapse before that consummation was arrived at. There was not the slightest possibility of Egypt being able to govern herself in the ordinary European sense within any reasonable period of time. If the British Government would consent to some system of European control for Egypt, the reality of their pledges might be believed in. But if they said that they would not leave Egypt until the occurrence of an event which they knew was not likely to occur in the lifetime of any man in that House, they were practically telling Europe that they were going to break the pledges which they had solemnly given. The right hon. Member for Bodmin had spoken of Egypt having been handed over to her creditors. He protested against this notion of handing over a country to its creditors as if it was a limited liability company. Why was it that this doctrine had not been applied in the case of other European countries? There was hardly a self-governing country in the world that had borrowed money abroad and that had not afterwards gone into bankruptcy and refused to pay. Even Italy had taxed its coupons, which was a gross breach of faith with the creditors. Why had not Italy been forced to pay to the uttermost farthing? The reason why the doctrine had been applied in the case of Egypt was because her people were helpless. If Egypt had been allowed to go on her own way, the fellaheen might have been subjected to some injustice, but they would not have been as heavily taxed as they were to-day. Sir Edgar Vincent, in his book on the Finances of the Ottoman Empire, pointed out that since the English had taken possession of Egypt the yield of the taxation of tobacco had increased sevenfold. That showed how the policy of the British administration of Egypt had been to screw the last farthing out of the people for the benfit of the bondholders. In fact, the policy which was being pursued in the case of Egypt was the same as that which had been pursued in Ireland for so many years. They had been told that there was to be no further expenditure on the Egyptian expedition this year. But was the financial year meant or the calendar year? They were not told how far the Government intended to go. Perhaps to the Mountains of the Moon. What they did know was that further sums would be demanded time after time for these expeditions which did not serve the interests of the mass of the people either of Ireland or Great Britain. They were told that these expeditions would destroy the tyranny of the Khalifate; but, bad as the Khalif might be, he doubted whether he was much worse than some of the other Mussulman potentates who had been backed by British power—for instance, the Sultan of Morocco. The cruelties of the Khalif might go on for a long time if it were not that the Government thought the territory could be obtained without much trouble and without any European Power interfering. He should protest against this proposal at every stage and at every opportunity allowed to the Irish Members. They might try whether worry might not bit by bit force the Government to deal with the definite grievances of the Irish people. He believed greatly in the power of worry, and he believed that France and Russia had done an excellent bit of work in protesting as they had done. Though their protests might not have kept back this expedition, still in the end those protests would tell, because they had prevented the Government from regularising their position as they might have done. The Irish Members, therefore, would "worry, worry, worry," until they forced the Government to pay attention to Ireland's definite grievances, and as an instalment of that "worry" he moved the reduction of the Vote by £72,500.

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 29; Noes, 139.—(Division List, No. 18—appended.)

AYES.

Allen, Wm. (Newc.-under-Lyme)
Bayley, Thomas (Derbyshire)
Brigg, John
Caldwell, James
Channing, Francis Allston
Clough, Walter Owen
Colville, John
Curran, Thomas B. (Donegal)
Dilke, Rt. Hon. Sir Charles
Farquharson, Dr. Robert
Gilhooly, James
Gourley, Sir Edward Temperley
Hedderwick, Thomas Charles H.
Hogan, James Francis
Lawson, Sir Wilfrid (Cumb'land)
Macaleese, Daniel
McKenna, Reginald
McLeod, John
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
Pinkerton, John
Provand, Andrew Dryburgh
Roberts, John Bryn (Eifion)
Samuel, J. (Stockton-on-Tees)
Smith, Samuel (Flint)
Sullivan, Donal (Westmeath)
Ure, Alexander
Wedderburn, Sir William
Wilson, Henry J. (York, W.R.)
Wilson, John (Govan)

TELLERS FOR THE AYES, Mr. Knox and Mr. James O'Connor.

NOES.

Allhusen, Augustus Henry Eden
Atkinson, Rt. Hon. John
Bailey, James (Walworth)
Baillie, James E. B. (Inverness)
Balcarres, Lord
Baldwin, Alfred
Balfour, Rt. Hon. A. J. (Manch'r)
Balfour, Gerald William (Leeds)
Banbury, Frederick George
Barry, A. H. Smith- (Hunts)
Bartley, George C. T.
Bathurst, Hon. Allen Benjamin
Beach, Rt. Hon. Sir M. H. (Brstl.)
Bethell, Commander
Bhownaggree, M. M.
Bigham, John Charles
Blundell, Colonel Henry
Brodrick, Rt. Hon. St. John
Brookfield, A. Montagu
Bucknill, Thomas Townsend
Butcher, John George
Cavendish, R. F. (N. Lancs.)
Cecil, Lord Hugh
Chaloner, Captain R. G. W.
Chamberlain, J. Austen (Worc'r.)
Chaplin, Rt. Hon. Henry
Clare, Octavius Leigh
Clarke, Sir Edward (Plymouth)
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse
Colomb, Sir John Charles Ready
Colston, Chas. Edw. H. Athole
Compton, Lord Alwyne (Beds)
Cook, Fred. Lucas (Lambeth)
Corbett, A. Cameron (Glasgow)
Cranborne, Viscount
Cross, Alexander (Glasgow)
Curzon, Rt. Hn. G. N. (Lnc., S.W.)
Curzon, Viscount (Bucks.)
Dane, Richard M.
Digby, John K. D. Wingfield-
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Ferguson, R. C. Munro (Leith)
Fergusson, Rt. Hn. Sir J. (Mnc'r.)
Field, Admiral (Eastbourne)
Finch-Hatton, Hon. Harold H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Fisher, William Hayes
Fison, Frederick William
Flannery, Fortescue
Forster, Henry William
Foster, Colonel (Lancaster)
Fry, Lewes
Gilliat, John Saunders
Godson, Augustus Frederick
Goldsworthy, Major-General
Gordon, John Edward
Gorst, Rt. Hon. Sir John Eldon
Goschen, Rt. Hn. G. J. (St. G'rg's.)
Goschen, George J. (Sussex)
Graham, Henry Robert
Green, Walford D. (Wednesb'y)
Gretton, John
Hamilton, Rt. Hon. Lord Geo.
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robert Wm.
Havelock-Allan, General Sir H.
Heaton, John Henniker
Helder, Augustus
Hill, Rt. Hn. Lord Arthur (Down)
Hoare, Edw. Brodie (Hampstead)
Holland, Hon. Lionel Raleigh
Hopkinson, Alfred
Houston, R. P.
Hutton, John (Yorks, N. R.)
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Kenny, William
Kenrick, William
Knowles, Lees
Laurie, Lieut.-General
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks)
Lea, Sir Thomas (Londonderry)
Llewelyn, Sir Dillwyn- (Sw'nsea)
Loder, Gerald Walter Erskine
Long, Col. Charles W. (Evesham)
Long, Rt. Hn. Walter (L'pool.)
Lorne, Marquess of
Lucas-Shadwell, William
Macartney, W. G. Ellison
Macdona, John Cumming
McCalmont, Maj.-Gn. (Ant'm. N)
McKillop, James
Mellor, Colonel (Lancashire)
Melville, Beresford Valentine
Meysey-Thompson, Sir H. M.
Monckton, Edward Philip
Monk, Charles James
Moon, Edward Robert Pacy
More, Robert Jasper
Murray, Rt. Hn. A. Graham (Bute)
Murray, Charles J. (Coventry)
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Oldroyd, Mark
Penn, John
Phillpotts, Captain Arthur

Pierpoint, Robert
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Pryce-Jones, Edward
Purvis, Robert
Pym, C. Guy
Renshaw, Charles Bine
Richardson, Thomas
Ridley, Rt. Hon. Sir Matthew W.
Ritchie, Rt. Hon. Chas. Thomson
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Samuel, Harry S. (Limehouse)
Sharpe, William Edward T.
Simeon, Sir Barrington
Sinclair, Louis (Romford)
Smith, Hon. W. F. D. (Strand)
Stanley, Lord (Lancs.)
Stanley, Edw. Jas. (Somerset)
Stewart, Sir Mark J. M'Taggart
Strauss, Arthur
Talbot, Lord E. (Chichester)
Thornton, Percy M.
Wanklyn, James Leslie
Warkworth, Lord
Warr, Augustus Frederick
Webster, R. G. (St. Pancras)
Webster, Sir R. E. (Isle of Wight)
Welby, Lieut.-Col. A. C. E.
Wharton, John Lloyd
Whittaker, Thomas Palmer
Williams, Joseph Powell-(Birm.)
Wolff, Gustav Wilhelm
Wyndham, George
Wyndham-Quin, Major W. H.
Yerburgh, Robert Armstrong

TELLERS FOR THE NOES, Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

On the return of the CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, after the usual interval,

*MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs) resumed the Debate on the main question. He said there could be no doubt of the strength of the controversial case against the policy and proposals of the Government in regard to the Soudan; and that some of the language used in presenting those proposals might be open to exception. In the first place they were confronted with the problem of "Who is to pay?" and with the unsatisfactory results of the attempts which had been made to solve it. Then there was the query whether the Dongola expedition was just what was needed, when it took place, to soothe the lively suspicions of the European Powers regarding the motives underlying our action in trying to save the Armenians. There were also the questions whether the security of the province which had been recovered for Egypt could be set against the massacres which had taken place under the Sultan, and whether anything was better calculated than the Dongola expedition to reduce our position of "splendid isolation" to one of sheer impotency at Constantinople. There was further the unfortunate impression that had been made by the number, the variety, and the general futility of the reasons offered in favour of the expedition. There was also the feeling amongst those who particularly desired the evacuation of Egypt, that the road to that goal hardly lay through Dongola. He was not sure that that view was entirely correct; but the feeling existed on both sides of the House and everywhere abroad that the occupation of Dongola was a step rather against the evacuation of Egypt than in that direction. It was not surprising, therefore, that there was a strong opposition to the Vote. But there were strong elementary facts connected with the present situation which underlay all else. They had to regard accomplished facts which relate to the future of Egypt and to the policy of the Government as the acting trustee for Egypt. The expedition, however ill-timed, was a success. Dongola was occupied. The weakness of the Khalifa was exposed. So long as the Khalifa was all-powerful, or was supposed to be, he was able to hold the Nile against all comers. He stopped the development of Egypt; but he was the foe to all advances upon the Nile valley. The expedition to Dongola had changed all that. In his view the pivot of the whole question of the movement into the Soudan was the condition of the Khalifa's power. Once that power was broken up, whether from internal causes, or external causes, the re-occupation of the Nile valley became easy and opportune. The break-up of the Khalifa's power meant anarchy in the regions over which he had exercised his despotism, and a condition of weakness upon the Egyptian frontier that would oblige us to interfere. But it involved more than that. It created a standing temptation to other Powers, whether advancing from the West, or through Abyssinia, to establish claims in the Nile valley. Therefore, if we did not allow Egypt to go forward we would leave interests on the Upper Nile open to others. Indeed, by standing deliberately aloof now we would almost invite other Powers to go in, to the prejudice of Egypt, for whom we were trustee, as well as to our own prejudice, and while our interest in the matter was important that of Egypt was vital. Having occupied Uganda, our influence should extend until it met the influence of Egypt. He believed that this policy would rather remove obstacles to our evacuation of Egypt than tend to unnecessarily prolong our occupation, for one of the great objections to quitting the country was the want of a settled frontier for Egypt towards the south. The break-up of the power of the Khalifa was therefore the beginning and end of his belief that the forward policy had become the right policy. It was right first because, whether they liked it or not, it was practical and opportune; and, secondly, because it was necessary to prevent new dangers and developments which were dormant so long as the Khalifa's power was not known to be so broken as to invite attack on the part of other Powers. It might, of course, be said that while acting professedly in the interests of Egypt we were doing it with our own money. But so far as that was concerned Egypt left alone could do it without us, if the Powers did not hold her purse-strings, and if they drew those strings absurdly tight—as they had often done for political reasons to suit themselves—he did not see why we should not ease the tension for reasons which suited us. It suited us to take that course now, for being on the Upper Nile we wanted the valley opened, and we preferred that it should be occupied by a Power that would at least be neutral. Our obligations to Egypt and to ourselves in this matter coincided, apart from the question of our actual occupation of Egypt at the present moment. Therefore, however much the Government might be blamed, and as he thought rightly blamed, for the time and the manner in which this expedition was conceived and carried out, he was unable to vote against the granting of the sum of money which was asked for.

*MR. SHARPE (Kensington, N.) said the Soudan expedition, so far as it had gone, was not alone absolutely necessary, but its extension further up the river Nile was most essential if this country desired to retain the place it occupied among the nations of the world. England was not merely a European Power; it was a great Asiatic Power also; and Egypt being a country with a double face—one towards the Mediterranean and the other towards the Red Sea—it was absolutely necessary if we wished to retain India, and to continue to be the predominant Power in Asia, that we should see that Egypt retained its security, and became a civilised, powerful, and well-governed country. As regarded our power to hold Egypt from India, he would remind them that about 100 years ago its feasibility was proved triumphantly and successfully by the great Lord Wellesley. At the very time when England was engaged in a death struggle with France he sent a few thousand troops from India, landed them at Kosseir on the Red Sea, sent them 100 miles across country to the Nile, and got them down by river to Lower Egypt, with the result that the great Napoleon was obliged to evacuate Egypt, as his troops were caught in a trap. That was a power that we still had—and still more in this age of steam. ["Hear, hear!"] He tendered the Chancellor of the Exchequer his warmest thanks for the patriotic and bold spirit with which he had asserted the position that England ought to occupy in this matter. It was a great and serious trust that had devolved upon this nation, and it had devolved upon them by the deliberate action of France, when invited to join, in refusing the invitation. This country had proved how successfully it could make Egypt happy, flourishing, and powerful. The average Englishman might not know all the reasons for these matters of high policy; but he believed, nevertheless, that any assembly of operatives or artisans, or of men of any class in the country would say, if the facts were laid fairly and fully before them, that they ought not to abandon the position they had occupied in Egypt.

*MR. W. A. MCARTHUR (Cornwall, St. Austell) said he wished to give the reasons which induced him to give his vote in favour of Her Majesty's Government. He did not propose to enter into the earlier question raised by the right hon. Member for Montrose. He felt, as he supposed all of them on that side of the House felt, that to a considerable extent very grave mistakes had been made by Her Majesty's Government in the conduct of this matter. Of course, he spoke without knowledge as to any possible European complications that might have ensued if the Government had taken the course that he would have desired, but he thought it would have been better if the Government had felt themselves able boldly and plainly last year to tell the House of Commons what they intended to do. It was a course, whatever might be the opinion of individual Members of that House, that he felt perfectly certain would have gained them credit in the country, and would have made them more popular in the country even amongst the Members of the Liberal Party. He thought it was a pity that the Government last year did not feel justified in saying that they thought the time had come to undertake what was practically the reconquest of the Soudan and the establishment of Egyptian or English influence up to Khartoum—for his own part, he should not be at all afraid to say beyond Khartoum. The expedition to Dongola had been a brilliant success; there was no question that we had not only conquered a former enemy of this country, but that we had delivered a vast population who regarded us as their saviour, from a grossly tyrannical and unjust rule. [Ministerial cheers.]

Mr. MICHAEL DAVITT (Mayo, S.): When were the Soudanese the enemy of this country?

*Mr. McARTHUR said that whether the Soudanese were the enemies of this country or not they had been under the dominion of the most tyrannical and cruel Power in this world. Any one who had read the extraordinary book written by Slatin Pasha, and who yet said that the Soudanese were not a nation who ought to have been delivered from such gross tyranny, was not a politician imbued with the ideas that dominated the old Liberal Party. [Ministerial cheers.] Whatever in his view might be the mistakes which the Government had made in the conduct of this matter—and he thought that grave mistakes had been made—he was compelled by his conscience, and by the declarations which he had made not only in that House, but to his own constituents, to give his vote in favour of a forward rather than a retrograde policy. [Ministerial cheers.] He had always claimed and been allowed to take a perfectly free hand in regard to foreign or colonial affairs, and he never would admit, whether he was a Member of a Government or of an Opposition, that either foreign or colonial affairs were matters to be brought within the purview of Party politics in that House. [Ministerial cheers.] He had said on a former occasion that he was prepared to support any definite policy proposed by a responsible Government in regard to Egypt, but what would become of the vast population we had taken under our protection if we left Egypt? It was quite impossible for us to leave Egypt, even if we wished to do so, without leaving the country as we found it, without restoring to Egypt those provinces which were hers when we first intervened in the affairs of the country. He did not say that was a policy which would pay England in a monetary sense, but it was a policy which made for righteousness—[Ministerial cheers]—for civilisation, for peace in those disturbed districts of the world, for liberty for an enslaved and oppressed people. [Cheers.] He did not agree with those who thought that England had enough territory to take care of, that England was not capable of taking charge of more native races than she had charge of at present; and, holding the views he did, he felt it would be unworthy in him if he refrained from voting for the proposition Her Majesty's Government had now made. [Cheers.]

Admiral FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) said he would not have intervened in the Debate but for the unfortunate speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast. His hon. Friend alluded to him and other naval men. If naval men could have heard that speech, not a single one of them would have approved of it, for a more chicken-hearted and miserable speech it was impossible to conceive. He was amazed that such weak sentiments should come from a generally strong man, and he entered his emphatic protest against such views as the hon. Gentleman had expressed being uttered by a supporter, or a pretended supporter, of Her Majesty's Government. He was equally amazed at the speech of the right hon. Baronet, the Member for the Forest of Dean, whom he had always regarded as a strong Imperialist. He expected anything from the hon. Member for Northampton, but he was surprised that the right hon. Baronet should utter the sentiments he had given expression to. Two admirable speeches had, however, been delivered from the Opposition benches, and they could well be put as a set-off to the miserable speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast. The Government had nothing to fear from their supporters. There had been no halting or hesitation as regarded Egypt, whatever might have happened in respect to their educational policy. The Members who sat around him were prepared to support as one man the forward policy in Egypt. The situation had greatly altered since some naval men did express rather strong views in regard to the Suez Canal. He remembered Lord Charles Beresford saying that the Suez Canal would be no use to us in case of war, and that it might be our duty to block it. Those, however, were now ancient opinions. If we wanted to evacuate Egypt we could not do so with honour. We had a duty to perform before the world. We were in Egypt by the force of circumstances, and there we would have to remain for some indefinite period, whether we liked it or not. Whether it involved a million now or to-morrow, we could not acquit ourselves of our responsibilities. Allusion had been made by the hon. Member for West Belfast to an international agreement. We had held joint Government and joint control, but that did not answer. If joint control by two Powers did not answer, was it likely that joint control by four or five Powers would answer? Naval men unanimously regretted the necessity cast on the Conservative Government in 1886, to agree to the policy of neutralising the Suez Canal. It was the Government which hon. Members opposite supported which landed us in that unfortunate policy. In 1885 the Conservatives came into office but not into power. The French Ambassador called upon Lord Salisbury's Government to take action under the Note sent to the Powers by Lord Granville, and Lord Salisbury very propery replied that there would be a General Election in the autumn, and he was not sure he would come back with a majority. After the election the Conservatives were quickly turned out, and in came the Government led by Mr. Gladstone. The French Ambassador approached Mr. Gladstone, asking him to ratify the action of Lord Granville. Mr. Gladstone said "No, I am about to bring in a Home Rule Bill, and whatever happens to that Bill, there must be a Dissolution upon it," and, God be praised, the Bill was defeated. There was a Dissolution, and the French Ambassador was put off on that score very properly. Lord Salisbury came into power with a large majority, and then the French Ambassador returned to the charge. Nothing amazed and delighted him more than to see the sagacity which their distinguished Leader manifested on that occasion. Lord Salisbury would not, having regard to the safety of our Indian possessions, agree to any policy of neutrality unless provision was made for the passing of troops through Egypt in case of the canal being blocked. The French Ambassador disapproved of that proposal, but ultimately agreed to not more than 1,000 troops passing through Egypt in one day, and to arms being packed in arm chests. Where would we be if we evacuated Egypt? How would we pass our troops through Egypt if the canal were blocked? Being in Egypt were we not in a better position to guard the neutrality of the canal than we should be if Egypt were in the hands of another Power. The Government had a moral obligation in this matter from which they could not depart, and hon. Members ought to be like a band of brothers, hand in hand in support of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cornwall (Mr. Courtney) in his charming speech made allusion to the good effect of our rule in Egypt. The details were worthy of attention. We have abolished forced labour, we have abolished the courbash, we have reorganised the finances, and we have largely extended the irrigating waters of the Nile. So that now, districts which were once barren were fertile. The occupation of Dongola was, in itself, an argument against the policy of withdrawal. One hon. Member had said he thought the policy of the Government was ill-timed, but it appeared to him that the success of the expedition was a pretty strong proof that it was well-timed. ["Hear, hear!"] But he thoroughly agreed with that hon. Member when he said that, having gone to Dongola, the operations should go further, should go on to Khartoum, and even further than that. [Ironical Opposition cheers.] For his own part, he did not care how far the Government went; the further they went on to the reconquest of the Soudan the better he should be pleased. He had always supported the forward policy of England in Egypt, and he hoped that policy would be continued. For those reasons he should heartily vote for the grant. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) said that for upwards of 10 years he had consistently supported in that House the policy of the right hon. Member for Montrose and the hon. Member for Northampton on this question. Ever since the first occupation of Egypt he had taken every opportunity of protesting against that occupation. The hon. Member for St. Austell had said that the English people were able to take care of and to civilise more native races than we now had sway over. In his judgment the experience they had had recently of certain parts of South Africa—Matabeleland, for instance—were not calculated to encourage humane men in the desire that we should carry on the work of civilisation farther; and for his own part, he agreed with the statement made by the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean that the general results of European interference in the interior of Africa had been enormously to increase suffering and loss of life among the native population. Civilisation in Africa, as understood by European interference, meant the establishment of European vices—the introduction of drink and murderous weapons; and travellers had stated that the track of European civilisation was marked by the skeletons of hundreds of thousands of the inhabitants who had been cruelly slain. He objected to this Vote, in the first place, because it was in reality a grant to Egypt, and in the shape of a mortgage on the country, which would be used by England as an excuse and a justification for indefinitely postponing her occupation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the money was to be advanced to Egypt as a loan, though it was called in the Estimates a grant in aid; but no attempt was made by the Government to explain how the money was ever to be repaid. No answer had been made to the statement of the right hon. Member for Bodmin and the hon. Member for Northampton that, in view of the present condition of Egypt, it was impossible for the Egyptian Government to repay the loan for at least a great number of years. Part of this loan was to be expended in connection with the construction of a railway, and until someone came along and paid England for it, it would be used as an ample argument by England for retaining possession of it. In face of this, was it any matter for surprise that Russia and France should have protested against this loan? The Government seemed to have given the go-by to this important fact. England stood pledged in the face of the whole of Europe to evacuate Egypt as soon as her work was done there. [Ministerial cries of "Hear, hear!"] Yes; but would any responsible Minister rise in his place and say that that work included the reconquest of the Soudan, and all the serious consequences which undoubtedly would result from it? ["Hear, hear!"] Europe could interpret the action of the Government in this matter in no other sense than as a declaration that England held Egypt, and meant to hold it. What he said last year he would now repeat, that he believed the Dongola campaign, or any other campaign for the reconquest of Egypt, was a matter of trifling importance as compared with the opinion of Russia and France on our proceedings. He never doubted that the expedition to Dongola, with the superior weapons, discipline, and command of the Egyptian troops, would be successful; and brave as the Dervishes undoubtedly were, there could be no doubt that any further expedition forward towards Khartoum would be equally successful; but he held that the troubles of this country, and of Egypt, would begin in real earnest when Khartoum was reached. Our embarrassments with Russia and France would then greatly increase. He therefore further strongly objected to the Vote for the reason that he believed it would be calculated to have long, far-reaching, and dangerous consequences to the relations of this country with France. He objected also to the form of the Vote. Last year they had a distinct pledge from the Government, when they were defending their action in the beginning of the Dongola campaign, that no English money beyond the mere expense of the officers would be asked for. But now, after the expedition had been brought to a termination, they were asked to vote the sum of £798,000 to be applied to Egypt. Yet we had no account furnished—no details given to us such as were afforded in the ordinary Estimates of the year. They had no means, therefore, of checking this account. He should like to know who certified it? The Chancellor of the Exchequer in bringing in the Vote did not even deign to give the Committee any details as to how the money was to be spent. Was the account to be checked in the Egyptian Treasury, or by the Comptroller General and the Financial Department, who looked over the Estimates and certified the expenditure by the House of Commons. They were entitled, before they were asked to vote this money, to know whether a new system was to be started in the House of Commons of voting large sums of money to the Egyptian Government, the expenditure of which was to be checked and accounted for, not by the Audit Office of this country but by some institution in Egypt. They had no means of knowing whether a portion of the money might not be disposed of for some purpose different to that for which that House voted it.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I can assure the hon. Member, if it is any comfort to him, that I went through the whole details of this expenditure with Mr. Dawkins, of the Egyptian Finance Department. He accounted to me for the whole of the details, and I am perfectly satisfied. [Cheers.]

*SIR W. HARCOURT: But will the accounts be laid on the Table?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have no objection to lay the accounts on the Table. [Cheers.]

MR. DILLON said that was a very important concession on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. There was another matter on which he would like to say a word or two. They were told last year, and they had been told again this year, that the British Government had nothing to do with this expedition practically speaking—that it was an Egyptian expedition and that it would be undertaken by the Egyptian Government. He thought that it was positively absurd, it was a perfect mockery, for a responsible Minister to stand up in the House of Commons and talk about the Egyptian Government doing this and agreeing to that, when they knew perfectly well that the Egyptian Government sat on the Front Treasury Bench, and that the Khedive was a mere puppet in the hands of British Ministers, and was not allowed to do anything except as Lord Cromer ordered him. They had heard, through this Debate, a great deal of talk about the horrible and diabolical tyranny of the Khalifa, and the desire of the English Government to put an end to it and to set free the subject populations of the Soudan, who were represented to them as groaning under this tyranny. But he had never heard any proof brought forward as to the character of this diabolical tyranny, except the book of Slatin Pasha. It was a most interesting book, but he must confess that he should not be disposed to receive all his statements as gospel truth without some corroborative evidence. He really thought it was an outrageous thing to justify this expedition of the testimony of Slatin Pasha's book, which was quoted in that House as proof positive and sufficient of the tyranny of the Khalifa. Personally, he had his grave doubts about this "frightful tyranny." He was certain of one thing—that the tyranny of the Khalifa was Christian civilised government compared with the conduct of their ally the Sultan of Turkey. He defied anyone in that House to prove that the Khalifa, who was denounced as a most infamous tyrant, had ever been guilty of the cruelty of which the Sultan of Turkey had been guilty in the last two years. It was all humbug—it was to quote the now classical words of Mr. Cecil Rhodes, a sample of "unctuous rectitude." The Chancellor of the Exchequer was wroth because his speech was described as an exasperating and defiant one. He should be very much surprised if that was not the interpretation put upon it to-morrow by the European Press. The right hon. Gentleman said the judgment of the Court of Appeal created a position in Egypt that was intolerable.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: That might become intolerable.

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman said that next year, in the ordinary course, the constitution of the Courts would come up for review, and it would be necessary to raise the whole question of jurisdiction and composition. In what connection would that reconsideration be conducted? To lessen the power of France and Russia in Egypt, and for no other object. ["Hear, hear!"] To put a check on the power of veto of France and Russia would be the object, and certainly France and Russia would exhibit more patience and forbearance than he gave those Governments credit for if they quietly acquiesced in a rearrangement of the Court of Appeal when it was avowedly made to reduce their power and influence. It reminded him of proceedings in Ireland. The Government did not like the composition of the Court, but never quarrelled with the Court until a verdict was recorded against them, and then the remedy proposed was to pack the Court, to get a verdict or to destroy its jurisdiction altogether. France and Russia would have something to say upon that matter, and he would be very much surprised if, before the country was engaged much further in this great invasion of the Soudan, we did not find a deal more concernment with a country much nearer to England than the Soudan, and the scene of operations or friction transferred from Wady Halfa and Dongola to much nearer home. These were the reasons why he opposed the whole policy of this grant. There was another aspect of the case to which he would only allude for a moment, for he would be out of order if he were to bring it into debate. This policy of invasion of the Soudan entailed the building up of a gigantic empire in the heart of Africa. This was what the Tory Party meant, and if these provinces were conquered they would not be handed back to Egypt to be governed, for that would be ridiculous. A great empire was to be built up in the heart of Africa, a great railway and various other developments would follow, entailing a great increase in the Army, of which the beginning was already seen. He would not enter into these matters in detail, but, as an Irishman, and believing that the people of Ireland did not share in the advantages of enormous military and naval expenditure, he protested from an Irish point of view against every addition to that expenditure, and he protested especially against this, which would not bring the blessings of peace and prosperity or any kind of advantage to the inhabitants of the Soudan, but fresh wars, fresh massacres and miseries.

Mr. R. PIERPOINT (Warrington) said he had heard with considerable interest allusions made with a sort of model piety from the other side of the House as to the way this country should fulfil its engagements and the promise given long ago to go out of Egypt. ["Hear, hear!"] But were engagements only to be kept by this country, and by no other country? Had France never entered into any engagements concerning the Regency of Tunis? France had entered into engagements concerning Tunis, engagements as precise and binding as ever this country entered into in regard to Egypt. One or two extracts from official correspondence will show the nature of these engagements. Lord Lyons to Earl Granville, May 10, 1881:—

> "He (M. Barthélemy St. Hilaire) begged me to report at once to Her Majesty's Government in the name of the Government of the Republic and in his own name, and in the most formal and explicit manner, the assurance that the French Government did not intend to annex Tunis. If it should be found necessary to occupy for a time certain points in the Regency with French troops, the occupation would, His Excellency said, be of an essentially provisional character, and would cease as soon as sufficient security had been obtained for the punctual execution by the Bey of the new arrangements, which would be effected by the Treaty which he would be required to make."

Then, again. M. Barthélemy St. Hilaire to Lord Lyons, May 16, 1881:—

> "Your Excellency remembers that on several occasions in my conversations with you I repudiated the idea of the conquest or annexation to France of any part of Tunisian territory. I have no difficulty in repeating here what I have already told you. . . We have no more desire to annex Bizerta than any other part of Tunis."

He knew Tunis pretty well, and had, he thought, been more often there than the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Dilke) had been to Egypt, and he was there three weeks ago. He had known Tunis for a good many years, and he could see nothing whatever in Tunis to lead to the belief that France had the slightest intention of ever fulfilling these engagements; apparently they had not the slightest intention of doing so. He remembered the city of Tunis when the French quarter of the town was very little better than waste land, and it is now built over with streets and boulevards, with French names, and no doubt the French had done exceedingly good work in the city and Regency of Tunis. M. St. Hilaire engaged that France would not annex Bizerta, but, in fact, the French had not only annexed it, but when he was there two years ago they had formed a naval station there. They had dredged the Lake of Bizerta, they had cut a channel between the sea and the lake, they had thrown out two piers into the sea, and they were forming a naval station with forts and guns in the rear of the lake. For himself, he confessed, though perhaps his opinion was not worth much, he regarded the Bay of Bizerta as a dangerous place to lay a fleet in, but it would be a dangerous place for any country at war with France with the French torpedo boats in the lake. That was what had taken place in regard to French engagements so far as Tunis was concerned, and this was an example of how other countries kept their engagements. One very strong reason why this expedition of the Egyptian Government, with the aid and advice of the English Government, should make the advance in the Soudan was that any Power, whether barbarous or civilised, that held the Blue Nile and the Atbara had the fortune and the very life of Egypt in the hollow of its hand. As Sir Samuel Baker had pointed out, it was possible for such a Power, "by throwing a dam across the empty bed during the dry season, to effectually deflect the stream when risen by the Abyssinian rains, and thus prevent the necessary flow towards Egypt," which could be ruined either by flood or famine. Sir Samuel, who was a great authority on these matters in the Soudan, said in a letter he wrote to The Times in 1888:

> "I have seen a spot about 230 miles from the mouth of the Atbara where the river might be deflected without difficulty, and be forced to an eastern course towards the Red Sea."

At the end of the same letter he said:—

> "If I were myself an enemy of Egypt, I know the place where I should commence the fatal work upon the river Atbara."

He thought these were very strong considerations, indeed, as to why this expedition should take place; besides the considerations which had already been given. He would not suggest that it was the intention of France or Russia, or both together, to take possession of the Blue Nile and the Atbara River. He would merely repeat that any Power, whether civilised or barbarous, which held the Atbara and the Blue Nile could actually dictate terms to the Egyptians themselves or any superior Power that held Egypt. That was a terrible danger to contemplate, and England, being in a position of a foster-mother to Egypt, would be very wrong, indeed, not to take every possible means to maintain the safety of the country she had taken in charge.

Mr. PHILIP STANHOPE (Burnley) was bound to say he took a very different view in this matter from that which had been expressed by the hon. Member for Warrington. That hon. Member had laid it down as his first proposition that France, having made certain engagements—which he did not think could be denied—with regard to Tunis, France had not respected those engagements, and was at present in possession of Tunis. He would point out to the hon. Member that, at all events, so far as Tunis was concerned, France had regulated her position in Tunis by diplomatic exchanges with the foreign Powers, and consequently the positon of France in Tunis would be a legitimate and legal position, whereas our position in Egypt was something of a very different kind. The hon. Gentleman had told them that very often foreign questions and difficulties were initiated in that House. Was there ever a speech delivered in that House more likely to initiate foreign trouble than the one just delivered? It was an unprovoked attack on France. France, so far as he knew, was not called into question in that Debate except indirectly as regarded Egypt. But the hon. Member actually went out of his way to make a violent and hostile attack on France, and that was what he called smoothing down difficulties in the House of Commons! He desired not to treat so much the financial as the international aspects of the case, and what, he asked, would be the result to-morrow morning of Continental appreciation of the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? He ventured to predict that it would be said in every capital of Europe that the British Government had now entered upon a new and determined policy with regard to Egypt, that they had made up their minds to disregard obligations and engagements, to flout Russia and France, and instead of allaying the irritation of those countries to provoke and increase it. That was the Government which was at the same time seeking to establish the concert of Europe! The most dangerous and fatal thing with regard to the Armenian difficulties had been that this country had not a good understanding with France and Russia, and was unable to go openly to them as friends without causes of difficulty and complaint between them. He was quite certain that if the Egyptian question had not been an open sore they should have had the concurrence and assistance of France in the settlement of the affairs of Turkey, and thousands of Armenian lives would have been saved. This was an international question of the gravest importance, and one which was bound to expand and extend as time goes on. Did the Government suppose that by what was called "a firm policy" and "putting their foot down"—one of the favourite expressions of hon. Gentlemen opposite—they were going to settle the Egyptian question, and that the French nation—an avowedly high-spirited nation—were going to tamely accept the fact that they had announced their intention of resisting any kind of interference on their part? France had a perfect right by international agreement to take all the steps she had taken in the matter. He did not say that she had been wise. The French Government had often been extremely ill-advised. They would have been wiser had they pursued a less bickering policy. But they were perfectly justified in the general attitude they had taken, and by denouncing the French Government they had not settled the Egyptian question, but possibly had raised international questions of the highest importance. The hon. and gallant Admiral in his breezy speech referred to the neutrality of the Suez Canal, but did not attempt to controvert the statement of the hon. Member for West Belfast—a naval expert—that in the opinion of naval men the Suez Canal would be absolutely useless in time of war. When we first occupied Egypt it was believed that we occupied the nearest military route to India. But this view was now exploded, and the raison d'être for our occupying Egypt for strategical advantages no longer exists. We were called upon to pay a million for what had already been done, and what was to be done in Egypt—in the form of an advance which Egypt was to pay when it could. It was a mortgage upon Egypt, and no doubt it was thought that, as mortgagee, we should have a better claim on Egypt than we already possessed. The most important part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's declaration was that, when the continuation of the Mixed Court of Appeal came up next year, the Government intended to assume a different attitude, and he, himself, supposed they intended to say what hon. Gentlemen opposite had not the courage to say openly:—

> "We have done all these things. We have spent this money. We have advanced into the interior of Africa. Egypt is unable to bear the burden of this enterprise, consequently we, the English Government, having done all this, can claim to announce that our occupation is not a temporary one, which we formerly said it would be, but the permanent occupation of the country."

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I said nothing of the kind.

MR. STANHOPE said he knew the right hon. Gentleman did not, but all he had said led to that conclusion. It was the conclusion that would be drawn from his words by every responsible person in Europe. That being so, was it right that we should make this profound change in our foreign policy and put this enormous charge on our Exchequer, that we should free ourselves from obligations and engagements entered into years ago, without having this matter more fully discussed with the correspondence and papers before us. ["Hear, hear!"]

CAPT. BETHELL (York, E. R., Holderness) denied that the Chancellor of the Exchequer used words provocative to France in his speech. Was it wise on the part of the hon. Member who had just spoken (who, although he had not occupied a responsible position in office, was well known on the Continent) to put the worst interpretation that could be put upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, and misinterpret and caricature his meaning? Was it wise on the part of an hon. Member who advocated international arbitration and peace to try as far as he could to provoke the underlying grievances that existed. ["Hear, hear!"] His hon. friend had observed that France had put herself right with other countries by diplomatic arrangements. That was no doubt true, but was it untrue of England in relation to Egypt? Could it be said that this country had not constantly undertaken diplomatic intercourse with France and other countries in relation to Egypt? He recognised to the full France's susceptibilities in regard to Egypt, but we had our susceptibilities also, though he did not think that in either case they were so enormous that they could not be settled ultimately by diplomatic arrangements. Differing as he did from hon. Gentlemen opposite in regard to the evacuation of Egypt, he was one of those, and he believed there were many on his side of the House, who would gladly be out of it; yet he strongly supported the recent action of Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member for Mayo said he had always been consistent in his opposition to our policy in Egypt, and remarked that the occupation of the country in the interests of civilisation had been marked by misery and slaughter. It was true that the advance of civilisation in its inception had always been accompanied by many dreadful acts, but no man could read the history of the Continent of Africa without recognising that the atrocities of civilisation, if hon. Gentlemen liked to call them so, faded into a shadow by the side of the slaughter and misery which existed before its advance. There could be no man in the House who could say that the rule of the Khalifa had not been accompanied with terrible cruelties. His right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin had given a very clear account of what he considered to be the operation of the Mixed Tribunal and of the Caisse; but he thought his right hon. Friend scarcely left on the House an impression of the true interpretation of the rules which, as he understood, guided the Mixed Tribunal. His right hon. Friend told the House that the Caisse had control over certain surpluses to apply them in particular ways, although there were circumstances when the surplus remaining could be used for extraordinary and exceptional purposes; and the right hon. Gentleman went on to point out cases in which it could be so used, and he left the impression on the House that he was quoting cases laid down by the rules of the Tribunal. But the fact of the matter was that the Caisse was allowed to use their surplus for extraordinary circumstances, and the question was whether the advance to Dongola could be considered an extraordinary circumstance or not. That of course was a matter of opinion, but his right hon. Friend would, he was sure, see that the illustrations he gave were not drawn from the rules which governed the Caisse, and that the real interpretation was to be gathered from the word "extraordinary."

MR. COURTNEY: What I endeavoured to explain was this—I wanted to put before the Committee the view I understood the Mixed Tribunal took of the interpretation of the law.

CAPTAIN BETHELL said he knew his right hon. Friend intended to put that view before the Committee, and he was only telling him that a wrong impression was left in his mind, and he thought in the minds of other Gentlemen. He would now like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a rather complicated question, and it was this. The right hon. Gentleman had not told the Committee why the Egyptian Government agreed to go to the arbitrament of the Mixed Tribunal. He presumed that the Egyptian Government were advised by their British advisers, and it was rather difficult to see why it was necessary for the Egyptian Government to appeal to the Mixed Tribunal. A good deal had been said in reference both to France and Russia by various speakers. Personally he believed our true policy was, as far as we could, to work harmoniously with France and Russia. Touching them as we did in so many quarters of the globe, we were more likely to be benefited by friendly intercourse than by meeting with objections on questions of policy at many turns. At the same time we had our interests in Egypt to guard, and, though he regretted that we were there, and that it was impossible to withdraw, he fully recognised that, while admitting the rights and susceptibilities of France, we must continue to guard our own, without, he hoped, sacrificing the friendship of other countries.

Mr. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvon, Eifion) said that he had never lost an opportunity since he first became a Member of the House, many years ago, of recording by his vote his strongest opposition to the occupation of Egypt. He had always done so, mainly on the ground that we were pledged by our word of honour to give up that occupation. That that pledge had been given solemnly and in unequivocal terms had been admitted by successive Governments both Conservative and Liberal. He should have thought that in an assembly of honourable men and a nation of honest people an admission of that kind would absolutely conclude the question, and that it would have been unnecessary to go into arguments of expediency. But if questions of expediency only were considered, he held that in this respect as well as in private life "honesty is the policy." It had been generally admitted that all the troubles in relation to the Eastern Question during the last two years, and the humiliating position which Great Britain had occupied, arose from the fact that we were universally distrusted on the continent of Europe. What was the reason of that distrust? Was it necessary to go further in search of an answer than the admission that, having gone to Egypt under a distinct pledge, we had calmly and unblushingly broken our word. It was argued that we were entitled to break our word in respect of Egypt, because France had done so in respect of Tunis. That amounted to this—"true, we have acted dishonestly; true, we are great rascals, but then the French are bigger rascals than we are." Was that an argument that could be addressed to any self-respecting people or nation. The conduct of other nations was not the measure of our honour, and we ought, out of self-respect, to carry out our obligation. The hon. Member for St. Austell said that whether we were right or wrong the mistake could not be rectified, but he omitted to state why the promise we gave was that we would withdraw as soon as Egypt was strong enough to maintain itself. But now we saw that Egypt was strong enough not only to maintain itself but to conquer the Soudan. Again, it was asked if we retired, what would become of the Egyptians. We had been in occupation for 15 years, but Egypt existed long before that, and from the earliest dawn of history down to 15 years the Egyptians had been able to govern themselves and carry on their affairs without the supervision of the English Government. What they had done in the past they could do in the future. The Chancellor of the Exchequer put the argument solely on the ground of philanthropy. With respect to that argument, he thought he was justified in applying to it the same description as the right hon. Gentleman himself applied to an argument of the Welsh Members in reference to Welsh disestablishment. The Welsh Members had urged that the cause of religion even in the Established Church would be benefited by disestablishment, and the right hon. Gentleman denounced that argument as a piece of nauseous cant. He thought he was entitled to retort and say that the argument that we were going to declare war against the Soudanese on grounds of philanthropy was a piece of nauseous hypocrisy. If Germany approved of our breaking our word, was that a good reason for breaking it? The reason of Germany's attitude was apparent. Since the war of 1870, the policy of Germany had been to isolate and weaken France as much as possible. Therefore, any policy which was likely to set France and England by the ears was certain to meet with the approval of Germany. These were the considerations which induced Prince Bismarck to suggest that England should interfere in Egypt. We were bound by our pledges and every consideration of honour to evacuate Egypt, and, therefore, he should vote against the proposal of the Government.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I hope that the Committee will now consent to bring this Debate to a conclusion. ["Hear, hear!"] The Members on both the Front Benches who are concerned in the matter have now spoken, and several independent Members on both sides have also spoken. We are dealing with a subject of great international delicacy and complexity, and I cannot help thinking that probably all has been said on this subject that is to the public advantage. I do not wish to press my view on the subject, but I express that view as a Minister of the Crown—["hear, hear!"]—and not merely as a Minister in charge of the business of the House and desiring to bring a Debate to a conclusion. I honestly do not think, after all that has been said on both sides of the question, that any further public object can be served by the continuation of this discussion. I do think it, therefore, for the general advantage that we should draw the Debate to a rapid conclusion, and I hope the Committee will take this suggestion in good part. [Cheers.]

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) said that he quite appreciated the spirit of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, whose advice, he thought, might very well have been given at an earlier hour, and perhaps applied to right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench. He rose for the purpose of putting two or three questions to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Was the new railway to be a continuation of the old one? (The Chancellor of the Exchequer: "No.") Was the cost of the railway already made included in the money which they were asked to vote, and was any useful traffic developing? The only excuse for constructing these desert railways was that they would open up trade. Were there any returns showing that in the way of business the first railway had been a success? With regard to the second railway, they had been told that the material required had been ordered by the Government, and that the Egyptian Government would defray the rest of the cost of making the line. He wanted to know why the Egyptian Government could not pay the whole bill. Then, did the sum of £270,000, which they were asked to vote for material, include the cost of material for building the line or only the rolling stock? He heartily reciprocated the appeal which the Leader of the House had made that nothing should be said in that discussion to make the position of this country difficult abroad. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought that a more courteous disposition towards France might have been exhibited by occupants of the Front Ministerial Bench who spoke earlier in the evening. The somewhat bitter discussion at the commencement of the Debate could not be viewed as having a tendency to promote the peace of the world. He thought that a great deal of excuse might be made for any resentment on the part of France for the incidents in Egypt. We ought to try to allay any bitter feelings that might be entertained by France towards this country. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Sir W. HARCOURT: I do not desire to encourage further discussion, but upon the financial question a suggestion has been made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in voting this large amount of money. We should not introduce the practice of voting these large sums without some full information being given to the House of Commons. I understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will lay on the Table of the House the details of this expenditure. That would be a security we ought to take in pursuance of the practice of the House of Commons—namely, the presenting of the most detailed information as to the expenditure of a Vote of public money.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I will take care that information is duly laid on the Table. [Several hon. Members: "Before Report?"] No, not before Report. I may point out that it does not refer to the actual sum voted, and therefore the details are not in the same position as in an ordinary Estimate which is composed of details. We are voting a lump sum, but full information will be laid on the Table of the House in due course. With regard to what has fallen from the hon. Member, I think he might have spared us his last remarks. [Cheers.] I do not know whether it tends to the peace of the world to attribute discourtesy to Ministers of the Crown with respect to a foreign nation. [Cheers.] I am quite sure, however, that any misinterpretation of remarks does not tend to the good of his own country. [Cheers.] With regard to his particular question I have to say that it is almost absurd to ask whether a military railway, in the first instance made from Sarras to Abu Fatmeh for an expedition for the reconquest of Dongola, pays as a business undertaking. [Cheers.] That railway has not been laid for more than six months or so, but I have no doubt, being as it is the only railway past the cataracts of the Nile to Dongola, that traffic will increase in due course, and I believe it will commercially pay in the end. With regard to the proposed railway to Abu Hamed, I have stated to the Committee that the Vote is for material. That includes material for railway construction purposes in this country and also for rolling stock. The Egyptian Government, as I have said, will pay for the construction.

Original Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 169; Noes, 57.—(Division List—No. 19—appended).

AYES.

Allhusen, Augustus Hny. Eden
Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Ellis
Atkinson, Rt. Hon. John
Bagot, Capt. Josceline FitzRoy
Bailey, James (Walworth)
Baillie, James E. B. (Inverness)
Balcarres, Lord
Baldwin, Alfred
Balfour, Rt. Hon.A.J.(Manch'r)
Balfour, Gerald William (Leeds)
Banbury, Frederick George
Bathurst, Hon. Allen Benjamin
Beach,Rt.Hn. Sir M.H.(Bristol)
Bemrose, Henry Howe
Bethell, Captain
Bhownaggree, M. M.
Blundell, Colonel Henry
Bond, Edward
Bowles, Capt. H. F. (Middlesex)
Brodrick, Rt. Hon. St. John
Brookfield, A. Montagu
Cavendish, R. F. (N. Lancs.)
Cavendish, V.C. W.(Derbyshire)
Cecil, Lord Hugh
Chaloner, Captain R. G. W.
Chamberlain, Rt. Hon.J.(Birm.)
Chamberlain, J. Austen(Worc'r)
Chaplin, Rt. Hon. Henry
Charrington, Spencer
Cochrane, Hon. Thos. H. A. E.
Coghill, Douglas Harry
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse
Colomb, Sir John Charles Ready
Compton, Lord Alwyne (Beds.)
Corbett, A. Cameron (Glasgow)
Cranborne, Viscount
Cross, Alexander (Glasgow)
Curzon,Rt.Hn.G.N.(Lanc.S.W.)
Curzon, Viscount (Bucks.)
Dane, Richard M.
Darling, Charles John
Davenport, W. Bromley-
Digby, John K. D. Wingfield-
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Egerton, Hon. A. de Tatton
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Ferguson, R. C. Munro (Leith)
Fergusson, Rt.Hn.Sir J.(Manc'r)
Field, Admiral (Eastbourne)
Finch-Hatton, Hon. Harold H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Fisher, William Hayes
Fison, Frederick William
Fletcher, Sir Henry
Forster, Henry William
Foster, Colonel (Lancaster)
Fry, Lewis

Garfit, William
Gedge, Sydney
Gilliat, John Saunders
Godson, Augustus Frederick
Goldsworthy, Major-General
Gordon, John Edward
Gorst, Rt. Hon. Sir John Eldon
Goschen, Rt. Hn.G.J.(St.G'rges)
Goschen, George J. (Sussex)
Goulding, Edward Alfred
Graham, Henry Robert
Green,WalfordD.(Wednesbury)
Gretton, John
Gull, Sir Cameron
Gunter, Colonel
Hamilton, Rt. Hon. Lord Geo.
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robert Wm.
Heaton, John Henniker
Helder, Augustus
Hermon-Hodge, Robert Trotter
Hill,Rt.Hn.Lord Arthur(Down)
Hoare, Edw.Brodie(Hampstead)
Holland, Hon. Lionel Raleigh
Houldsworth, Sir Wm. Henry
Hutton, John (Yorks. N.R.)
Isaacson, Frederick Wootton
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Johnstone, John H. (Sussex)
Jolliffe, Hon. H. George
Kenny, William
Kenrick, William
Knowles, Lees
Laurie, Lieut.-General
Lawrence, Edwin (Cornwall)
Lawrence, Wm. F. (Liverpool)
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks)
Lea, Sir Thomas (Londonderry)
Lees, Sir Elliott (Birkenhead)
Llewelyn,Sir Dillwyn-(Sw'ns'a)
Lockwood, Lt.-Col. A.R.(Essex)
Loder, Gerald Walter Erskine
Long, Col. CharlesW.(Evesh'm)
Long, Rt. Hn. Walter (L'pool)
Lorne, Marquess of
Loyd, Archie Kirkman
Lucas-Shadwell, William
Lyttelton, Hon. Alfred
Macartney, W. G. Ellison
Macdona, John Cumming
McArthur, William
McCalmont,Maj.-Gen.(Ant'mN)
McKillop, James
Malcolm, Ian
Martin, Richard Biddulph
Mellor, Colonel (Lancashire)
Melville, Beresford Valentine
Meysey-Thompson, Sir H. M.
Monckton, Edward Philip

Monk, Charles James
Moon, Edward Robert Pacy
More, Robert Jasper
Murray,Rt.Hn.A.Graham(Bute)
Murray, Charles J. (Coventry)
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Northcote, Hon. Sir H. Stafford
O'Neill, Hon. Robert Torrens
Orr-Ewing, Charles Lindsay
Penn, John
Phillpotts, Captain Arthur
Pierpoint, Robert
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Pollock, Harry Frederick
Pryce-Jones, Edward
Purvis, Robert
Renshaw, Charles Bine
Richardson, Thomas
Ridley, Rt. Hn. Sir Matthew W.
Ritchie, Rt. Hon. Chas.Thomson
Robinson, Brooke
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Rutherford, John
Seely, Charles Hilton
Sharpe, William Edward T.
Simeon, Sir Barrington
Sinclair, Louis (Romford)
Smith, Abel H. (Christchurch)
Smith, Hon. W. F. D. (Strand)
Stanley, Lord (Lancs.)
Stanley, Edw. Jas. (Somerset)
Stanley, Henry M. (Lambeth)
Stewart, Sir Mark J. M'Taggart
Stirling-Maxwell, Sir John M.
Sturt, Hon. Humphry Napier
Talbot, Lord E. (Chichester)
Thornton, Percy M.
Tritton, Charles Ernest
Valentia, Viscount
Vincent, Col. Sir C. E. Howard
Wanklyn, James Leslie
Warkworth, Lord
Warr, Augustus Frederick
Webster, R. G. (St. Pancras)
Webster,SirR.E.(Isle of Wight)
Welby, Lieut.-Col. A. C. E.
Wharton, John Lloyd
Williams, Joseph Powell (Bir.)
Willoughby de Eresby, Lord
Wolff, Gustav Wilhelm
Wyndham, George
Wyndham-Quin, Major W. H.
Yerburgh, Robert Armstrong

TELLERS FOR THE AYES, Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

NOES.

Bayley, Thomas (Derbyshire)
Beaumont, Wentworth C. B.
Brigg, John
Brunner, Sir John Tomlinson
Buxton, Sydney Charles
Caldwell, James
Cameron, Robert
Causton, Richard Knight
Channing, Francis Allston
Clough, Walter Owen
Dalziel, James Henry
Davitt, Michael
Dilke, Rt. Hon. Sir Charles
Donelan, Captain A.
Doogan, P. C.
Ellis, Thos. Edw. (Merionethsh)
Engledow, Charles John
Evans, Sir Francis H. (South'ton)
Farquharson, Dr. Robert
Fenwick, Charles
Flynn, James Christopher
Gladstone, Rt. Hn. Herbert John
Gourley, Sir Edward Temperley
Griffiths, Ellis J.
Haldane, Richard Burdon
Harcourt, Rt. Hon. Sir William
Hedderwick, Thomas Charles H.
Joicey, Sir James
Jones, William (Carnarvonshire)
Lawson, Sir Wilfrid (Cumb'land)
Lloyd-George, David
Lough, Thomas
Macaleese, Daniel
MacNeill, John Gordon Swift
McKenna, Reginald
McLeod, John
Maden, John Henry
Morley, Rt. Hon. John (Montrose)
Morton, Edward John Chalmers
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
O'Connor, T. P. (Liverpool)
Oldroyd, Mark
Pinkerton, John
Pirie, Captain Duncan Vernon
Provand, Andrew Dryburgh
Reid, Sir Robert T.
Roberts, John Byrn (Eifion)
Robson, William Snowdon
Samuel, J. (Stockton-on-Tees)
Smith, Samuel (Flint)
Stanhope, Hon. Phillip J.
Sullivan, Donal (Westmeath)
Tennant, Harold John
Thomas, Alfred (Glamorgan, E.)
Ure, Alexander
Wedderburn, Sir William
Whittaker, Thomas Palmer

Tellers for the Noes, Mr. Labouchere and Mr. Dillon.

ARMY SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE, 1896–7.

INDIAN TROOPS AT SUAKIM.

£145,000, Pay, etc., of Indian Troops at Suakim.

Mr. LOUGH asked whether this Vote covered the whole cost of the troops. He thought that the Indian Government ought not to be put to any expense at the present time.

Mr. T. R. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.) said that there were points on which information was desirable. In the past there had constantly been difficulties in settling the accounts as between India and the Home Government. Sometimes the Indian Government had had to wait months and years, and in connection with the Abyssinian campaign the money due from the Imperial Exchequer had to be borrowed. Did this sum of £145,000 represent the general Estimate of the Indian Government? What were the details of the amount, and was it a final discharge, leaving no claims in dispute?

*The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. Powell-Williams, Birmingham, S.) said that yesterday he had informed the hon. Gentleman that the estimate of the total extra cost falling upon India through the use of the troops at Suakim had been framed in India, and, in the opinion of the Indian Government, covered every charge. Since yesterday he had received further information. The estimate was divided into seven heads, each of which had been computed by the Indian Government. The heaviest item was £59,000 for the transport of the troops from India and back. There was also £25,000 for land transit, £35,000 for commissariat, and the balance was made up of such items as pay, medical service, and ordnance. Her Majesty's Government had every assurance that the total sum would cover every expense to which the Indian Government had been put.

Mr. LABOUCHERE said that there were many Members who, like him, desired to divide against this Vote as a protest against the employment of Indian troops at all outside India, and more especially in the Soudan, but they were unable to do so because, if the Vote were rejected, the cost would be thrown on the people of India. ["Hear, hear!"] As a matter of fact, however, a considerable burden would have to be borne by India owing to this expedition. It seemed to him a monstrous thing at a time like the present, when the people of India were struggling with famine for their lives, to tax them in order to carry out a ridiculous, absurd, and iniquitous policy of jingoism in Africa. (Cheers.) He also thought the Committee should be informed what services the Indian troops had done while at Saukim, and whether India or anybody else had benefited to the extent not of £140,000, but of 140,000 pence by this sending of Indian troops, despite the protest of the Indian Government, to occupy Saukim. [" Hear, hear ! "]

Mr. DILLON said that when this question was discussed last year public opinion was overwhelmingly in favour of the Imperial Government providing the pay of the Indian troops while away from India. He therefore thought that as India was suffering from a terrible famine, the Government ought to depart from the selfish and utterly indefensible principle of refusing to pay the wages of the Indian troops they had brought to Suakim. He regretted the forms of the House did not allow him to move an increase of the Vote by £40,000, or whatever might be the amount of the pay of the troops ; and he thought the Government would do well to put down an Estimate for refunding the money to India as a contribution to the famine fund.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he appreciated the spirit of the remarks of the hon. Member for East Mayo ; but they were open to the grave objection that they mixed up two questions that ought to be kept apart. If help from us was required by India, because of the terrific famine, the aid that would be given would be very much larger than £30,000. [" Hear, hear !"] On the other hand, to remit this charge upon India would be to neglect a very important fiscal question of policy between the two countries in regard to the employment of Indian troops in similar cases in the future. [" Hear, hear ! "] While, therefore, he had every desire to consider any application for aid from India—should it be made—he trusted that the suggestion which had been made would not be proceeded with on that occasion.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next ; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

MILITARY WORKS (MONEY) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On the Order for the Second Reading of this Bill,

Dr. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said he thought it was hardly respectful to the Scotch Members that a Bill of this importance should be moved at that hour of the night. He hoped that at some future time they should have some more comprehensive statement than they had at present as to the objects of the Bill. He hoped no one would think that he had any intention of obstructing the Measure, the provisions of which on the whole were extremely beneficial and practical. But the Bill was essentially one of detail, and he hoped at a future time there would be sufficient time to discuss it in Committee. He would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill whether he was in favour of a proposal which he had upon the Paper, to refer the Bill to a Grand Committee composed of all the Scotch Members, with 15 other Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection. He understood that the proposal of the Government was to send this Bill to the Grand Committee on Law, but he thought that proposal was entirely inadequate, and he therefore should propose, after the Second Reading, that the Bill should be referred to such a Committee as he had indicated. He was sure all the Scotch Members would agree with him that they ought to have a Committee of the kind he had mentioned, a Committee which had worked admirably in the past and which would work equally well in the future.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright) was satisfied that the Bill could only be passed if it was referred to a Committee upstairs. The Measure had been before the House in many forms and on many occasions. He had sat on many Committees appointed to consider it, and it was his wish it should pass. The prevailing feeling in Scotland was that the Bill should pass, and, therefore, he hoped the Government would refer it to a Select Committee.

MR. T. R. BUCHANAN said he considered that he and his Scotch colleagues had some reason to complain of the way in which Scotch business was treated. This was a Bill of 171 clauses, and its Second Reading was moved without any notice to Scotch Members, and in the absence of the Member responsible for Scotch business. Last year the Bill, which was mentioned in the Queen's Speech, was passed in the House of Lords, but the Government made no attempt to pass it here. This year it was not mentioned in the Queen's Speech, but was introduced the first day of the Session. Scotch Members showed their good sense in not making any objection to the introduction of the Bill, but they were reasonable in expecting that at this stage the Lord Advocate would be present to explain shortly and clearly the substantial alterations of the law which the Bill would make. The law relating to public health in Scotland required revision, but at the same time the constituencies were anxious to know at this stage the general lines of the reforms proposed by the Bill. The Measure had only been published within the past week, and he and other Members had had no opportunity of consulting their constituents in regard to it. It would greatly facilitate the progress of business and the understanding of this Bill in the House and the country, if either the First Lord of the Treasury or the Lord Advocate explained the principal points of the Measure, and the way in which the proposals affected the existing law. Certainly, if the Bill was to pass at all, it must be passed by a Committee on which every Scotch Member had the power to sit and give expression to his views. If the First Lord of the Treasury could assure them that the Bill would be sent to a Committee on which all Scotch Members would be represented, adding fifteen, or any other number of Members he might think right and proper to give expression to the views of the House, he thought they might take the Second Reading of the Bill without further discussion. [Cries of "No!"]; but in the absence of any explanation by the Minister responsible for Scotch affairs he did not think it right and proper that the Second Reading should be then taken. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie) was sure that Members on both sides of the House had echoed the feelings of Scotland generally when they said that the deepest interest was felt in this Bill. He thought that a Minister of the Crown ought to explain the details of this elaborate and minute Bill to the House. The Bill was one which could not be explained on general principles. It was full of details, and in the interest of business and of Scotland generally, he hoped the House would allow the Second Reading to be taken—[Cries of "No!"]—on the understanding that the Government would arrange that all Scotch Members should be present at the deliberations of the Committee. He did not desire to intrude himself on that Committee with any Amendments. He did not belong to the Standing Committee on Law, but he had received a number of communications with reference to the Bill which would make it necessary for him, if the Bill was to be referred to that Committee, to button-hole the Members of the Committee, and to impress upon them the views of the Scotch people in regard to this matter. [Hear, hear!"]

MR. R. B. HALDANE (Haddington) said that undoubtedly the Bill was one which required much consideration, and it could only be adequately considered in a Committee composed principally of Scotch Members. They had had no Second Reading explanation of the Bill, and it was not too much to ask the Government to accede to the appeal which had been made by Members on their own side of the House to give a pledge that the Bill should go to a Scotch Committee. Unless that pledge was given the Government could not expect to get the Second Reading of such a Bill without considerable discussion. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. J. H. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, Burghs) thought the Scotch Members had reason to complain of the manner in which the Government were treating this important Bill. The Measure had been discussed throughout the whole of Scotland, and yet there was not a single Minister who would pay the smallest respect to Scotland—[cheers]—by giving any explanation of the Bill or any promise to carry out the wishes of the Scotch Members with reference to the one Scotch Bill of the Session. He could not complain of the absence of the Lord Advocate, because this Bill had come on somewhat unexpectedly; but the First Lord of the Treasury was a Scotchman, and a supporter of the Bill, and his name was on the back of it, and he ought not to have left the House when half-a-dozen representative Scotch Members had appealed to the Government to appoint the Committee suggested. That was the way Scotland was treated after a General Election—they would not condescend to say a word in support of their own Bill. [Cheers.] At the General Election, they were promised nothing but Scotch legislation–[laughter]—and the question in his own county was, how much Scotch legislation the Conservative Party were going to give them at Westminster. Under these circumstances, and having in view the importance of the Bill, he did not think they were asking too much in requesting an explanation of its details, and for a promise that such a Committee as the Scotch Members desired would be appointed.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs) said that any differences of opinion that existed with regard to the Bill were apparently on mere matters of detail—[cries of "No!"]—and he hoped hon. Members would allow the Second Reading to be taken. [Cries of "No!"] The composition of the Committee would be considered with every desire to secure a full representation of Scottish opinion.

And it being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned. Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

Mr. R. B. Haldane.

BERRIEW SCHOOL BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday next.

MILITARY LANDS ACT (1892) AMENDMENT BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS (IRELAND) (WOMEN) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday 17th March.

SHOP ASSISTANTS (HALF-HOLIDAY) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Tuesday next.

On the Motion "That this House do now adjourn,"

MR. LOUGH said it was announced in the House last night that Monday would be devoted to getting Mr. Speaker out of the Chair, but just now the First Lord said they would take the Military Bands Bill on Monday. He would like to know whether, if they did not come to the Military Bands Bill on Monday it would be taken on Thursday before the Education Bill.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston) said that the first Order on Monday would be the Army Estimates, with the Speaker in the Chair. There were certain Bills put down in the ordinary way to follow them, but he did not suppose they would be reached.

House adjourned at Five minutes after Twelve o'clock till Monday next

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Monday, 8th February 1897.

INDIAN FAMINE.

*LORD KINNAIRD asked the following questions, of which he had given private notice to the Government: 1st. Whether Her Majesty's Government were in a position to affirm or contradict the statement telegraphed on the 2nd inst. by Reuter's agent from Raipur, in the Central Provinces, that many deaths from starvation had already taken place, that many persons were on the brink of starvation, and that the district, with a population of one and a-half millions, was almost without food supplies? 2nd. In the worst districts of each of the affected provinces, what was now the selling price of grain in common use, (a) in the towns, (b) in the remote interior? 3rd. What did Her Majesty's Government consider to be the retail selling price of such grain which could not be passed without the speedy exhaustion of the cultivation and artisan classes, by which is meant classes above the unskilled wage-earning labourer? He said that the statement of the Secretary of State in another place on Friday last reminded the country of an awful possibility. If the loss of life was estimated at 5,800,000 in 1877-8, out of a population of 27,000,000, what was the possibility of this famine, affecting an area with a population of 40,000,000? If the same ratio of lives were lost the number would reach the appalling total of over eight millions. He had carefully read over the Government's answer to the questions he addressed to them last Monday, and he considered they wholly failed to answer the facts and figures which he ventured to put forward, as he believed, making out a case that the time had arrived when they must on a large scale store grain, and, if necessary, import it from Burma and elsewhere. They were not working in the dark, without precedent to guide them. Of the principal famines of this century only one was successfully grappled with, and that was by Lord Northbrook and Sir Richard Temple, and the other officers working under them, and they were only able to avert horrible destruction of human life by a large importation of grain. The crux of the whole matter was, would private trade do what was necessary? Would it supply grain to even get-at-able districts at a possible price? This necessary help must, as the Lieut.-Governor of Bengal had said, come by grain imported from across the sea. The optimistic prophecies and promises of the Government that they would prevent loss of life had already been falsified. He believed it was now admitted that the situation in the Central Provinces was serious. Reuter's Agency telegraphed the serious news that an area of 12,000 miles and a population of 1,500,000 people was almost without food supply. He was introduced to a gentleman that day who had been 38 years in India, 32 of which were spent in the Government service. He left Bombay on December 14, and he admitted that planters, merchants, importers and others who knew the country well, estimated that up to November 14 there had been 250,000 deaths from practically starvation throughout the famine area. In the Central Provinces there was another burning question, the supply of seed grain, which neither landlords nor tenants were able to get. Did the Government intend to provide seed for the next harvest under the Famine Code? Papers dated January 13 from Calcutta gave an account of a meeting of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. The Committee of that body said:—

> "Having regard to the widespread effect of the present scarcity, the Committee have been impressed by the high range of prices throughout the Province of Bengal. Even in places where the crop has not wholly failed, prices of food stuffs are far in excess of anything marking the beginning of scarcity in 1874 or in 1866. This high range of wholesale prices means a very considerably higher retail price to the people, so that the effect of the demand for food in the afflicted tracts, and in the tracts where the crops have notoriously failed, has led the Committee to infer that stocks throughout the country are low."

The British Indian Association, which always spoke with authority, had also expressed dissatisfaction that steps had not been taken to secure an adequate store of grain which could be utilised at short notice. This, they believed, could only be done by the Government, so that, in the event of a crisis, it might be used in outlying districts. With reference to questions 2 and 3, he ventured to think an assurance was required from the Government that, whenever the rate rose to 18lbs. per rupee, direct orders should be given that imported grain would be brought into the district; for it was an established fact in famine history, that it was impossible for the rate to be 18lbs. per rupee of grain in common use for long without the death of millions, as in Orissa and Southern India. Private trade was sure to be busy about and in seaports and the main lines of railway, and might possibly do all that was wanted there. It did so in Behar, sending in to the distressed parts 50,000 tons a month. This fact showed how futile all the assertions were that the Government by their importing largely—altogether about 500,000 tons—crushed out of activity private trade. It imported again in Southern India, when it threw into the distressed parts of Madras and Bombay 100,000 tons a month; but that grain never got into the remote parts. The prices prevailing along the line of rail were high enough to enable traders to make a profit, and all they could bring was greedily absorbed on the main line. Traders, therefore, had no mind to face the difficulties and risks of the further journey into the remote parts. This was no conjecture, for he had seen private letters from the Central Provinces which arrived last week, speaking of terrible scenes and deaths from starvation. He had received a letter speaking of a district some miles from a town or railway, in which the distress was very acute throughout the villages. At present there were no relief works in those villages, and no possibility of getting Government assistance. The action of the Government in discouraging private charity had made it difficult to collect funds, and the Mansion House Fund was entirely, it was believed, in the hands of the Government for disposal. The difficulty was that the Government either had no information or thought it well to follow the advice of the Leader of the Opposition, that the Indian Government should have a free hand and not be interfered with or troubled with questions. He was not making any complaints against any officials, who were doing most self-denying hard work and using every endeavour to save life. He only hoped that many would not give way under the strain, as one noble worker had done—a Deputy-Commissioner who died of brain fever from the strain put on him by the famine, constantly saying, "These people are dying, and I cannot save them." What the country would require of the Government was, not assurances and promises, but facts justifying the statements put forward, that the Government of India was never in so favourable a position for combating famine. Many high authorities took the opposite view, for prices had been for some years at an exhausting figure, and now the scarcity and increased dearness were more widespread than ever had been the case before. Stocks were not coming forward as expected, and the landlords and people with wealth were clinging to their supplies.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (the EARL of ONSLOW): The noble Lord has not confined himself to asking questions, but has given your Lordships a certain amount of information and has passed some criticism on the action of the Viceroy and his Government, and perhaps your Lordships will forgive me if, before I address myself to answering the questions of the noble Lord, I deal for a moment with what he has said. In the first place, I am not aware that the Government of Lord Elgin has at any time made any promise or statement that the Government would be able to prevent entirely loss of life. I think the statement made was that the Government had recognised that it should be in such a position that no persons need of necessity lose their lives; and I would point out that there is a considerable difference between the two propositions. The noble Lord has said that he has been informed that in one particular district there have been 250,000 deaths from famine. I am not in a position to contradict the assertion made by the noble Lord, but I can say this—that if it should hereafter prove to be corroborated and shown to be correct, I should be very much surprised, because it is quite in opposition to all the information we have received; and when the noble Lord asks me whether Her Majesty's Government can affirm or contradict what has been reported by Reuter's agent at Raipur, I can only assure him that it is quite contrary to the information we have received. I am not myself in a position to say what the number of deaths at Raipur may have been, but the Secretary of State has communicated with the Government of India by telegraph, and I shall be glad to hand to my noble Friend a copy of the reply as soon as it is received. The noble Lord has asked me a number of other questions, some of which it is not easy to answer in a general way. The noble Lord asks me what Her Majesty's Government consider to be the retail selling price of grain which cannot be passed without the speedy exhaustion of the cultivator and artisan classes, by which is meant classes above the unskilled wage-earning labourer. If the noble Lord will refer to the Report of the Famine Commissioners he will see that the actual price of grain in a particular district is not really controlled by the necessities of the population or the power of the population to purchase. The Commissioners say that it is a well-ascertained fact that prices which will be regarded as indicating a state of famine in one part of the country are quite compatible with a state of undisturbed prosperity in another. As to what are the prices now obtaining in different parts of India, I can only answer that by referring to the prices in the particular district to which the noble Lord has referred. On December 31, 1896, rice and wheat were obtainable in Raipur at the rate of 10 seers per rupee, while on the same date in 1895, before famine prices existed, rice was obtainable at the rate of 16 seers per rupee, and wheat at the rate of 16½ seers per rupee; so that the noble Lord will see that the price has risen from 16 seers to the rupee to 10. Before I sit down I should like to read part of a telegram received from the Viceroy to-day, which, I think, will go a long way to allay the apprehensions of the noble Lord as to the supplies being insufficient for the wants of India to-day. The Viceroy says:—

> "Our latest information is generally reassuring. Steady prices generally, and fall which has now begun in Punjab and N.W. Provinces, and sufficiency of visible supplies for daily requirements, are favourable indications. Punjab prices reported 15 to 20 per cent. lower than two months ago. Apprehension of failure of stocks would be indicated by rise of prices. Spring crops promise well in Northern India and Hindustan, and ought to add considerably to existing stocks. Sufficiency of existing stocks for all probable emergencies not capable of precise quantitative answer, but no reason to doubt correctness of policy affirmed in your dispatch No. 10 of Jan. 15, that trade as a whole can supply food demand better and more effectively than Government."

I think that in that answer I shall have given the noble Lord some assurance that the Government of India are satisfied that the policy they have adopted and intend to carry out is one which will meet the necessities of the situation.

House Adjourned at a Quarter before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a Quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 8th February 1897.

QUESTIONS.

FOREIGN-MADE PRISON GOODS.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when he proposes to introduce the Bill for the exclusion of the goods made in the prisons of other countries promised in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech, and if he will take care to press it forward sufficiently early in the Session to avoid its being subsequently shelved for want of time?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon): I am not able at present to state when I shall introduce the Bill, but I hope it will not be long delayed.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Will my right hon. Friend make it as soon as possible?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, I hope it will not be long delayed.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK. ACCOUNTS.

MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will state how many accounts in the Post Office Savings Bank showed, on the 31st December 1895, a balance not exceeding £50, in how many accounts the balance was over £50 and not exceeding £100, and in how many over £100?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The number of accounts in the Post Office Savings Bank on December 31st, 1895, with balances not exceeding £50 was 5,858,191; with balances over £50 but not exceeding £100, 346,463; and with balances over £100, 248,943.

POSTAL AND TELEGRAPH SERVICES (REVENUE).

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will state how much of the net revenue of £3,632,122 derived from the combined Postal and Telegraph services for the year 1895–6 was contributed by England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, respectively?

MR. HANBURY: The amount named by the hon. Member is not net revenue, as it includes work done for Government departments, in respect of which no money is received. I do not know what he means by the phrase "contributed." All that is known is the amount "collected" in any country and the amount "expended" in such country, but the amount collected does not bear any necessary proportion to the amount actually expended. For instance, 2½d. collected for a foreign letter may represent at least 3d. expended whereas 1d. collected for an inland letter may represent much less than 1d. expended in respect thereof by the Post Office. Similarly the amounts expended in any country by the Post Office do not accurately represent the cost incurred in respect of that country. The cost of the Irish packet service for instance is all paid in London. The accounts of money collected and expended in England (including Wales) Scotland and Ireland are to be found on pp. 12 and 34 of Parliamentary Paper 336 of 1896.

IMPORTATION OF SPIRITS (SIERRA LEONE).

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can see his way to take any action to put a stop to the importation of the inferior spirit at Sierra Leone, complained of by the Acting Colonial Secretary in Colonial Report No. 160, Sierra Leone, issued in 1896, and described in page 3 as producing terrible effects upon consumers who are our collectors and growers of our produce for export, and being such as is commonly used by painters as driers in lieu of turpentine?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.), replying in the absence of Mr. Chamberlain: I hope to be very shortly in a position to lay before the House all the papers relating to the general question of the Liquor Traffic in West Africa.

FINNER RIFLE RANGE (COUNTY DONEGAL).

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that on the piece of land recently taken by the War Office for the construction of a rifle range at Finner, county Donegal, a cairn of great antiquity, which is held in great veneration by the people of the district, and is believed to contain the ashes of some Irish chiefs, is being demolished and the material used in the construction of the range; and, whether, as this cairn stands on the highest part of the lands and would not in any way interfere with its use, and as the necessary material can be got elsewhere in the neighbourhood, he will instruct the military authorities to stop further demolition of the cairn?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): A report has now been received from Finner, and it appears that there is no cairn at all on the range, but a natural limestone formation from which some twelve cubic yards of loose stones were taken. It is added that there is in the neighbourhood a small cromlech known as Muldoon's grave which is an object of local veneration. This is 100 yards from the supposed cairn, and has not been touched.

ST. HELENA.

ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, why the high rate of postage of 6d. per letter at St. Helena is maintained instead of 2½d. as in all other of our Colonial possessions; and whether in view of the great poverty of the population generally, the recommendation of the Acting Governor in the matter of this excess of postal charge will be accepted, as pointed out in page 5, Colonial Report, No. 176, St. Helena, for 1895, issued last year?

MR. HANBURY: My hon. and gallant Friend is advocating a reform which was carried into effect several months ago. On the 1st of October last the postage on letters from St. Helena was reduced from 6d. to 2½d. per half ounce.

ADMIRAL FIELD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to Colonial Report, No. 176, St. Helena, for 1895, issued last year, where, at page 6, the Acting Governor calls attention to the fact of the growing increase of the female population over the male owing to the emigration of the young men to Cape Colony, and points out the desire of many young women to proceed to the Cape as domestic servants; and whether under the circumstances, he can suggest to the High Commissioner at the Cape to endeavour to arrange with the Cape Government to offer assisted passages from St. Helena to respectable girls to enable them to proceed to Cape Colony where the males are in excess of the females?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am in communication with the Agent General for the Cape Colony on this subject, and shall be glad if it is possible to make some arrangement such as is suggested by the hon. and gallant Member.

EVICTED TENANTS (IRELAND).

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork Co., N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Committees consisting of ex-officio and elected guardians were appointed in the Poor Law Unions of Mallow, Fermoy, and Mitchelstown for the purpose of endeavouring to bring about settlements between evicted tenants and landlords in these unions under sections 46 and 47 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896; and if he will ascertain from the clerks of those several unions how many evicted tenants have been reinstated in their holdings through the efforts of these Committees, and how many landlords have either declined their mediation or failed to reply to the invitation extended to them by these Conciliation Committees?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The Committees to which the hon. Member refers in the Question were not created under the authority of any provision contained in the Act of last year, and though I believe it is true that Committees were formed in certain localities for the purpose indicated, I have no effective means at my disposal of obtaining official information as to the proceedings of such bodies as is suggested in the Question. There have been no settlements effected with evicted tenants under the Act in either of the Poor Law Unions mentioned.

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) asked whether, in view of total failure of this Clause to effect the object which Parliament had in view, he would introduce any fresh legislation this Session?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No, Sir, I cannot undertake to introduce any fresh legislation this Session. I think we ought at all events to wait until the time when that particular provision expires before deciding whether any further legislation is necessary.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was not aware that the clerks of the unions were also secretaries of the Committees, and that therefore there would be no difficulty in getting the information he sought.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.) asked the right hon. Gentleman if he had considered the desirability of obtaining arbitration Courts with compulsory powers for dealing with these cases.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I do not think that would be desirable.

SCHOOL TEXT BOOKS (SCOTLAND.)

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, in view of the fact that in the schools in Welsh-speaking districts in Wales text books in Welsh and English are used, the Scottish Education Department will consider the advisability of adopting text books in English and Gaelic in the schools of Gaelic-speaking districts of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland?

*__The LORD ADVOCATE__ (Mr. Graham Murray, Buteshire): The adoption of text books does not rest with the Education Department, but primarily with the managers of schools. Should the use of such books as the hon. Member refers to be proposed by the managers of any schools, the Department would consider whether it would be expedient to sanction them.

Mr. WEIR asked if the hon. and learned Member was aware that these text books were only allowed to pupil teachers in Gaelic schools in the Highlands whereas in Wales the scholars had these books.

*__The LORD ADVOCATE__ said he had nothing to add to the answer he had already given.

Mr. WEIR said he would put another question on the subject.

NORTH SEA CONVENTION.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Atlantic seaboard of the Island of Lewis is included in the North Sea Convention?

The LORD ADVOCATE: No, Sir.

Captain SINCLAIR (Forfar): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland, whether Her Majesty's Government have taken any steps to ascertain the views of the Foreign Powers, who are signatories of the North Sea Convention, in regard to an agreement as to the extension of the trawling limit upon the east coast of Scotland?

The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS, (Mr. G. Curzon, Lancashire, Southport): The matter referred to is engaging the earnest attention of Her Majesty's Government; but until a decision has been arrived at on the whole question, which involves points of great difficulty, no case arises for addressing a communication to any Foreign Government.

VACCINATION LAWS.

General RUSSELL (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is the intention of the Government to take any action with reference to the Vaccination Laws this Session?

The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Henry Chaplin, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I have carefully considered this question since the Royal Commission reported in September last. The Royal Commission recommended that, amongst other things, a further investigation should be made into the effect of the storage of vaccine lymph in glycerine. I took an early opportunity of instructing Dr. Thorne, the medical officer of the Board, and Dr. Copeman to visit certain foreign cities in order to study and report on the more modern methods adopted abroad as to the preparation, storage, and distribution of glycerinised calf lymph, and to ascertain the results. These officers have visited Paris, Brussels, Berlin, Dresden, and Cologne for the purpose, but their inquiry is not yet completed, and their report, therefore, has not yet been submitted to me. I may say this, however, that on the information before me I have already come to this conclusion—that any alteration of the law will most certainly involve an important and radical change in the matter of lymph supply, and will necessitate consequently a very considerable modification in the system of public vaccination. The hon. Member will see that no time has been lost by the Local Government Board since the report of the Royal Commission was published, and I am quite alive to the importance of this question.

MALL (CONDITION OF ROAD).

Mr. C. J. MONK (Gloucester): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the state of the road between Marlborough House and Buckingham Palace; whether immediate steps will be taken to repair the same: and, whether he has considered the desirability of continuing the wood pavement between Marlborough House and Buckingham Gate?

The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS (Mr. Akers-Douglas, Kent, St. Augustine's): I am aware that this road is not at present in good condition. It has been the custom to repair it twice a year (April and September) but the traffic has been growing so considerably, that it will be necessary to mend the road at shorter intervals in future. I propose to have the work done now as soon as possible. I am now considering the question of laying down wood paving on this portion of the roadway.

DISTRESS (LISTOWEL UNION).

Mr. MICHAEL AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received a resolution from the Listowel Board of Guardians, directing attention to the distress existing among the labouring classes in several parts of the Union, owing to the want of employment and the almost total failure of the potato crop; and, whether, in view of this state of affairs, the Government will see the necessity that exists of opening relief works in the district mentioned?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I have received a copy of the resolution referred to. Careful inquiries which have been made as to the condition of the poorer classes in the Listowel Union do not point to the conclusion that it will become necessary to supplement the resources of the poor law by the opening of relief works.

MILITARY WORKS BILL.

Mr. MONK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will explain to the House the principle upon which grants will be made towards acquiring new rifle ranges out of the £500,000 to be devoted to that purpose; and, by whom applications for grants should be made to the War Office?

The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for WAR (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): There is no intention of making any grants out of this fund. Its object is the purchase in the several districts of ranges at which the regular troops and the Militia can safely practice with the Lee-Metford rifle. Where ranges so acquired are conveniently situated for use by Volunteers, every facility for shooting on the usual conditions will be given to them.

In answer to Mr. Monk,

Mr. BRODRICK said he could not say anything as to the locality in which ranges would be purchased.

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Paper giving the details of the proposed expenditure for defence works and ranges provided in the Military Works (Money) Bill, giving similar particulars to those which had been provided with regard to barracks, before proceeding with the Second Reading of the Bill; and, whether, if he will not furnish Papers, he will now say at what precise places the proposed expenditure on the fortification of London is to be made, and what is the exact nature of the works to be undertaken?

Mr. BRODRICK: It would not be for the public interest that details of the intended defence works should be given. The Government propose to follow the course adopted with the consent of Parliament in 1888 and only to show the amount to be expended in the schedule to the Bill. The general character of the proposed works was explained in introducing the resolution. As regards ranges, the list of stations at which they are to be provided could not be given without largely increasing the cost. In reference to the allusion in the question to the "fortification of London," I would explain to the hon. Member that the works proposed are merely a continuation of those which have been for some years in progress—viz., the preparation of centres for a system of field defences which could be thrown up on emergency. They include, as has already been stated, storehouses for the tools and ammunition necessary for the troops to be stationed at these points.

BARRACKS ACT 1890.

Mr. LOUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will furnish to the House additional particulars showing how much has been expended under the Barracks Act 1890, setting out the structures that have been completed, and giving in each case an estimate of the cost which it will be necessary to incur to complete the works under the new Bill before the House?

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I shall be glad to give a Return showing by stations the expenditure to the end of 1896 under the Barracks Act of 1890, if the hon. Member thinks right to move it. All structures commenced under the loan of 1890 will be completed under it; but any additional buildings required to complete the schemes will be provided under the new Bill.

Mr. LOUGH asked if the hon. Gentleman could state whether, before the Bill was proceeded with, another account of the expenditure under the Barracks Act of 1890 would be furnished, because the one that is in existence is very old?

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS: That looks very much like a question of which I had better have notice.

Mr. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War why no provision is made either in the Military Works Act or in the Estimates for the contemplated barracks at Londonderry; and, what is the cause of the delay in commencing work?

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS: Provision for the barracks at Londonderry is made in the Barracks Act of 1890, under which the works will be completed. The delay which has arisen is in consequence of the great difficulty experienced in obtaining possession of a large portion of the ground on which the new buildings are to be erected. Steps are being taken to fix a value of this ground by arbitration under the Lands Clauses Act.

Mr. J. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) asked would the hon. Gentleman take care before the work commenced that the stone for the building should be obtained from the Donegal quarries.

[No answer was given.]

NORTHAMPTON PRISON (ADVERTISEMENTS).

Mr. H. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the advertisements inviting tenders for supplying with goods the prison at Northampton are inserted in London and Birmingham newspapers but not in the newspapers published at Northampton; would he explain what is the reason for this; and whether he will see that these advertisements are henceforward published in the local journals?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir Matthew White Ridley, Lancashire, Blackpool): The advertisements are not, as the hon. Member's Question suggests, for Northampton prison alone, but for the whole of the prisons of England and Wales; and being lengthy and expensive, are for economy's sake inserted only in trade journals of general circulation, and in the newspapers which have the widest circulation in the various parts of the country. I shall be glad to consider the claim of any Northampton journal to belong to either of these classes of papers.

IRISH MAILS.

Mr. JAMES ROCHE (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if, having regard to the resolutions passed by various public bodies in Killarney and Tralee, copies of which have reached him, calling the attention of the Postmaster General to the very irregular manner in which the mails have been delivered in those towns for the last few years, he will communicate with the Great South Western Railway Company and endeavour to get the mails forwarded from Mallow Junction to Killarney and Tralee in a more expeditious manner than at present?

Mr. HANBURY: The resolutions referred to will receive consideration. There are, however, grave objections to increasing the number of stops of the Dublin and Cork day mail trains, which would of course unfavourably affect the arrival and departure of the mail at Cork. Even if the Dublin and Cork trains stop at Mallow, it is not clear that the Company would desire to put on trains to and from Tralee in connection therewith for their ordinary traffic, and the Post Office would not be justified in paying for special trains for the service.

Captain DONELAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether any arrangements have yet been made with the Irish Railway Companies, so as to enable him to give the new mail time table to Cork and Belfast respectively?

MR. HANBURY: The revision of the hours of the day mail trains from Dublin to Cork, Belfast, etc., was necessarily postponed till the time table between London and Dublin was definitely settled. It is now under consideration, but it has not been possible in the short time which has elapsed to make any definite arrangement.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: May I ask whether, in making these arrangements, will due consideration be paid to the resolution recently forwarded to the Postmaster General by the Cork Chamber of Commerce and Shipping, directing attention to the needless delays that now occur on the loop line in Dublin and in backing in and out of Kingsbridge station?

MR. HANBURY: I have not seen it, but I have no doubt due attention will be given to it.

MR. KNOX: May I ask whether, in preparing this time table, the right hon. Gentleman will take the opportunity of laying it before the representatives of the Cork, Derry, and Belfast Chambers of Commerce.

MR. HANBURY: I do not quite know why these towns should be singled out in this Question, which affects the whole of Ireland.

LIGHT RAILWAYS (IRELAND).

DR. ROBERT AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how much, out of the sum allocated last year for the building of light railways in Ireland, has been spent up to the present?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No portion of the money referred to has yet been spent, but negotiations in connection with a variety of schemes are now in progress.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS (GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND).

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): On behalf of the hon. Member for Cavan W. (Mr. J. P. FARRELL), I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the findings of the Royal Commision on the Financial Relations between Great Britain and Ireland, he will, with a view to giving some relief to the people during this hard season, advise the Government to introduce an Agricultural Land Rating Bill for Ireland?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I have already stated that it is not the intention of the Government to introduce an Agricultural Land Rating Bill for Ireland.

ARABI PASHA.

MR. MICHAEL DAVITT (Mayo, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs under what sentence, English or Egyptian, is Arabi Pasha still condemned to exile from his country; and whether, in view of the peaceful condition of Egypt at the present time, Her Majesty's Government can see their way to abridge the term of his banishment, and permit him to return to his home and his friends?

MR. CURZON: Arabi Pasha was tried by an Egyptian court-martial on December 3rd, 1882, on a charge of rebellion against the Khedive. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to death, but the Khedive, by a decree of the same date, commuted this sentence to perpetual exile on condition that he should proceed to any locality that might be indicated to him, and that he should there remain unless authorised to remove. The question of allowing him to return to Egypt was raised in March, 1893, when Mr. Gladstone, in reply to a question, stated that inquiry had been made in 1891 into the health of the exiles, with the result that, on that ground there was no reason for Arabi's removal; whilst on any other grounds Her Majesty's Government did not feel themselves justified in overriding the decision of the Egyptian Government. Nothing has since occurred to warrant a reversal of that decision.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): May I ask, is it intended to keep him there perpetually?

[No answer was given.]

EXPLOSION OF CORDITE (WOOLWICH ARSENAL).

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War who is responsible for such dangerous experiments as the explosion of large quantities of cordite at Woolwich that took place there and was recorded in Tuesday's papers; and what compensation will be granted for the serious damage caused?

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS: As I explained the other day, these experiments were undertaken for a specific purpose under the supervision of the Ordnance Department, and a site was selected at Plumstead where no risk was likely to occur, and where proper precautions are taken. No complaints have been received at the War Office, and the reports as to the extent of damage done appear to have been very much exaggerated.

SALE OF FIRE-ARMS AND SPIRITS IN NEW HEBRIDES.

MR. J. F. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (1) whether French traders are permitted to sell firearms and spirits to the Natives of the New Hebrides, whereas British traders are expressly prohibited from doing so; (2) whether the joint agreements entered into between the British and French Governments in 1887 and 1888, in relation to the New Hebrides, contain any clause sanctioning this state of things; and (3) whether any remonstrances have been addressed to the French Government on the subject?

MR. CURZON: The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The joint agreement contains no provision affecting the traffic in arms and liquor, which is prohibited to British subjects by Regulation under Order in Council. Representations on the subject have recently been addressed to the French Government. No reply having been received from them, instructions are being sent to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris to again draw their attention to the matter.

SETTLED PROPERTY (ESTATE DUTY).

CAPTAIN PRETYMAN (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any test case, raising the points referred to in the questions put to him in this House on 3rd July last as to the proper interpretation of Section 2, Sub-Section (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1894, has yet been decided or is ripe for hearing; and, if not, can he hold out any hope of obtaining the decision of the Courts of Law within a reasonable time?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No case has yet arisen in which it has been found possible to raise before a Court of Law the points referred to in the question addressed to me by the hon. Member in July last. Special instructions have been given to the authorities of the Inland Revenue to watch every case and to arrange at the earliest possible moment to obtain a legal decision upon the points in question, and I will take care that the hon. Member is informed of any cases in which it may seem probable that the questions can be raised.

CHILDREN'S METROPOLITAN ASYLUMS BOARD.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can inform the House how many of the Metropolitan Poor Law children will probably come under the jurisdiction of the proposed new Asylums Board for Sick Children, and what number of children suffering from ophthalmia, contagious diseases of the skin or scalp, debility, defective intellect, or other physical infirmity, are respectively likely to require the services of the Board?

Mr. CHAPLIN: According to Returns received from the several district and separate schools, including the large Roman Catholic certified schools, the cases of ophthalmia number 760, and, if the number of children in the workhouses and infirmaries is added, the number for which separate treatment is desirable may be roughly estimated at 1,000. The number of children in the schools referred to who are returned as suffering from ringworm is 208, and of those suffering from skin disease 168. If the number in the workhouses and infirmaries is added, the total number of these children may be estimated at about 500. I have no information as to the number of children requiring special treatment during convalescence, or seaside air, or of children who, in consequence of defect of intellect or physical infirmity, cannot properly be trained in association with children in ordinary schools; but the number of the latter class I should not anticipate would be large.

LONDONDERRY CORPORATION STOCK.

Mr. KNOX: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland (1) whether the forms prescribed by the regulations as to issue of stock in Ireland, under the Public Health Act Amendment Act 1890, contemplate the issue of stock only after public tender, to be invited after the resolution for its creation has been passed; (2) whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Londonderry Corporation, nevertheless, have resolved to issue stock to the amount of £80,000 without public tender at par, and have refused to consider an offer of 101 per cent. made for the stock by a responsible person, on the ground that the Corporation was bound by a contract alleged to have been entered into not under seal, in respect of a smaller total amount, and before the consent order had been issued by the Local Government Board; (3) whether the Local Government Board were aware of this alleged contract when they issued their consent order on 27th January; and (4) whether the Board have any power to prevent such a transaction; and, if not, whether the regulations will be revised so as to prevent it being repeated?

*The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. J. Atkinson, Londonderry, N.): The forms and regulation framed under the Statute mentioned resembling in this respect those framed by the Local Government Board in England, do not prescribe any mode in which applications for stock are to be invited, that being left to the local authorities to determine. I am not aware whether the facts are exactly as stated in the second paragraph, as some difference of opinion appears to exist between the members of the Corporation as to what was the precise nature and effect of the negotiations on the subject. The answer to the third paragraph is in the negative. As to the fourth paragraph, the Local Government Board have no power to interfere with the action of the local authority, in respect of the issue of stock after a consent order has been made, and inasmuch as the regulations are similar to those prescribed in England and have been found on the whole to work satisfactorily, it is not considered desirable to alter them.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS (RATING).

Mr. ELLIS GRIFFITH (Anglesey): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board what is the sum total of rates paid in respect of Elementary Schools other than Board Schools, distinguishing counties and boroughs, in the last year for which such returns are available?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The Local Government Board have no returns which would enable them to furnish the information referred to.

Mr. ELLIS GRIFFITH asked if the right hon. Gentleman could say from which department he could get the return?

Mr. CHAPLIN could not say without notice.

INCOME TAX ON UNPAID DIVIDENDS.

Mr. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the case, W 1 a 546, before the Inland Revenue, in which that Department claimed Income Tax on a mortgage although no income had been received from the mortgage or rent from the property for four years, and stated in their letter of the 31st December 1896, though they subsequently waived their claim in this particular case, that "the Special Commissioners must regard the full amount of the mortgage interest annually accruing (whether it is actually realised by year or not) as representing the income from this source for the purpose of the Income Tax Acts. Whether this claim for Income Tax on incomes nominally accruing, but not paid has his sanction; and, whether it is enforced on unpaid dividends or interest on debentures and other classes of property; and, if so, under what clauses of the Income Tax Acts it is based?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: My hon. Friend seems to be under a misapprehension as to the point involved in this case. The Inland Revenue do not claim Income Tax from a mortgagee in respect of interest which he does not receive. A mortgagee pays his Income Tax indirectly, that is, by the deduction of the amount of it from the mortgage interest, when paid over by the mortgagor. Where, therefore, no interest is paid, there is no deduction. But, in considering a claim for exemption or abatement, the Inland Revenue insist that mortgage interest due to a person making the claim should be taken into account in computing his total income, even if it has not been paid within the year, unless it can be clearly shown that such interest is irrecoverable, is, in fact, a bad debt. This was the case in the present instance. As soon as the Inland Revenue were satisfied that the interest was irrecoverable they abandoned the claim that it should be taken into account. The same principle applies generally in the case of claims to exemption or abatement, to dividends, and any interest accruing within the year. Such interest is included in the statement of the claimant's income, unless it can be shown that it is not only in arrear but irrecoverable.

MR. BARTLEY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that in this particular case the Inland Revenue knew that no rents had been received for four years, and was that not sufficient evidence to show that practically the matter was a bad debt?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER presumed they had heard that.

MR. BARTLEY said the claim was made after they knew that.

PARISH DOCUMENTS.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware of the doubt existing as to the interpretation of Clause 16, Section 8, in the Local Government Act of 1894, which deals with the custody of parish documents; whether he will state whether a tithe-map would according to that section, be a document directed by law to be kept with the public books, writings, and papers of the parish; and, whether the Local Government Board have given any legal opinion to parish councils upon the question referred to?

MR. CHAPLIN: I am aware that questions have arisen with regard to the custody of documents under Subsection (8) of Section 17 of the Local Government Act 1894. The Act contemplated that this would be the case, and has provided that any questions as to such custody shall be determined by the County Council. The Local Government Board have no jurisdiction to determine questions as regards the tithe-map, and it has been their practice to inform parish councils to this effect. I am advised that tithe-maps are under the Tithe Commutation Act 1886, to be kept "with the public books, writings, and papers of the parish," and the subsection to which I have referred requires therefore, that they shall either remain in their existing custody or be deposited in such custody as the parish council may direct.

POOR LAW SCHOOLS (METROPOLIS).

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to the evidence of Dr. Downes, given before the recent Committee on Poor Law Schools, that there are in London workhouses on an average upwards of 2,000 children of school age; and, whether, as it is stated that this aggregation of children in workhouses is largely due to the block caused by the existence of infectious disease either among the children in the workhouse or in the school belonging to the union, he will entrust the new Central Metropolitan Authority, which he proposes to create, with the duty of taking over existing probationary or quarantine wards, and when necessary erecting others, in accordance with the recommendation of the recent Committee?

MR. CHAPLIN: I am glad to say that the number of children who are detained in London workhouses and infirmaries is now less than the number stated. The block has to some extent been occasioned by the cause referred to by the hon. Member, and it will be the duty of the Central Authority whom it is proposed to constitute to make such provision as is necessary for children of the class alluded to. The question how such provision should be made will be one for the new body in the first instance to consider.

Mr. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether he will give effect to the recommendation of the recent Committee on Metropolitan Poor Law Schools that the establishment of small certified homes should be encouraged, by the Local Government Board urging on boards of guardians in suitable cases the expediency of utilising such homes, and by the appointment of additional inspectors, preferably women, to be charged with the duty of regularly visiting certified homes, conferring with the committee of management, and inspecting the children individually?

Mr. PICKERSGILL also asked the President of the Local Government Board whether he proposes to take any, and, if so, what steps to carry out the recommendation of the recent Committee on Poor Law Schools that special schools should be provided, of an intermediate character, for the reception of the casual and fluctuating class of children known as ins and outs.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It has already been the practice of the Local Government Board in the past to encourage the establishment of small certified schools, and it is certainly my intention to continue to do so. These schools are inspected by inspectors of the Board, and I have under my consideration the question whether it will not be necessary to increase the number of inspectors for the metropolitan district. The Local Government Board consider that it is very desirable that provision should be made otherwise than in the workhouse for children who are now retained temporarily before being drafted into the school, in order that it may be ascertained that they are not suffering from infectious disease, and for children of the particular class referred to by the hon. Member. The Board are desirous of promoting such arrangements, and schemes for the purpose are now under the consideration of some of the boards of guardians. The Board consider that such provision could be more satisfactorily made by the guardians of the different unions than by a central authority acting for the whole of the metropolis.

ARMY RETIRED PAY.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he has any objection to state the principle on which the "just equivalent" mentioned in Article 978 XIII. of the Royal Warrant of 10th June 1884, was calculated; and, whether and when any, and, if so, what, limit was placed upon such equivalent by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury?

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS: The principle adopted has been to give the officer the calculated value of his prospects at the time of retirement under the Warrant or Warrants in force before 1881, subject to a limit of £600 a year, which was the highest amount of retired full pay granted under former Warrants to a Colonel. This principle was decided on with the concurrence of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether this limit was made known to the officers who were to retire under the article in question?

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS said he was informed that it was so made known.

LABOURERS' ALLOTMENTS (IRELAND).

Mr. DAVITT: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the Resolution unanimously adopted by the House of Commons on 13th April 1894, and supported by all sections of Irish Members, favouring the extension to Ireland of all the legal facilities existing in England for the creation of labourers' allotments or small holdings of land, he will introduce a measure to that effect during the present Session, and thereby encourage the fuller and better cultivation of the soil in Ireland, and increase in this manner opportunities of profitable employment for the industrial population of that country?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The terms of the Resolution in question were "that all the facilities for obtaining land now possessed by England should be at once extended to Ireland." The object aimed at by the hon. Member is to some extent met by the Labourers Acts of 1883 to 1896, which do not apply to England. The condition of affairs in Ireland, which is already a country of small holdings, is materially different from that in England, and I am not prepared to affirm, even apart from the question of machinery, that the same arrangements should be made to apply to both countries. I do not say that the subject in its more general aspect is not worthy of consideration, but the Government in any case cannot undertake to introduce legislation dealing with it in the present Session.

Mr. DAVITT: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of the probability that such a Measure would pass without opposition, he will not reconsider his decision?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I am unable to take the same view as the hon. Gentleman as to the probability of a Measure of this kind being entirely unopposed; and I could give no pledge in the direction indicated without a further assurance on the point, and without giving the subject a great deal of further consideration.

MORTALITY (CENTRAL INDIA PROVINCES).

Mr. DAVITT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will state from the statistics of the Local Government Gazette of the Central Provinces of India the death rate in those provinces for the six months of the year ending 31st December 1895, and for the year ending 31st December 1896, and the total number of deaths in each of these two periods, giving each number separately?

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Lord George Hamilton, Middlesex, Ealing): The Central Provinces Gazette does not give the full monthly vital statistics for any month later than September 1896, but the figures for the periods of three months ending September 1895, and September 1896, respectively are as follows:—Mean of monthly death rates, July to September 1895, 43·12 per mille: mean of monthly death rates, July to September 1896, 55·80 per mille; total number of deaths, July to September 1895, 102,420; total number of deaths, July to September 1896, 132,552. These provinces were visited by a severe epidemic of cholera in the spring and summer which caused a heavy and general rise in the number of deaths in the summer and early autumn. Though I have no complete summary of the death rate of the whole province for the later months, the Chief Commissioner informed me some time back that in the division of Jubbalpore, where the distress was acute, there was a continuous fall in the mortality during October and November.

WORKMISTRESSES (IRISH SCHOOLS).

Mr. D. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) if, during the recess, he brought before the Irish Government or the Commissioners of National Education the claims of workmistresses in Irish schools for increased remuneration; and (2) whether, seeing that these workmistresses give constant attendance during school hours, and their remuneration is only £12 a year, increased by a few shillings in the results fees, will he give the matter early attention?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: Representations were made during the recess by the Commissioners to the Irish Government in relation to the remuneration of workmistresses in National schools, but the Treasury, having given these representations their best consideration, were unable to sanction the proposals of the Commissioners. As regards the second paragraph, I have already pointed out that workmistresses are not employed for the full school day, and that in the year 1886 their fixed salaries, with the approval of the Treasury, were augumented to the present amount. The number of workmistresses employed in mixed National schools was 843 in the year ended 31st December 1895, and in addition to the fixed salary of £12 they are paid results fees varying from sixpence to three shillings in respect of each girl passed.

FIJI.

Mr. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, can he explain why a Blue-Book, embodying valuable information as to the causes of the serious decline in the native population of Fiji during recent years, has not been published by the Government of that Crown Colony; is there any document or dispatch in the Colonial

Office that would throw light upon this proceeding; and will he call for an explanation from the Governor?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The Report in question has been received and is at present under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. It would not be desirable, or in accordance with the usual practice in such cases, to publish the Report in the Colony in its present stage.

RELIEF OF KASSALA.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the communication in which the Italian Government requested Her Majesty's Government to assist them against the Dervishes by military advance into the Northern Provinces of the Soudan; and, by whom the communication was made?

Mr. CURZON: The communications in question were received from the Italian Ambassador in London. Their substance has already appeared in telegrams, between the Ambassador and his Government, that were published in the Italian Green-Book of last year, and were read out in this House by the hon. Member for Northampton in the Debate on June 5 1896.

Mr. MACNEILL: I now ask the right hon. Gentleman again, will he lay these communications in extenso on the Table?

Mr. CURZON: No, Sir; there is no necessity to lay communications between the Italian Ambassador and his own Government on the Table of this House. They have been published by the Italian Government and have appeared in the reports of the proceedings of this House, as the hon. Member will see if he refers to "Hansard."

Mr. MACNEILL: I desire, Mr. Speaker, to ask you a question on the rules of procedure governing Debates in this House. I wish to know from you whether, when a document is referred to in debate by a Minister of the Crown, or a gentleman representing a Minister of the Crown, it is not imperative upon him to lay that document on the Table? In reference to this matter I would cite a precedent which occurred in this House on July 17 1857. On that occasion Sir Charles Wood, the then First Lord of the Admiralty, did not quote from but referred to a letter he had received. He was asked to produce that letter in its entirety, and Mr. Disraeli made the following observations in the Debate and laid down this rule:—

> "There should be no reference to any Papers that were not laid on the Table or that were not meant to be laid on the Table afterwards. The moment a Minister referred even to a private letter, it became a State document. That was a salutary principle which always prevailed in their Debates. Were it otherwise, the opponents of the Minister could have no chance in Debate. He could always be referring to private matter in his portfolio to support his case."

Mr. Disraeli called it a private letter, and he was corrected by some Gentleman calling out "It is a public letter." To that Mr. Disraeli replied:—

> "What! a public letter. That is a worse case still. It is even a more flagrant case when a public document is kept secret from the House."

I say this case which I have cited is on all fours with what occurred on Friday evening in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: If a Minister refers to a particular document by quoting part of it or stating what the effect of the contents of that particular document is, then the House is entitled to see the document itself. But I do not understand that any question of that kind arises here. A Minister is not bound, having stated in answer to a question or otherwise that there have been communications generally to such and such an effect with a foreign Government, to produce the document which would bear out his statement. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. MACNEILL: With great respect Sir, the right hon. Gentleman specifically referred on Friday night to communications. At that time the point of order was not taken either before the Chairman of Committees or yourself; but is there not a clear distinction when a Minister specifically refers to a certain document which he refuses to produce?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a great difference between specifically referring to communications generally and specifically referring to the contents of a particular document. Nothing of the latter kind seems to have taken place here. [Cheers.]

ILLEGAL TRAWLING (CORK).

Captain DONELAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that English steam trawlers are in the habit of fishing off the coast of Ballycotton, county Cork, upon Sundays, and that upon Sunday last one of these trawlers was thus engaged close to the mouth of the bay; and, whether steps will be taken to protect the Ballycotton fishermen from this illegal practice?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The Chief Officer of the Coastguard at Ballycotton states he has never seen English steam trawlers fishing in this locality on Sundays, but that on Sunday the 31st January one passed at the entrance to the bay though it was not at the time fishing. On Monday last I informed the hon. Member that a bye-law had been prepared with a view to prohibit steam-trawling inside Ballycotton Bay. This bye-law will shortly be submitted to the Lord Lieutenant in Council.

Mr. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): Arising out of that answer might I ask the right hon Gentleman is it not a fact that owing to the great damage done on the Scottish coast by these steam trawlers it was found necessary to prevent steam trawling within three miles of the coast, and whether in view of that fact the Government have any intention of introducing a similar law for the Irish coast?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I am not acquainted with the practice in Scotland, but if the hon. Member will put the question on the Paper I will endeavour to answer it.

CRETE.

Mr. J. C. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Foreign Office have yet received any official information concerning the alleged burning of the village of Galata, and the reported murder of a Christian Judge, M. Markoulakis, at Canea; whether he is aware that the Bishop of Canea and the Administrative Council of Notables have forwarded to the Consuls a memorandum denouncing the violence and misdeeds of the Turks, and imploring the prompt intervention of the Powers with a view to the immediate application of the reforms; and, if he can say what action has been taken by the representatives of the Powers to deal with this dangerous condition of affairs?

Sir E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will also answer at the same time the following question, of which I have given him private notice:—whether the Mussulman inhabitants of Crete have been driven to the coast from their homes by Christian insurgents and subjected to grievous maltreatment, and what steps Great Britain and the other Powers propose to take in order to protect the Mussulman inhabitants and to restore order, in view of the fact that the Sultan and the Turkish Government have given all the reforms in Crete asked for by the Powers?

Mr. CURZON: As regards Galata and the reported murder of M. Markoulakis, there is nothing to add to the last answer returned to the hon. Member. The memorandum referred to has been sent home by Her Majesty's Consul. It calls attention to the fear of Mussulman agitation, and represents the need for foreign gendarmes in the towns. As regards the general situation in the island, about which the House will naturally desire the latest information, I have to state that the position at and around Canea Halepa, and Suda Bay has been grave for the last few days. Fighting, or rather the discharge of firearms, has been continuous, but there seems to be no foundation for the rumours as to a massacre that have appeared in some quarters, and, so far, the loss of life is reported as comparatively small. Flames broke out in many places in the town, and every exertion has been made by the foreign ships of war to subdue them, and in these efforts they were seconded by both the Christian and Mussulman population. Much difficulty resulted from scarcity of water supply. The Turkish troops are reported to have behaved in an exemplary manner, and there was practically no plundering. The last account, dated this morning, states that the fire has now been completely extinguished, though nearly 200 houses and some large oil stores have been burnt, that upwards of 5,000 refugees have been embarked, and that the firing has ceased on all sides round Canea. At Candia the Mussulman population, who complained that they were defenceless while the Christians were armed, became uncontrollable, and are reported to have taken a quantity of rifles from the arsenal, but the latest intelligence is that the town continues quiet. As it is reported that there is great scarcity of food, the Admiral in command of the Mediterranean Squadron is sending the troopship Tyne from Malta with biscuits and meat for 1,200 persons for a fortnight. Her Majesty's ships Barfleur, Scout, Nymph, Fearless, Dragon, and a second battleship are at present in Cretan waters, and the Revenge with Admiral Harris on board, is on her way there. The commanders of these ships, in co-operation with Her Majesty's Consul and with Colonel Chermside, late Military Attaché at Constantinople, and representative of this country on the Gendarmerie Commission, have been labouring without cease to allay the disorder and alarm, to prevent more serious developments, and to afford protection to the refugees. In answer to the supplementary question put by my hon. Friend below the gangway, I have already in the answer I have read described generally the steps taken by the representatives of the Powers in Crete. I can assure him that we are as anxious to protect the Mussulman as the Christian inhabitants of the island—[cheers]—and that the steps which I have described as taken by our officials have been directed to that end. But so far as the reports—of which I have read a great many—lead me to form an opinion, it is that the maltreatment appears to be about evenly distributed between the two parties. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. FLYNN asked if it were true that large numbers of Christians had taken refuge on board ships and that Turkish troops had rebelled against the Vali.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. The hon. Member must give notice of the question.

MR. DILLON asked if there was any definite information as to the actual loss of life?

*MR. CURZON replied that the only figures that the Foreign Office had reported the loss of life at not more than 30.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked if the Government would take steps to see that some protection was offered to the Mussulmans of the interior?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must give notice.

FACTORY ACCIDENT, BATLEY.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he is aware that an inquest was held on Saturday, 23rd January, at Batley, by the Coroner for the West Riding, on the death of one Fred. Taylor, which occurred by accident in the Phœnix Mills, Batley, and that the Coroner neither gave notice of the inquest to the Factory Inspector for the district nor adjourned the inquest for the Inspector's attendance, in accordance with section 19 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895; and, whether he will take steps to secure the due observance of the law in future?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I have communicated with the Home Office upon the subject of the question of the right hon. Baronet, and I understand that the facts are correctly stated in the first paragraph of the question. I am also informed that the Coroner has been communicated with, in order to insure that in future the procedure directed by the Statute is observed. Upon the facts before me, it does not seem to me to be a case in which I ought to take proceedings under the Statute, as I have nothing to show that it is necessary, in the interests of justice, that another inquest should be held; but I shall be glad to consider any further representation if the right hon. Baronet wishes me to do so.

ROYAL BOUNTY FUND (GEORGE BROOKS).

MR. DAVITT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury (1) will he explain what are the rules, regulations, or practices governing the allocation of grants from the Royal Bounty Fund; and (2) upon whose recommendation a sum of money from this source was given to George Brooks, who was recently the plaintiff in one or more libel suits?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In answer to the second paragraph of the Question, I am alone responsible for all representations for grants from the Royal Bounty Fund. As regards the first paragraph of the question, no rules or regulations have been laid down by Parliament on this subject, but there is a body of official tradition which has been handed on from one First Lord to another, and to that tradition and practice I have endeavoured to conform.

MR. DAVITT: May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that he would find a resolution adopted by this House—[cries of "Order, order!"]—concerning the distribution of this money.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I am not aware of that.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Does the right hon. Gentleman desire to make further explanation of his having allocated this money to Mr. Brooks? [Laughter.]

[No answer was given.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question about the business of to-day. The first order of the day is Supply, Army Estimates, in the name of the Under Secretary for War. I observe also on the Paper a notice relating to what are called the proposals of the Government. We have no knowledge of any proposals of the Government. There has been no notice of any such proposals. I have heard it rumoured that a statement has been made about the military plans of the Government in another place. But we are bound not to know anything about that. [Opposition laughter, and cheers.] The Army Estimates have apparently been opened by the Government in another place, and it would be out of order to know anything on the subject. But there are a few people I believe who read newspapers—[laughter]—and those persons may know something about the intentions of the Government upon military affairs. But here we know nothing of the proposals of the Government, and what I have to ask the right hon. Gentleman is that before we go to a discussion upon the Speaker leaving the Chair we should know the scheme of the Government by a statement from the Under Secretary. Otherwise it is quite impossible to deal either generally or in detail with the matter. The usual practice has been to state the Army Estimates after the Speaker has left the Chair. Within my own recollection there have been several instances where it was thought more convenient that the statement should be made when the Speaker was in the Chair. If it be true that a statement has been made in another place of the military intentions of the Government that is a conclusive reason why, before we discuss them here, a statement should be made here. ["Hear!"]

*SIR JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth) asked whether the proposals of the Government were not contained in Parliamentary papers signed by the Minister for War, and circulated among the Members of the House?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I do not know whence the right hon. Gentleman got his views on constitutional procedure or how long he has entertained them, but I have often heard him quote at unnecessary length, speeches which had been made in the other House.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Not on financial statements.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Is there any difference? ("Hear, hear!") I thought the right hon. Gentleman laid it down that he never knew about what went on in the other House, and that if by accident he heard from some obscure sources what passed there he never dared to make use of his knowledge in the House of Commons. [Laughter.] I have closely followed the right hon. Gentleman's method of procedure, and should have thought his practice hardly squared with his theory. But, however that may be, the question of my hon. and gallant Friend supplies an answer to the right hon. Gentleman. There has been circulated, and there is in the hands of Members no doubt, a concise but clear and adequate summary of the proposals of the Government with regard to the Army Estimates, and this appears to me to be a sufficient basis for such discussion as may take place before the Speaker leaves the Chair. Under these circumstances I do not think there is any reason to depart from what is the usual, but not invariable, practice of waiting until the Speaker is out of the Chair before the Under Secretary for War makes his general statement on the Army Estimates.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Are we to understand that before we are asked to consider the Army Estimates we shall have no more information than is contained in the memorandum which has been referred to? If that is sufficient for any one question it is sufficient for the whole, and I should have expected that the Leader of the House would have seen at what disadvantages the House is placed.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that there is no question before the House.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MILITARY FORCES (MAINTENANCE).

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) proposed to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add instead thereof the words—

> "this House, while ready to provide the funds required for the efficient maintenance of our Military forces, desires to be convinced that the present system of enlistment and terms of service are such as to be suitable to the requirements of the Empire."

He said the total cost of our national defences was now larger than it had ever been before. Last year the military and naval Votes with the loan money and the Indian expenditure and the expenditure of the self-governing colonies, amounted to £63,000,000 a year, and as far as it was possible to compute the expenditure of the present year it was likely to be on the same scale. Some items would be less, some more, but £63,000,000 a year seemed to be the sum at which our military and naval expenditure stood and was likely to stand. Of this enormous sum the military expenditure of the country formed more than half. This was a curious fact, because this Empire was called an Empire of the Seas, and all persons concerned in Imperial defence, including soldiers, were generally inclined to admit the Primacy of the Navy in defence. It was a remarkable fact that, although it was generally admitted that the Navy stood first as regarded the defence of the Empire, more than half of our defence expenditure was spent on the land forces. Of course he could not say what the expenditure for the next financial year would be, but taking the Estimates of the next financial year, it was fair to say that our military expenditure at home now stood at £18,855,000. It was difficult to detach the Army at home from the Army in India, and the Indian expenditure in the previous financial year, without anything for Burmah or Chitral, amounted to £16,127,000 odd. Adding together what we spent out of Votes here for the Home Army, and what was estimated for the present year for the Indian Army, which was largely paid here, they obtained a total expenditure of £34,982,000 for the land forces. In addition to that there was a large expenditure on military works, which next year, when from five to six millions sterling would be taken in the Loan Bill of the present year, would be very large. There was also the expenditure of the self-governing colonies, so that he estimated the total expenditure on land forces or fixed defences at at least 39 millions a year. All parties—and the Army itself—were willing to admit that the Navy stood first. That admission had been made very fully on the part of the present Government by Lord Lansdowne, who was responsible for the present Estimates. The present Secretary of State for War had admitted fully that it was the duty of the Navy to protect us against invasion, and to protect our coaling stations, which were garrisoned by the Army, against invasion. He had told them that the coaling stations of the Navy need only be garrisoned by the Army as against what he called cruiser attack, and said that they were not required to be prepared to resist attack from a large hostile squadron, carrying with it a considerable expeditionary force, as from such attack it was the business of the fleet to protect them; and that the enemy's fleet could not be watching or engaging our fleet and at the same time delivering an attack in force against one of our coaling stations. And yet the Empire was spending 39 millions sterling on land forces and fixed defences. India, of course, contributed towards these Estimates, and so did the Crown Colonies, but the latter contributed at a very different rate to that at which India contributed. [Cheers.] The present Government, moreover, had been decreasing the contributions of the Crown Colonies; that was the case with the Straits Settlements, according to the latest Return, and with Ceylon, where the contribution towards these Estimates was fixed at 7½ per cent. of the gross revenue, exclusive of land sales. It was a remarkable fact that, at a time when plague and famine were rife in India, we obtained the utmost farthing from India, although this pressed with even cruel severity upon the Indian taxpayer, while we obtained only 7½ per cent. of the gross revenue of a colony like Ceylon whose prosperity was extraordinary. We were spending on our land forces and defences, putting aside the self-governing colonies, 37 millions sterling, and he thought that even the Under Secretary for War would not deny that our military system was by far the dearest in the world. There was an attempt made to explain the enormous cost of our military system by the absence of military conscription in this country, but large deductions had to be made on the other side. For instance, the cost of forage in Germany or France was overwhelmingly greater than our own—partly because we had hardly any horses in our Army. [Laughter.] Then it had to be remembered that such countries as France or Germany had to keep clothing, ammunition, and arms not for the Army with the colours or for a reserve like our own, but for a war Army of over four million men each, and all that had to be kept up out of the annual Votes. This, he thought, went to prove that the absence of conscription was not in itself a sufficient answer to those who urged that our Army was too dear. On one occasion he had had to read a paper at the Statistical Society on the question of the cost of the Army, which produced a very interesting discussion between the military authorities of this country, and it had to be admitted that the word "conscription" did not constitute a complete answer to the argument drawn from the cost. On the other hand, it was admitted that the British Navy, considering the money we spent on it, was on the whole more efficient than the navies of other countries, and he thought it was also cheaper. In this argument in regard to conscription the War Office took credit for the amount of the pay which was given to the soldiers. But the pay of the Volunteers was non-existent, that of the Militia was very small, and the pay of the private soldier, although larger than that of the private soldier in foreign armies, was, in his opinion, very much less than it might be with advantage to the country. He admitted that no close comparison between the cost of our Army and those of foreign countries was possible; he merely protested against this argument of conscription being considered as a complete answer to the question of cost. Then he would ask what return we got for this cost in the shape of an Army that could really be employed for those purposes for which it was possible to contemplate our Army being used. ["Hear, hear!"] He would assume that we possessed command of the seas. The Secretary of State for the Colonies made a very interesting speech last Saturday week at Birmingham upon this point, in which he said that the House of Commons had increased the Empire and that it must therefore increase its Army of defence. That was rather a specious argument, but one that would not bear investigation. To begin with, large portions of our Empire, such as Australia and British North America, with the exception of the fortress of Halifax, were not defended by the Army at all. They might say that the number of troops we sent abroad needed to be increased; but it had not increased of late years, but had rather diminished, and yet there was an enormously increased expense. The Secretary of State for the Colonies had deprecated any depreciation of our defence resources, and he should be the last person to make any statement with regard to them which could strengthen the hands of foreign countries, but they all knew that foreign military attachés in this country, and the intelligence departments of foreign armies were thoroughly acquainted with everything that could be said for or against our military system. He believed it was understood by foreign Governments that the utmost force we could send out of this country was 16,000 men. It must be admitted that our Army was the only army in the world which had no permanent organisation in brigades, divisions, or corps, no permanent staff for war, and, he was afraid, no general training for war in the absence of manœuvres, which alone could train an army for service in the field. He feared that that fact must mean disaster in any serious war in which our Army was engaged. Undoubtedly the opinions expressed in evidence before the Wantage Commission by men now responsible for the Army—Lord Wolseley, Sir Evelyn Wood, and Sir Redvers Buller—exceeded in pessimism anything which could be said by any Member of the House. The Adjutant General at the time of the Wantage Commission said—

> "the military authorities have never been told what it is that the British Army is expected to do in war," and he went on to point out that whatever it was that the Army was expected to do it was unfit, as at present organised, to do it. Lord Lansdowne admitted most frankly that the British Army was unfit for war.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): When did he admit that?

*SIR C. DILKE: He admitted it in another place. The Adjutant General in his Wantage evidence said, "not a single battalion at home is fit to go to war."

MR. BRODRICK: Without the Reserve.

*SIR C. DILKE said the Reserve was untrained, and in that respect it differed from every other reserve in the world. It was not the intention of Lord Cardwell when he established the short service system that the Reserve should be used on any but great occasions, and one of the worst points in the present policy of Lord Lansdowne was that the Reserves Bill, which had been condemned by every competent military Member of the House, was to be reintroduced. When giving his evidence the Adjutant General must have forgotten the battalions of Guards. It would be universally admitted that those battalions were fit to go to war. The Under Secretary shook his head, as he evidently thought they were not fit; he should have thought they were fit to go to war without their Reserve men, or, at any rate, could have picked up sufficient men to go to war very quickly. The Guards were the force in this country which, next to some battalions of Volunteers, were most easily mobilised; but they differed from the Volunteers in being under highly skilled officers and non-commissioned officers. ["Hear, hear!"] One of the great defects in the present scheme was that it would spoil the only battalions which at the present time were fit for war. Sir Evelyn Wood, in his evidence before the Wantage Commission, said:—

> "We have not 30 per cent. of the rank and file who are equal to carrying the service marching order," and Lord Wolseley agreed. Anyone who had watched the marching at Aldershot during recent years must have noticed a progressive decline instead of an improvement, and one seldom saw a British battalion carrying packs in marching order. ["The Guards!"] He was talking about the ordinary infantry. Foreign armies carried their service marching order on all occasions. Even the Swiss, who had a very short period of training, marched with 60lb. weight on their backs, and they could march 30 miles a day. In the present state of things the Government proposed to drop the manœuvres. The Under Secretary shook his head, but the Secretary of State spoke of less extended manœuvres. £80,000 in one lump was dropped, and there was a large diminution in land transport work, which was explained as meaning that there were not to be manœuvres in the present year. Many persons believed that we could never have a really efficient army unless we had manœuvres. But even manœuvres could not make battalions, and he asked what return we got for the money we spent. Of course in India there was a certain return. We could put upon the frontier in India a force of 70,000 men, of which two-thirds would be natives. But even to put that force in the field 700 officers would have to be got from home for whom no provision had ever been made in the Estimates. What did we get here? We got the Guards and a little field artillery, but nothing else without fresh expenditure and a great waste of time after the declaration of war. The field artillery were to be slightly increased this year. They were diminished by a previous Government, and credit was taken afterwards for having increased them again. But there was no increase in men or horses, and he could not understand what the increase was that was not to be discovered in horses and men. He could not attach any particular importance to the increase of artillery when it was measured by one battery. The net amount of increase in field artillery was to be under 200 men and 66 horses, and he dared say that in these horses were included some garrison artillery horses, for some garrison batteries had officers' horses on the establishment; but even assuming that the field artillery was to get all these 66 horses, that was not a large increase, considering that the field artillery had been steadily declining in amount for a number of years, whilst the War Estimates had been increasing. There was one part of the proposals of the Government which he heartily approved—namely, the proposal to increase the West India Regiment. That would tend to secure our naval base at Sierra Leone, and was a step that had been pressed upon the attention of the Government by private Members for the last five or six years. But what was going to be done respecting the British infantry? It was admitted that the battalions at home were killed for the sake of the small Indian mobile army. The work thrown upon officers and non-commissioned officers who had to train the masses of recruits to be drafted to India was work calculated to break the hearts of the best men. Nothing could be more painful than the description given of our existing battalions in this country by men who knew the facts of the case. There were too many boys in them, and they were there for too short a time. Lord Lansdowne had said that the evil was the total inability of that portion of the Army which was at home to support the portion abroad, and that our present system was worked under conditions which absolutely precluded the possibility of success. Previous Secretaries of State for War had been telling the House for many years that the Army was in a satisfactory condition. Remembering the optimistic statements made from 1888 onwards, he thought the frank description of the condition of the Army which Lord Lansdowne had given was remarkable. In 1892 his right hon. Friend the late Secretary of State for War, speaking on the subject of war administration, referred to the "appalling cost," and said, "we are tied by traditions, prejudices, and habits which it is hopeless to overcome." He asked the House to make the attempt now to overcome the difficulties of which his right hon. Friend then spoke. If there were co-operation between those Radicals who honestly desired to get the article for which the country paid and the soldiers who now realised almost without exception the difficulties into which the Army had fallen—if there were co-operation between those two sections of the House he felt certain that the difficulties would be overcome at once. His right hon. Friend the late Secretary of State for War, whilst admitting the primacy of the Navy, had declined to contemplate the possibility of our taking part in a continental war. How, then, could he justify an expenditure of £36,000,000 a year upon our land forces? When he quitted office the right hon. Gentleman had prepared, as Lord Rosebery told the country at the Albert Hall, a great scheme of administrative reform. What were the results of that great scheme? There was this plan now brought forward by the Government. The Secretary of State for War had said at Bristol that all would be right if the House of Commons would give him 11 more battalions; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer had replied that he would not consent, and now the Government brought forward a totally different proposal—a makeshift. The Secretary of State for War said that we must establish equilibrium between the battalions at home and abroad. Up to the present time there had never been such equilibrium, and it would not be established by the proposals of the Government. It was part of Lord Cardwell's scheme that whenever two regimental battalions were absent from home at the same time the militia battalion of the regiment should be embodied. But that had never been done, and there had never been equilibrium, because ever since 1872 there had been more battalions abroad than at home. By sending three battalions of Guards away and so spoiling the only good infantry battalions that we had at home, and by creating a battalion of Cameron Highlanders—as if that could be done by a stroke of the pen—they would have four additional battalions abroad. This was called a temporary arrangement. What was the meaning of that? Was there the smallest probability that the state of affairs in South Africa would shortly permit the return home of troops from that country, or was it likely, after the speech to which they had listened on Friday, that a battalion would be brought home from Egypt? He thought that that was unlikely, and that the plan of the Government would have nothing temporary about it. Even if 11 battalions were added to the Army, was it probable that our military system would be a success and that the country would get an adequate return for its outlay? The Secretary of State had brought forward his plan as an anonymous proposal. It was talked about vaguely as Sir Arthur Haliburton's plan, and the Under Secretary had said, "This plan is put before us by the military authorities as the best and most economical." Who were the authorities thus referred it? Did the Under Secretary mean that it was the plan of the Commander-in-Chief? They did not give their confidence to the Secretary of State for War or to the First Lord of the Admiralty in military or naval matters apart from the advice which they received and communicated to the House. They, like himself, were amateurs, however great the pains they took; and when a new system was being established, or a new departure made, while admitting that their past system had failed and that they were engaged in patching it up, the House ought to be furnished with some kind of military authority in support of the scheme. ["Hear, hear!"] Personally he did not believe that this was the plan of the military authorities; he did not believe it was the plan of the Commander-in-Chief, of Sir Redvers Buller, and of Sir Evelyn Wood. The present plan was not even that of the Secretary of State for War himself at the time he made the speech; and it might, indeed, be a plan which was forced on the military authorities, and which they might have accepted from the Government; but from a perusal of it he did not think that it was the plan which they themselves had devised. The Under Secretary for War could not object to what he had just said in using the ordinary sources of information as to what the real opinion of the military authorities was. In the Debate on cordite ammunition, it was said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the real opinion of the military authorities was known, although the Financial Secretary for War of the late Government (Mr. Woodall) said that > "the War Office had been advised by the Director of Artillery, whose conclusion had been accepted and confirmed by the Adjutant General."

He said that this was an anonymous proposal. The Government when they came into office chose Lord Wolseley as Commander-in-Chief. If the Government were not going to back Lord Wolseley up in the proposals he made they ought to come to the House and say what was his opinion and their opinion of the situation. The Government ought to have the courage to back him up, because otherwise they misled the country by the weight of the Commander-in-Chief's name. The fact was that the House and the country were receiving the opinions on what was evidently a complicated disease, not of the physician but of unknown amateurs. [Cheers.] He thought that the Government had on this occasion a great opportunity. They made a new departure by appointing a Committee of the Cabinet for defence, and they made certain variations in the reforms of the late Secretary for War; and he believed that public opinion would have supported the Government in any drastic and effective measures to remedy the present condition of the Army. [Cheers.] He was, however, greatly disappointed at the miserable makeshift proposal which the Government had offered to the House. ["Hear, hear!"] This particular anonymous proposal failed to meet the battalion difficulty. It obviously left the Field Artillery far below the responsibilities of the country; it increased the fixed defences of the country, which were already large in proportion to her mobile strength; but it spoiled one of the home Infantry forces. The Guards were now a short service Infantry force; the majority of the men served three years, and it was difficult to send abroad a three years' force. It was impossible under three years' service to allow the Guards to go abroad in the sense in which the Line battalions went abroad. They could not be sent to India or to any other distant place; they could only be sent to the Mediterranean, which meant Malta, Gibraltar, or Egypt. But in all these places the difficulties of training were very great, and the sentry duty was very heavy; the troops so used were essentially garrison troops. If the Guards were sent to Egypt, to Malta, or Gibraltar, the young soldiers would be subject to fever in a considerable degree, and undoubtedly most of the battalions which were sent there would pass into the Reserve virtually untrained. They would get no proper exercise in field work, and in the garrison stations they would become garrison troops. Then the battalions left at home would undoubtedly, though not in so large a degree, undergo the deterioration to which Line battalions were subject by having to keep up their corresponding battalions abroad. It was said that Lord Methuen approved the Government scheme. He was one of the best generals of his age which we or any other country possessed—[cheers]—and Lord Methuen had shown that he was a very excellent Parliamentary speaker. But in his judgment Lord Methuen had managed to express his extreme objection to the Government scheme in language which was interpreted by the Government to be language of resigned approval. Lord Methuen said there were three evils in Gibraltar which existed in a greater degree there than in London: Drunkenness, disease, and heavy sentry duty.

> "The question of recruiting was one with which he had nothing to do, but he did hope that if any difficulty was found in getting recruits, and if the Brigade of Guards was in consequence to lose its fine physique, some steps would be taken to stop any deterioration."

Lord Methuen added that

> "he should not be doing his duty if he did not point out the dangers and difficulties in the way."

[Cheers.] It was not needful to dwell on the great cost and extreme inconvenience of having those troops perpetually at sea.

Sir Charles Dilke.

They would have, according to the Government scheme, to be continually relieved at Gibraltar, to be frequently crossing the Bay of Biscay, and there would be the cost of transport; but this was a minor detail. The real point to consider was whether the troops sent to the Reserve would not have had their efficiency destroyed by their want of training, and whether the battalions at home would not be ruined in order to support the battalions at Gibraltar. As to the reduction of military expenditure, while at the same time securing reforms, he said that he had not much hope of a considerable saving in the military Estimates so long as we proceeded on the present lines. One economy which might be effected would be to hand over the naval bases to the Admiralty. He believed that the Admiralty did not want to take them, but foreign Admiralties had to take charge of such bases. There were some, again, who would vote the money in a lump to the military authorities, and let the Commander-in-Chief spend it very much as he chose, without control from that House. In short, these people thought the Army should be left to itself. Lord Cromer gave some interesting evidence upon that point before the Indian Expenditure Commission, and he said:—

> "The fault of the English system is that it looks too much to the amount spent but not enough to seeing that the money is well spent, and sometimes certainly it is not well spent."

It would be necessary for Parliament, if it wished to have what Lord Wolseley called a cheaper Army of equal strength, or a larger Army at the same price, to adopt a complete change of system. The real question was what that system should be. He thought it should be a short-service system for the Home Army, combined with a long-service system for India and for the naval bases, if the Admiralty would not take those bases. Lord Roberts had expressed an opinion on that point. He said:—

> "If a system had to be framed afresh to meet our requirements, the separation"

—he did not shrink from the word—

> "of the infantry into permanent home and foreign service battalions might be conducive to the interest of the soldier and of the State."

He also used these words:—

> "The present system is extremely prejudicial to India financially."

Now, one of the reasons which had been given for not making a great change was that somebody in the War Office—he believed Sir A. Haliburton—thought it would mean that India would have to pay more for her Army than at present. It seemed a remarkable fact, however, that Lord Roberts, with his enormous experience of India, and General Chesney, with his still greater experience of Indian military finance, should both unhesitatingly express the opinion that financially India would be the better off for the change. When, some time ago, he, in collaboration with Mr. Spencer Wilkinson, ventured to write on this subject, they had certain actuarial calculations with regard to the cost of separate systems for enlistment for the Home Army and for India. Those calculations had been contradicted, but they had never been in his opinion upset, and since then, with some modifications, they had received the public approval of Lord Roberts and General Chesney. The system that Lord Roberts suggested was three years' service for Home, with a prolongation for India of the men who wished to remain for nine years' service. That was the essence of Lord Roberts's scheme. It had been said there would be difficulty in getting sufficient men for the long service. [Ministerial cheers.] On that question he submitted that the opinions of Lord Roberts and General Chesney should have some weight, and also the experience of the Royal Marines. He believed Lord Roberts was right in his belief that half the men would go for long service if the service were made reasonably attractive. If that were the objection of the Government to the change, then he suggested it would be possible, as regards certain forces, to bring the question to the test of actual decision by the men themselves. It would be easy to see what proportion of men could be raised, for instance, when the Marines were being increased, as he presumed they would be this year, by volunteers from among short-service men. He should be prepared himself to suggest a plan by which such a test could be made. If he were asked what the expenditure of the country on its Army ought to be, he answered that he would be prepared, and he believed the country was prepared, to spend whatever was necessary for our life and existence. [Ministerial cheers.] But they wanted to have it shown that we were, on the total computation of this immense expenditure, allotting a proper share to the Army and Navy respectively, and spending the portion allotted to the Army in the most effective way. [Cheers.] He had no desire to express want of confidence in the Government generally; he confined himself strictly to their military scheme, but he knew it was open to them to declare—and Governments generally were not slow to do so—that they would treat any Amendment in Supply as a vote of want of confidence in themselves. Some hon. and gallant Gentlemen opposite had given notices which technically amounted to want of confidence also. He could not assent to the milder form of asking only for inquiry, because the fact was, since he had been a Member of the House, the reports of Committees and Commissions on this subject already mounted to a column taller than himself, and everything that could be said had been said in evidence, and was on record. He appealed to those who wanted their money's worth for what they spent, and also to those who wanted an Army fit to do that which, by the admission of the Government themselves, our present Army was not able to perform, to vote for his Motion.

Major RASCH (Essex, S.E.) seconded the Motion, and said that, although the right hon. Baronet had called himself an amateur, he was yet an admitted expert in all matters connected with civil and military administration, and his reputation extended far beyond the walls of that House. [Cheers.] In his opinion, the charge of inefficiency of the Home Army was caused, not because Parliament voted insufficient money, but because the money was improperly and inefficiently spent. [Cheers.] The country got the maximum of cost and the minimum of result in its Army. An expenditure of 19½ millions resulted in a force of 154,000 with the colours and 78,000 in the reserves. He was glad to know that the Government were going to increase the Army, but many regarded the proposals as makeshift and patchwork. He approved of several of the proposals, but he did not think that those with reference to the Brigade of Guards would increase its efficiency. He did not wish to say anything in depreciation of that Brigade, which for 250 years had been bound up with the history of the Empire, and which was the oldest commissioned corps in existence. The Foot Guards were largely recruited in London and the metropolitan counties, and the men were able while soldiering to keep in touch with their friends. Thus, when they joined the reserve, they were able to get civilian employment much more easily than soldiers of the Line; and it was that fact which was the great deterrent to recruiting for the Line. If the Foot Guards were to be sent abroad they would lose this advantage. At Gibraltar there was no drill-ground suitable for large bodies of troops, and there were so many garrison duties for which men had to be detached that the Colonel had little opportunity of getting the regiment together. By forming the Guards into six battalions—three at home and three abroad—those at home, which fed those abroad, would be reduced to the position of squeezed lemons. As to the field batteries, Lord Lansdowne said that by increasing them by one there would be guns enough for the three home Army Corps. According to the French and Prussian standards, there were five guns to 1,000 men; and at that rate we ought to have 375 guns for our three Army Corps. But the number of guns we should absolutely possess would, at the most, be 320, and for the 400,000 infantry, beyond the three Army Corps, there would not be a single battery. Those who were in France in 1871 would know that the defeat of the Army of the Loire and of the Army of the East, under Bourbaki, was almost entirely due to shortness of guns. It was easy to improvise a regiment of conscripts, but a battery could no more be improvised than an ironclad. We were to have only 320 guns, while a small country like Roumania in 1885 had 300 guns, and Servia had 285. As for ammunition trains, which were an essential part of the artillery service, we had absolutely none in this country. The War Office had not shown a proper grasp of this question of army augmentation. This scheme ought to have represented a parting of the ways with the old methods. The addition of a few thousand men was nothing; augmentation ought to have been considered in connection with a well-conceived plan of national and Imperial defence. The Authorities might have considered the scheme of a long-service army for India and a short-service army with a reserve for this country; the garrisoning of small outlying stations by the Marines, instead of by Line regiments which, so shut up, became inefficient for want of proper drill and manœuvring. The War Office might have considered also the scheme put forth by the Daily Chronicle for an Imperial army, in the formation of which the colonies should be invited to join, paying some part of the cost and finding a recruiting ground. Before giving this money, the House should consider what the War Office had done in the last 50 years. Its path had been strewn with failures. There was the scheme of 1872, the most fatuous and ridiculous ever imagined, in which the whole country was parcelled out into eight army corps which had no existence; the squadron system, which was soon abandoned, and the linked battalion system, which had proved an utter failure. In 1860—a normal year—the Army Estimates were £14,900,000, and for this sum an army of 236,000 men might have been put into the field. Last year's Estimates amounted to £19,500,000, and the total forces available were only 229,000 men. So that in 36 years the War Office had increased the Estimates by 36 per cent., and reduced the nominal forces available by 2½ per cent. That did not encourage the voting of more money to this Department. The French army represented a charge of 25 millions a year, and for that expenditure there were 600,000 men with the colours, and reserves of 2,500,000. In the German Confederation there was an expenditure of 27 millions, and there were 585,000 men with the colours, and reserves of 3,250,000. Switzerland, with a population of three millions, spent £1,000,000 a year, and had a first reserve of 250,000 men and a second of 220,000. And these forces were all brigaded and available when wanted. In 1870 the Prussian Staff put 400,000 men on the line of the Rhine and the Vosges in a few weeks. How long would it take the War Office to mobilise 35,000 at Aldershot? But, unsatisfactory as was the nominal force available when compared with our expenditure, it was still more unsatisfactory in reality than on paper; for nearly 37,000 out of the 156,000 men were serving in the colonies. Most of the men of the Home Army serving abroad were shut up in Gibraltar and Malta, and in other small stations, where they had no chance of getting the necessary field drill and instruction. They consequently lost their efficiency and were unable to meet European troops in the field. In regard to the rest of the Home Army, 116,000 men, he would point out that the present Commander-in-Chief stated before the Wantage Committee that there was not a single battalion fit to be sent abroad, each being like a squeezed lemon; that it would have to be supplemented by the Reserve; and that that Reserve was practically a sham. He did not think there could be a stronger condemnation than those words of Lord Wolseley. Then, take the case of individual battalions. He knew one which was supposed to have a strength of 950 men in the ranks. But 400 of the men were under 20 years, and could not be sent out of the country. About 5 per cent. were what were called "specials"—their chest measurements were short and they were under 5ft. 4in. In addition to all that, there was a draft of from 120 to 150 men to be sent to the battalion serving abroad in the course of the next month. What then became of the strength of 950 men when only 320 men could be put into line? Lord Wolseley was therefore right when he said that the battalions at home were nothing more than "squeezed lemons." Then as to the cavalry branch of the service. He had never been able to understand, though he had served ten years in a dragoon regiment, why, with 13,000 dragoons, they should not have 13,000 horses to put them on. He knew very well that there were a great many double horses in some regiments—more horses than men to ride them very often. But that was because of the system under which recruits, after a lot of money was spent on their training, were put into the canteens or made officers' servants of instead of being made dragoons. Lord Wolseley had described the Reserve as a sham. How could there be an efficient Reserve when they were never called up? Some of the men of the Reserve had not worn a red coat for nine years, and since they left the colours, rifles, powder, guns, projectiles—everything, in fact, had been altered; and now the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary proposed to introduce a new helmet. Then, as to the Auxiliary Forces, he did not think he need take up the time of the House in describing their condition. He could understand the position of hon. Gentlemen like the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who wished to have the Army disbanded and the Navy dismantled, and desired to trust, like Lord Randolph Churchill, the warlike instincts of an ancient people; but he was surprised that a proposal to largely increase the expenditure on the Army should be made by right hon. Gentlemen who knew perfectly well that the Army was neither efficient nor to be relied on.

MR. BRODRICK said he always listened with the greatest possible respect to everything that fell from the right hon. Gentleman who had moved this Motion. There was probably no Member of the House who was not an Army man who had given so much of his time or attention to the subject of the organisation of the Army as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean. He therefore regretted very much that it became necessary occasionally for him, as Under Secretary for War, to controvert the views expressed by the right hon. Gentleman, who, however, was often found supporting the policy of the present Government in regard to the defensive forces of the Empire. But he thought that on this occasion every Member of the House who had heard the denunciation of the whole Army system and the hostile criticism of every arrangement connected with the Army at home and in the Colonies, in the course of the two speeches which had been made in support of the Motion, must wonder how it was—to quote the concluding words of his hon. Friend the Member for South-East Essex—that men who knew that the Army was neither useful nor efficient could ask the House to spend a large extra sum in bolstering it up. [Cheers.] He wondered what his hon. Friend's idea was as to the process of mind by which a number of men sitting on the Treasury Bench could so far forget all the attributes on which all Members of the House prided themselves as to unite in bolstering up a rotten Army system and in making fresh demands for money without satisfying themselves that the money could be effectively spent in improving the condition of the Army. [Cheers.] He thought the fact that nine Secretaries of State had supported the system introduced by Lord Cardwell—modified since then in some minor respects—ought to be some guarantee that that system was not so absolutely rotten as it had just been described. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean had said that the country ought to get more value for the money it spent on the Army; but the right hon. Gentleman never threw out a suggestion, in the course of his speech, as to how that better value was to be obtained for the expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman had, indeed, made one suggestion—that was that the soldiers should be more highly paid. Of course, they would all be glad to see that done, but it would mean an enormous plunge into the National purse. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman had put forward a scheme which had to some extent received the imprimatur of Lord Roberts. What would be the result of such a scheme if adopted? It would magnify every evil under which our Army system now suffered, and put upon India an increased charge of £640,000 a year. [Cheers.] Let the House consider what our Army had to do. There was no other army in the world subject to similar conditions. ["Hear, hear!"] In the first place, we had to maintain a force in India and the colonies of nearly 100,000 men; secondly, we had to provide a force fit for mobilisation to the extent the military authorities deemed necessary; thirdly, we had to provide the possibility of sending two army corps on foreign service; and, fourth, we had to provide for the exigencies of possible small wars, and he would remind the House that the small wars which we had undertaken—often surrounded with great difficulties—had been carried out with more success than had attended the efforts of foreign Powers under similar circumstances. [Cheers.] The short-service system was based on the principle that we should have an equal number of battalions at home and abroad, the battalions at home to find drafts for those abroad. The effect of this, of course, was that the home battalions were depleted annually of a number of their best men. That system was tried by Lord Cardwell under two different organisations, first with the home battalion at 450. That system failed entirely, and it was deserted for a system in which nearly all the battalions at home were placed on an establishment of 720 rank and file. But after the Indian and colonial drafts were taken away from these battalions they were reduced to a number at which they could not be sent abroad without drawing upon the reserves. It had been made a matter of complaint that the battalions were not effective for foreign service without the reservists being drawn upon; but that was inevitable, and he did not apologise for it under the circumstances. There was no foreign regiment, so far as he knew, which could be mobilised for the defence even of its own country without calling on the reserves. It was true that our reservists were not called out for training as foreign reserves were; but the men could not be called up arbitrarily without interfering with their employment. It would, of course, be an advantage to train the reservists to a greater extent, but it could not be done compulsorily. ["Hear, hear!"] In considering this point he would ask the House to bear in mind the extent of training the British soldier had with the colours. The British soldier was eight years with the colours and four or five years in the Reserve; and was it reasonable to suppose that a man would forget in four years what he had learnt in eight years of active service? In the German infantry the soldier was 20 months with the colours and two or three years in the reserve, but the men were trained ceaselessly, morning, noon, and night, and he would ask what sort of recruits would be obtained in this country if a man's life was made practically a slavery, as was the case with the German soldier in the first year of service? ["Hear, hear!"] He would be a bold War Minister who would come down to that House and propose a similar system of training for the British soldier. The French soldier was three years with the colours and seven years in the reserve, and the Austrian soldier the same. Therefore, the British soldier spent more than twice the time with the colours and a shorter period with the reserve than the foreign soldier. ["Hear, hear!"] In 1885 the reservists attached to 14 different regiments were called out for inspection. He would not give the names of the regiments, but he would read some of the reports of the inspecting officers. The first was a cavalry corps, and the men were reported, after a month's training, to be "fit to take their places in the ranks." The reports went on as to the other regiments—"efficient in drill," "efficient in drill and military duties," "efficiency excellent," "thoroughly efficient," and so on, the reports generally being to the effect that the Reserve men were efficient and fit for active service. ["Hear, hear!"] That experience ought at once to dispose of the idea that our Reserve force was a sham. ["Hear, hear!"] Whatever were the faults of Lord Cardwell's scheme, it, at all events, had this advantage—that it had provided for the first time an efficient Reserve of 80,000 men fit to take their places in the Line regiments. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean had complained that there was a deficiency of field artillery at home, in comparison with the strength of the infantry. He might state that the field artillery had now been increased to the extent sufficient for three Army corps. ["Hear, hear!"] We had in store, and practically in readiness—though a few guns were still under conversion—all the reserve guns necessary for those Army corps to meet casualties or exigencies. The right hon. Gentleman also complained that there were no field guns attached to the great force of Volunteer infantry in the country; but, surely, if the Volunteer infantry was to be regarded as an integral part of the national defences, it was only right that they should take into account the 200 mobile guns in the hands of the Volunteer artillery, which would, in the event of invasion, be undoubtedly used in support of the infantry—["hear, hear!"]—though he was ready to admit that the Volunteers were not yet furnished with a regular artillery force. With regard to the complaint that the military manœuvres had been dropped this year, he could only say that the explanation was simple. The Government had had many difficulties to contend with in the matter, but they had an important Measure in hand relating to it, and it would be pushed forward as soon as possible. At any rate, the Government did not go one step from the declaration they made last year—namely, that it is desirable from time to time to hold large manœuvres. They hoped in the next year to have the large tract of ground on Salisbury Plain, to which reference had previously been made in the House, and for the purchase of which the necessary estimate had already been taken. The ground would be new to the troops and new to the generals, and would enable troops to be manœuvred on a much larger scale than at Aldershot or elsewhere. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman asked, "Do we get a force for any of the purposes of the Empire in any way equivalent to its expense?" and he had expressed his regret that the demand was so small. He did not think it was a small demand. ["Hear, hear!"] It was the largest increase which had been made to the Army for 25 years. [Cheers.]

*SIR C. DILKE said he did not express regret that the demand was so small. He expressed no opinion one way or the other upon that point, but he did express the belief that a large saving could not be made with the present system.

MR. BRODRICK said he was about to justify their proposal. It was quite true they had not asked for more field artillery.

*SIR C. DILKE said he did express regret with regard to the field artillery.

MR. BRODRICK said they did a good deal for field artillery last year. They added 81 guns, and they had got horses and men for three Army corps. After all, they could not do everything at once, and it was perfectly obvious that they must apply the military organisation to what they had got before they began to lay down plans for an occasion which had not yet come upon them. As regarded the garrison artillery, they had faced the question of providing for the adequate defence of the forts and coaling stations by largely increasing the number of such artillery. But the right hon. Baronet and those behind him had concentrated their attention on the infantry. What were the facts about the infantry? He hoped the right hon. Baronet would not think him discourteous if he declined at that moment to enter into the question of the Guards. It was to be raised on a distinct Motion later in the evening, and he thought it would be convenient to the House that the discussion should take place then. ["Hear, hear!"] But as regarded the number of regiments which it had been said should be added to the Line, he might say that the present number of Line battalions abroad was 76, and the present number at home was 65. Incidentally he might say that the right hon. Baronet was in error in stating that 25 years ago they had proportionately a larger number abroad.

*Sir C. DILKE: I did not say proportionately.

Mr. BRODRICK said he had so understood him. At all events, the position 25 years ago was that they had 71 battalions at home and 70 abroad. No short-service system could have a fair trial which for a long period had a strain of that kind put upon it. What it meant was that they had regiments abroad with no battalions at home to relieve them and forced to draw their recruits from depôts—by no means the best method of training recruits—and forced, therefore, to take a very large number of young soldiers into their ranks, and who, when they did come home, were in a state of very much less efficiency. The proposal of the Government, if it was accepted, as he hoped it would be, by the House, would prevent the necessity of raising six new Line battalions, as it would mean that instead of having 76 Line battalions abroad and 65 at home, they would in future have 73 abroad and 69 at home. The right hon. Baronet said, "Why didn't you make a clean business of it and raise four more new battalions?" ["Hear, hear!"] Their reply to that was that they had a right to consider that two of the battalions which were sent to South Africa last year were only there temporarily, and that any change in the state of affairs there which enabled them to bring those battalions home would make the number of battalions at home equal to those abroad. But the right hon. Gentleman challenged this decision, and practically said it had not been supported by military opinion. The Army Board, of which the Commander-in-Chief was a member, had been consulted continually throughout the year with regard to this proposal, and it finally submitted to the Secretary of State the following proposals:—(1) To add one battalion of field artillery; (2) To add 3,500 men to the garrison artillery; (3) To raise two new battalions of Guards; (4) to raise an additional battalion of the West India Regiment; and (5) To raise an additional battalion of Malta Militia. The Army Board also considered the condition of battalions of the Line, and they held that it was necessary that the lining should be put into such a position that the foreign battalions could be supplied without having two battalions of the same regiment abroad at the same time. The Government had made that decision except with regard to the two battalions he had mentioned, and therefore he was entitled to say, in reply to the right hon. Baronet, that the proposals of the Army Board, under the instructions which the Government naturally gave as to the purposes for which the Army was intended to be used, had been met by the provision which the Government had made. He might go one step further and say that, so far from there being, on the part of the military heads of the War Office, any feeling that they had been defrauded of what they might naturally have expected, the proposals of the Government, taken as a whole, had been gratefully accepted by one and all not merely as an instalment, but as, in the words of the Commander-in-Chief, "such a step forward as the Army has not made for many years." [Cheers.] He did not wish to labour this point, but he should like to say that the language with which their military advisers had agreed to the proposals of the Government had been very different to that of the Gentleman who had spoken in the House that afternoon. After all, they could only be guided by those who had the responsibility. They had followed them, he believed, not only in the main in the proposals they had made, but they had followed them, he believed, to the whole extent of the soldiers they were likely to obtain. ["Hear, hear!"] He had a few words to say as to the alternative proposal laid down by the right hon. Baronet. That proposal was a revival of the scheme which he submitted in great detail and admirably worked out some time ago. That scheme was that the recruits should be enrolled for three years at home and for nine or 18 years in India.

*SIR C. DILKE: I said nothing about 18 years to-night. I confined myself to that scheme as criticised by Lord Roberts. I accepted to-night the criticisms of Lord Roberts.

MR. BRODRICK said he did not want to hold the right hon. Baronet to anything but his present view. His present view was three years at home and nine years in India. Did that improve the condition of the Army at home? Would it improve the condition of the Army at home if, after a man had done three years' service at home, he was to have the alternative either of going into the Reserve or of going to India for nine years? Lord Roberts was a great authority, but there were some statistics which were perhaps even higher than Lord Roberts. Those were the statistics of the health of the Army in India during the closing years of long service. ["Hear, hear!"] Before the end of long service 65 per 1,000 of the Army of India were dying. The cost of India annually represented, as compared with the previous rate, the difference between 65 per 1,000 and 17 per 1,000. ["Hear, hear!"] If they could reduce the amount of life to the figures, the cost to India by this reckless expenditure of human life was calculated to amount to £1,000 per day, or £365,000 per year. There was not merely the question of health. There was also the question of efficiency. He believed it was held widely by other soldiers of eminence that nine years in India was too long a time to employ private soldiers without a change. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal was, after the 12 years' service to send the men back home. Was he going to pension them or would he turn them out at the age of 30 without a farthing except what was due to him as deferred pay? He did not know whether he took the question of pensions into his scheme or not, but the cost of that scheme would be something like £640,000 a year more than the present system of providing a good British Army with shorter service and an Indian Army, and would be, in his opinion, of most military authorities, far less efficient. That House had appointed committee and commission, one after another, to inquire into the needs of the Army. They had Lord Randolph Churchill's Committee, which considered the financial arrangements of the Army in 1887. They had the Duke of Devonshire's Commission in 1889, and they had the Wantage Committee in 1890. The Wantage Committee was specially charged with considering the terms and conditions of service in the Army, and he thought that, as that verdict had been challenged, they had some right to ask the House to abide by it. Lord Wantage's Committee said, not that the system had failed, but that the working of the system had been such that it had not had a fair chance. The House was now asked to improve the working of the system and to put that system into such a condition as Lord Wantage's Committee desired it should be in. The right hon. Gentleman had a scheme and the other hon. Gentlemen had their schemes. There might be a separate Indian Army or there might be a return to the long-service system, which, as Lord Wolseley had observed, would be like making water run up hill, but there was no scheme on which reliance could be placed with that certainty which could be relied on as to results, as was the case with the short service, and until a better system was produced, surely it must be said that short service held the field. ["Hear, hear!"] What had it given us? We had for the first time a force of 200,000 under pay in England by voluntary recruiting. He admitted that the first year recruits were too young; he admitted that the battalions at home were unfit to go abroad without reserves. If we could afford to pay a larger scale of pay we might secure recruits in competition with the ordinary labour market, but we could not do that; we could not hope to attract men who could earn 4s. a day at other labour, but at the same time those who knew our soldiers after two or three years' service allowed that there never was a time when the British Army was in a better and sounder condition, except as regards the first-year recruits. Under these circumstances he urged the House and every Member to read the evidence given before Lord Wantage's Committee, and to believe that they came to the conclusion that it was not the system that had failed, but that the working of the system required improvement. The hon. Member for Belfast (Mr.

Arnold-Forster) had written a letter to The Times in which he regretted to see the hon. Member spoke of a small section having had their fling and having done their level best to ruin the British Army. That section thus alluded to included nine Secretaries of State, four Adjutants-General, and two Commanders-in-Chief, of whom one was the most distinguished representative of the old school of military thought, and the second was the most prominent General of the new school. In asking the House to reject the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, he did so in favour of a system which had given us the best Army we had ever had, which had produced results which could not be surpassed by any system which could be suggested in place of it, and which, if the House would only give the extra regiments now proposed, would enable the system to have a fair trial, enabling line regiments to fulfil the part they were intended to bear, and carry out a well-conceived plan which, in the opinion of the highest authority, would secure the efficiency of our Army. [Cheers.]

Sir H. HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.) said he had no intention of voting with the right hon. Baronet because, though there were some parts of his speech with which he thoroughly agreed, his own view was in accord with that of the Under Secretary. He had not had an opportunity of looking closely into the figures of the right hon. Baronet, and it was not of the slightest use to follow a comparison of the cost of foreign armies with the British Army. This matter had been discussed in the House, and had been well dealt with by the late Secretary for War. It was not possible to make the comparison, not only because of the fact that while on the Continent there was the system of conscription, and we had to go into the open market, but also because of the comfort and almost luxury of the position of the soldier in the British Army as compared with foreign armies. While the pay of the latter was about a halfpenny a day, our men received from 6 to 12 times that amount, and were lodged and maintained in a manner which in continental armies there was no attempt to approach, nor would he have that standard of comfort in the least diminished. In the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman with reference to artillery, and in his comparison of the number of guns required by the infantry, he forgot to mention that, of the total number of infantry, 250,000 were Volunteers, and that they had a fairly adequate amount of Volunteer artillery —some 280 guns, many well horsed; and the only reason why they had not a larger force of field artillery was that the military authorities did not think it desirable to institute Volunteer field batteries. But they had some seven or eight, and the number might be increased at any time if it should be thought desirable to make the increase. Of the specific proposals of the Government he thought they were excellent so far as they went, but he found fault with the Government for not proceeding further in the same direction. To the proposal so far as the Guards were concerned he objected, and he predicted that in a few years it would be revised. At first one or two battalions would be sent abroad, but soon the difficulties of recruiting would come in, and the scheme would have to be abandoned. He agreed with the Under Secretary as to the advantages of the short-service system, but the fault he found with the scheme was twofold—first, that it should not leave well alone and the Guards as they are; and, next, that it did not give the nine extra battalions all military reformers had been asking for during ten years past to make the short-service system work well. The question as it concerned the Guards would come up for subsequent discussion, but he was perfectly convinced that there would be no shadow of objection on the part of officers of the Guards to any scheme for the advantage of the service —their public spirit and esprit de corps would induce them to sacrifice all personal considerations to that end. The objection to that part of the scheme was that the opinion of the officers commanding the Guards had never been asked. They were surely the first people who ought to have been consulted. The defect of that scheme was that it was proposed to send three battalions of the Guards where both the popularity of their recruiting and their efficiency as trained soldiers must be diminished. One reason of the popularity of the Guards was that the soldiers, on the termination of their three years' service, had little difficulty in obtaining civilian employment. If they were sent abroad that would cease to be the case, and the popularity of recruiting for the Guards, and their efficiency also, to a certain degree, would be reduced. The men composing the Guards regiments were as fine as any in the whole world as regarded both drill and training, but they were going to be sent to a place the principal characteristics of which were, according to Lord Methuen, disease, heavy duty, and heavy drinking. The circumscribed space which they were to occupy must result in contributing to their inefficiency, whilst the way it was suggested to remedy that by making the terms of service shorter would not prove effective, and would add greatly to the expense. He was of opinion that short service had in the main been of substantial benefit. ["Hear, hear!"] The defect of the remarks of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean was that he had no remedy to propose. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman, if the present system was put in the melting-pot, was there a single person ready with any effective substitute for it. ["Hear, hear!"] He himself did not know of any such person. With the exception of the proposal relating to the Guards, he approved of the scheme of the Government, which he should support in the hope that this one step in the right direction would be followed up by further steps in succeeding years. ["Hear, hear!"]

Sir HENRY CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs) said he had not intended to take part in this discussion, as he had given expression to his views on many previous occasions. But, when he heard the right hon. Gentleman, speaking on behalf of the War Office, appeal to the fact that so many of his predecessors had taken the same view that was taken by the present Administration on that subject, he thought it only right that he should express his entire confirmation of that statement. ["Hear, hear!"] He would go a little further and say that, to his own knowledge, more than one Secretary of State had gone to the War Office strongly prejudiced against the present system, but when they became aware of the real internal difficulties of working such a complicated Army as theirs, they altered their opinions and accepted the present conditions. He would even go a little further, and say that soldier after soldier had gone to the War Office, and they also had found reason greatly to modify the opinions they had previously entertained, and he doubted very much whether they could find any soldier at the present day who had occupied a high responsible position connected with the Army who would endorse the view put before the House by the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean. ["Hear, hear!"] He was quite aware that the right hon. Baronet had been able to quote the evidence of two very distinguished officers. But they were officers the whole of whose service had been passed in India, who had to do with the finished and manufactured article, and not with the manufacturing and finishing of it. They had no knowledge or experience of all the difficulties surrounding the question. There was one point he should like to urge upon those who had a conscious or unconscious inclination towards the system of long service—namely, that if the right hon. Baronet's Motion was good as against the present Government, it was good as against the whole series of Governments from Lord Cardwell's time down to this. ["Hear, hear!"] Why was short service introduced? It was introduced because the long service system had notoriously failed, and because the Recruiting Commission had produced evidence which could not be resisted, and which showed that they could not recruit the Army under the long-service system. It therefore came to be a question of short service or nothing. There was really no choice in the matter, and those who were responsible at the time had to face the necessity of altering the old long service pension system. ["Hear, hear!"] His right hon. Friend was not an upholder of long service; he wished a very short service for this country, but for the Indian and the colonial service he would still have a long term, with the consequence that had been already pointed out—that in addition to being an inefficient system it would be a costly and a cruel one. They would send the men out to India and keep them there until they either died or their constitutions were hopelessly damaged, and then bring back the remnants to this country to be pensioned and to eke out their wretched existence. They had this to be said for the present system—that, if illogical from many points of view, it suited their conditions, and what they endeavoured to do was to keep the men who went to India long enough for efficiency, yet sparing as much as possible expense to the Indian Government, while at the same time not keeping them so long as to do material damage to their constitution. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Baronet had quoted the evidence of Lord Wolseley, Sir Redvers Buller, and others before the Wantage Committee. Lord Wolseley was rather apt to make strong statements, and in some of his evidence he had made rather sweeping admissions as to the condition of the Army. But did Lord Wolseley, Sir Redvers Buller, and Sir Evelyn Wood, who had given that kind of evidence before the Wantage Committee, endorse the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman? Not one of them. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Baronet had quoted some words he had himself used with regard to the way in which they were hampered by traditions and local difficulties. He remembered the occasion and the matter of which he was then speaking, and he repeated it now. It was when the infantry was organised in double battalions and localised as it was now over the country; he did not hesitate to say that it would have been better to have formed larger regiments with more battalions, to have had smaller districts, and thus have saved a great deal of expense in barracks and staffs. ["Hear, hear!"] He appealed to anyone in the House what would have been done if the A-shire regiment had been sent to the B-shire district, or the colonel of the C-shire Militia had had to serve under the Commanding Officer of the D-shire district. [Laughter.] They were beset on all hands by county prejudices and jealousies, and by the traditions and susceptibilities of the regiments. There were enormous difficulties in dealing with the distribution of regiments of the Line. Take the case of the Cameron Highlanders. He made a feeble effort to dispose of it, because it was an utterly anomalous regiment. As a Scotchman his heart bled for it—[laughter]—and feeling was too strong against him. But now, the Government which the right hon. Gentleman represented had a great courage. Here was a single battalion which, according to the last return, was kept in a state of efficiency by 11 recruits drawn from its own district; and to get over the difficulty the happy thought had occurred to the Government to have two battalions and divide the 11 recruits between them. [Laughter.] This showed the difficulties met with when they attempted to do anything business-like in regard to the different regiments. He had already spoken of the system, and said all he need say about it. The question the House had to consider was whether the present system had worked thoroughly. He had listened with great pleasure, as he always did, to his hon. and gallant Friend who preceded him in this Debate, than whom there was no one with a wider knowledge of the Army or more qualified to advise the House on any military question. ["Hear, hear!"] His hon. and gallant Friend alluded to the excess of battalions out of the country. That was really the crux of the question. If we had had from the first a larger number of battalions in the country than serving abroad, or, in other words, had maintained the system as it was originally intended, none of the difficulties which had so far been discovered would have arisen. But what reason had they to believe that the excess of battalions abroad would be permanent? That had always been the difficulty. He had had this responsibility himself, and he had never felt quite certain he was justified in coming to the House of Commons for a large additional sum for the Army on the ground of the excess of battalions abroad, because he was not certain what change of policy might not create an inequality without any other mode of interference. He believed we had 52 battalions of the Line in India. Would it not be possible to bring home two or three of those battalions? He was not aware that there was a serious objection to a step of this sort being taken. Then he came to a difficulty to which he felt bound to allude, and which had really had a good deal to do with this question. Of late years, greatly to the public advantage, the Army and Navy had been brought together on the question of the defence of the country. They had heard each others' views, and now the whole system of national defence was arranged on full consideration of the views of the two services. He ventured to hope that both services were perfectly fair and reasonable in the matter. But the distinguished officers at the head of the Navy declared that they would not be responsible for conveying any reinforcements to any of our foreign stations after a declaration of war. This statement had been made authoritatively and it was accepted as gospel. But he was not aware that there was anything in it which should make it like one of the postulates of Euclid that people should accept as beyond contradiction. What did it mean? He was not aware that that claim on the part of the Navy had ever been made before. But now the theory was that the Navy was to have the supreme command of the seas. If this doctrine were put forward by a weak Navy he could well understand it. But it was put forward by a strong Navy, and if it were not strong enough let them strengthen it. But it seemed to him to make a considerable claim on the intelligence of the ordinary outsider merely to say it was impossible for it to convey troops to Gibraltar or Malta after a declaration of war.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I never said that.

SIR HENRY CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said it might be right or it might be wrong. He pointed out the great influence that it had. What was the consequence? We had seven battalions of infantry at Malta treading on each others heels, deteriorating day by day in many respects. They were not in a suitable place for a part of our mobile forces. He tried when in office to get one or two away, but he was immediately extinguished when any proposal of the kind was made. He was told it was a scandalous thing, that the infantry garrison at Malta was not large enough at the present moment, and the War Office ought to send more men there. That was a state of things not in itself desirable. Malta was nothing but a Navy base. The Army had no use for Malta; yet all its best infantry battalions in piping times of peace were kept there year after year deteriorating under their eyes, and they were told there was no help for it. The same thing applied mutatis mutandis to Gibraltar. He was merely showing how many considerations must be taken into account. He did not venture, after his past experience, to contradict the theory to which he had alluded as a postulate to be accepted. It might be right or not. He pointed out the consequences, and if it could be got over, the equalisation of battalions was pretty well accomplished. The proposal they had heard with regard to the Guards was terra incognita. It had not been explained, so he should reserve what he had to say about it. But he had thought it desirable in connection with this question of the Army system and its administration to make these few plain observations upon the evils and possibilities of cure which attach to the present state of things. Holding strongly the view that our present Army system, although it was easy to find fault with it, could not be replaced by any other which would not have ten times more evils or which would at all come near it in meeting the various requirements of the Service, he need hardly say he should support the Government. [Cheers.]

*MR. ARTHUR BRROKFIELD (Sussex, Rye) said that although the Motion of the right hon. Member for Dean Forest was practically a vote of censure on the Government, it would be recognised in every part of the House that the motive was a most creditable one and only sprang from a desire, shared in a large degree on the Ministerial side of the House, to direct general attention to the present serious condition of the Army. Nothing the right hon. Baronet had said had so heartily enlisted his own approval as his observation that the public would have backed up the Government in making much more thorough and carefully elaborated proposals than they had done. He was not by nature a democrat, but he thoroughly believed in the policy of completely trusting those from whom you wanted extensive favours, and he thought that in the case of naval policy the public had shown an absolute willingness to vote any sum of money provided it had some guarantee that it would have commensurate results in return. It was no new discovery that our military system was excessively expensive. The Wantage Committee, so often referred to, contained references to the fact that the efficient maintenance of our military establishments and the defence of our positions at home and abroad, must always, under any system of voluntary enlistment, be a matter of great difficulty. The voluntary system was more responsible than anything else for the excessive cost of the Army, and though the right hon. Baronet tried to minimise that objection, his arguments did not disturb the central fact that a soldier who was paid under the voluntary system had to be more highly paid. In his opinion there were many people in this country who held extravagantly optimistic views with regard to the Navy. They talked about the sister service exactly like the French used to talk of their Army just before the events of 1870. The cause of those views being held with regard to our Navy was to be found in the fact that so many of our military critics were fond of depreciating our Army and of always looking at its seamy side, both in public and in private. He did not think that either the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean, nor his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Essex, were quite fair in the statements they had made with regard to some features of our Army. It had already been pointed out that evening that our Army occupied a most difficult position, and had more anomalous duties to perform than that of any other nation. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman did not give sufficient credit to the Reserve, which formed a most important feature in our short system. He, however, entirely sympathised in the complaint that the Reserve men were not adequately trained, and that great difficulty was created by employers objecting to the Reserve men in their employment being called out for annual training. If this difficulty cropped up too frequently that House would have to deal with such employers, who could not be allowed to sacrifice the Army for their own interests. As a general rule, the Reserve men had responded admirably when they had been called out. Thus, in 1878, out of, in round numbers, 14,000 men summoned, 13,000 had come back to the colours. In 1882, out of 11,600 men summoned, 11,000 had responded to the call; and from the figures which had been set forth that night the same thing had occurred in 1885. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Essex, and certain other military critics, were in the habit of ridiculing the physique of our young soldiers. It was a fact, however, that our minimum standard of height was considerably above that of foreign armies. Putting aside the exceptional standard of the Guards, he might remind the House that the minimum standard of height in the Line was 5 feet 4 inches, as against the minimum standard of 5 feet in the German army, which actually had in the ranks of their line battalions soldiers who stood "5 feet nothing." He had had the honour of serving for some years in India, and he had seen our magnificent battalions there in their full war strength, who were constantly being moved out of their cantonments at a moment's notice, and it was impossible not to be deeply impressed with their warlike efficiency, which could hardly be surpassed. He should recommend our military critics to visit India and to look at those battalions for themselves, because he was satisfied that if they did so we should hear a great deal less said in depreciation of our Army as a whole. His right hon. Friend had said but little about the possible invasion of this country; and it had been suggested that the proposals for the fortification of London did not enter into the serious military policy of our defence, but were rather devices to lull the fears of the uninformed multitude. He feared that the military authorities were really placing absolute reliance for the security of the country against invasion upon the Navy alone. With regard to the difficulty arising out of our linked battalion system, he thought that when, by any accident, two of the linked battalions were sent abroad at the same time, the third battalion, in other words, the Militia, should be embodied, in order to feed the other two. If in the present instance 11 militia battalions had been permanently embodied, it would have had rather a striking effect upon the people of this country. He thought that that experiment might fairly be tried. He also agreed with the suggestion of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Essex that, in order to give some outlet for local patriotic feeling, a regiment might be localised in each of our more important dependencies, such as Canada and Australia. As to the proposals of the Government generally, he repeated that the public would have been prepared for something much more sweeping and involving much greater cost if it had only been explained to them that it was necessary. Nevertheless, he trusted that the Government, having once decided upon a scheme, would thoroughly persevere with it, and would not, like their predecessors in office, allow themselves to be led away by social influences. With regard to a second battalion for the Cameron Highlanders, he should have liked to have heard that the wish of Lord Cardwell, to the effect that a superior class of young men should be attracted to the Army, had been fulfilled. He commented on the absence in these proposals of any definite plan for sending small expeditions out of the country in cases of emergency. The Guards would have been a specially serviceable body for this purpose, and he could understand that to send them to do duty in a fortress in time of peace might have a very injurious effect on their recruiting. He would not discuss the additions to the Army, which were really microscopic, any further, except to express the hope that the field battery might at least consist of six guns and not four. The issue raised by the right hon. Baronet was, of course, one of want of confidence. If that Motion were carried, and the Government defeated, did he (the right hon. Baronet) desire to return to the torpid sway of the right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary of State for War? and did he think that would advance the objects which he, in common with the right hon. Baronet, had at heart? It was useless to contend that our military position and the military administration of this country were absolutely satisfactory, but he was not prepared to interrupt and terminate by a vote of censure the first important step taken for many years to improve the efficiency of the Army.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB (Great Yarmouth) said there was very considerable difficulty in properly discussing these military proposals. The first thing the House required to be convinced of was whether the money provided would do the work that the Army had to do; but before they could say what the Army had to do they must first decide whether the country was safe from invasion. That was a question which could not be decided by the Military Authorities at all, but was a Naval question, involving also the question of transport and the Mercantile Marine of this and other countries. If he were to attempt to discuss that question on the Army Estimates he would no doubt be told by the Speaker that this was a question which should be discussed on the Navy Estimates. But he wished to point out that the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman), a late Minister responsible for the War Department, had said that the number of battalions at Malta might be reduced. The root of the whole question of the inequality between the foreign service battalions and the home service battalions rested upon the answer to the question: What was the number of battalions that it was necessary to have in garrisons abroad? He entirely agreed with Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman that we had too many battalions at Malta. His opinion of the difficulties and the cause of the failure of the military system was that they arose from the fact that we had never actually defined, and no Minister in the House had been in a position to say, given our supremacy at sea, what are our military requirements? He would require a distinct statement how far naval supremacy affected our military policy. The steady absorption of our Army into garrison service he regarded as a great danger, and considered that the result obtained was not at all in proportion to the expense to which we were put by such a system. He understood that the increase of the garrison battalions was the result of the recommendation of the Colonial Committee, but he asked if the Authorities of the War Office were going to produce to the House the recommendations and Report of that Committee? It was a curious fact that the proposals now made by the Government were exactly the reverse to the proposals made before the short service system was introduced, when, in 1870, as preliminary to the reform in the Army, they took away one battalion of the West Indian Regiment, and abolished the Canadian Rifles and the Ceylon Corps, and turned Garrison Artillery into Field Artillery. Now another preliminary reform in 1870 was a reduction in the fleet, when it was announced, amidst the cheers of the House, that the Navy Estimates were lower than they had been for many years; therefore, the difficulty he found in discussing the Army Estimates was that of having clearly in their minds what the Statesmen guiding the defences of the Empire really thought of the military necessities. Evidently the tendency was that the stronger the fleet became the more they should lock up the Army; but, in his opinion, the stronger the fleet the freer should be the Army. His own conviction was that they were overdoing the cost and the number of men provided for the sedentary duties of the Army. If they took the case of Malta, all the troops in Europe crammed into Malta would not prolong its existence under the British flag for one hour when our naval supremacy had ceased; while, if we exercised a dominating influence at sea, how was it possible for any great sea expedition to come down and attack Malta? Therefore, the real cause of complaint in regard to the little apparent result they got from the Army was that they did not face fairly the question of what our Army was for, and what were its necessary functions. He found that for garrison service, and service in defensive positions alone, they absorbed 372,123 men at a cost of nearly five and three-quarter millions, while the field Army, which was the real Army, cost only just five millions, and absorbed only 112,000 men. He did not think such a system was satisfactory, or that the country was getting value for its money. Our Navy was really the defensive arm of the country, and so long as it fulfilled its duty offensive expeditions over the sea by foreign military force were impossible. He wished to draw attention to this fact. There was a statement made by the War Minister that such and such things were going to be done on the recommendation of the Colonial Committee. Was the right hon. Gentleman going to produce the Report of that Committee? Because this question and the Guards, and, indeed, all these questions resolved themselves into this, What was it that determined the necessity for strengthening the garrisons abroad? If it was proposed to keep so many battalions at Malta—the very flower of the Army with the colours outside India—surely the House had a right to know what were the broad grounds on which it was proposed to keep seven battalions locked up at Malta? In this matter he did not consider himself tied by any Party obligations. ["Hear, hear!"] He felt himself bound to vote on matters affecting the national defence according to his own lights and judgment; and, unless before the Debate closed he could get some satisfactory statement from the Front Bench as to what were the real circumstances that led to increasing the strength of these garrisons, and unless he had some clear statement as to why it was, with the naval supremacy in their hands, the Government could contemplate for a moment a large hostile force coming across the sea to attack them, he was bound to say he should vote for the Motion, because he did not think the Government were fulfilling the requirements of the country. He felt this very strongly when he looked at the general position abroad, and remembered that if the supremacy at sea was real, the main military question simply resolved itself into a question—apart from India—of offence. The naval base must be secured from the cruiser attacks of which the Duke of Devonshire spoke, but he could not see that seven battalions were wanted at Malta, besides an enormous force of artillery, engineers, and sub-marine mines, to resist cruiser attacks. If the fleet was sufficient, any organised attack on British possessions abroad was impossible. ["Hear, hear!"] Why, then, were the Government locking up the flower of the Army in these garrisons? Unless he could get some more satisfactory statement as to the reasons and grounds for all this enormous accumulation of force and all this enormous expenditure on garrison service, he should feel bound to give his vote for the Motion, not so much on the question of enlistment or terms of service, as upon the primary question of military policy. He trusted the House would have some satisfactory explanation. It was no good for the Under Secretary to get up and say that the military authorities feared invasion, because the highest military authority at his back had the most extraordinary notions on the subject, namely, that the Army must be looked to because the fleet might disappear in a night. The point on which he wanted a clear and explicit answer was this, had the military policy in regard to these preparations for great military attacks been settled, not by the military authorities, but by the most serious consideration of the possibility of an enormous military force parading about the sea to attack our possessions, while we held the supremacy of the sea! On the answer the right hon. Gentleman was able to give to that question certainly depended into which Lobby he should go. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. BRODRICK said the question which his hon. Friend had asked was one scarcely coming within the scope of the Motion. The Secretary of State had quoted the opinion of the Colonial Defence Committee and the other authorities which had influenced the opinion of the Government on the probable points of attack and the force that ought to be maintained. Those recommendations had been put before the House on the responsibility of the Government, who, of course, had carefully considered both the naval and military effects that might be produced. The hon. Gentleman might rest assured that if the Government came to the House and asked for what they considered the needs of the national defences, it was after considering the whole naval and military requirements of the nation.

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER, after the usual interval,

*GENERAL McCALMONT (Antrim, N.) pointed out that our voluntary system of enlistment gave every man in England a freedom which was absolutely priceless, and although he did not deny that our Army was expensive, the reason lay in that fact. As long as the voluntary system existed, we would undoubtedly have to pay the price of freedom for it. Every miltary man would like to see the system advocated by the right hon. Baronet, but there was great objection to it, and that was the objection of pensions which it would entail. It was an ideal system, but he did not think it could be introduced now. We had adopted another system, that of linked battalions. That system was the very best that could be devised at the time it was brought forward, but from the day of its conception until now, it had never had the slightest chance of success, owing to the action of various administrative Governments. He read several extracts from Memorandum of General MacDougall's Committee's Report on Details of Army Organisation, to show that essential recommendations had never been carried out. It was quite impossible that system could go on under the circumstances. We had now 76 battalions abroad and 65 at home. The fact was, that to work the system properly we required a margin over and above the reliefs of six battalions attached to the First Army Corps. He could not understand how the Under Secretary for War proposed on any ground whatever to carry out the linked battalion system, unless he had, at any rate, an equal number abroad and at home. The proposal of the Government, put it any way they liked, left us in a minority of four. He could not understand the attitude of the Government. He was a representative belonging to the Conservative Party. He had been wont to go down to the constituencies and denounce the Party opposite, declaring that when the Conservatives came into power they would do something for the Army, and would put it on a proper footing. He was bound to say, as a military man, and, he must humbly add, one who had had considerable experience, he regarded the proposals of the Government as absolutely contemptible and paltry. If ever we wanted an addition to the Army it was now, because the territory of the Empire had grown in a prodigious way. We had annexed Cyprus and the Transvaal, though we afterwards gave the latter back to the Boers, which hon. Members opposite would say was the right thing to do! But we had since added Bechuanaland and Rhodesia to our South African dependencies. They could not call it a temporary expedient to send out four battalions to South Africa. The Under Secretary looked to get two battalions back from South Africa. In his opinion they would probably have to send out 10 more battalions there. We should have to keep our troops in South Africa, or else he was entirely wrong in his prognostications. Turn to Egypt. We had several battalions there. Was that looked upon as a temporary measure. Here we were with a deficiency of at least 11 battalions, and all this was due to the fact that successive Governments had never done anything to carry out the most essential points of General McDougall's Committee's recommendations. The increase of the Depôt organisations to meet emergencies had been quietly ignored. Nobody knew what chaos reigned at present from one battalion preying upon another. In consequence, no one knew that except the regimental officers of the British Army, and they had no means of expressing their view of the facts in this House; but, having commanded a British regiment, he could vouch for the fact. For two or three years, while he commanded that regiment, when he objected to the system carried on he was told by the Adjutant General that, according to the plan, the regiment was for the time being useless. That was a contemptible position to put any colonel in. What did the Government do? They came down and asked the House of Commons for two battalions to the Guards, and claimed, by a process of arithmetic, that in so doing they were adding six battalions to the Army. They were doing nothing of the kind. As a matter of exchange they were adding six battalions to the Line, but merely adding three battalions to the Army. For the Government to come down with a miserable £5 note proposal of that kind—he said it was a contemptible thing for any Government to do. He was extremely sorry to have to go so far as to say that. One of the greatest difficulties they had to contend with was that they could only get a diluted opinion as regards the military advisers of the Crown. At the present time they had the Commander-in-Chief, the Quartermaster General, the Adjutant General, and the Commander of the Forces in Ireland. He did not suppose that any Government in modern times had had the advantage of more skilled advice, or officers more experienced in war, than those four officers. What he would like to have would be the concrete opinion of those general officers, or else the individual opinion of any one of those officers on the proposals before the House. Everyone who had served in the Army as long as he had must feel that some of the remarks of the Under Secretary could hardly represent the opinions of the military advisers of the War Office. Those opinions must have been whittled down, so that the force had been altogether destroyed, to trim with political exigencies. They had to cut their coat according to their cloth, and that cloth was served out to them by a set of clerks in Pall Mall who did not know the requirements of the service. This great Empire would some day meet with an unparalleled catastrophe if these methods were persisted in. The service Members were supposed to swallow anything offered to them, but he was not prepared to swallow some of the proposals of the Government; and he said this from a strong conviction that the Army was not up to the requirements of the Empire. He saw it was proposed to add some 400 horses to the cavalry; but if our cavalry were to be put in a state even relatively equal to that of France and Germany, 2,000, even 4,000, rather than 400, more horses would be needed. At the same time, the Government must be thanked for the proposal, because they were the first Government in the last 20 years who had added a single cavalry horse. The ideal cavalry organisation of France and Germany was four squadrons to the regiment and 24 squadrons to the division, while we were content with three squadrons to the regiment and 18 to the division. It would be well to follow the standard of Powers which had had so much reason to study the matter, and which had at present such magnificent cavalry divisions. If he had expressed himself more warmly than he intended, it was simply in the interests of the service which he had so much at heart. ["Hear, hear!"]

Sir EDWARD GOURLEY (Sunderland) said the system under which enlistment was now conducted in the Army, as far as foreign service was concerned, was the best system for the country. The men who were trained in service abroad returned eminently fitted to make a good reserve. In advocating a return to the long service system, it had been forgotten that Lord Cardwell's system of depôt centres had never yet had a fair trial. The idea of that system was, that all the arms of the service should be so brought together that they worked, not as units, but as a whole. Further, these depôt centres were to be made stores, where everything would be found necessary for the troops ordered on active service. But the money—£3,500,000—voted by Parliament for establishing this system was spent for quite different purposes. A great proportion of it went to build barracks. The time had come when the War Office should take this scheme into consideration. If war were to break out to-morrow we should find ourselves in the same position as we did at the outbreak of the Crimean War and during the Abyssinian campaign. To send an army corps into the field would cause considerable confusion. What we wanted was some organisation which would give us a better preparation for actual war. The late Secretary of State for War had that evening declared that the naval authorities declined to be responsible for the movement of the garrisons in the Mediterranean. That was a very serious state of things. He thought that, under the new Committee of the Cabinet, something like co-operation of the services had been brought about; and he hoped that reasonable and sensible co-operation would be insisted on. Manœuvres ought to be conducted, not by the Army alone, but by the two services in co-operation. There should, for instance, be exercise in the embarkation and disembarkation of troops and stores. It was essential that the forces should be employed in times of peace at such work as would be required of them when actively engaged in war. He also considered that we were not getting money's worth for what we were spending on the Army. When his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury was an independent Member he was always laying before the House evidence of military extravagance. He remembered that on one accasion his hon. Friend showed that the cost per head of our Army was three times more than the cost per head of the Army of any other country. The total cost of an English soldier was £130 a year. The greater portion of that cost was due to extravagance in organisation and administration, and that therefore was a branch of the service in which economy was badly needed.

Colonel SANDYS (Lancashire, Bootle) said he did not agree with the conclusions of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, when he advocated two Armies, enlisted under different terms of service, for home and India. Such a scheme was not likely to be beneficial either to the Army or to the military needs of the country. But, on the other hand, the proposal of the Government did not appear to him to meet the requirements of the service. They were no doubt a step in advance, and as such they would be welcomed; but what was required was not so much what he should call, with great respect, a patching-up of the present system, as the remodelling of that system on a working basis. The right hon. Baronet had quoted the opinion of the Adjutant General, who had said that there was not a battalion of the Line in this country at the present time that was ready for war. It was popularly supposed that our battalions were ready for war at any moment. But if it were otherwise, it was not the battalions but the system that was to blame, and it was the duty of Members of the House, as the representatives of the electorate of the country, to find out where the defect lay, and to suggest an adequate remedy. Personally, having had forty years' practical experience of military life, and therefore having some knowledge of the subject, he thought the two questions of linked battalions and short service should not be mixed up together, but should be considered separately. At present, military opinon was not strongly against short service. Under that system we escaped the great number of pensions which lay at the end of long service, and besides, the term of service was being gradually extended. But the linked battalion system had never appeared to him to be a good scheme. It was like an Army working in fetters. He had always held that it was not right to sacrifice the efficiency of one battalion in order to feed another, and keep up the system of linking. It was intended under that system to have at home precisely the same number of battalions as were abroad. But if it became necessary to maintain permanently abroad a number of battalions in excess of the number at home—say, in the case of a European war—what, then, would become of the linked battalion system? The system was based on the idea that an even balance should be preserved between the two linked battalions—the one at home and the other abroad—but it was conceivable that in certain eventualities that balance might be disturbed. What should be done was that the links should be severed, the battalions should be set free, as before, and restored to their old numbers; that the depot system should be made a reality; that each battalion should have two strong companies at the depot to feed the battalion at home or abroad, and with a framework ready so that it could be extended when necessary into a fresh battalion. He was sorry it was proposed to add only one battery to the Field Artillery. It was a service that took a long time to train; there was none that could be extemporised less quickly in the field, and none it was more essential to keep at all times up to its full strength and efficiency. Therefore, while willing to accept the proposals of the Government, he did not think they were complete or efficient. There was one other point to which he wished to refer, and that was the responsibility for military policy. They had had a short statement from the Under Secretary with regard to Army matters, but which he thought the House and the country would like—

*MR. SPEAKER: That hardly arises upon this Amendment.

COLONEL SANDYS said he would, therefore, only add, in conclusion, that the conditions which were proposed in the present instance appeared to him hardly sufficient to meet the requirements of the service. Hon. Members were willing to accept them at the present time, but he trusted the time would soon come when the Government would see fit to accede to the wishes of the House and go more fully into the requirements of the Army.

*CAPTAIN PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.) said it was with great diffidence that he rose to make a few remarks on the proposal now before the House, and his diffidence was increased by the statement of the late Secretary for War that until they had sufficient knowledge of an official character upon the question it was really impossible to express an opinion. He was, however, somewhat strengthened in appearing before the House when he remembered that the same right hon. Gentleman had said that the cost of the Army was appalling, and was at present increased by prejudices and traditions which it was almost hopeless to overcome. He for one did not give up hope entirely, and he trusted that the other military Members of the House, who were almost all of one mind on certain points, would not give up hope until the country knew the real facts of the case. The Under Secretary for War, in his very able statement, said, in direct contradiction to what the Secretary for War stated in another place, that the state of the Army was quite satisfactory up to a certain extent—that we had succeeded wherever we had gone in our wars. He had always held that the British Army was good, but he did not think that was quite the question before the House. The question was, was it as good as it might be? Was it as good as this great nation had a right to demand? He did not think that any answer could be given to that question except in the negative. He did not think it was right to say, as the late Secretary for War said, that the present Commander-in-Chief had a very large field of expression. He thought that when a man like Lord Wolseley gave utterance to the words that the Reserve was a sham, those words ought to be received with great respect and attention. He had had some slight personal knowledge of those distinguished officers, Sir Evelyn Wood and Sir Redvers Buller—the latter of whom was better known by the very determined way in which he expressed himself—and he did not think that anything but absolute truth could be attached to any evidence they might give before a Committee. But the principal object for which he rose was to refer to the words in the Motion, viz., "dealing with the present system of enlistment." That was a matter which he had the honour to bring before the House on the Estimates last year. He was convinced that, whatever might be said about systems and about the different ways of managing the Army, until they went to the very root of the question, until they dealt with the actual material of which the Army was composed, the sources from which that material was derived, and the way in which it was derived, they must be beating the air. That was the very root of the question, and until they looked at the way in which they got their recruits, and the time of getting them, they would never attain the ends which they had all in view, viz., that the country should get its money's worth for the money which it spent on the Army. It was wise to see what foreign countries were doing in this respect. Most foreign countries enlisted men at the age of 20 or 21, and only one European country enlisted at the age of 19. But the normal age of enlistment in this country was 18, and practically general officers were allowed to accept recruits at the age of 17, and it was a well-known fact that recruits were taken even at much lower ages. Those recruits were merely undeveloped boys; their minds and their characters were not those of men, and yet they were expected to do the work of men, and to resist the temptations of men. In 1894, in order to get 37,000 recruits no less than 62,000 candidates were examined, and, therefore, 25,000, or over 40 per cent. of all the applicants, were rejected. That to his mind showed that the class from which recruits were drawn was almost entirely composed of the lowest of the community, especially in view of the small requirements of the Army recruiting departments. He thought that if we could organise our Army on the real lines that we ought to do, we would obtain a better class of men. We expected a great deal more from our soldiers than we did a very short time ago. He held that as long as we continued to take our recruits at anything under 20 into the battalions in which they were expected to serve, they could not, from the force of circumstances, do the work nor acquire the knowledge expected of them. Perhaps the most serious aspect of this matter was the nation's responsibility as regarded the individual units who were persuaded into joining the Army. Until they altered the present conditions under which the men, instead of leaving the Army better than when they entered it, left it worse, they would never get the parents of boys anxious to send their sons into the Army. The same rule ought to apply to the non-commissioned ranks as to the commissioned. There was an unparalleled anxiety to get into the latter, and if the Army was treated on logical lines, by making it sufficiently attractive to the rank and file, there would be the same competition to enter the ranks of the Army as there now is to obtain a commission. Another point he desired to refer to was the terrible state of the health of the Army, and it made the responsibility all the greater when they thought of the comparative youth of those who were invalided while their service was going on.

*MR. SPEAKER: I think the health of the Army is a subject outside this Motion.

*CAPTAIN PIRIE said he was merely going to prove that the enlistment suffered in consequence of the neglected state of health of the soldiers. He could only say that when a man left the Army he was often worse than when he went into it. He left it, in many cases, a beer-drinker, and that was one of the greatest detriments to a man obtaining employment when he left the service. He did not deny that a great improvement had taken place as regarded the question of temperance, but there was great room for further improvement. As remedies for meeting the present difficulty, he suggested that our tropical and semi-tropical coaling stations should be placed under the Admiralty, which would relieve many of the battalions now in garrison there. Then, also, with regard to our smaller Crown colonies, he thought their efficiency might be maintained with much smaller staffs of officers. At some of the stations the staffs were ridiculously large. Thus, for example, at Bermuda, ten staff officers, nearly all of the rank of Lieut.-Colonel, are maintained for the control of a force less numerous than a single German regiment—and this, of course, not including regimental officers. The time had come when those anomalies should be remedied. Twenty-five years ago Yokohama was garrisoned by marines, and the experiment was proved to be an unqualified success. The Secretary of State for War stated that those stations absorbed no fewer than 18 battalions; but if the coaling stations were placed under the Admiralty, and garrisoned, if only partially, by marines, many battalions would be relieved. He could not understand there being any objection on the part of the Navy to undertake the work. ["Hear, hear!"] Another method by which he would seek to change the present unsatisfactory system would be not to admit any recruit into a battalion until he was 20 years of age, but if it was necessary to enlist recruits at a lower age, then they ought to be placed first of all in training establishments, similarly to training commissioned officers at Woolwich and Sandhurst. As long as recruiting at the present age went on, he held that satisfactory results could never be obtained. [" Hear, hear ! "] The Under Secretary for War seemed to refute the idea that men could be got to enlist under present conditions for long service, but the right hon. Gentleman had forgotten that it was the object of the authorities to throw every obstacle in the way of the men, to prevent them from enlisting for long terms. He believed also that the pernicious system of deferred pay had done more harm to the Army than anything else, and it was one of the first things he would abolish in the present system. They could not expect finality in the matter, however, until the Army was so reformed and the soldier so treated that he would be made to feel that the greatest punishment that could be awarded him was to be dismissed from the service, and until there was as great competition to serve in the rank and file as there was in the commissioned ranks. [" Hear, hear ! "]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.), while not wishing to interfere with the Debate, ventured to point out that there was another Amendment following on the Paper which raised a question of very great interest, which deserved to be debated, and on which the public would desire to have some information. He alluded to the subject of the additions to the Guards. [" Hear, hear ! "] He therefore thought it would be for the general convenience of the House that the present Debate should be brought to a close with or without a Division, so that the other subject might be considered. When his right hon. Friend the Under Secretary made his statement on Friday there would be every opportunity of discussing the general question. [" Hear, hear ! "]

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said he felt bound to make a few remarks on the matters under consideration that night, as he understood that on Friday an Amendment would be moved for a reduction in the number of men, which would have the effect of preventing any hon. Member from dealing with the subjects which were now before the House. The two front Benches were agreed on the present policy adopted in regard to the Army; they had similarly agreed before, and the result of such agreement had always been the breakdown and failure of our Army organisation. [" Hear, hear ! "] Until this system was changed the British Army would never make any progress. The system was contrary to common sense. It was a crazy system which could never produce any satisfactory results. The plan of linked battalions supposed that two battalions formed one unit, but only by accident had the two battalions of one regiment ever been quartered together. They generally met each other in the Suez Canal. There never would be regimental solidarity with one battalion at home and the other abroad. The depôt system for recruits had undoubtedly been a failure; to those brick buildings scattered all over the country were sent recruits and some old veterans who were employed there in cleaning pots and pans, looking after vegetables, and doing other military duties of that kind. [Laughter.] Another batch of recruits would go to the home battalion. Was it credible that this could be a wise system? The whole staff of officers of the home battalion had practically not to learn military duties, but to play the part of masters of schools and of drill-masters to the recruits. When the men thus under training began to know their masters and to become soldiers they were sent away to another battalion. Let the House look at the contrary effect of the system pursued in regard to the Royal Marines. The recruits for this force were sent to large depôts and kept there for nine months. They were then turned out the best drilled soldiers in the world—[cheers]—and sent straight to the various divisions. To make any comparison between the line battalions at home and the Royal Marines, either at home or abroad, was perfectly idle and absurd. [" Hear, hear ! "] It had been urged that there should be a system of short service for the Army at home and of long service for the troops abroad. The system of short service—the term of three years—had been tried at home in the Brigade of Guards, and it had succeeded after the long term of seven years had failed.

They had a long service in the Royal Marines, and there they had, side by side, a three years' service and a 12 years' service, both producing admirable results. Between those two they had a seven, or eight, or six years' service, which they pretended was a short-service system, and which was an absolute failure. ["Hear, hear!"] Their practice in the matter was contrary to common sense. They expected to get good soldiers and plenty of them, and yet they told every man or boy on enlisting that they would keep him for six years and then turn him adrift a ruined man, unless he got aid from some charitable institution, to which he must go and beg the right to live. ["Hear, hear!"] He defied anyone to suggest that that sort of system could attract the right class of men. He asked any hon. Gentleman to tell him of one single instance since the short-service system started of any battalion in the British Service—except the Guards or on the Indian Establishment—that had paraded on its war strength in war. As a matter of fact, their Commander-in-Chief, or others, had selected their battalions. ["Hear, hear!"] They picked and chose and filled up their battalions with the best men they could get from here and there. A war would test this system, and they would then see whether they were dealing in realities or not. It was said that these men were very fine fellows. So they were. Those who survived the perils and temptations of Indian life grew up to be fine soldiers; but they came back here to be ruined and to go into the workhouses. Only last Session he asked that these men might receive a little more consideration at the hands of the Government—men who were discharged into the workhouses by scores and hundreds. [Ministerial cries of "No."] He hoped he should have an occasion of proving that statement. He was told that a great number of these men had been employed by the railway companies, but that the railway companies found they were not the proper class of men, and it was not fair to press them to take a class of men whom they really could not make use of. Was that the necessary consequence of serving Her Majesty? Not a bit of it. They got men discharged from the Marines by hundreds and from the Navy by thousands, and everybody was glad to get their service. But they got those men whose careers had been broken by this Army service discharge, and they came out as they went in—very little better, and sometimes, perhaps, a little worse. He claimed that the failure of the system, which was now undoubted, was the natural and inevitable consequence of the system; and he trusted the House would not be misled by the rosy statements they heard sometimes. They must discount and discount the legitimate and splendid pride their officers took in the units they commanded, and they must go and see for themselves what these battalions were. He did not care where hon. Members went, they would find the same miserable, tedious sham going on of these battalions being treated as depôts for other battalions. ["Hear, hear!"] What he believed they wanted was a recasting of the system on some common-sense lines. ["Hear, hear!"] They wanted to do away with this plan of making one battalion depôt for another—a plan never heard of in any land except this or fairyland. He wanted to see the men transferred, when they were properly trained, to the regiments in which they were to serve. They wanted to see their superior officers really occupied in doing the work which they entered the Army to do, and not doing the work which, as a matter of fact, was being done by non-commissioned officers in the depôt. They were burning the candle at both ends, for they were preventing the right men going in, because they did not allow them to go in under conditions which good men would be content to accept. For these reasons he would support the Motion of the right hon. Baronet.

MR. WILLIAM ALLAN (Gateshead) desired to challenge the statement of the Under Secretary for War that the 200 guns belonging to the Artillery Volunteers were perfectly mobile and could be used in case of an invasion. Those guns—and he dared say the right hon. Gentleman was aware of the fact—were absolutely useless, for they were obsolete. There was not a Volunteer company in the country that had got breech-loading field pieces, while the battalions on the coast had only muzzle-loaders. He would like to know why the right hon. Gentleman said that these 200 guns could be used in case of invasion, and were perfectly mobile. He did not object to the proposed expenditure. Far from it, but with this expenditure the artillery of the Volunteers should be put on a proper basis. He happened to be an old Volunteer officer, and remembered that the guns were and remained now, he believed, all muzzle loaders. What was the use of these? Those were not the best weapons with which to resist an invasion. He would go further in reference to the expenditure upon artillery, and deny that the best weapons were given to the Royal Artillery. They might brag of the efficiency of batteries and horses, but the weapons were old. The breech mechanism of the field pieces was old, it had the side swing and not the proper drop action for quick-firing. Why spend money on the obsolete mechanism? He merely directed the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to these facts. It was all very well to come to the House and ask for money, and the right hon. Gentleman was only doing his duty in that, but the money would not be wisely spent unless it armed the British Army with the best weapons. The Royal Artillery could not compete with continental artillery, simply because the weapons were not of the modern type. The quick firing of the French and German artillery could beat ours, to use a common expression "into fits." He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be practical in this matter. It was his duty as Minister of the Crown, and not only a duty he owed to his colleagues but to the nation, that, before asking for money he should show it was for supplying the best article he could get.

*Colonel WELBY (Taunton) felt an apology was due to the House, and he hoped Members would bear with him while he called attention to a matter which would not be in order on later Amendments. The Under Secretary had reproached the right hon. Baronet who moved this Resolution with not having provided any solution of the difficulties which he had placed before the House, and the taunt had been repeated by hon. Members who had followed. But it seemed to him, if the right hon. Gentleman established his point, if he had shown that the state of the Army at the present time was unsatisfactory, that it was inefficient and required to be reorganised, then he had done all that could be expected from a civilian Member of the House, the solution of the difficulties resting with the paid officers of the Crown. ["Hear, hear!"] It was not for a civilian Member of the House to offer the solution of these difficulties. He asked the patience of the House because he believed that to a certain extent he could suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary some lines upon which he could amend the future organisation of our Army. No doubt our Army presented a most complex problem. We had to provide for home defence, for the possibility of landing a large force on the continent, for our Indian Army, and for the garrisons of our colonial and foreign possessions, and all this had to be done with the voluntary system. To provide for all these difficulties we had a system which dated from a time when we had no colonial possessions or Indian Empire to defend; the system of district commands, a system which had been thrust aside by all continental nations. We had rejected it in India, where we had a far better organised and more efficient Army. This system of district commands dated almost from the beginning of our standing Army. So different were the districts in this country that it would be found in their staff officers they varied from nine up to twenty-one, and in battalions in these districts they varied from one to fifteen. In spite of these irregularities they were co-equal in power, each independent of the other, and simply tied to the War Office and subject to the War Office. In England these districts were nine in number, in Scotland one, and in Ireland four. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Brodrick) that if he really wished to lay the foundation of a properly-organised Army system in the country, he should change these district commands into Army Corps commands, those in Great Britain to two or three Army Corps districts and those of Ireland into one. When he said a change, he meant much more than any change that had been made on paper up to the present time. He did not mean merely reorganising them on paper, leaving these Army Corps subordinate to the War Office as at the present time; he meant more than that. If the right hon. Gentleman and the Secretary for War thought of waiting until the War Office took the initiative, that would never come until they were in their graves. What the right hon. Gentleman needed to do was, to speak with the authority of the Government to which he belonged, with the force of the public opinion of the of the country behind him, and say that this antiquated system must cease and be replaced by a system in accordance with continental and Indian experience. It must be something real. The Army Corps must not be simply generals who are under the thumb of the War Office, they must be in command of the Army Corps, responsible for everything concerned in the district, ammunition, materiel and arms, and all preparations for defence. Let these be as independent as the Army Corps leaders in Germany, and only by laying the foundation of some such system would the organisation of the military force of the country be effective? What the right hon. Gentleman was doing was simply patchwork. The War Office was an old building, and whilst to an old building they might put a bow window, or an attic, or a new storey, they could not adapt it to new requirements. ["Hear, hear!"] They must start at the very foundation and build upwards. If the right hon. Gentleman would not do this the money he was now asking to be voted for the Army would be wasted, for he would not get any effective return for it. It was a question of organisation, and unless the right hon. Gentleman took that in hand and insisted upon its being real, complete success would not attend his efforts. ["Hear, hear!"] He could warn him that when he came to attack the War Office system he would find there was an enormous vis inertiæ. It was a building in which had collected an enormous number of staff officers and staff clerks. They naturally loved power—as did everybody—they had got it in their hands and would keep it if they could. But if the right hon. Gentleman would speak with the strength of the Government and of public opinion behind him, he could say to the War Office that it should be reduced to the limits of any general staff of the foreign armies, and that these staff officers and clerks who were superfluous should go to the Army Corps district. ["Hear, hear!"] He pressed it upon the right hon. Gentleman as a matter of organisation, and he would tell him that, if he genuinely asked for a solution of the difficulties in connection with the British Army in this country, that solution could only come from such a system of decentralisation as he had mapped out to him. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. COURTENAY WARNER (Stafford, Lichfield) observed that the proof of the short service being the better system was that the very regiments they proposed to increase were those which had been successful because of the short service. They were, indeed, the very regiments that were most easily recruited because they had the option of short service. Then came the question of the battalions at home. The Under Secretary said they were supposed to be of a strength of 720 each, or taking the drafts for India 520. He had himself been at Aldershot for something like twenty years, and he had never seen—except in a very rare case—a battalion of 520 men on parade, and he did not think they very often saw 400. As to the question of the Artillery the increase that was proposed would bring the number of horses and men up to what they were about thirty years ago, when there were both more horses and men than now. He thought it was Mr. Stanhope who brought about the reduction, and the Artillery were now about to be put back to the old numbers by the proposed increase. But independently of that, the Army was supposed to be increased, therefore the proportion had fallen enormously. Coming to the Reserves, there was one Reserve which was a perfect myth, namely, the Militia. The Militia Reserve was composed of men who were reserved naturally by being in the Militia. The Militia in the old days was a reserve that filled up their battalions at the battle of Waterloo, and on a hundred other occasions, and formed the Reserve Army of this country. They took 30,000 men out of the Militia, called them Militia Reserves and gave them a pound or thirty shillings a year for the sake of having that name. No members of the Militia would object to see that force used for foreign service when required, and the country would then be enabled to save the £30,000 a year they were now spending on a Militia Reserve, which was practically a stage Army, and which became reserved twice over, first, as the Militia Reserve, and then as the Militia. They had got no artillery for the Militia. They had got Garrison Artillery but there was not a single gun to supply them with. Then there was the Yeomanry, which was very good for scouts and so on, but hardly sufficient to supply the Army with 70,000 men—at least with cavalry—which the Militia was supposed to be able to do. They had thus got a large reserve in the form of Militia without a single gun, and without any real cavalry to support them in the field. He thought this reform was a fictitious one. They increased the infantry, in which they were strongest, but they increased the Artillery to such a small extent as to be utterly inefficient for use as a Reserve, and they did not really improve the existing force of the country against invasion. The only thing they did, was to enable their best force for protection namely, the Guards, to be divided, so that a certain portion of them could be utilised as were the Line regiments, by being sent abroad, but by that means they destroyed the few battalions that were left at home. He complained of the inefficiency of the Army at home. Something was radically wrong with the system of recruiting, and should be altered if we were to have anything more than a paper Army.

*General RUSSELL (Cheltenham) held that the proposals of the Government were unsatisfactory in themselves and insufficient for the needs of the Army. The Under Secretary for War spoke of the recommendations of the Military Board. Military members knew what they were. The Military Board was obliged to take what was given to it. He did not deny that the permanent officials of the War Office were painstaking and industrious, but he contended that they and the Secretary of State should have a freer hand, and not be told by the Treasury: "You cannot have any more money; you must make the best of what you have." The Militia were below the proper strength, and no attempt had been made to enforce the Constitutional law of raising it by ballot. He exceedingly regretted that. The system of deferred pay was most objectionable, and the sooner it was abolished the better. He was surprised that no proposals had been made for extending the manœuvres. The Under Secretary for War had referred to the acquisition of 60 square miles on Salisbury Plain for that purpose. Did he think an Army could manœuvre on a space eight miles by eight miles? Such an area was nothing more than a large drill ground. Our Reserves did not receive sufficient training, and when they were called out to fill up weak battalions, as had been done in the case of Egypt, they had in some instances been found to be extremely insubordinate and difficult to deal with. But why were the Reserves not called out oftener? It was said that if called out they would not get employment. They got retaining pay, and why not call them out at least for a few days every year? ["Hear, hear?"] He had been in the Army 30 years, and he had never known the Militia Reserve to be called out. He believed that any hon. Member who was in the service would bear him out in that statement. He maintained that when the Reserve men had been called out in England they had been found to give a great deal of trouble. [Cries of "No!"] As to what had been said with regard to the provisions of guns for the Artillery, he happened to command a brigade of Volunteers, and he should like to know where the guns were that would be a necessary adjunct to the force if they were called upon at short notice to go into action. As far as he could ascertain we had something like 200 guns only nominally assigned for that purpose, which amounted to about half a gun per thousand men. The Government had made no adequate provision of these arms, but they came down to that House with a mere makeshift proposal to carry out the linked battalion system. He would not detain the House longer at that late hour of the night, and he could only apologise for having occupied its time at such length. The matter, however, was one of great importance, and it was this fact that had led him to trespass so long upon the good nature and indulgence of the House. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Mr. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) said that the state of our military forces was a subject that fully deserved the attention of that House. For some 18 or 20 years he had held a Commission in Her Majesty's Service—not in the Regulars, but in the Militia—and he had taken a great interest in the question of the recruitment of the force. It appeared to him that it was a mistake to recruit for the Army and for the Militia separately. They ought to recruit for the two branches of the Service together, and after the men had received a certain amount of training they should be allowed to elect whether they would join the Militia or the regular Army. As it was, he believed that some 15,000 or 20,000 men who were recruited for the Militia went into the regular Army every year. That appeared to him to be a very wasteful and unworkable system, which ought to be abolished. Then, in order to stop desertion in the regular Army, a soldier, after a certain probationary period, should be free to return to civil life or to remain with the colours as he thought fit. The Government, in place of adding three battalions to the Guards and sending them to Gibraltar and Malta, where they could not be properly trained, and consequently must deteriorate, should have added four regiments to the Line, which would have been a real and a useful addition to the Army. In his opinion the proposal of the Government to send the Guards abroad would render it very difficult to obtain recruits for that branch of the Army. The hon. Member for Aberdeen had drawn attention to the excessive amount of drinking that went on in the Army—but in India it would be found that some 30 or 40 per cent. of the men were total abstainers. With regard to the Militia Reserve, it was a singular fact that during the Russo-Turkish War, when the men belonging to some regiments were called out, actually more turned up than the number that were called out. That this was the case was brought to his attention by the fact that when the Reserve men in his regiment were paraded for inspection prior to their being drafted into the linked battalions of the line, four more men than the complement were found to be present, and it was only after the roll-call had been taken that the intruders were discovered. In any case, it showed an excellent spirit. With regard to the question of the Militia, it was ridiculous to count 135,000 men as the Militia force. The Militia force was only 105,000 men, the fact being that 30,000 belonged to the Militia Reserve. But in time of emergency there would be, unfortunately, only 75,000, because 30,000 would have to serve in line regiments. The Government had not grasped the nettle and done what he believed the country would have backed them up in, namely, to add four regiments (eight battalions) to our Army. If they had done so, he should have loyally supported them, but as they had not done the right thing, he should vote for the Amendment of the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—The House divided:—Ayes, 197; Noes, 63.—(Division List—No. 20—appended.)

AYES.

Acland-Hood, Capt. Sir A. F.
Allhusen, Augustus Henry Eden
Arnold, Alfred
Ascroft, Robert
Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Ellis
Atkinson, Rt. Hon. John
Bagot, Capt. Josceline FitzRoy
Baillie, James E. B. (Inverness)
Bainbridge, Emerson
Balcarres, Lord
Balfour, Rt. Hon. A. J. (Manch'r)
Balfour, Gerald William (Leeds)
Balfour, Rt. Hn. J. Blair (Clackm)
Banbury, Frederick George
Barnes, Frederic Gorell
Beach, Rt. Hon. Sir M. H. (Bristol)
Begg, Ferdinand Faithfull
Bethell, Captain
Blundell, Colonel Henry
Boscawen, Arthur Griffith-
Bousfield, William Robert
Bowles, Capt. H. F. (Middlesex)
Brodrick, Rt. Hon. St. John
Brookfield, A. Montagu
Bullard, Sir Harry
Butcher, John George
Caldwell, James
Campbell, James A.
Campbell-Bannerman, Sir H.
Causton, Richard Knight
Cavendish, V. C. W. (Derbyshire)
Cecil, Lord Hugh
Chaloner, Captain R. G. W.
Chamberlain, J. Austen (Worc'r)
Chaplin, Rt. Hon. Henry
Charrington, Spencer
Chelsea, Viscount
Clare, Octavius Leigh
Clarke, Sir Edward (Plymouth)
Cochrane, Hon. Thos. H. A. E.
Coghill, Douglas Harry
Collings, Rt. Hon. Jesse
Colston, Chas. Edw. H. Athole
Compton, Lord Alwyne (Beds.)
Corbett, A. Cameron (Glasgow)
Courtney, Rt. Hon. Leonard H.
Cox, Robert
Cranborne, Viscount
Curzon, Viscount (Bucks.)
Dalbiac, Major Philip Hugh
Darling, Charles John
Denny, Colonel
Digby, John K. D. Wingfield-
Dixon, George
Douglas, Rt. Hon. A. Akers-
Doxford, William Theodore
Drucker, A.
Duncombe, Hon. Hubert V.
Egerton, Hon. A. de Tatton
Ellis, Thos. Edw. (Merionethsh.)

Fardell, Thomas George
Fellowes, Hon. Ailwyn Edward
Ferguson, R. C. Munro (Leith)
Fergusson, Rt. Hn. Sir J. (Manc'r)
Field, Admiral (Eastbourne)
Finch, George H.
Finlay, Sir Robert Bannatyne
Fisher, William Hayes
FitzGerald, Sir R. U. Penrose
Flannery, Fortescue
Fletcher, Sir Henry
Flower, Ernest
Folkestone, Viscount
Forster, Henry William
Forwood, Rt. Hn. Sir Arthur B.
Foster, Colonel (Lancaster)
Garfit, William
Gedge, Sydney
Gibbs, Hn. A. G. H. (City of Lond.)
Gibbs, Hon. Vicary (St. Albans)
Gladstone, Rt. Hn. Herbert John
Godson, Augustus Frederick
Gordon, John Edward
Gorst, Rt. Hon. Sir John Eldon
Goschen, Rt. Hn. G. J. (St. G'rg's)
Goschen, George J. (Sussex)
Goulding, Edward Alfred
Gray, Ernest (West Ham)
Green, Walford D. (Wednesb'ry)
Greene, W. Raymond- (Cambs.)
Gull, Sir Cameron
Haldane, Richard Burdon
Hamilton, Rt. Hon Lord George
Hanbury, Rt. Hon. Robert Wm.
Hare, Thomas Leigh
Havelock-Allan, General Sir H.
Hermon-Hodge, Robert Trotter
Hill, Rt. Hn. Lord Arthur (Down)
Hobhouse, Henry
Holland, Hon. Lionel Raleigh
Hubbard, Hon. Evelyn
Hunt, Sir Frederick Seager
Hutchinson, Capt. G. W. Grice-
Hutton, John (Yorks, N.R.)
Jeffreys, Arthur Frederick
Jenkins, Sir John Jones
Johnston, William (Belfast)
Johnstone, John H. (Sussex)
Joliffe, Hon. H. George
Kemp, George
Kenny, William
King, Sir Henry Seymour
Knowles, Lees
Lafone, Alfred
Lawson, John Grant (Yorks)
Lawson, Sir Wilfrid (Cumb'land)
Lea, Sir Thomas (Londonderry)
Lecky, William Edward H.
Lees, Sir Elliott (Birkenhead)
Leighton, Stanley
Llewellyn, Evan H. (Somerset)
Llewellyn, Sir Dillwyn- (Swnsea)
Lockwood, Lt.-Col. A. R. (Essex)
Lockwood, Sir Frank (York)
Long, Col. Charles W. (Evesham)
Long, Rt. Hon. Walter (L'pool)
Lopes, Henry Yarde Buller
Loyd, Archie Kirkman
Lucas-Shadwell, William
Lyttelton, Hon. Alfred
Macdona, John Cumming
Maclure, John William
McArthur, William
McCalmont, Maj.-Gen (Anr'mN)
McEwan, William
McKillop, James
Martin, Richard Biddulph
Massey-Mainwaring. Hn. W. F.
Mellor, Colonel (Lancashire)
Melville, Beresford Valentine
Milbank, Powlett Charles John
Monckton, Edward Philip
Muntz, Philip A.
Murray, Rt. Hn. A. Graham (Bute)
Murray, Col. Wyndham (Bath)
Myers, William Henry
Nicol, Donald Ninian
Northcote, Hon. Sir H. Stafford
Orr-Ewing, Charles Lindsay
Parkes, Ebenezer
Paulton, James Mellor
Penn, John
Phillpotts, Captain Arthur
Pierpoint, Robert
Platt-Higgins, Frederick
Pollock, Harry Frederick
Pretyman, Capt. Ernest George
Pryce-Jones, Edward
Purvis, Robert
Renshaw, Charles Bine
Ridley, Rt. Hon. Sir Matthew W.
Ritchie, Rt. Hon. Chas. Thomson
Robson, William Snowdon
Round, James
Russell, T. W. (Tyrone)
Savory, Sir Joseph
Seely, Charles Hilton
Sharpe, William Edward T.
Shaw, Thomas (Hawick B.)
Simeon, Sir Barrington
Sinclair, Louis (Romford)
Skewes-Cox, Thomas
Smith, Abel H. (Christchurch)
Smith, Hon. W. F. D. (Strand)
Stanley, Lord (Lancs.)
Stanley, Edw. Jas. (Somerset)
Stirling-Maxwell, Sir John M.
Strutt, Hon. Charles Hedley
Sturt, Hon. Humphry Napier
Talbot, Lord E. (Chichester)
Thornton, Percy M.
Tomlinson, Wm. Edw. Murray
Ure, Alexander
Valentia, Viscount
Vincent, Col. Sir C. E. Howard
Warde, Lt.-Col. C. E. (Kent)
Warkworth, Lord
Warr, Augustus Frederick
Webster, Sir R. E. (Isle of Wight)
Whiteley, George (Stockport)
Williams, Joseph Powell- (Birm.)
Willoughby de Eresby, Lord
Wodehouse, Edmond R. (Bath)
Woodall, William
Wyndham-Quin, Major W. H
Wyvill, Marmaduke D'Arcy
Younger, William

Tellers for the Ayes, Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

NOES.

Allan, William (Gateshead)
Allen, Wm. (Newc-under-Lyme)
Arnold-Forster, Hugh O.
Bartley, George C. T.
Bayley, Thomas (Derbyshire)
Brigg, John
Buchanan, Thomas Ryburn
Clough, Walter Owen
Colomb, Sir John Charles Ready
Cross, Alexander (Glasgow)
Dalziel, James Henry
Davies, M. Vaughan- (Cardigan)
Davitt, Michael
Dillon, John
Doogan, P. C.
Edwards, Gen. Sir James Bevan
Engledow, Charles John
Farquharson, Dr. Robert
Fenwick, Charles
Finch-Hatton, Hon. Harold H.
Goddard, Daniel Ford
Gourley, Sir Edward Temperley
Greville, Captain
Griffith, Ellis J.
Hedderwick, Thomas Chas. H.
Jessel, Captain Herbert Merton
Joicey, Sir James
Labouchere, Henry
Laurie, Lieut.-General
Leng, Sir John
Leuty, Thomas Richmond
Lloyd-George, David
Luttrell, Hugh Fownes
Macaleese, Daniel
McDermott, Patrick
M'Hugh, Patrick A. (Leitrim)
McKenna, Reginald
McLeod, John
Milner, Sir Frederick George
Morton, Edward John Chalmers
Nussey, Thomas Willans
O'Brien, Patrick (Kilkenny)
O'Connor, T. P. (Liverpool)
Parnell, John Howard
Pirie, Captain Duncan Vernon
Provand, Andrew Dryburgh
Roberts, John Bryn (Eifion)
Roberts, John H. (Denbighs.)
Roche, Hon. James (East Kerry)
Samuel, J. (Stockton-on-Tees)
Shaw, Wm. Rawson (Halifax)
Smith, Samuel (Flint)
Spicer, Albert
Stanhope, Hon. Philip J.
Sullivan, Donal (Westmeath)
Tennant, Harold John
Thomas, Alfred (Glamorgan, E.)
Warner, Thomas Courtenay T.
Webster, R. G. (St. Pancras)
Welby, Lieut.-Col. A. C. E.
Whittaker, Thomas Palmer
Williams, John Carvell (Notts.)
Woodhouse, Sir J. T. (Hud'rsf'ld)

Tellers for the Noes, Sir Charles Dilke and Major Rasch.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping), in whose name the following motion stood on the Paper—

> "That the proposal to station three battalions of the Guards in the Mediterranean requires further serious consideration at the hands of her Majesty's Government," said it was most distasteful to him to criticise any of the measures brought forward by the Government. He knew he was pledged to support them on every possible occasion, and he thought he had fairly redeemed that pledge. ["Hear, hear!"] But what he had to criticise that evening was not an error of policy he considered it an error of judgment which might easily be altered in the respect of which he was going to speak without any difficulty or loss of dignity to the Government. ["Hear, hear!"] The Government had determined, and he thought rightly, to strengthen the Army, and with that proposition he thought nobody on his side of the House and very few on the other side would find fault, though from the speeches they had heard that night they knew there was a difference of opinion as to the method in which it should be carried out. He wished particularly to speak of the quartering of a portion of the Guards in the Mediterranean. The officers of the Guards, though they did hold very serious objection to the plan, objected not from any selfish motive or because they entertained the slightest objection to serving Her Majesty in any quarter of the globe, but because they believed the plan would be detrimental to the Brigade of Guards and would diminish its efficiency. ["Hear, hear!"] His objections to the plan were that the War Office would not obtain the requisite number of recruits of the necessary physique, and that the scheme would injuriously affect the Household troops by applying to them the linked battalion system which had already failed in the Line. The Brigade of Guards was a privileged body of troops, their privilege being to guard the Queen, and they maintained a high standard in drill and physique. Lord Lansdowne wanted to make use of the Guards to relieve the present strain on the Army. Instead of altering the linked battalion system he was going to use the Guards in a makeshift manner at the risk of impairing their efficiency. The Secretary of State acknowledged that on starting for Gibraltar a battalion would require a large draft of men, and he called that a loan in exchange; but, as a matter of fact, it would be depleting the battalion at home. A battalion at home would have to supply very nearly 200 men, which would reduce its numbers to about 540. He did not find fault with the proposal to increase the Brigade by two battalions, if the recruits could be got, but could they? The Guards, in numbers and efficiency, were now a pattern of excellence to the battalions of the Line; but instead of making the latter equivalent in numbers and, if possible, in excellence to the Guards, the Government were going to level the Guards down to the standard of the Line battalions. How were the Government going to keep up a strong battalion abroad with a yearly waste of about 200 men? The waste would have to be supplied from the battalions at home. The Secretary of State was optimistic in his views. He could not affirm that he would obtain the necessary number of recruits. He only hoped that he would, and confessed that if he found he could not, he would be prepared to modify his proposal. In case of an offensive expedition being necessary from this country, how many men could be put into the field? According to the right hon. Baronet, the Member for the Forest of Dean, not more than 16,000. That was a small enough number of men, but of that small force the Guards would form the very backbone, complete as they were now in numbers. It must be borne in mind that the three years' enlistment system prevailed in the Guards, and consequently twice as many men would have to be drawn off for relieving battalions abroad as would have to be drawn off in the case of Line battalions where the period of service was longer. Then there was the question of training. He presumed that it was in a man's second year of service that he would be sent to Gibraltar, where he could obtain no training in field firing and other necessary duties. After his three years' service he would be passed into the Reserve for nine years, during which he would have no opportunity of practising those duties. At home the Guards got a very fair amount of training at manœuvres or at Pirbright, and they were practised in marching in London. It should be remembered that it was still to be proved whether the men who had been some time in the Reserve would be as efficient on mobilisation as one hoped they would be. There was no doubt that we got a large proportion of our recruits from men who believed that their services in the Brigade of Guards would enable them to get positions on the railways and in the police force. These men also had this advantage—that they were on the spot, and were thus able to obtain these situations with greater ease. He would not allude to the question as to whether it was a breach of faith to ask the Brigade of Guards to serve abroad. Technically speaking, he believed it was not; but it was going perilously near it. It was true that it would cost more to have raised the Line battalions, but the cost of maintaining the battalions of the Brigade of Guards was very nearly £10,000 a year more than the Line battalions. Where were the officers to come from for the new battalions? Were the Government going to bring in officers from other corps and to place them over the heads of officers already serving in the Brigade? The late Secretary for War had stated that of late the standard of height had been higher than it was before. But within three months the height had been reduced from 5ft. 9in. to 5ft. 8½in.; and he remembered the time when the standard had been as low as 5ft. 6in. In times of difficult recruiting they would even have a lower standard than that of these extra battalions. The standard of height, which it was desirable to maintain in the recruits for the Guards, would thus be deteriorated. He feared that the Government had come to a decision on this matter without sufficiently going into the question. Had they consulted an officer commanding a battalion or a regiment on these important points? So far as he could gather not an officer commanding a battalion or regiment had been consulted on the subject, or, if consulted, were in favour of it. On the contrary, they were unanimously against it. He understood that Lord Methuen had been consulted, and that he had reported in favour of the proposal; but if that was so, he could not understand the conduct of Lord Methuen in another place in damning the Measure with very faint praise indeed. If the Government were determined to carry out their policy, he believed it would certainly deteriorate the quality of the men forming the Guards. In time it would certainly weaken, if not ruin, the Brigade. This would not be the first time that the height of men for the Guards had been reduced owing to the want of recruits. In 1878 the Scots Guards wanted 460 men, and the establishment was reduced from 2,000 to 1,500 men; in 1881 they were reduced by two companies, which showed that it was not always easy for the Brigade to procure men of the size and chest measurement necessary for Household troops. He suggested that the authorities should note three points—(1) the battalion abroad should be of the same strength as the battalion at home; (2) their service abroad should not exceed one year or, at the outside, 18 months; and (3) no draft should be sent from the home battalion to the battalion abroad.

LORD ALWYNE COMPTON (Beds, Biggleswade) endorsed the remarks made by his hon. and gallant Friend who had just sat down. The subject was one he had always advocated and preached the gospel of on public platforms on every possible occasion—that was to say, the increase of the Army, and the increased efficiency of the Army. It was a matter of deep regret that on this the first occasion for some years when the Government had been able to bring forward a measure of this kind he could not profess himself in sympathy with them. He did not speak from the sentimental, but from the practical point of view. He was a practical soldier, having been acting adjutant of the Guards for some years, and afterwards adjutant of his own regiment. [Cheers.] He cordially agreed with the Under Secretary when he said it was not the system which had failed, but the manner in which it had been carried out. The late Commander-in-Chief, in his evidence before the Wantage Committee, stated that "every battalion at home is inefficent." The Adjutant General at that time said, "At the present moment we have not a single infantry battalion effective at home." And the General Commanding at Aldershot and Lord Wolseley gave evidence to the same effect. The latter added that the "only exception to that state of things was the Guards." Lord Wolseley spoke with perfect truth when he referred to the great difficulties the officers of the Guards had to contend with in order to produce that state of things in their ranks. He thought he was right in saying that when the short-service system was first introduced the officers and non-commissioned officers of the Brigade of Guards were perfectly appalled at the task they had before them. It was only by putting their backs into it that the Guards were brought up to the same state of efficiency in three years' service as they had been under long service. He would brush aside the question of the privileges of the Guards. They had had many in the past, and most of them had departed one by one; and every officer felt that the rest would go some day or other. He would ask leave to brush aside the opinions of the officers, as it was admitted on all hands that their convenience was not part of the question. There might be some gilded youths who could not endure a year at Gibraltar, and there might be men of property whom it would not suit to leave the country. But the Army would not lose if these men left it. But the one difficulty in the past had been that all the officers of the Guards had been volunteering for active service in all parts of the world. He hoped, however, that this question of the Guards going to Gibraltar was not looked upon in any way in the light of a penalty or a punishment. But it could not be forgotton that only two years ago, when one of the battalions of Guards relaxed their discipline somewhat, the authorities, after mature consideration, inflicted this very punishment on officers and men. With regard to Gibraltar as a station, he had served with a Line regiment at Gibraltar for a year. The duties there were particularly hard, and the fatigues were most irksome. The manœuvring ground was so small as to be hardly worthy of the name, and the ranges were not adequate. From the moment that the soldier set foot on Gibraltar his education as a soldier ceased. If three battalions of Guards were sent to Gibraltar it would be for a year or 18 months; and this was the fact which must be faced—that on the outbreak of war the three battalions at Gibraltar would be trained as soldiers up to 18 months and no further, while the three battalions at home would be just training up to 18 months. Supposing the first battalion of Grenadier Guards went out this year; they would draw the best men they could get for the second battalion. In 1898 the second battalion would go out and the first would come home; and the second would then have, not two battalions but only one to draw upon, and from that moment the drafts would always be on one battalion only. The Line regiments had an advantage over the Guards in this respect, because they each had a militia regiment affiliated to them on which they could draw. It was said that these proposals were the outcome of Lord Wantage's Committee; but they were only one of three suggestions made by the Committee. The first suggestion was to take in the Cameron Highlanders and raise five new Line battalions. The next was to treat Malta and Gibraltar as home stations. The third suggestion of the Committee was the one the Government had now brought forward. But the whole crux of the question as to the adoption of that suggestion was, as the Committee had pointed out, the state of the recruiting. It was perfectly true that a few years ago the standard for the Guards had to be raised owing to the number of recruits. But last summer, during the so-called military manœuvres, the Grenadiers were 100 below strength, and a recruiting party had to be sent to London to recruit, especially among the Militia, and it was only by the superhuman efforts of the recruiting party that the battalion was brought up to the required strength. At the present time the Coldstreams and the Scots Greys were also below strength. The fact was that in the years 1894 and 1895 the labour market was in a bad condition, recruits were plentiful, and so the standard had to be raised. But with the advent of a Unionist Government came prosperity, in some trades at least —[laughter]—with the result that the number of recruits fell off and the standard had to be lowered. Therefore, considering the actual condition of the Brigade of Guards at the present moment —under strength and with the standard lowered — it was hardly an opportune time to try this new experiment. [" Hear, hear! "] The only real defence of the Government's proposal which he had heard was the defence of economy. It was said that there would be a saving of £200,000 a year. He should like to know how these figures were arrived at.

He doubted whether they would stand the test of investigation. But would anyone seriously propose that for the sake of saving £200,000 a year, they should risk destroying the efficiency of what Lord Wolseley had truly described as the finest body of men in the world?

CAPTAIN BAGOT (Westmorland, Kendal) thought the experiment which was to be made in respect to the Guards was one the result of which appeared to be extremely doubtful. If battalions which had to find men for their linked battalions abroad would be decimated, it would be interesting to know what, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, was the peculiarity of the Guards which would place them in a different position. Certainly a Brigade of Guards would have two battalions at home to one abroad, and, therefore, the battalions at home would be only decimated or squeezed to half the extent of other battalions. The Guards were the only real short-service battalions we had; they represented, on a small scale, the continental regiments which had real short service and a large reserve. The present peace establishment of a battalion of Guards was 744 men and the war establishment 999. The establishment of a battalion in the Mediterranean was 921 rank and file, and he presumed that under the scheme the right hon. Gentleman would send a battalion of Guards to the Mediterranean of the same strength as line battalions were there now. In that case, battalions of the Guards which were ordered to the Mediterranean would have to find 208 men in place of those left at home. It would also have to find the deficiencies between the present peace establishment—744—and the 920 it would require to have in order to be on the establishment of the Mediterranean, that was 177. In all 385, or roughly speaking 400, would have to be found by the two battalions remaining at home. That would leave each of the two battalions at home 544 strong, of whom a certain proportion would be recruits. The crux of the question came when the first relief was to go out and the first battalion on the Mediterranean service come home. Take the three battalions of the Grenadiers. The first battalion would go out to the Mediterranean and at the end of the year it would come home, and the first relief would have to go out. When the first battalion came home it would have a large number of time-expired men of three years' service. Who would find the 400 men to make the second battalion fit to go to the Mediterranean? Clearly the first battalion which had just come home could not do so. The third battalion would have to find the men. The third battalion would then be left with 344 men, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman, and anyone interested in the Army, whether he would like to see such a battalion of Guards doing duty at home. He greatly feared that under the scheme of the Government the battalions of Guards left at home, after furnishing the reliefs for the battalions abroad, would, in a few years, be reduced to the condition of the Line battalions as described by Lord Wolseley—namely, that of squeezed lemons. He wished to direct attention to another consideration. Hitherto the Guards had been regarded in a certain sense as show battalions, and had been proudly displayed to the foreign visitor as specimens of British infantry. Moreover, the Guards being kept in London got a knowledge of the streets, and were brought frequently into contact with large masses of the people. They were also extremely popular, and in the case of any public disturbance, which unfortunately sometimes occurred, the Guards, composed as they were of steady and trained men, would be much better able to deal prudently with an unruly street mob than a Line battalion made up chiefly of recruits. That was a consideration again not altogether unworthy of the attention of the authorities. ["Hear, hear!"] However, he thought that, in the circumstances, hon. Members would be satisfied if the Government would state that the proposed change would only be in the nature of an experiment, and that, if in the next few years it was found to have any disadvantageous effect on the efficiency and physique of the Guards, that experiment would be given up and the brigade would be allowed to revert to the present system. ["Hear!"]

Debate adjourned.

Supply,—Committee upon Wednesday.

MILITARY WORKS (MONEY) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Adjourned Debate on Second Reading [5th February] further adjourned till Thursday.

MILITARY LANDS ACT (1892) AMENDMENT BILL.

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Committee deferred till Wednesday.

SUPPLY [5th FEBRUARY].

Resolutions reported.

CIVIL SERVICES, 1896-7.

Egyptian Government (Grant in Aid).

1. "That a sum, not exceeding £798,802, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897, for a Grant in aid of the Expenditure incurred in connection with the Egyptian Expedition to Dongola."

ARMY SUPPLEMENTARY.

Pay, etc., of Indian Troops at Suakim.

2. "That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £145,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for the repayment to the Government of India of the extra expenses incurred in connection with the employment of Indian Troops at Suakim, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1897."

Resolutions agreed to.

TRUSTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow.

LAW OF EVIDENCE (CRIMINAL CASES) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till to-morrow.

UNLAWFUL POSSESSION BILL.

Adjourned Debate on Second Reading [29th January] further adjourned till Wednesday 10th March.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT (1894) AMENDMENT BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE (EXTENSION TO WOMEN) BILL.

MR. FAITHFULL BEGG (Glasgow, St. Rollox) moved, That the House do now go into Committee on this Bill.

Objection being taken,

*MR. SPEAKER said that as some Members appeared to object to his leaving the Chair, it was desirable that he should explain why it was not competent for them to do so. Standing Order No. 51 compelled him to leave the Chair, on the Order for the Committee being read, unless there was a Notice of Instruction on the Paper. There were two Notices of Instruction on the Paper, but those being Instructions that were not valid, he might—in accordance with previous and, if he might respectfully say so, correct ruling from the Chair—treat them as nullities and step out of the Chair at once. But the more usual and convenient course was that he should first make a statement as to the reasons why they were not valid Instructions. Therefore, he would say that the Instruction of the hon. Member for Caithness was out of order, in the first place because it was a mandatory injunction to a Committee of the whole House, and, in the second place, because the subject-matter of it might be dealt with by way of Amendment. The Instruction of the hon. and gallant Member for Torquay, was bad, so far as it related to women's votes, because it might be made the subject of an Amendment, and in so far as it related to taking away men's votes it was bad as being outside the scope of the Bill. Both Instructions were bad, and that being so, under the provisions of Standing Order No. 51 he was obliged to leave the Chair forthwith.

House in Committee.

[MR. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk) in the Chair.]

Clause 1,—

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday 23rd June.

FACTORY ACTS (FISHING TRADE) BILL.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

FRANCHISE AND REMOVAL OF WOMEN'S DISABILITIES BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday 23rd June.

MOTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (ALDERSHOT AND FARNBOROUGH) BILL.

Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Constitution of the District Councils of Aldershot and Farnborough, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Powell-Williams; presented accordingly, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Monday, 2nd February, and to be printed.—[Bill 125.]

RAILWAY RETURN TICKETS BILL.

Bill for enacting that all Railway Return Tickets be available for return journeys any time during the year of issue, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Macdona, Mr. Rentoul, Mr. Thomas B. Curran, Mr. Cochrane, Mr. Goulding, and Mr. Pryce-Jones; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday, 2nd June, and to be printed.—[Bill 126.]

SEA FISHERIES (SCOTLAND).

Bill to amend the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Haldane, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Tennant, Mr. Weir, Mr. Crombie, Mr. Hedderwick, and Captain Sinclair; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday, 24th March, and to be printed.—[Bill 127.]

Mr. Speaker.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS (AID GRANT, ETC.).

On the Motion "That this House do now adjourn,"

MR. LOUGH said that he ventured to ask the Leader of the House another question in reference to the Education Bill. Many Members shared his impression until to-night that the intention was not to take the Second Reading of the Bill this week, but the announcement that it would be proceeded with on Thursday, and further that notice would be given of a Resolution on the subject, caused some uneasiness. He supposed if the Education Bill was to be taken on Thursday the Military Works Bill would not be taken this week?

MR. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said he shared the idea that the Education Bill was set down pro forma for Thursday but would not be taken until Monday. ["Hear, hear!"]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said so far as he was aware the only statement on this subject was that he made in answer to a question from the late Vice President of the Committee of the Council on Education, when he distinctly said the Bill would come on for Second Reading on Thursday, and that he believed was the general wish. ["Hear, hear!" and "No, no!"] More than once he had stated that as a preliminary to the Second Reading he would put down a Resolution giving the Bill precedence of the Notices of Motion when set down as first Order of the Day. It was very improbable that the other Bill mentioned would come on this week.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) hoped there was no intention to force the Second Reading on Thursday night.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Oh, no.

House Adjourned at Ten Minutes after Twelve o'clock.

[INDEX.

INDEX

TO

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

(AUTHORISED EDITION).

VOLUME XLV. FOURTH SERIES.

FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1897.

Explanation of Abbreviations.

Bills Read 1ª, 1°, 2ª, 2°, 3ª, 3°. Read the First, Second, or Third Time.
1R., 2R., 3R. Speech delivered on First, Second, or Third Reading.
Adj. Adjourned.
A. Answer.
c. Commons.
Com. Committee.
com. Committed.
Intro. Introduction.
l. Lords.
Obj. Objections.
Obs. Observations.
Pres. Presented.
Q. Question.
Rep. Reported.
R.P. Report Progress.
Reso. Resolutions.

The Subjects of Debate, as far as possible, are classified under General Headings, e.g. :—

AFRICA
AGRICULTURE, BOARD OF
ARMY
CIVIL SERVICE
COLONIES
CUSTOMS, EXCISE, AND INLAND REVENUE
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT
FOREIGN OFFICE
HOME DEPARTMENT
INDIA
IRELAND
LABOUR QUESTIONS
LAW AND JUSTICE AND POLICE
LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD
MERCHANT SHIPPING
MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS
METROPOLIS
NAVY
PARLIAMENT
POST OFFICE
RAILWAYS
SCOTLAND
SUPPLY
TRADE, BOARD OF WALES
WAYS AND MEANS

ABRAHAM, Mr. WILLIAM, Cork County, N.E.
Evicted Tenants, Ireland Feb 8, 1537, 1538
Queen's Speech Jan 20, 138

Access to Mountains (Scotland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. Bryce; Read 1° Jan 22, 299

Accidents
- Boat, Royal Navy, Q. Mr. Gibson Bowles; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 28, 665
- Collision, s.s. Siren and H.M. Gunboat Landrail, Q. Mr. J. Gilhooly; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 28, 677
- Explosion of Cordite, Woolwich Arsenal, Q. Mr. W. Woodall; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 4, 1313. Q. Mr. Egerton; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 8, 1546

[cont.

Accidents—cont.
- Mill, Batley, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 29, 794. Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir R. Webster Feb 8, 1562
- Oil Lamp, Q. Captain Donelan; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 29, 793

Accountants (Scotland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. A. Campbell; Read 1° Jan 27, 660

ACLAND, Right Hon. A. H. DYKE, Yorkshire, W.R., Rotherham
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 944, 947, 948, 949, 952, 953, 956; Feb 2, 1171

ADMIRALTY

First Lord—Mr. G. J. Goschen
Secretary—Mr. W. G. E. Macartney
Civil Lord—Mr. J. Austen Chamberlain
(See Navy)

AFRICA

- Advance to the Egyptian Government, Qs. Mr. J. Morley; As. Mr. Curzon Feb 5, 1430
- Aliens' Expulsion Act, Q. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 4, 1295
- Arabi Pasha, Qs. Mr. M. Davitt, Sir W. Lawson; As. Mr. Curzon Feb 8, 1546
- Benin Expedition, Q. Mr. M. Davitt; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 188
- Boer Government, Legislation against Aliens, Q. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 22, 287
- British South Africa
  - Committee, Qs. Mr. J. M. Maclean, Sir W. Harcourt, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 26, 514
    (For Debate see British South Africa, Select Committee on)
  - Company, Q. Mr. T. Bayley; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 674
- Cape Colony (Sir J. Sivewright), Qs. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. L. Courtney; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 686
- Congo Railway, Native Labour, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 29, 781
- Egyptian Expedition
  - Grant in Aid, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 2, 1067
  - Indian Troops, Qs. Mr. T. R. Buchanan; As. Lord G. Hamilton, Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 4, 1301
- Egyptian Government, Advance to, Qs. Mr. J. Morley; As. Mr. Curzon Feb 5, 1430
- Kassala, Relief of, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Curzon Feb 8, 1557
- Khama's Territory, Liquor Licences, Q. Sir M. Stewart; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 1, 924
- Matabeleland, Qs. Mr. T. Bayley; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 21, 189
- Niger Delta, Liquor Traffic, Q. Mr. Davitt; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 29, 792
- Prempeh (King), Qs. Mr. M. Davitt; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 678
- Pretoria, Reform Prisoners at, Qs. Mr. J. M. Maclean, Mr. J. Lowther; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 21, 183. Qs. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. J. M. Maclean; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 4, 1296
- Quarantine, Qs. Sir W. Wedderburn, Sir B. W. Foster; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 5, 1420
- Reform Prisoners at Pretoria, Qs. Mr. J. M. Maclean, Mr. J. Lowther; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 21, 183. Qs. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 4, 1296
- Sierra Leone
  - Importation of Spirits, Q. Admiral Field; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1535
  - Railway, Q. Mr. C. Bill; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 1, 920
- Slavery in Zanzibar, Q. Sir J. H. Kennaway; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 195. Q. Mr. J. A. Pease; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 4, 1297

[cont.

AFRICA—cont.

- Spirits
  - Importation of, Sierra Leone, Q. Admiral Field; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1535
  - Trade, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 26, 493
- Transvaal Raid, Q. Mr. Arnold-Forster; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 679
- Zanzibar, Slavery in, Q. Sir J. H. Kennaway; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 195. Q. Mr. J. A. Pease; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 4, 1297

Agricultural Holdings Bill

c. Intro., Mr. F. A. Channing; Read 1° Jan 22, 302

Agricultural Produce (Marks) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Wingfield-Digby; Read 1° Jan 22, 294

AGRICULTURE, BOARD OF

President—Mr. Walter H. Long.

- Agricultural
  - Expenditure, Ireland, Q. Mr. Engledow; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 29, 798
  - Prices, Ireland, Qs. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh, Mr. J. C. Flynn; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1035
- Board of Agriculture for Ireland, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1418
- Carriage of Animals, Channel Traffic, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. W. Long Jan 22, 289
- Dog Muzzling, Metropolis, Q. Dr. Farquharson; A. Mr. W. Long Feb 1, 920
- Horse Breeding, Ireland, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 388

AKERS-DOUGLAS, Right Hon. A. (First Commissioner of Works, Parks, and Public Buildings), Kent, St. Augustine

- Daunt's Rock Lightship Jan 21, 181, 182
- Holyrood Palace Jan 29, 797
- House of Commons, Members' Smoking Accommodation Feb 4, 1303
- Irish Lights Board Jan 21, 190
- Mall, Condition of Road Feb 8, 1541

Aliens Bill

c. Intro., Sir H. Vincent; Read 1° Jan 22, 304

Allan, Mr. William, Gateshead

- Belleville Boilers Jan 26, 513
- Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1618
- Military Works Bill, In Com. Jan 29, 870
- Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1198

Allan, Sir Henry M. Havelock- (see Havelock-Allan)

Allen, Mr. W., Newcastle-under-Lyme

- Mines (Eight Hours) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 294

AMBROSE, Dr. R., Mayo, W.

- Agricultural Distress, Westport Union Jan 21, 174
- Distress, Westport Union Feb 4, 1284
- Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Jan 26, 514
- Light Railways, Ireland Feb 8, 1545
- Queen's Speech Jan 21, 253

AMBROSE, MR. W. (Attorney General for the Duchy of Lancaster), Middlesex, Harrow

- Colour-blind Tests, Sailors Feb 1, 907

America

- Arbitration Treaty with the United States, Q. Mr. Gibson Bowles; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 2, 1056
- Cable
  - Canada and Australia, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 663
  - West Indian Colonies, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 684
- Canadian Mail Service, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 25, 380
- Costa Rica Packet Case, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 26, 498

Arbitration Treaty, Great Britain and United States

- Address for Copy (c.) Feb 3, 1173
- (For Questions see AMERICA)

Archdeaconry of London (Additional Endowments) Bill

- c. Intro., Mr. Alban Gibbs; Read 1° Jan 22, 296

ARMY

Secretary of State—Marquess of LANSDOWNE
Under Secretary of State—Mr. BRODRICK
Financial Secretary—Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS

- Autumn Manœuvres, Aldershot, Q. Mr. A. F. Jeffreys; A. Mr. Brodrick Jan 25, 378
- Barracks Act 1890, Qs. Mr. T. Lough, Mr. Vesey Knox, Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 8, 1542
- Barracks
  - Cavalry, Hulme, Manchester, Q. Mr. W. J. Galloway; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 2, 1058
  - Dublin Royal, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 29, 791
  - Limerick Military, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Brodrick Jan 22, 280
- Bisley Meeting, Lee-Metford Rifles, Q. Mr. R. Wallace (Perth); A. Mr. Brodrick Jan 26, 495
- Chitral Campaign Medal, Q. Mr. A. M. Brookfield; A. Lord G. Hamilton Feb 2, 1057
- Civilian Clerk, Royal Engineers, Q. Mr. J. L. Carew; A. Mr. Brodrick Jan 29, 791
- Contracts, Ireland, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 29, 788

[cont.

ARMY—cont.

- Crimean Veteran: Brennan (John), Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 28, 680
- Egyptian Expedition, Indian Troops, Qs. Mr. T. R. Buchanan; As. Lord G. Hamilton, Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 4, 1301
- Enniskillen Fusiliers, Enlistment, Q. Mr. J. Hammond; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 5, 1427
- Estimates, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 4, 1314
- Explosion of Cordite, Woolwich Arsenal, Q. Mr. W. Woodall; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 4, 1313. Q. Mr. Egerton; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 8, 1546
- Finner Rifle Range, Donegal, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 2, 1063. Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 8, 1536
- Foreign Meat Supply, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. W. Field; As. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 21, 182. Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 22, 290. Qs. Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 25, 406
- Guards (The) in the Mediterranean (see that Title)
- Health of Troops
  - India, Qs. Colonel Lockwood, Mr. C. J. Darling, Major Rasch; As. Lord G. Hamilton Jan 25, 397
  - United Kingdom, Qs. Major Rasch; As. Mr. Brodrick Jan 29, 781
- Hulme Cavalry Barracks, Manchester, Q. Mr. W. J. Galloway; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 2, 1058
- Increase of Strength of, Qs. Viscount de Vesci, Lord Monkswell; [Obs. Lord Wantage, Lord Methuen]; As. Marquess of Lansdowne Feb 4, 1243
- Indian
  - Artillery and Engineers, Cadets, Q. Sir H. S. King; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 2, 1040
  - Troops
    - Egyptian Expedition, Qs. Mr. T. R. Buchanan; As. Lord G. Hamilton, Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 4, 1301
    - Scurvy, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Lord G. Hamilton Feb 2, 1052
  - Troopship Warren Hastings, Wreck of, Qs. Colonel Lockwood, Mr. P. M. Thornton; As. Mr. Brodrick Jan 25, 383. Q. Mr. Vicary Gibbs; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 1, 905
- Irish Militia, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 28, 677
- Jury Service, Yeomanry Officers, Q. Mr. J. H. C. Hozier; A. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 26, 500
- Lanarkshire Militia, Qs. Mr. J. Wilson (Falkirk); As. Mr. Brodrick Feb 1, 906
- Lee-Metford Rifles, Bisley Meeting, Q. Mr. R. Wallace (Perth); A. Mr. Brodrick Jan 26, 495
- Limerick Military Barracks, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Brodrick Jan 22, 280
- Madras Infantry Regiments, Q. Sir H. S. King; A. Lord G. Hamilton Jan 26, 510
- Medical Staff, Q. Sir B. W. Foster; A. Mr. Brodrick Jan 29, 796. Q. Dr. Farquharson; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 1, 925

[cont.

ARMY—cont.
Mediterranean Garrison, Brigade of Guards, Qs. Sir J. Fergusson, Sir C. Dilke, Mr. J. McLeod, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Brodrick Feb 4, 1277
Military Forces (Maintenance) (see that Title)
Military Works Bill, Qs. Mr. C. J. Monk, Mr. T. Lough; As. Mr. Brodrick Feb 8, 1541
(For Debate see Title of Bill)
Militia
Irish, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 28, 677
Lanarkshire, Qs. Mr. J. Wilson (Falkirk); As. Mr. Brodrick Feb 1, 906
Netley Hospital, Assessment, Q. Sir J. S. B. Simeon; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1054
Officers
Uniform of, Q. Major Rasch; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 2, 1053
Yeomanry, Jury Service, Q. Mr. J. H. C. Hozier; A. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 26, 500
Pensions
Fitzpatrick (John), Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 4, 1280
Kelly (John), Qs. Mr. J. Tully, Mr. H. E. Kearley; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 28, 680
Retired Pay, Qs. Mr. A. O'Connor; As. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 8, 1554
Rifle Range, Finner, Donegal, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 2, 1063. Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 8, 1536
Royal
Barracks, Dublin, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 29, 791
Engineers, Civilian Clerk, Q. Mr. J. L. Carew; A. Mr. Brodrick Jan 29, 791
Troopships
Ballasting, Q. Mr. Vicary Gibbs; A. Mr. Macartney Feb 1, 904
Indian, Wreck of Warren Hastings, Qs. Colonel Lockwood, Mr. P. M. Thornton; As. Mr. Brodrick Jan 25, 383. Q. Mr. Vicary Gibbs; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 1, 905
Woolwich Arsenal, Explosion of Cordite, Q. Mr. W. Woodall; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 4, 1313. Q. Mr. Egerton; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 8, 1546
Yeomanry Officers, Jury Service, Q. Mr. J. H. C. Hozier; A. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 26, 500

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1897-98

£145,000 for Pay, etc., of Indian Troops at Suakim (Supplementary)
In Com., Mr. T. Lough, 1521; Mr. T. R. Buchanan, 1521; Mr. Powell-Williams, 1521; Mr. H. Labouchere, 1522; Mr. J. Dillon, 1523; Sir M. Hicks Beach, 1523. Vote Agreed to, 1524 Feb 5. Report Feb 8, 1637

ARMY ESTIMATES—cont.
£255,300 for Volunteer Corps Capitation Grant (Supplementary)
In Com., Mr. Vesey Knox, (Amendt.) 843, 844, 847; [Chairman, 843, 845;] Sir H. Vincent, 844, 845; Mr. T. Lough, 845; Mr. Gibson Bowles, 845; Mr. Brodrick, 846; Mr. J. G. Weir, 847; (Division, 848). Vote Agreed to, 848 Jan 29. Report Feb 1, 1019

Army, Increase in
Viscount de Vesci (Notice of Question) Jan 28, 661
(For Questions see ARMY)

ARNOLD-FORSTER, Mr. H. O., Belfast, W.
Erasmus Smith Schools, Ireland Feb 4, 1302
Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1615
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1484
Transvaal Raid Jan 28, 679

ASCROFT, Mr. R., Oldham
Preferential Payments Bankruptcy Act (1888) Amendment (No. 2) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 300

ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Sir ELLIS, Sheffield, Ecclesall
Aliens' Expulsion Act Feb 4, 1295
Boer Government, Legislation against Aliens Jan 22, 287
British South Africa Committee Jan 29, 814
Cape Colony (Sir J. Sivewright) Jan 28, 686
Crete Feb 4, 1299; Feb 8, 1560, 1561
Queen's Speech Jan 19, 83; Jan 26, 579, 584, 586, 590
Reform Prisoners at Pretoria Feb 4, 1296
Russia in North East Asia Feb 2, 1033
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1461, 1462, 1463, 1479

ASQUITH, Right Hon. H. H., Fife, E.
Queen's Speech Jan 25, 425, 428
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1151, 1152; Feb 4, 1315, 1319

Assistant County Surveyors (Ireland) Bill
c. Intro., Sir T. Lea; Read 1° Jan 22, 302

ATHERLEY-JONES, Mr. LLEWELLYN A., Durham, N.W.
Judicature Acts Jan 26, 489
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1179, 1183, 1184, 1186

ATKINSON, Right Hon. JOHN (Attorney General for Ireland), Londonderry, N.
- Agricultural Distress, Westport Union Jan 21, 175
- Codification of Laws Jan 21, 195
- Consolidation of Irish Acts Jan 22, 291
- Cork Winter Assizes Jan 25, 402
- Distress
  - West Donegal Jan 22, 282
  - Westport Union (Agricultural) Jan 21, 175
- Erasmus Smith Schools Jan 22, 276
- Evicted Tenants, Ireland Jan 21, 179, 180; Jan 22, 275
- Government Valuation, Clare Jan 22, 277
- Irish
  - Canals Jan 22, 290
  - Lights Board Jan 22, 290
- Judicial Rents, Ireland Jan 21, 180
- Lane-Fox Estate, Leitrim Feb 5, 1423
- Loan Fund Board Jan 21, 192; Jan 22, 269
- Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 1) Bill, Intro. Jan 20, 121
- Londonderry Corporation Stock Feb 4, 1305, 1306; Feb 8, 1549
- Port Charges, Dublin Jan 22, 280
- Queen's Speech Jan 21, 215, 216, 217, 245
- Railway Rates, Ireland Jan 21, 190
- School Attendance, Ireland Jan 22, 289
- Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act Jan 22, 291

Austin, Mr. M., Limerick, W.
- Distress, Listowel Union Feb 8, 1541

Australasia
- Australian and Indian Mails, Qs. Mr. Henniker Heaton; As. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 404
- Cable, Canada and Australasia, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 663
- Federal Convention, Australian Colonies, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 22, 271
- Fiji, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1556
- New Hebrides
  - Agreements with France, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 187
  - Sale of Fire-arms and Spirits, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 8, 1547
- Norfolk Island, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 21, 187
- Western Australia, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 2, 1066

Baden-Powell, Sir George S., Liverpool, Kirkdale
- Cables
  - Canada and Australasia Jan 28, 663
  - West Indian Colonies Jan 28, 684
- Queen's Reign Jan 29, 800

Bagot, Captain J. F., Westmorland, Kendal
- Guards (The) in the Mediterranean Feb 8, 1635

Baird, Mr. J. G. A., Glasgow, Central
- Illegal Supply of Seamen, Glasgow Feb 4, 1283

Balcarres, Lord, Lancashire, N., Chorley
- National Portrait Gallery, Police Protection Jan 29, 782

BALFOUR, Right Hon. ARTHUR J. (First Lord of the Treasury), Manchester, E.
- Agricultural Rating Bill Jan 21, 176
- Army Estimates Feb 4, 1314
- British South Africa Committee Jan 26, 515
- Business of the House
  - General Jan 19, 41; Jan 20, 122; Jan 26, 599, 600; Jan 28, 780; Jan 29, 800; Feb 8, 1564
  - Government Bills Jan 19, 41
  - Reports of Money Committees (Motion) Jan 29, 848
  - Supply
    - Irish Estimates Feb 4, 1311
    - Motion Jan 29, 828, 830, 839
    - Order of Last Session Jan 21, 200
  - Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1068, 1069, 1072, 1075
  - Wednesday Sittings Jan 22, 293
- Cathedral Maintenance Jan 21, 198
- Catholic University, Ireland Feb 1, 925
- Current Rate of Wages, Woolwich District Jan 25, 408
- Education
  - Bill (Poor School Board Districts) Jan 22, 291, 292
  - Grant, Scotland Feb 2, 1067
- Egyptian Expedition Feb 2, 1067
- Episcopal Elections Feb 4, 1313
- Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Jan 21, 199, 200; Jan 22, 293; Jan 26, 514; Jan 29, 799; Feb 2, 1067
- Hours of Polling, Metropolis Feb 4, 1312
- House of Commons (Sale of Intoxicants) Feb 5, 1434
- Indian Famine and Plague Jan 21, 178
- International Monetary Conference Jan 25, 409
- Licensing Laws Commission Jan 25, 409
- Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1615
- Necessitous Board Schools, Scotland Feb 5, 1435
- Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 729
- Queen's
  - Reign
    - Gifts of Real Property Feb 5, 1435
    - Treason-felony Prisoners Jan 28, 691; Feb 5, 1435
  - Speech Jan 19, 71, 76, 77, 78, 80; Jan 20, 161; Jan 22, 319, 320, 330, 362, 370; Jan 25, 454, 457; Jan 26, 593
- Royal
  - Bounty Fund: George Brooks Feb 8, 1562, 1563
  - Patriotic Fund Feb 2, 1066
  - Residence in Ireland Feb 4, 1311
- Secret Service Fund Jan 22, 292
- Shipping Maritime Property (Compensation for Injury) Feb 1, 926
- Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1455, 1516

[cont.

BALFOUR, Right Hon. ARTHUR J.—cont.
- Turkish Loan Jan 29, 799
- University Education of Roman Catholics Jan 28, 690
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Jan 22, 376; Feb 1, 926, 937, 938, 947, 948, 949, 956, 967, 1002, 1027, 1028: Feb 2, 1099, 1100, 1101, 1106, 1150, 1152, 1153, 1161, 1171; Feb 4, 1313, 1324, 1337, 1347, 1378, 1380, 1394, 1415; Feb 8, 1640

BALFOUR, RIGHT HON. GERALD W. (Chief Secretary for Ireland), Leeds, Central
- Agricultural
  - Expenditure, Ireland Jan 29, 798
  - Prices, Ireland Feb 2, 1035, 1036
- Agricultural Land Rating (Ireland) Bill Jan 28, 687
- Amalgamation of Poor Law Unions, Ireland Feb 5, 1426
- Belfast
  - Board of Guardians Jan 25, 391
  - Musgrave Street Police Barracks Feb 4, 1307
- Board of
  - Agriculture, Ireland Feb 5, 1418
  - Guardians
    - Belfast Jan 25, 391
    - Newry Jan 28, 670; Jan 29, 788
- Bog Slide, Kerry Jan 28, 669
- Castlepollard Petty Sessions Feb 5, 1424
- Cattle, Transit of, by Sea Jan 26, 509
- Charge of Larceny, Cork Feb 5, 1427
- Civil Service Retirement Jan 25, 386
- Congested Districts Board, Ireland Jan 25, 388
- Connemara
  - Distress Jan 25, 385
  - Evictions Feb 2, 1037
- Cork
  - Charge of Larceny Feb 5, 1427
  - Illegal Trawling Feb 8, 1559
  - Queen's College Feb 4, 1306
  - Railways (Mid) Jan 28, 683
- Deportation of Paupers to Ireland Feb 2, 1052
- Distress
  - Belmullet Union Jan 25, 404; Jan 28, 681
  - Connemara Jan 25, 385
  - Donegal (West) Jan 26, 504
  - Listowel Union Feb 8, 1541
  - Westport Union Feb 4, 1284
- Divisional Police Commissioners (Ireland) Feb 4, 1281
- Dog Licences Feb 1, 909
- Donegal
  - Distress (West) Jan 26, 504
  - Petty Sessions Feb 4, 1285
  - Railway Extensions Feb 4, 1309
- Drawing, Irish Schools Jan 25, 382
- Dublin
  - Grangegorman Prison Jan 25, 383
  - Land Commission Office Feb 4, 1291
  - Police Reserve Force Feb 2, 1041
- Dublin Port and Docks Bill Jan 29, 794

[cont.

BALFOUR, Right Hon. GERALD W.—cont.
- Educational Endowments (Ireland) Act (1885) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 29, 875
- Erasmus Smith Schools Jan 28, 674; Feb 4, 1302
- Evicted Tenants, Ireland Feb 8, 1538
- Evictions
  - Connemara Feb 2, 1037
  - Leitrim County Feb 5, 1419
- Fair Rent
  - Agreements, Ireland Feb 5, 1425
  - Applications, Monaghan Jan 25, 384, 385
- Fee Farm Tenants, Longford Jan 25, 391
- Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Feb 8, 1546
- Government Bills Jan 19, 42
- Grangegorman Prison, Dublin Jan 25, 383
- Horse Breeding, Ireland Jan 25, 388
- Illegal Trawling
  - Cork Feb 8, 1559
  - Irish Coast Feb 1, 913, 914; Feb 2, 1057
- Intermediate Education Exams., Ireland Feb 4, 1290
- Irish
  - Public Boards Audit Jan 25, 389
  - Resident Magistracy Feb 4, 1307
- Irish-speaking Witnesses Jan 25, 403
- Kerry
  - Bog Slide Jan 28, 669
  - Warden Estate Feb 1, 916
- Labourers
  - Acts, Longford Feb 5, 1427
  - Allotments, Ireland Feb 8, 1554, 1555
  - Cottages, Ireland Jan 25, 381
- Land
  - Commission
    - Ireland Feb 1, 921
    - Leitrim Jan 28, 673
    - Office, Dublin Feb 4, 1291
  - Purchase, Longford Jan 25, 390
  - Sub-Commissioners, Ireland Jan 25, 399
- Leitrim
  - Eviction Feb 5, 1419
  - Land Commission Jan 28, 673
  - Road Contracts Feb 5, 1422
- Licensed Pawnbrokers, Ireland Jan 28, 689
- Light Railways, Ireland Feb 8, 1545
- Local Government, Ireland Feb 1, 922
- Longford
  - Fee Farm Tenants Jan 25, 391
  - Labourers Acts Feb 5, 1427
  - Land Purchase Jan 25, 390
- Magistrates, Ireland
  - Resident Feb 4, 1307
  - Stipendiary Jan 28, 675
- Monaghan
  - Fair Rent Applications Jan 25, 384, 385
  - Newbliss Court-house Feb 4, 1298
  - Sanitary Accommodation, Clones Feb 5, 1425
  - Tenants' Holdings Feb 2, 1052
- Mountjoy Prison, Health of Prisoner Feb 1, 909
- Mullingar Union, Medicine Contract Jan 26, 503
- Municipal Franchise, Ireland Jan 26, 499
- Musgrave Street Police Barracks, Belfast Feb 4, 1307

[cont.

BALFOUR, Right Hon. GERALD W.—cont.
- National
  - Board of Education Jan 25, 392
  - Schools, Ireland Feb 2, 1050, 1051; Feb 4, 1300
- Newbliss Court-house, Monaghan Feb 4, 1298
- Newry Board of Guardians Jan 28, 670; Jan 29, 788
- Petty Sessions
  - Castlepollard Feb 5, 1424
  - Donegal Feb 4, 1285
- Police Reserve Force, Dublin Feb 2, 1041
- Pollen Fishery, Lough Neagh Feb 1, 912, 913
- Poor Relief, Ireland Jan 28, 685
- Prisons, Ireland
  - Grangegorman, Dublin Jan 25, 383
  - Mountjoy, Health of Prisoner Feb 1, 909
  - Service Feb 1, 921
- Private Bill Legislation Feb 4, 1290
- Purchase of Holdings, Ireland Feb 1, 906
- Queen's
  - College, Cork Feb 4, 1306
  - Speech Jan 26, 571
- Railways
  - Extension
    - Donegal Feb 4, 1309
    - Ireland Feb 5, 1430
  - Ireland Jan 29, 784, 785
  - Mid-Cork Jan 28, 683
  - Rates, Ireland Feb 2, 1045
- Road Contracts, Leitrim Feb 5, 1422
- Royal Irish Constabulary Jan 25, 400; Jan 26, 511; Jan 28, 671, 672; Feb 4, 1286, 1287
- Sanitary Accommodation, Clones, Monaghan Feb 5, 1425
- Schools
  - Accommodation, Letter-Gunnell Feb 5, 1426
  - Erasmus Smith Jan 28, 674; Feb 4, 1302
  - Irish
    - Drawing in Jan 25, 382
    - Workmistresses Feb 8, 1556
  - National, Ireland Feb 2, 1050, 1051; Feb 4, 1300
  - Teachers' Pensions, Ireland Feb 2, 1050
- Seed Rate, Ireland Feb 5, 1428
- Statutory Term Applications, Ireland Jan 29, 793
- Stipendiary Magistrates, Ireland Jan 28, 675
- Street Preaching in Sligo Jan 26, 498, 499
- Technical Education, Ireland Feb 1, 910
- Tenants, Ireland
  - Application for Re-instatement, Carlow Jan 28, 675
  - Evicted Feb 8, 1538
  - Fee Farm, Longford Jan 25, 391
  - Holdings, Monaghan Feb 2, 1052
  - Town Jan 26, 510
- Town Tenants, Ireland Jan 26, 510
- Transit of Cattle by Sea Jan 26, 509
- Undersheriffs, Ireland Jan 29, 791
- Warden Estate, Kerry Feb 1, 916
- Waterford Bacon Trade Dispute Jan 26, 505
- Workmistresses, Irish Schools Feb 8, 1556

BANBURY, Mr. FREDERICK G., Camberwell, Peckham
- Queen's Speech Jan 26, 579

BARTLEY, Mr. G. C. T., Islington, N.
- Business of the House: Supply Jan 29, 834
- Income Tax on Unpaid Dividends Feb 8, 1550, 1551
- Married Persons Small Industrial Incomes (Tax Relief) Bill, Intro. Feb 1, 1027
- Occupying Tenants' Enfranchisement (Purchase of Fee Simple) Bill, Intro. Feb 1, 1027
- Old Age Provident Pensions Bill, Intro. Jan 26, 516
- Outdoor Provident Relief Bill, Intro. Jan 26, 516
- Poor Law Schools Feb 1, 904
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 937, 984; Feb 4, 1391; Feb 8, 1640

BATH, Marquess of
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 6

BAYLEY, Mr. THOMAS, Derbyshire, Chesterfield
- British South Africa Company Jan 28, 674
- Matabeleland Jan 21, 189, 190
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 118
- Sale of Intoxicants, Houses of Parliament Jan 21, 198
- Smallpox Epidemic, Gloucester Feb 4, 1291, 1292
- Vaccination, Royal Commission and Report Jan 26, 493

BEACH, RIGHT HON. SIR M. E. HICKS, BART. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), Bristol, W.
- Army Estimates: £145,000 for Pay of Indian Troops at Suakim (Supplementary) Feb 5, 1523
- Codification of Laws Jan 21, 194
- Collection of Licences Feb 4, 1286
- Elections, Interference of Peers in Jan 19, 38
- Fiji Feb 8, 1557
- Importation of Spirits, Sierra Leone Feb 8, 1536
- Income Tax on Unpaid Dividends Feb 8, 1550, 1551
- Indian Famine and Plague Jan 21, 177
- Land Tax Jan 29, 786
- Loan Fund (Ireland) Acts Jan 22, 270
- Military Works Bill Feb 1, 1023
- Port Precautions against Disease Jan 26, 506
- Probate Duty Grant, Ireland Jan 21, 194
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 54
- St. Helena Feb 8, 1537
- School
  - Fee Grant, Scotland Jan 25, 398
  - Teachers' Pensions (Ireland) Jan 22, 278
- Settled Property, Estate Duty Feb 8, 1548
- Solicitors' Licence Duty, Ireland Jan 26, 495
- Special Commissioner of Assize (Personal Explanation) Jan 21, 200
- Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1439, 1445, 1447, 1452, 1466, 1467, 1468, 1478, 1479, 1482, 1505, 1506, 1512, 1518
- Taxation, Ireland Jan 25, 379

[cont.

BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. HICKS—cont.
Voluntary Schools
Aid Grant Feb 1, 952 ; Feb 2, 1129
Equivalent Grants
Ireland Feb 4, 1311, 1312
Scotland Feb 2, 1054, 1055 ; Feb 4, 1312
Grant (1897) Feb 4, 1308

BEGG, Mr. F. FAITHFULL, Glasgow, St. Rollox
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 294 ; 2R. Feb 3, 1173, 1178, 1202, 1204, 1231 ; Feb 8, 1638

Benefices Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. A. Willox ; Read 1° Jan 22, 295

Benefices (No. 3) Bill
c. Intro., Colonel Sandys ; Read 1° Jan 22, 303

Berriew School Bill
c. Intro., Sir J. Gorst ; Read 1° Feb 1, 926

BETHELL, Captain G. R., Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness
Supply : £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1512, 1514

BHOWNAGGREE, Mr. M. M., Bethnal Green, N.E.
Queen's Speech Jan 26, 527, 528, 531, 549, 550

BILL, Mr. CHARLES, Staffordshire, Leek
Sierra Leone Railway Feb 1, 920

BIRRELL, Mr. AUGUSTINE, Fife, W.
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1143, 1144

BLAKE, Mr. E., Longford, S.
Queen's Speech Jan 19, 77, 80

BLUNDELL, Colonel H. B. H., Lancashire, S.W., Ince
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 747

Board of Guardians and Labourers (Ireland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. G. Murnaghan ; Read 1° Jan 22, 298

Boiler Inspection and Registration Bill
c. Intro., Sir E. T. Gourley ; Read 1° Jan 22, 295

Borough Funds Bill
c. Intro., Sir A. K. Rollit ; Read 1° Jan 22, 298

BOSCAWEN, Mr. A. S. T. GRIFFITH- (see GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN)

BOULNOIS, Mr. E., Marylebone, E.
Birth Certificates Jan 28, 663

BOWLES, Mr. T. GIBSON, Lynn Regis
Admiralty Charts Jan 26, 491
Appointment of New Commercial Attachés Jan 25, 378
Arbitration Treaty with the United States Feb 2, 1056
Army Estimates : £255,300 for Volunteer Corps Capitation Grant, etc. (Supplementary) Jan 29, 845
Boat Accidents, Royal Navy Jan 28, 665
Bulgarian Tribute and Turkish Debt Jan 21, 184, 185
Collisions at Sea, New Regulations Jan 29, 795
Consular Court at Constantinople Jan 26, 501
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 628
Naval Examining Boards Jan 26, 500
Notice of Motion Jan 27, 601
Ottoman Public Debt Jan 26, 490
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Feb 2, 1063
Queen's Speech Jan 19, 104 ; Jan 26, 595, 596
Rams of Warships Jan 26, 491
Supply : Point of Order Feb 5, 1437
Turkish Reforms Jan 21, 186, 187

BRIGG, Mr. JOHN, Yorks, W.R., Keighley
Parliamentary Registration Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 297
Queen's Speech Jan 26, 558
Registration of Parliamentary Voters Bill, Intro. Feb 5, 1436

British South Africa Company (see AFRICA)

British South Africa (Select Committee on)
Appointment of : Mr. J. Chamberlain, (Motion) 171, 172 ; Mr. T. M. Healy, 172 ; Mr. J. M. Maclean, 172 ; [Mr. Speaker, 172 ;] (Motion Postponed, 172) Jan 20
Debate Resumed : Mr. J. Chamberlain, (Motion) 762 ; Mr. J. M. Maclean, (Amendt.) 762 ; Sir J. Lubbock, 775 Jan 28
Debate Resumed : Mr. J. Chamberlain, 802 ; Sir W. Harcourt, 808 ; Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett, 814 ; Dr. G. B. Clark, 817 ; Sir H. Howorth, 820 ; Mr. L. Courtney, 822 ; Mr. J. M. Maclean, 822 ; (Amendt. withdrawn, 823. Motion Agreed to, 823 Jan 29
Debate on Nomination : Mr. J. L. Carew, 823 ; [Mr. Speaker, 823 ;] Dr. Tanner, 823 ; Mr. P. O'Brien, (Amendt.) 823 ; Colonel Saunderson, 823 ; Mr. T. M. Healy, 824 ; Mr. J. Chamberlain, 825, 827 ; Sir J. Lubbock, 826 ; (Amendt. negatived, 826) ; Sir W. Lawson, 826 ; Sir W. Harcourt, 826 : Mr. Seton-Karr, 827, 828 Jan 29
Special Report from Select Com. brought up and Read Feb 5, 1417
(For Questions see AFRICA)

BROADHURST, Mr. HENRY, Leicester
Business of the House : Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1073
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 705, 707
Queen's Speech Jan 19, 86
Truck Acts Amendment Bill, Intro. Feb 3, 1240
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1362, 1363

BRODRICK, Right Hon. WILLIAM St. JOHN F. (Under Secretary of State for War), Surrey, Guildford
- Aldershot Autumn Manœuvres Jan 25, 378
- Army
  - Medical Staff Jan 29, 796; Feb 1, 925
  - Officers' Uniform Feb 2, 1054
- Army Estimates: £255,300 for Volunteer Corps, Capitation Grant, etc. (Supplementary Jan 29, 846
- Barracks
  - Limerick Military Jan 22, 280
  - Hulme Cavalry, Manchester Feb 2, 1058
- Finner Rifle Range, Donegal Feb 2, 1064
- Government Bills Jan 19, 41
- Health of Troops, United Kingdom Jan 29, 782
- Indian Artillery and Engineers, Cadets Feb 2, 1041
- Lancashire Militia Feb 1, 907
- Lee-Metford Rifles Jan 26, 496
- Mediterranean Garrison, Brigade of Guards Feb 4, 1277, 1278
- Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1569, 1582, 1586, 1587, 1589, 1605
- Military Lands Act (1892) Amendment Bill, Intro. Feb 1, 926
- Military Works Bill Jan 29, 848, 867, 872; Feb 1, 1020, 1022; Feb 8, 1541, 1542
- Royal Engineers, Civilian Clerk Jan 29, 791
- Wreck of Indian Troopship Warren Hastings Jan 25, 384; Feb 1, 905

BROOKFIELD, Mr. A. M., Sussex, Rye
- Chitral Campaign Medal Feb 2, 1057
- Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1598

BRUNNER, Sir JOHN T., Bart., Cheshire, Northwich
- Queen's Reign, Gifts of Real Property Feb 5, 1435

BRYCE, Right Hon. JAMES, Aberdeen, S.
- Access to Mountains (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 299
- Equivalent Grant, Scotland Feb 2, 1055
- Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 608, 609, 618
- Missing Steamer State of Georgia, Jan 28, 689
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 98

BUCHANAN, Mr. T. R., Aberdeen, E.
- Army Estimates: £145,000 for Pay of Indian Troops at Suakim (Supplementary) Feb 5, 1521
- Egyptian Expedition, Indian Troops Feb 4, 1301
- Factory Acts (Fishing Trade) Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 659
- Public Health (Scotland) Bill, 2R. Feb 5, 1525
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 110
- Supply Jan 21, 200

Building Feus and Leases (Scotland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. Colville; Read 1° Feb 1, 1027

Burials Bill
c. Intro., Mr. R. Cameron; Read 1° Jan 22, 294

BURNS, Mr. JOHN, Battersea
- Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 733, 739
- Queen's Speech Jan 25, 474

BURT, Mr. THOMAS, Morpeth
- Employers' Liability for Injuries to Workmen Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 301

Business of the House (see PARLIAMENT: LORDS; COMMONS)

BUXTON, Mr. SYDNEY, Tower Hamlets, Poplar
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 119
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1139

CALDWELL, Mr. J., Lanarkshire, Mid
- Indian Famine and Plague Jan 21, 177
- Necessitous Board Schools, Scotland Feb 5, 1435
- Queen's Speech Jan 22, 341; Jan 26, 575, 576
- School Fee Grant, Scotland Jan 25, 398

CAMERON, Mr. R., Durham, Houghton-le-Spring
- Burials Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 294

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Right Hon. Sir H., Stirling Burghs
- Business of the House Feb 8, 1565
- Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1593, 1597

CAMPBELL, Mr. JAMES A., Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities
- Accountants (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Jan 27, 660

CAREW, Mr. J. L., Dublin, College Green
- British South Africa Committee Jan 29, 823
- Grangegorman Prison, Dublin Jan 25, 383
- Irish Mail Service Feb 2, 1055
- Municipal Franchise (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 301
- Port Charges, Dublin Jan 22, 280
- Royal Engineers, Civilian Clerk Jan 29, 791

CARSON, Right Hon. EDWARD H., Dublin University
- Queen's Speech Jan 22, 333, 334

CASTLETOWN, Lord
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 35

Cemeteries Rating Bill
c. Intro., Mr. H. C. Stephens; Read 1° Jan 22, 296

CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. J. AUSTEN (Civil Lord of the Admiralty), Worcestershire, E.
- Lee-Metford Rifle, Royal Marines Jan 29, 797
- Training Ship, Belfast Lough Jan 29, 789

CHAMBERLAIN, Right Hon. JOSEPH (Secretary of State for the Colonies), Birmingham, W.

- Aliens' Expulsion Act Feb 4, 1295
- Australian Colonies, Federal Convention Jan 22, 272
- Boer Government, Legislation against Aliens Jan 22, 288
- British South Africa
  - Committee Jan 28, 762; Jan 29, 802, 825, 827
  - Company Jan 20, 171, 172; Jan 28, 674
- Cables
  - Canada and Australasia Jan 28, 663
  - West Indian Colonies Jan 28, 684; Feb 1, 917
- Canadian Mail Service Jan 25, 380
- Cape Colony (Sir J. Sivewright) Jan 28, 686
- Congo Railway, Native Labour Jan 29, 781
- Emigrants' Information Office Jan 26, 503
- Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Jan 29, 800
- Importation of Drugs, Ceylon Feb 5, 1433
- Khama's Territory, Liquor Licences Feb 1, 924
- Matabeleland Jan 21, 190
- Mauritius Police Jan 26, 510
- Norfolk Island Jan 21, 187
- Port Precautions against Disease Jan 26, 507
- Prempeh (King) Jan 28, 678, 679
- Quarantine Feb 5, 1420, 1421
- Queen's
  - Diamond Jubilee, Visit of Colonial Premiers Feb 1, 924
  - Speech Jan 19, 120
- Reform Prisoners at Pretoria Jan 21, 183, 184; Feb 4, 1297
- Sierra Leone Railway Feb 1, 920
- Trade
  - British Colonies, with Jan 26, 496
  - Spirits Jan 26, 493
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1385, 1392, 1401, 1402, 1403, 1404, 1408
- Western Australia Feb 2, 1066

Channing, Mr. F. A., Northampton, E.

- Agricultural Holdings Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 302
- Business of the House: Supply Jan 29, 836
- Coroners' Inquests (Railway Fatalities) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 304
- Elementary Education (Arrears of Grant) Jan 26, 489
- Industrial and Provident and Incorporated Building Societies (Purchase of Fee Simple) Bill, Intro. Jan 27, 660
- Licensing Laws Commission Jan 25, 408
- Merchandise Marks Act (Amendment) Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 631
- Necessitous Board Schools Feb 2, 1063
- Postal Facilities, Rushden Feb 4, 1294
- Queen's Speech Jan 25, 449
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1353

CHAPLIN, Right Hon. HENRY (President of the Local Government Board), Lincolnshire, Sleaford

- Children's Metropolitan Asylums Board Feb 8, 1548
- Cottage Gardens Feb 4, 1282

Chaplin, Right Hon. Henry—cont.

- Elementary Schools, Rating Feb 8, 1550
- Incorporation, Metropolitan Districts Feb 1, 910, 911
- Parish
  - Council Elections Feb 2, 1056
  - Documents Feb 8, 1551
- Poor Law Schools, Metropolis Feb 1, 902, 904; Feb 4, 1310; Feb 5, 1433, 1434; Feb 8, 1552, 1553
- Sheffield Cottage Homes for Children Feb 4, 1309
- Small-pox Epidemic, Gloucester Feb 4, 1292
- Vaccination
  - Laws Feb 8, 1540
  - Medical Officers Feb 2, 1044
  - Officers' Fees Feb 1, 923
- Water Supply, Rural Districts Feb 4, 1274
- Weak-minded and Imbecile Children Feb 4, 1296

CHARITY COMMISSION

Parliamentary Charity Commissioner—
Mr. J. Grant Lawson

Howell's Charity, Qs. Mr. Humphreys-Owen; As. Sir J. Gorst Jan 26, 493; Feb 4, 1304

Civil Contingencies Fund 1895–96
Copy Pres. (c.) Jan 19, 40

CIVIL SERVICE

District Lunatic Asylums, Retirement of Officials, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 386

Clancy, Mr. J. J., Dublin County, N.

- Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Jan 26, 514
- Poor Law Officers' Superannuation (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 26, 517
- Post Office Female Clerks, Dublin Jan 26, 512
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 103; Jan 20, 129, 131; Jan 21, 216, 229, 233; Jan 26, 574
- Surveyors (County Dublin) Bill, Intro. Jan 25, 488
- Telegraph Facilities, Fairview, Dublin Jan 25, 407
- University Education (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 301

Clark, Dr. G. B., Caithness

- British South Africa Committee Jan 29, 817
- Business of the House
  - General Jan 26, 600
  - Supply Jan 29, 837
- Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Jan 21, 199; Jan 22, 293
- Indian Famine and Plague Jan 21, 177
- Notice of Motion Jan 27, 601
- Queen's Speech Jan 22, 352; Jan 25, 485, 486; Jan 26, 549, 550

Coal Mines Regulation Bill
c. Intro., Sir C. Dilke; Read 1° Jan 22, 296

Coal Tables
Copy Pres. (c.) Jan 19, 40

COGHILL, Mr. D. H., Stoke-on-Trent
Queen's Speech Jan 19, 88

COHEN, Mr. B. L., Islington, E.
Business of the House: Supply Jan 29, 835
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1351

COLLERY, Mr. B., Sligo, N.
Sligo
  Abbey Jan 25, 407
  Street Preaching in Jan 26, 498
  Union Jan 29, 792

COLLINGS, RIGHT HON. JESSE (Under Secretary of State for the Home Department), Birmingham, Bordesley
London (Borough Road, Southwark) Provisional Order Bill, Intro. Jan 20, 121
London (Churchway, St. Pancras) Provisional Order Bill, Intro. Jan 20, 121
London (Clare Market, Strand) Provisional Order Bill, Intro. Feb 3, 1173
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 640, 641, 642
Metropolitan Police Provisional Order Bill, Intro. Feb 3, 1173

COLOMB, Sir JOHN C. R., Great Yarmouth
Business of the House Feb 8, 1564
Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1601
Military Works Bill Jan 29, 862; Feb 1, 1022
Shipping and Maritime Property (Compensation for Injury) Feb 1, 925

COLONIES
Secretary of State—Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN
Under Secretary of State—Earl of SELBORNE
Aliens' Expulsion Act, Q. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 4, 1295
Australian
  Colonies, Federal Convention, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 22, 271
  Mails, Indian and, Qs. Mr. Henniker Heaton; As. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 404
Boer Government, Legislation against Aliens, Q. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 22, 287
British South Africa
  Committee (see AFRICA)
  Company, Q. Mr. T. Bayley; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 674
Cable
  Canada and Australia, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 663
  West Indian Colonies, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 684. Qs. Mr. Tomlinson, General Laurie; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 1, 917
Canada and Australia, Cable, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 663
Canadian Mail Service, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 25, 380
Cape Colony (Sir J. Sivewright), Qs. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. L. Courtney; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 686

[cont.

COLONIES—cont.
Ceylon, Importation of Drugs, Qs. Mr. H. J. Wilson; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 5, 1433
Congo Railway, Native Labour, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 29, 781
Emigrants' Information Office, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 26, 503
Federal Convention, Australian Colonies, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 22, 271
Fiji, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1556
Importation of
  Drugs, Ceylon, Qs. Mr. H. J. Wilson; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 5, 1433
  Spirits, Sierra Leone, Q. Admiral Field; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1535
Khama's Territory, Liquor Licences, Q. Sir M. Stuart; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 1, 924
Mail Service, Canada, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 25, 380
Matabeleland, Qs. Mr. T. Bayley; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 21, 189
Mauritius Police, Q. Sir H. S. King; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 26, 510
Norfolk Island, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 21, 187
Prempeh (King), Qs. Mr. M. Davitt; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 678
Pretoria, Reform Prisoners at, Qs. Mr. J. M. Maclean, Mr. J. Lowther; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 21, 183. Qs. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. J. M. Maclean; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 4, 1296
Quarantine, Qs. Sir W. Wedderburn, Sir B. W. Foster; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 5, 1420
Queen's
  Diamond Jubilee, Visit of Colonial Premiers, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 1, 924
  Reign, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 29, 800
Reform Prisoners at Pretoria, Qs. Mr. J. M. Maclean, Mr. J. Lowther; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 21, 183. Qs. Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. J. M. Maclean; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 4, 1296
Sierra Leone
  Importation of Spirits, Q. Admiral Field; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1535
  Railway, Q. Mr. C. Bill; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 1, 920
Trade
  British Colonies, with, Q. Sir H. Vincent; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 26, 496
  Spirits, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 26, 493
Transvaal Raid, Q. Mr. Arnold-Forster; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 679
Western Australia, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 2, 1066
West Indian Colonies, Cable, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 28, 684

COLVILLE, Mr. J., Lanarkshire, N.E.
Building Feus and Leases (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Feb 1, 1027
Queen's Speech Jan 22, 349

Companies Bill
l. Pres., Earl of Dudley; Read 1a Feb 1, 885

Compton, Lord Alwyne F., Bedford, Biggleswade
Guards (The) in the Mediterranean Feb 8, 1632

Contracts
Army, Ireland, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 29, 788
Associations of Workmen, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 5, 1433
Foreigners, with, Q. Sir H. Vincent; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1270
Mail Subsidies, Q. Mr. Henniker Heaton; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 919
Medicine, Mullingar Union, Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 502
Road, Leitrim, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1422

Cooke, Mr. C. W. Radcliffe, Hereford
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1185, 1186, 1195, 1196, 1198, 1199
Queen's Speech Jan 25, 440
Street Noises Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 297

Corn Sales Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. Rankin; Read 1° Jan 22, 303

Coroners' Inquests (Railway Fatalities) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. F. A. Channing; Read 1° Jan 22, 304

County Councillors (Qualification of Women) (Scotland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Munro Ferguson; Read 1° Jan 25, 487

County Courts Bill
c. Intro., Mr. C. J. Monk: Read 1° Jan 22, 299

County Government (Ireland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. P. C. Doogan; Read 1° Jan 22, 299

County Surveyors (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill
c. Intro., Mr. W. Johnston; Read 1° Feb 2, 1083

Court of Criminal Appeal Bill
c. Intro., Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; Read 1° Jan 22, 295

Courtney, Right Hon. Leonard H., Cornwall, Bodmin
British South Africa Committee Jan 29, 822
Cape Colony (Sir J. Sivewright) Jan 28, 686
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1229
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1476, 1478, 1479, 1514
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 936, 971

Crean, Mr. E., Queen's County, Ossory
Seed Rate, Ireland Feb 5, 1428

Crilly, Mr. D., Mayo, N.
Distress, Belmullet Union Jan 25, 403; Jan 28, 681
Licences (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 303
Licensed Pawnbrokers, Ireland Jan 28, 689

Cripps, Mr. C. A., Gloucester, Stroud
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 974

Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act (1886) Amendment Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. G. Weir; Read 1° Feb 2, 1083

Cross, Mr. A., Glasgow, Camlachie
Public Health (Scotland) Bill, 2R. Feb 5, 1526
Smaller Dwellings (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Feb 5, 1436

Crown Lands, etc. (see Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues of the Crown)

CURZON, Right Hon. GEORGE N. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Lancashire, S.W., Southport
Advance to the Egyptian Government Feb 5 1430
Antwerp, Shipping Masters at Feb 1, 900
Appointment of New Commercial Attachés Jan 25, 377, 378
Arabi Pasha Feb 8, 1546
Benin Expedition Jan 21, 188
Bulgarian Tribute, Turkish Debt Jan 21, 185, 186
Consular Court at Constantinople Jan 26, 501
Costa Rica Packet Case Jan 26, 498
Crete Jan 29, 796; Feb 2, 1053; Feb 4, 1299; Feb 8, 1560, 1561
Duty on Scotch Herrings Feb 2, 1039
Kassala, Relief of Feb 8, 1557
New Hebrides
  Agreements with France Jan 21, 187
  Sale of Fire-arms and Spirits in Feb 8, 1547
Niger Delta Liquor Traffic Jan 29, 792
North Sea Convention Feb 8, 1539
Ottoman Public Debt Jan 26, 490
Persecution of Nestorians Feb 4, 1278
Queen's Speech Jan 19, 98, 101, 119, 120; Jan 26, 585, 586, 588, 589, 590
Slavery at Zanzibar Jan 21, 196; Feb 4, 1297
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1468, 1473, 1475, 1480
Syria and Macedonia Jan 22, 275
Turkey
  Parliamentary Paper Jan 21, 179
  Political Prisoners in Jan 22, 275
Turkish Reforms Jan 21, 186, 187
United States, Arbitration Treaty with Feb 2, 1056

CUSTOMS, EXCISE, AND INLAND REVENUE
Codification of Laws, Qs. Mr. M. Healy; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach, Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 21 194
Collection of Licences, Q. Mr. T. Lough; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 4, 1285
Cottage Gardens, Qs. Sir C. Dilke; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1281
Customs Outdoor Officers, Ireland, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1294
Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland, Qs. Mr. Munro Ferguson, Dr. G. B. Clark, Mr. T. Lough, Sir W. Harcourt; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 21, 198
Income Tax on Unpaid Dividends, Qs. Mr. G. C. T. Bartley; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1550
Land Tax, Q. Mr. A. F. Jeffreys; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 29, 786
Licensing Laws Commission, Q. Mr. F. A. Channing; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 25, 408
Netley Hospital, Assessment, Q. Sir J. S. B. Simeon; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1054
Probate Duty Grant, Ireland, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 21, 194
Sale of Intoxicants, Houses of Parliament, Qs. Sir W. Lawson, Mr. J. W. Logan, Mr. T. Bayley; As. Sir R. Webster, Jan 21, 197. Qs. Sir. W. Lawson; As. Lord Stanley, Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 5, 1434
Settled Property, Estate Duty, Q. Captain Pretyman; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1547
Solicitors' Licence Duty, Ireland, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 26, 495
Taxation, Ireland, Qs. Mr. A. F. Jeffreys, Mr. A. O'Connor, Mr. T. Lough; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 25, 378

DALY, Mr. J., Monaghan, S.
Deportation of Paupers to Ireland Feb 2, 1052
Fair Rent Applications, Monaghan Jan 25, 384
Great Northern of Ireland Railway Feb 2, 1047
Queen's Speech Jan 20, 170; Jan 21, 202; Jan 26, 568
Royal Irish Constabulary Jan 28, 671
Tenants' Holdings, Monaghan Feb 2, 1052

DALZIEL, Mr. J. H., Kirkcaldy Burghs
Public Health (Scotland) Bill, 2R. Feb 5, 1527

DANE, Mr. R. M., Fermanagh, N.
Castlepollard Petty Sessions Feb 5, 1423
Civil Service Retirement Jan 25, 386
Distress, Westport Union Feb 4, 1284
Fair Rent Agreements, Ireland Feb 5, 1425
Intermediate Education Exams., Ireland Feb 4, 1290
Irish Land Commission Feb 1, 921
Loan Fund (Ireland) Acts Jan 22, 269
Prison Service, Ireland Feb 1, 921
Queen's Speech Jan 21, 206
Royal
  Irish Constabulary Jan 28, 671
  Residence in Ireland Feb 4, 1311
Statutory Term Applications, Ireland Jan 29, 793
Undersheriffs, Ireland Jan 29, 791

DARLING, Mr. C. J., Deptford
Health of Troops in India Jan 25, 397
Special Commissioner of Assize, Personal Explanation Jan 21, 200

DAVENPORT, Mr. W. BROMLEY, Cheshire, Macclesfield
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 694, 709, 712, 719, 721, 722, 742, 745; Feb 2, 1061, 1062

DAVIES, Mr. M. VAUGHAN-, Cardigan
Land Tenure (Wales and Monmouthshire) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 295

DAVIES, Mr. W. REES-, Pembrokeshire
Fishguard Bay Railway Jan 25, 389
House of Commons, Members' Smoking Accommodation Feb 4, 1303
Places of Worship (Leasehold) Enfranchisement Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 299
Unlawful Possession Bill, 2R Jan 29, 877

DAVITT, Mr. MICHAEL, Mayo, S.
Agricultural Distress, Westport Union Jan 21 174
Arabi Pasha Feb 8, 1546
Benin Expedition Jan 21, 188
Convicts, Escaped Jan 21, 188
Labourers' Allotments, Ireland Feb 8, 1554, 1555
Mortality, Central India Provinces Feb 8, 1555
Niger Delta, Liquor Traffic Jan 29, 792
Prempeh (King) Jan 28, 678, 679
Queen's Speech, Jan 20, 151, 152, 153; Jan 21, 233; Jan 22, 347, 351, 376; Jan 25, 411
Royal Bounty Fund: George Brooks Feb 8, 1562, 1563
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1499

DENNY, Colonel J. M., Kilmarnock Burghs
Loss of Life at Sea Feb 4, 1300, 1301

DE VESCI Viscount
Army, Increase of Strength Jan 28, 661; Feb 4, 1243

DILKE, Right Hon. Sir C. W., Bart., Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean
Belfast Textile Trades, Fines Feb 2, 1034
Coal Mines Regulation Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 296
Congo Railway, Native Labourers Jan 29, 781
Cottage Gardens Feb 4, 1281, 1282
Current Rate of Wages, Woolwich District Jan 25, 408
Education Bill (Poor School Board Districts) Jan 22, 291, 292
Egyptian Expedition Feb 2, 1067
Factories and Workshops Act (Particulars Section) Feb 5, 1422
Factory
  Accident, Batley Jan 29, 794; Feb 8, 1562
  Acts Jan 21, 184
Franchise and Removal of Women's Disabilities Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 304

[cont.

Dilke, Right Hon. Sir C. W., Bart.—cont.
- Indian Troops, Scurvy Feb 2, 1052
- Mediterranean Garrison, Brigade of Guards Feb 4, 1278
- Mercantile Marine Classification Feb 1, 919
- Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1565, 1569, 1586, 1587, 1589
- Military Works Bill, Jan 29, 860; Feb 1, 1021, 1022
- Mill Accident, Batley Jan 29, 794; Feb 8, 1562
- Notices of Motion Jan 27, 601, 602
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 93, 97; Jan 25, 475; Jan 26, 564
- Shops Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 304
- Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1458, 1461, 1463, 1473
- Trade Spirits Jan 26, 493
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Jan 22, 376; Feb 1, 965, 967
- Wool Sorting Jan 28, 664

Dillon, Mr. John, Mayo, E.
- Army Estimates: £145,000 for Pay of Indian Troops at Suakim (Supplementary) Feb 5, 1523
- Crete Feb 8, 1561
- Evicted Tenants, Ireland Jan 21, 180; Feb 8, 1538
- Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Jan 26, 514; Feb 2, 1067
- Irish Mail Service Jan 25, 393
- Military Works Bill Feb 1, 1023
- Pollen Fishery, Lough Neagh Feb 1, 912, 913
- Poor Relief, Ireland Jan 28, 685
- Queen's Speech, Jan 19, 77; Jan 20, (Amendt.) 157, 161; Jan 21, 215; Jan 25, 427, 428
- Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government, Feb 5, 1502, 1505, 1506
- Voluntary Schools Feb 4, 1308
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 938; Feb 2, 1128, 1129; Feb 4, 1399
- Warden Estate, Kerry Feb 1, 915, 916

Disraeli, Mr. Coningsby R., Cheshire, Altrincham
- Queen's Speech Jan 26, (Amendt.) 577, 588, 589

Dixon-Hartland, Sir Frederick D., Bart., Middlesex, Uxbridge
- London Water Companies Amalgamation Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 302

Dixon, Mr. G., Birmingham, Edgbaston
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 993

Donelan, Captain A. J. C., Cork, E.
- Army Foreign Meat Supply Jan 21, 182; Jan 25, 406, 407
- Daunt's Rock Lightship Jan 21, 181, 182; Jan 25, 406; Jan 28, 672
- Evicted Tenants, Ireland Jan 21, 179; Feb 8, 1538
- Illegal Trawling
  - Cork Feb 8, 1559
  - Irish Coast Feb 1, 913, 914
- Irish Mail Service Feb 8, 1544, 1545
- Judicial Rents, Ireland Jan 21, 180

[cont.

Donelan, Captain A. J. C.—cont.
- Mediterranean Garrison, Brigade of Guards Feb 4, 1278
- National Gallery and British Museum (Sundays) Feb 4, 1293
- Naval Repairs, H.M.S. Black Prince Jan 26, 513
- Oil Lamp Accidents Jan 29, 793

Doogan, Mr. P. C., Tyrone, E.
- County Government (Ireland) Bill, Intro., Jan 22, 299
- Pollen Fishery, Lough Neagh Feb 1, 912
- Queen's Speech Jan 21, 237; Jan 26, 576

Douglas-Pennant, Hon. Edward S., Northants, S.
- Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 700, 704, 705, 707, 745, 746

Douglas, Right Hon. A. Akers- (see Akers-Douglas)

Drage, Mr. Geoffrey, Derby
- Poor Law Schools Feb 1, 902
- Queen's Speeech Jan 21, 203
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1365, 1366

Duncombe, Hon. H. V., Cumberland, Egremont
- Shop Assistants (Half Holiday) Bill, Intro. Feb 2, 1083
- Unlawful Possession Bill, 2R. Jan 29, 879

Dunn, Sir William, Bart., Paisley
- Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Jan 26, 513

Dyke, Right Hon. Sir W. Hart, Bart., Kent, Dartford
- Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 638
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1089; Feb 4, 1319

Education Acts Amendment Bill
- c. Intro., Mr. Sydney Gedge; Read 1° Jan 22, 301

Educational Endowment (Ireland) Act (1885) Amendment Bill
- c. Intro., Mr. T. M. Healy; Read 1° Jan 26, 516
- 2R. Mr. T. M. Healy, 875; Mr. G. Balfour, 875; Mr. W. Johnston, 876 Jan 29
- Read 2° Jan 29, 876
- In Com. Feb 3, 1240

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT

Lord President—Duke of Devonshire
Vice President—Sir John E. Gorst

- Catholic University, Ireland, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 1, 925
- Drawing, Irish Schools. Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 382
- Education Bill (Poor School Board Districts), Qs. Sir C. Dilke, Sir W. Harcourt; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 22, 291

[cont.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—cont.
Education
Grant
Ireland, Q. Mr. Vesey Knox; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 282
Scotland, Q. Mr. E. Robertson; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 2, 1067
National Board of, Ireland, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 391
Educational Endowments (Ireland) Act (1885) Amendment Bill (see that Title)
Elementary Schools (see Schools below)
Equivalent Grant, Scotland, Qs. Mr. W. Thorburn, Mr. J. Bryce; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 2, 1054
Erasmus Smith Schools, Ireland, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 276. Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 673. Qs. Mr. Arnold-Forster, Mr. W. Johnston; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1302
Heywood, Public Schools at, Q. Mr. J. C. Williams; A. Sir J. Gorst Jan 25, 387
Howell's Charity, Qs. Mr. Humphreys-Owen; As. Sir J. Gorst Jan 26, 493; Feb 4, 1304
Intermediate Education (see EDUCATION, INTERMEDIATE AND TECHNICAL)
National Schools, Ireland, Qs. Mr. J. C. Flynn; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1050; Feb 4, 1300
Necessitous Board Schools
Scotland, Q. Mr. J. Caldwell; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 5, 1435
Unpaid Grants, Q. Mr. F. A. Channing; A. Sir J. Gorst Feb 2, 1063
Pensions, School Teachers', Ireland, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach, Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 278
Prison Officers' Instruction, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 671
St. Andrew's School, Willesden, Qs. Mr. J. H. Yoxall, Mr. A. J. Mundella; As. Sir. J. Gorst Feb 2, 1043
St. Jude's School, Bethnal Green, Q. Mr. A. E. Hutton; A. Sir J. Gorst Jan 25, 385
Schools
Accommodation
Castleton, Q. Mr. A. E. Hutton; A. Sir J. Gorst Feb 4, 1308
Letter-Gunnell, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1426
Attendance, Ireland, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 289
Boards, Scotland, Q. Mr. J. Wilson (Falkirk); A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1044
Buildings, Q. Mr. A. E. Hutton; A. Sir J. Gorst Feb 4, 1295
Elementary
Building Grants, Q. Mr. A. E. Hutton; A. Sir J. Gorst Feb 5, 1342
Highlands and Islands of Scotland, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1048
Parliamentary Grant, Q. Mr. A. K. Loyd; A. Sir J. Gorst Jan 26, 494
Queen's Reign, Q. Mr. W. Johnston; A. Sir J. Gorst Jan 25, 387
Rating, Qs. Mr. Ellis Griffith; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 8, 1550
Wimbledon, Q. Mr. J. C. Williams; A. Sir J. Gorst Feb 4, 1289

[cont.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—cont.
Schools—cont.
Erasmus Smith, Ireland, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 276. Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 673. Qs. Mr. Arnold-Forster, Mr. W. Johnston; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1302
Fee Grant, Scotland, Q. Mr. J. Caldwell; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 25, 398
Irish
Drawing, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 382
Workmistresses, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1556
Necessitous Board, Scotland, Q. Mr. J. Caldwell; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 5, 1435
Poor Law
Metropolis, Qs. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1310; Feb 5, 1433; Feb 8, 1552
Report on, Qs. Mr. G. Drage, Mr. G. C. T. Bartley, Mr. T. Lough; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 1, 902
Public, Heywood, Q. Mr. J. C. Williams; A. Sir J. Gorst Jan 25, 387
St. Andrew's, Willesden, Qs. Mr. J. H. Yoxall, Mr. A. J. Mundella; As. Sir J. Gorst Feb 2, 1043
St. Jude's, Bethnal Green, Q. Mr. A. E. Hutton; A. Sir J. Gorst Jan 25, 385
Teachers' Pensions (Ireland), Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach, Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 278. Qs. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; As. Mr. Hanbury, Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1049
Text-books, Scotland, Qs. Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 8, 1539
Voluntary (Aid Grant), Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 22, 376. Q. Mr. J. Dillon; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 4, 1308. Q. Mr. A. J. Mundella; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 4, 1313
Science and Art Classes, Qs. Mr. E. Gray; As. Sir J. Gorst Feb 2, 1041
Technical Education (see EDUCATION, INTERMEDIATE AND TECHNICAL)
University Education of Roman Catholics, Qs. Mr. Vesey Knox, Mr. W. E. H. Lecky; As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 28, 690
Voluntary School Grant
Irish Equivalent, Qs. Mr. J. C. Flynn; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 4, 1311
Scotch Equivalent, Q. Mr. Hedderwick; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 4, 1312
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant), Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 22, 376. Q. Mr. J. Dillon; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 4, 1308. Q. Mr. A. J. Mundella; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 4, 1313
(For Debate see that Title)
Workmistresses, Irish Schools, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1556

Education (Intermediate and Technical)
Intermediate Education Exams., Ireland, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1290
Technical Education (Ireland), Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 910

EDWARDS, General Sir J. BEVAN, Hythe
Calais Harbour Feb 2, 1037

EGERTON, Hon ALAN DE TATTON, Cheshire, Knutsford
Explosion of Cordite, Woolwich Arsenal Feb 8, 1546

Egypt (see AFRICA)

Election Petitions Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Wootton Isaacson : Read 1° Jan 22, 295

Elections
Order and Resolutions (c.) Jan 19, 37

Elementary Education (Arrears of Grants)
Mr. Humphreys-Owen (Notice of Motion) Jan 26, 489
Mr. F. A. Channing (Notice of Motion) Jan 26, 489

Elementary Education (Permissive Rates Aid) Bill
c. Intro., Sir A. B. Forwood : Read 1° Jan 22, 300

ELLIS, Mr. J. E., Notts, Rushcliffe
Business of the House : Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1068, 1069
Crete Jan 29, 795

Employers' Liability (Foreign Shipowners) Amendments Bill
c. Intro., Mr. H. J. Reckitt : Read 1° Jan 26, 516

Employers' Liability for Injuries to Workmen Bill
c. Intro., Mr. T. Burt ; Read 1° Jan 22, 301

ENGLEDOW, Mr. C. J., Kildare, N.
Agricultural Expenditure, Ireland Jan 29, 798
Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 298
Queen's Speech Jan 21, (Amendt.) 257 : Jan 22, 335

ESMONDE, Sir T. H. GRATTAN, Bart., Kerry, W.
Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Jan 29, 799
Labourers' Cottages, Ireland Jan 25, 380
Railway Connections, Ireland Jan 25, 381
Tralee and Dingle Railway Jan 25, 381

EVANS, Mr. S. T., Glamorgan, Mid
Unlawful Possession Bill, 2R. Jan 29, 876
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1347, 1348

Evicted Tenants (Ireland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. T. Harrington ; Read 1° Jan 22, 301

Factory Acts (Fishing Trade) Bill
c. Intro., Sir A. K. Rollit ; Read 1° Jan 22, 304
2R. Sir A. K. Rollit, 658, 659 ; Mr. T. R. Buchanan, 659 Jan 27
Read 2° Jan 27, 659
In Com. Feb 3, 1239

FARDELL, Mr. T. G., Paddington, S.
Cab Licences, Metropolis Feb 1, 908

FARQUHARSON, Dr. R., Aberdeenshire, W.
Army Medical Staff Feb 1, 925
Children's Metropolitan Asylums Board Feb 8, 1548
Dog Muzzling, Metropolis Feb 1, 920
Parish Councillors, Scotland Jan 25, 396
Public Health (Scotland) Bill, 2R. Feb 5, 1524
Queen's Speech Jan 22, 343
Vaccination, Royal Commission Report Jan 26, 494

FARRELL, Mr. J. P., Cavan, W.
Amalgamation of Poor Law Unions, Ireland Feb 5, 1425, 1426
Army Pension, Fitzpatrick (John) Feb 4, 1280
Board of Agriculture, Ireland Feb 5, 1418
Fee Farm Tenants Jan 25, 390
Floods, Longford Feb 2, 1045
Irish
  Lights Board Feb 1, 915
  Mail Service Feb 4, 1279
Labourers' Acts, Longford Feb 5, 1426, 1427
Land
  Commission Office, Dublin Feb 4, 1291
  Purchase, Longford Jan 25, 390
Newry Board of Guardians Jan 28, 669
Parochial Board of Sanquhair Feb 1, 918
Postal
  Arrangements, West Cavan Feb 1, 901
  Facilities, Longford Feb 5, 1419
Queen's Speech Jan 21, 239 ; Jan 26, 568
Railways
  Ireland Jan 29, 784, 785
  Light, Cavan and Leitrim Feb 4, 1275
  Rates, Ireland Feb 2, 1045
Royal Canal Harbour, Longford Feb 4, 1275
School Accommodation, Letter-Gunnell Feb 5 1426
Supply : Irish Estimates Feb 4, 1311

FERGUSON, Mr. R. C. M., Leith Burghs
County Councillors (Qualification of Women) (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Jan 25, 487
Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Jan 21, 198
Supply : £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1495
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1367

FERGUSSON, Right Hon. Sir JAMES, Bart., Manchester, N.E.
Mediterranean Garrison, Brigade of Guards Feb 4, 1277
Queen's Speech Jan 26, 522

Field, Admiral, Sussex, Eastbourne
Naval College, Dartmouth Jan 26, 497
St. Helena Feb 8, 1537
Sample Post, Butterflies Feb 1, 917
Sierra Leone, Importation of Spirits Feb 8, 1535
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1500

Field, Mr. W., Dublin, St. Patrick
Army Foreign Meat Supply Jan 21, 182, 183; Jan 22, 290
Carriage of Animals, Channel Traffic Jan 22, 289
Daunt's Rock Lightship Jan 21, 181; Jan 28, 672
Dublin Port and Docks Bill Jan 29, 794
International Monetary Conference Jan 25, 409
Irish
  Canals Jan 22, 289
  Lights Board Jan 21, 190; Jan 22, 290; Jan 29, 785
  Mail Service Jan 25, 394, 395; Jan 26, 508
Labourers' Cottages (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 25, 488
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 616
Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 27, 660
Queen's Speech Jan 20, 136; Jan 21, 236; Jan 26, 576
Railway Rates, Ireland Jan 21, 190
Royal
  Barracks, Dublin Jan 29, 791
  Naval Reserve Jan 26, 508
School Attendance, Ireland Jan 22, 289
Tenant Right in Towns (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 27, 660
Town Tenants, Ireland Jan 26, 510
Transit of Cattle by Sea Jan 26, 509
Treason-felony Prisoners Jan 26, 509

Financial Relations between Great Britain and Ireland
Qs. Mr. Munro Ferguson, Dr. G. B. Clark, Mr. T. Lough, Sir W. Harcourt; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 21, 198. Q. Dr. G. B. Clark; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 22, 293. Qs. Sir W. Dunn, Mr. J. Dillon, Mr. J. J. Clancy, Dr. R. Ambrose; As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 26, 513. Q. Sir T. G. Esmonde; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 29, 799. Q. Mr. J. Dillon; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 2, 1067. Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1545

FINLAY, Sir R. B. (Solicitor General), Inverness Burghs
Public Health (Scotland) Bill, 2R. Feb 5, 1527
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1111, 1112; Feb 4, 1363

Flannery, Mr. J. Fortescue, Yorkshire, W.R., Shipley
Injuries to Workmen, Foreign Shipowners Jan 28, 685
Unlawful Possession Bill, 2R. Jan 29, 881

Floating Derelicts
Mr. J. C. Macdona (Notice of Motion) Feb 2, 1034

Flynn, Mr. J. C., Cork, N.
Agricultural Prices, Ireland Feb 2, 1035
Charge of Larceny, Cork Feb 5, 1427
Cork Winter Assizes Jan 25, 401, 402, 403
Crete Feb 2, 1053; Feb 4, 1298, 1299; Feb 8, 1559, 1561
Lane-Fox Estate, Leitrim Feb 5, 1423
Municipal Franchise, Ireland Jan 26, 499
National Schools, Ireland Feb 2, 1050, 1051; Feb 4, 1300
Queen's Speech Jan 20, 126
Voluntary Schools Grant, Irish Equivalent Feb 4, 1311, 1312

Folkestone Viscount, Wilts, Wilton
Queen's Speech Jan 19, 42

Food Supplies, United Kingdom
Mr. H. Seton-Karr (Notice of Motion) Feb 2, 1033

FOREIGN OFFICE

Secretary of State—Marquess of Salisbury
Under Secretary of State—Mr. G. N. Curzon

Advance to the Egyptian Government, Qs. Mr. J. Morley; As. Mr. Curzon Feb 5, 1430
Appointments of New Commercial Attachés, Qs. Sir H. Vincent, Mr. Gibson Bowles; As. Mr. Curzon Jan 25, 377
Arabi Pasha, Qs. Mr. M. Davitt, Sir W. Lawson; As. Mr. Curzon Feb 8, 1546
Arbitration Treaty with the United States, Q. Mr. Gibson Bowles; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 2, 1056
Benin Expedition, Q. Mr. M. Davitt; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 188
Bulgarian Tribute and Turkish Debt, Qs. Mr. Gibson Bowles; As. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 184
Constantinople, Consular Court at, Q. Mr. Gibson Bowles; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 26, 501
Consular Court at Constantinople, Q. Mr. Gibson Bowles; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 26, 501
Costa Rica Packet Case, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan A. Mr. Curzon Jan 26, 498
Crete, Q. Mr. J. Ellis; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 29, 795. Q. Mr. J. C. Flynn; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 2, 1053. Qs. Mr. J. C. Flynn, Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett; As. Mr. Curzon Feb 4, 1298. Qs. Mr. J. C. Flynn, Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlet, Mr. J. Dillon; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Curzon Feb 8, 1559
Duty on Scotch Herrings, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 2, 1039
Egyptian Government, Advance to, Qs. Mr. J. Morley; As. Mr. Curzon Feb 5, 1430
Macedonia and Syria, Q. Mr. F. S. Stevenson; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 22, 275
New Hebrides
  Agreement with France, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 187
  Sale of Fire-arms and Spirits, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 8, 1547

[cont.

FOREIGN OFFICE—cont.
Niger Delta, Liquor Traffic, Q. Mr. M. Davitt; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 29, 792
Ottoman Public Debt, Q. Mr. Gibson Bowles; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 26, 490
Persecution of Nestorians, Q. Mr. S. Smith; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 4, 1278
Political Prisoners in Turkey, Q. Mr. F. S. Stevenson; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 22, 275
Relief of Kassala, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Curzon Feb 8, 1557
Sale of Fire-arms and Spirits, New Hebrides, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 8, 1547
Shipping Masters at Antwerp, Q. Mr. T. P. Whittaker; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 1, 900
Slavery in Zanzibar, Q. Sir J. H. Kennaway; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 195. Q. Mr. J. A. Pease; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 4, 1297
Syria and Macedonia, Q. Mr. F. S. Stevenson; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 22, 275
Turkey
Parliamentary Paper, Q. Mr. J. H. Roberts; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 178
Political Prisoners in, Q. Mr. F. S. Stevenson; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 22, 275
Turkish
Debt and Bulgarian Tribute, Qs. Mr. Gibson Bowles; As. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 184
Loans, Q. Mr. P. J. Stanhope; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 29, 799
Reforms, Qs. Mr. Gibson Bowles; As. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 186
Zanzibar, Slavery in, Q. Sir J. H. Kennaway; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 21, 195. Q. Mr. J. A. Pease; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 4, 1297

FORWOOD, Right Hon. Sir A. B., Bart., Lancashire, S.W., Ormskirk
Elementary Education (Permissive Rates Aid) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 300
Injuries to Workmen (Employers' Liability) Bill, Intro. Feb 2, 1083
Queen's Speech Jan 25, 473, 474, 475, 486

FOSTER, Mr. H. S., Suffolk, Lowestoft
Episcopal Elections Feb 4, 1312
Southwold, Damage by Gales Feb 4, 1303
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1372

FOSTER, Sir B. WALTER, Derbyshire, Ilkeston
Army Medical Staff Jan 29, 796
Cholera Outbreak, s.s. Nubia Jan 22, 288
Parish Council
Accounts Jan 22, 277
Elections Feb 2, 1056
Pensions (Old Age) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 297
Port Precautions against Disease Jan 26, 507
Quarantine Feb 5, 1421
Queen's Speech Jan 25, 444
Vaccination, Medical Officers Feb 2, 1043

FOWLER, Right Hon. Sir H. H., Wolverhampton, E.
Queen's Speech Jan 26, 541
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1098, 1099, 1100, 1101, 1102, 1106

Franchise and Removal of Women's Disabilities Bill
c. Intro., Sir C. Dilke; Read 1° Jan 22, 304

GALLOWAY, Mr. W. J., Manchester, S.W.
Hulme Cavalry Barracks Feb 2, 1058
Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 645

GEDGE, Mr. SYDNEY, Walsall
Education Acts Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 301
Queen's Speech Jan 25, 428

GEORGE, Mr. D. LLOYD- (see LLOYD-GEORGE)

GIBBS, Hon. ALBAN G. H., London, City
Archdeaconry of London (Additional Endowments) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 296

GIBBS, Hon. VICARY, Herts, St. Albans
Troopships, Ballasting Feb 1, 904
Wreck, Indian Troopship Warren Hastings Feb 1, 905

GILES, Mr. C. T., Cambridge, Wisbech
Post Office, Four-mile Radius Feb 2, 1033

GILHOOLY, Mr. JAMES, Cork County, W.
Collision at Sea, H.M. Gunboat Landrail and s.s. Siren Jan 28, 677
Illegal Trawling, Irish Coast Feb 1, 913

GODDARD, Mr. D. F., Ipswich
Labour Bureaux Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 299
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1087

GODSON, Mr. A. F., Kidderminster
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 605

Gold and Silver Plate Licences Bill
c. Intro., Mr. H. C. Richards; Read 1° Jan 22, 302

GORST, RIGHT HON. SIR JOHN E. (Vice President of the Council on Education), Cambridge University
Berriew School Bill, Intro. Feb 1, 926
Elementary Schools
Building Grants Feb 5, 1432
Parliamentary Grant Jan 26, 494
Queen's Reign Jan 25, 387
Wimbledon Feb 4, 1289
Howell's Charity Jan 26, 493; Feb 4, 1304, 1305
Necessitous School Boards Feb 2, 1063
Public Schools, Heywood Jan 25, 388
Queen's Reign, Elementary Schools Jan 25, 387
St. Andrew's School, Willesden Feb 2, 1043
St. Jude's School, Bethnal Green Jan 25, 386
School
Accommodation, Castleton Feb 4, 1309
Buildings Feb 4, 1296
Science and Art Classes Feb 2, 1042

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. GEORGE J. (First Lord of the Admiralty), St. George's, Hanover Square
- Admiralty Charts Jan 26, 492
- Boat Accidents, Royal Navy Jan 28, 665
- Collision at Sea, H.M. Gunboat Landrail and s.s. Siren Jan 28, 677
- Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1597
- Missing Steamer, State of Georgia Jan 28, 689
- Naval
  - College, Dartmouth Jan 26, 497
  - Examining Boards Jan 26, 501
  - Royal Reserve Jan 26, 509
- Rams of Warships Jan 26, 491

Gourley, Colonel Sir E. T., Sunderland
- Boiler Inspection and Registration Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 295
- Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1608

Gray, Mr. Ernest, West Ham, N.
- Science and Art Classes Feb 2, 1041, 1042
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 1014, 1019; Feb 2, 1084

Green, Mr. Walford D., Wednesbury
- Rating (Places of Worship and Schools) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 298

Griffith-Boscawen, Mr. A. S. T., Kent, Tunbridge
- Law of Libel Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 299
- Light Locomotives Act (Traction Engines) Jan 28, 668
- Telephone Service, Tunbridge Wells Feb 2, 1038, 1039

Griffith, Mr. Ellis J., Anglesey
- Elementary Schools, Rating Feb 8, 1550
- Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 760

Grocers' Certificates (Scotland) Abolition Bill
- c. Intro., Sir J. Leng; Read 1° Jan 26, 515

Guards (The) in the Mediterranean
- On Motion, That Mr. Speaker do now Leave the Chair: Colonel Lockwood, (Amendt.) 1629; Lord A. Compton, 1632; Captain Bagot, 1635; (Adj.) Feb 8

Gull, Sir W. Cameron, Bart., Devon, Barnstaple
- Water Supply, Rural Districts Feb 4, 1274

Haldane, Mr. R. B., Haddington
- Public Health (Scotland) Bill, 2R. Feb 5, 1526
- Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Feb 8, 1639
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1338, 1343

HALSBURY, Lord (Lord Chancellor)
- Queen's Speech, Delivered Jan 19, 2

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord GEORGE F. (Secretary of State for India), Middlesex, Ealing
- Chitral Campaign Medal Feb 2, 1057
- India
  - Exchange Compensation Jan 26, 506
  - Famine
    - Plague and Jan 21, 176, 177; Jan 22, 284, 287; Feb 5, 1431
    - Sale of Silver Jan 26, 508
  - Mortality, Central Provinces Feb 8, 1555
  - Troops
    - Egyptian Expedition Feb 4, 1301
    - Health of, in Jan 25, 397, 398
    - Scurvy Feb 2, 1052
- Madras Infantry Regiments Jan 26, 511
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 97; Jan 26, 532, 534

Hammond, Mr. John, Carlow
- Enniskillen Fusiliers Enlistment Feb 5, 1427
- Tenants' Application for Reinstatement, Carlow Jan 28, 675

HANBURY, Right Hon. R. W. (Financial Secretary to the Treasury), Preston
- Adjournment Feb 5, 1528
- Askeaton and Kilmallock Abbeys Jan 22, 270
- Australian and Indian Mails Jan 25, 404, 405
- Book Post Charges Jan 29, 784
- British Museum Staff Feb 2, 1046
- Calais Harbour Feb 2, 1037
- Cavan and Leitrim Light Railway Feb 4, 1275
- Contracts with Foreigners Feb 4, 1270
- Crofter Commission, Scotland Feb 4, 1305
- Customs Outdoor Officers, Ireland Feb 4, 1295
- Edinburgh University Library Buildings Jan 29, 796
- Education Fee Grant, Ireland Jan 22, 283
- Floods, Longford Feb 2, 1046
- Inland Money Orders Feb 5, 1429
- Kilcrea Abbey, Cork Jan 28, 682
- Loans to Tenants, Ireland Feb 2, 1044
- Mail Service
  - Australian and Indian Jan 25, 404, 405
  - Bag Seals Feb 4, 1273
  - Contract Subsidies Feb 1, 919
  - Irish Jan 25, 393, 394, 395; Jan 26, 508; Jan 28, 683; Feb 2, 1055; Feb 4, 1279, 1280; Feb 8, 1544, 1545
  - Stornoway Feb 4, 1276
- National
  - Gallery and British Museum, Sundays Feb 4, 1293
  - Portrait Gallery, Police Protection Jan 29, 782
- Netley Hospital Assessment Feb 2, 1054
- Parcels Post
  - Charges Jan 29, 783
  - Switzerland Jan 28, 666
- Postal
  - Arrangements
    - Bournae, Tipperary Jan 26, 497
    - Cavan (West) Feb 1, 902
    - Leitrim (South) Jan 26, 502
  - Facilities
    - Longford Feb 5, 1419
    - Rushden Feb 4, 1294
- Postal and Telegraph Services, Revenue Feb 8, 1535

[cont.

HANBURY, Right Hon. R. W.—cont.
- Post Office
  - Accommodation, Thurles, Tipperary Jan 22, 272
  - Boscombe Feb 4, 1293
  - Establishments Jan 21, 174; Feb 1, 914; Feb 5, 1430
  - Female Clerks, Dublin Jan 26, 512
  - Limerick Jan 21, 178
  - Savings Bank
    - Accounts Feb 8, 1535
    - Deposits Feb 4, 1271, 1272
  - Sligo Feb 1, 906
  - Swansea Feb 4, 1274
  - Trosses, Donegal Jan 25, 401
- Post Office Amendment Act (1895) Feb 2, 1048
- Protection of Ancient Monuments, Ireland Jan 29, 798
- Public Works, Ireland Jan 28, 682
- Rating of Government Property, London Feb 4, 1308
- River Suck Drainage Jan 25, 399; Jan 26, 499
- Royal Canal, Ireland Jan 29, 790
- St. Helena Feb 8, 1537
- Sample Post, Butterflies Feb 1, 918
- School Teachers' Pensions, Ireland Jan 22, 279; Feb 2, 1049
- Sligo
  - Abbey Jan 25, 408
  - Post Office Feb 1, 906
  - Union Jan 29, 792
- South Kensington Museum Feb 1, 923
- Telegraph
  - Facilities
    - Fairview, Dublin Jan 25, 407
    - Limerick Jan 29, 790
  - Service, Ireland Jan 22, 283
- Telephone
  - Service, Tunbridge Wells Feb 2, 1038, 1039
  - Trunk Line, Cork and Dublin Jan 28, 683
- Tralee and Dingle Railway Jan 25, 381
- Treasury Loans, Ireland Jan 29, 787

HARCOURT, Right Hon. Sir WILLIAM VERNON, Monmouthshire, W.
- British South Africa Committee Jan 26, 515; Jan 29, 808, 826
- Business of the House
  - General Jan 28, 780; Feb 8, 1563, 1564
  - Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1070
- Education Bill (Poor School Board Districts) Jan 22, 291
- Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Jan 21, 199
- Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 617, 618
- Military Works Bill Feb 1, 1022
- Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1225
- Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 723, 750
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 49, 54, 76, 79; Jan 26, 591
- Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 651
- Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1465, 1466, 1467, 1468, 1473, 1476, 1505, 1518
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 1028; Feb 2, 1112, 1154, 1155; Feb 4, 1337, 1382, 1385, 1391, 1392, 1394, 1399, 1402, 1403, 1404, 1408

HARDY, Mr. LAURENCE, Kent, Ashford
- Taxation on Clerical Incomes Feb 2, 1033

HARRINGTON, Mr. TIMOTHY, Dublin City, Harbour
- Daunt's Rock Lightship Jan 22, 274
- Evicted Tenants (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 301
- Queen's Speech Jan 20, 148; Jan 21, 268; Jan 22, 305, 308, 309, 320

HARRISON Mr. CHARLES, Plymouth
- Land Values (Towns) Assessment Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 298

HART DYKE, Right Hon. Sir W., Bart. (see DYKE)

HAVELOCK-ALLAN, General Sir H. M., Bart., Durham, S.E.
- Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1591

HEALY, Mr. MAURICE, Cork City
- Codification of Laws Jan 21, 194, 195
- Consolidation of Irish Acts Jan 22, 291
- Daunt's Rock Lightship Jan 22, 273, 274; Jan 25, 405
- Evicted Tenants, Ireland Jan 22, 274
- Flogging Prisoners Jan 22, 281
- Irish Mail Service Jan 25, 393; Jan 28, 683
- Probate Duty Grant, Ireland Jan 21, 194
- Queen's Speech Jan 25, 436
- Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act Jan 22, 291
- Trunk Telephone Line, Cork and Dublin Jan 28, 683

HEALY, Mr. TIMOTHY M., Louth, N.
- Agricultural Land Rating (Ireland) Bill Jan 21, 175, 176; Jan 28, 687
- British South Africa Committee Jan 20, 172; Jan 26, 515; Jan 29, 824
- Business of the House
  - General Jan 20, 122
  - Supply Jan 29, 838
  - Wednesday Sittings Jan 22, 293
- Convicts, Escaped Jan 21, 189
- Drawing, Irish Schools Jan 25, 382
- Educational Endowment (Ireland) Act (1885) Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 26, 516; 2R. Jan 29, 875
- Erasmus Smith Schools Jan 22, 276; Jan 28, 673
- Industries (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 29, 884
- Irish Mail Service Jan 25, 394
- Land Law (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 293
- Law of Evidence (Criminal Cases) Bill Jan 21, 268; Jan 29, 874
- Loan Fund (Ireland) Acts Jan 22, 270
- Municipal Franchise, Ireland Jan 26, 499
- Port Charges, Dublin Jan 22, 279
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 77; Jan 20, 134, 135, 147; Jan 21, 225, 227; Jan 22, 331, 333, 334, 366; Jan 25, 430; Jan 26, 553
- Street Preaching in Sligo Jan 26, 499
- Unlawful Possession Bill, 2R. Jan 26, 598

HEATON, Mr. J. HENNIKER, Canterbury
- Australian and Indian Mails Jan 25, 404, 405
- Book Post Charges Jan 29, 783
- Mail Contract Subsidies Feb 1, 919
- Parcel Post Charges Jan 29, 783
- Post Office Savings Bank Deposits Feb 4, 1271, 1272

HEDDERWICK, Mr. T. C. H., Wick Burghs
- Liquor Traffic Local Veto (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 298
- Queen's Speech Jan 22, 348
- Voluntary Schools Grant (Scotch Equivalent) Feb 4, 1312

HEMPHILL, Right Hon. Serjeant C. H., Tyrone, N.
- Queen's Speech Jan 21, 222; Jan 26, 573

HICKMAN, Sir A., Wolverhampton, W.
- Working Men's Dwellings (No. 2) Bill, Intro. Feb 4, 1416

HICKS BEACH, Sir M. E., Bt. (see BEACH)

HOBHOUSE, Mr. H., Somerset, E.
- Local Government Act (1894) Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 27, 659
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 1010

HOGAN, Mr. J. F., Tipperary, Mid
- Australian Colonies, Federal Convention Jan 22, 271
- British Museum Staff Feb 2, 1046
- Costa Rica Packet Case Jan 26, 498
- Emigrants' Information Office Jan 26, 503
- Fiji Feb 8, 1556
- New Hebrides
  - Agreement with France Jan 21, 187
  - Sale of Fire-arms and Spirits in Feb 8, 1547
- Norfolk Island Jan 21, 187
- Postal Arrangements, Bournae, Tipperary Jan 26, 497
- Post Office Accommodation, Thurles, Tipperary Jan 22, 272
- Queen's Diamond Jubilee, Visit of Colonial Premiers Feb 1, 924
- Unification of Time at Sea Jan 21, 191
- Western Australia Feb 2, 1066

HOLLAND, Hon. L. R., Tower Hamlets, Bow and Bromley
- Vaccination Officers' Fees Feb 1, 923

HOME DEPARTMENT

Secretary of State—Sir M. W. RIDLEY
Under Secretary of State—Mr. JESSE COLLINGS

- Armenian Refugee Killed in London, Qs. Sir W. Lawson, Mr. J. O'Kelly; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 667
- Belfast Textile Trades, Fines, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 2, 1034
- Burial Fees, Ulverston, Qs. Mr. J. C. Williams; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 21, 173

[cont.

HOME DEPARTMENT—cont.
- Cab Licences, Metropolis, Q. Mr. T. G. Fardell; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 1, 908
- Committals to Assizes, Qs. Mr. A. O'Connor; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 395
- Dangerous Trades, Q. Mr. R. McKenna; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 386
- Escaped Convicts, Qs. Mr. M. Davitt, Mr. E. H. Pickersgill, Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. J. A. Pease; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 21, 188
- Experiments on Living Animals, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 4, 1287. Q. Mr. Swift MacNeill; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 5, 1431
- Factories and Workshops Act (Particulars Section), Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 5, 1422
- Factory Acts, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 21, 184
- Flogging Prisoners, Qs. Mr. J. A. Pease, Mr. M. Healy, Mr. J. Morley, Sir W. Lawson, Sir J. F. Leese, Mr. H. E. Kearley; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 22, 280
- Foundry Workers, Q. Mr. J. McKillop; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 26, 494
- Housebreaking, Liverpool Assizes, Q. Mr. H. Seton-Karr; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 664
- Imposition of Fines on Workmen, Qs. Mr. G. W. Wolff, Mr. J. Samuel; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 409
- Inebriates, Q. Mr. Lees Knowles; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 4, 1287
- Injuries to Workmen, Foreign Shipowners, Q. Mr. J. F. Flannery; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 685
- Insanity, Qs. Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 4, 1282
- Manslaughter at Manchester, Q. Mr. C. E. Schwann; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 2, 1039
- Midwives' Registration, Q. Mr. C. E. Schwann; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 4, 1270
- Mill Accident, Batley, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 29, 794
- Oil Lamp Accidents, Q. Captain Donelan; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 29, 793
- Payment of Common Jurors, Q. Mr. Lloyd-Morgan; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 1, 914
- Prisoners' Property Fund, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 4, 1309
- Prisons
  - Northampton, Advertisements, Q. Mr. H. Labouchere; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 8, 1543
  - Officers' Instruction, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 671
  - Visiting Committees, Qs. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 670
- Privilege Cab System, Q. Mr. T. Lough; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 396
- Shuttle Guards, Q. Mr. C. E. Schwann; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 22, 284. Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 379. Q. Mr. C. E. Schwann; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 688

[cont.

HOME DEPARTMENT—cont.
Treason-felony Prisoners
Duff, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 667
Fetherstone and Flanagan, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 26, 509
Wool Sorting, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 664

HOPKINSON, Mr. A., Wilts, Cricklade
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 1007

HOWELL, Mr. W. T., Denbigh Boroughs
Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 656, 658

HOWORTH, Sir H. H., Salford, S.
British South Africa Committee Jan 29, 820
Queen's Speech Jan 22, (Amendt.) 359, 362, 366, 368; Jan 25, 429

HOZIER, Mr. J. H. C., Lanarkshire, S.
Jury Service, Yeomanry Officers Jan 26, 500

HUMPHREYS-OWEN, Mr. ARTHUR C., Montgomery
Elementary Education (Arrears of Grants) Jan 26, 489
Howell's Charity Jan 26, 493; Feb 4, 1304, 1305
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1121

HUTTON, Mr. A. E., York., W. R., Morley
Elementary Schools (Building Grants) Feb 5, 1432
St. Jude's School, Bethnal Green Jan 25, 385
School
Accommodation, Castleton Feb 4, 1308
Buildings Feb 4, 1295

Imperial Defence Act 1888 (Ports and Coaling Stations)
Account Pres. (c.) Feb 1, 900

INDIA

Secretary of State—Lord G. HAMILTON
Under Secretary of State—Earl of ONSLOW

Chitral Campaign Medal, Q. Mr. A. M. Brookfield; A. Lord G. Hamilton Feb 2, 1057
Egyptian Expedition, Indian Troops, Qs. Mr. T. R. Buchanan; As. Lord G. Hamilton, Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 4, 1301
Exchange Compensation, Q. Sir H. S. King; A. Lord G. Hamilton Jan 26, 506.
Health of Troops in India, Qs. Colonel Lockwood, Mr. C. J. Darling, Major Rasch; As. Lord G. Hamilton Jan 25, 397
Indian
Artillery and Engineers, Cadets, Q. Sir H. S. King; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 2, 1040
Famine
Mortality, Q. Sir W. Wedderburn; A. Lord G. Hamilton Feb 5, 1431

[cont.

INDIA—cont.
Indian—cont.
Famine—cont.
Plague, and, Qs. Mr. T. Lough, Dr. G. B. Clark, Mr. G. Lambert, Mr. J. Caldwell, Mr. J. M. Maclean; As. Lord G. Hamilton, Sir M. Hicks Beach, Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 21, 176. Qs. Sir A. R. Scoble, Mr. J. M. Maclean; As. Lord G. Hamilton Jan 22, 284
Relief Measures, Qs. Lord Kinnaird; [Obs. Earl of Northbrook, Lord Wenlock, Earl of Kimberley;] As. Earl of Onslow Feb 1, 885. Q. Lord Kinnaird; A. Earl of Onslow Feb 8, 1529
Sale of Silver, Q. Mr. J. M. Maclean; A. Lord G. Hamilton Jan 26, 507
Mails, Australian and, Qs. Mr. Henniker Heaton; As. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 404
Troops
Egyptian Expedition, Qs. Mr. T. R. Buchanan; As. Lord G. Hamilton, Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 4, 1301
Scurvy, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Lord G. Hamilton Feb 2, 1052
Madras Infantry Regiments, Q. Sir H. S. King; A. Lord G. Hamilton Jan 26, 510
Mortality, Central Indian Provinces, Q. Mr. M. Davitt; A. Lord G. Hamilton Feb 8, 1555

India (Superannuation Allowance)
Address for Copy Correspondence regarding Superannuation Allowance of Major-General Sir Owen Tudor Burne (l.) Jan 19, 36
Return Pres. (c.) Jan 19, 120

Industrial and Provident and Incorporated Building Societies (Purchase of Fee Simple) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. F. A. Channing; Read 1° Jan 27, 660

Industries (Ireland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. T. M. Healy; Read 1° Jan 29, 884

Injuries to Workmen (Employers' Liability) Bill
c. Intro., Sir A. Forwood; Read 1° Feb 2, 1083

Insanity (see LUNACY)

Intoxicants (Sale of): Houses of Parliament (see PARLIAMENT: COMMONS, subheading Miscellaneous)

IRELAND

Lord Lieutenant—Earl CADOGAN
Chief Secretary—Mr. G. W. BALFOUR
Lord Chancellor—Lord ASHBOURNE
Attorney General—Mr. J. ATKINSON
Solicitor General—Mr. W. KENNY

Agricultural
Distress (Westport Union), Qs. Dr. R. Ambrose, Mr. M. Davitt, Mr. A. O'Connor; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 21, 174
Expenditure, Q. Mr. Engledow; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 29, 798
Prices, Qs. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh, Mr. J. C. Flynn; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1035

[cont.

IRELAND—cont.
  Agricultural Land Rating (Ireland) Bill, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 687
  Agricultural Rating Bill, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy; As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 21, 175
  Amalgamation of Poor Law Unions, Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1425
  Army
    Contracts, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 29, 788
    Foreign Meat Supply, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. W. Field; As. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 21, 182. Qs. Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 25, 406
  Askeaton and Kilmallock Abbeys, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 270
  Bacon Trade Dispute, Waterford, Qs. Mr. P. O'Brien; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 504
  Belfast
    Board of Guardians, Q. Mr. M. McCartan; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 391
    Lough, Training Ship, Q. Mr. S. Young; A. Mr. Austen Chamberlain Jan 29, 789
    Musgrave Street Police Barracks, Q. Mr. G. W. Wolff; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1307
    Textile Trades, Fines, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 2, 1034
  Belmullet Union, Distress in, Q. Mr. D. Crilly; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 403
  Board of
    Agriculture, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1418
    Guardians, Newry, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 669. Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 29, 787
  Bog Slide, Kerry, Q. Mr. James Roche; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 668
  Canals, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 289
  Carlow County, Tenant's Application for Reinstatement, Q. Mr. J. Hammond; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 675
  Castlepollard Petty Sessions, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1423
  Catholic University, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 1, 925
  Cattle, Transit of, by Sea, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 509
  Cavan and Leitrim Light Railway, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1275
  Cavan (West), Postal Arrangements, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 901
  Charge of Larceny, Cork, Q. Mr. J. C. Flynn; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1427
  Civil Service Retirement, District Lunatic Asylums, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 386
  Clare County, Government Valuation, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 276
  Codification of Laws, Qs. Mr. M. Healy; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach, Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 21, 194
  Congested Districts Board, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 388

[cont.

IRELAND—cont.
  Connemara
    Distress in, Q. Mr. W. O'Malley; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 385
    Evictions, Q. Mr. W. O'Malley; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1036
  Consolidation of Irish Acts, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 291
  Cork
    Charge of Larceny, Q. Mr. J. C. Flynn; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1427
    Dublin and, Telephone Trunk Line, Q. Mr. M Healy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 683
    Illegal Trawling, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. P. J. Power; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1559
    Kilcrea Abbey, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 682
    Queen's College, Q. Mr. Vesey Knox; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1306
    Railways, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28,683
    Winter Assizes, Qs. Mr. J. C. Flynn, Mr. Swift MacNeill; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 25, 401
  Customs Outdoor Officers, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1294
  Daunt's Rock Lightship, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. W. Field; As. Mr. Akers-Douglas Jan 21, 181. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Mr. T. Harrington; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 22, 273. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 405. Qs. Mr. W. Field, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 28, 672
  Deportation of Paupers to Ireland, Q. Mr. J. Daly; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1052
  Distress
    Belmullet Union, Qs. Mr. D. Crilly; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 403; Jan 28, 681
    Connemara, Q. Mr. W. O'Malley; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 385
    Donegal (Western), Q. Mr. T. D. Sullivan; A. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 282. Q. Mr. T. D. Sullivan; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 504
    Ireland (West of), Q. Mr. D. Crilly; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 681
    Listowel Union, Q. Mr. M. Austin; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1541
    Westport Union, Qs. Dr. R. Ambrose, Mr. M. Davitt, Mr. A. O'Connor; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 21, 174. Qs. Dr. R. Ambrose, Mr. R. M. Dane; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1284
  District Lunatic Asylums, Civil Service Retirement, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 386
  Divisional Police Commissioners, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1281
  Dog Licences, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 909
  Donegal
    Distress in, Western, Q. Mr. T. D. Sullivan; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 282. Q. Mr. T. D. Sullivan; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 504
    Finner Rifle Range, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 2, 1063. Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 8, 1536

[cont.

IRELAND—cont.

- Donegal– cont.
  - Petty Sessions, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill ; As. Mr. G, Balfour Feb 4, 1284
  - Post Office, Trosses, Q. Mr. Swift MacNeill ; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 401
  - Railway Extensions, Q. Mr. Vesey Knox ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1309
- Drawing, Irish Schools, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 382
- Dublin
  - Cork and, Telephone Trunk Line, Q. Mr. M. Healy ; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 683
  - Grangegorman Prison, Qs. Mr. J. L. Carew, Mr. P. O'Brien ; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 383
  - Land Commission Office, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1291
  - Police, Reserve Force, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1041
  - Port Charges, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. J. L. Carew ; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 279
  - Post Office Female Clerks, Q. Mr. J. J. Clancy ; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 512
  - Royal Barracks, Q. Mr. W. Field ; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 29, 791
  - Telegraph Facilities, Fairview, Q. Mr. J. J. Clancy ; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 407
- Dublin Port and Docks Bill, Q. Mr. W. Field ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 29, 794
- Education
  - Fee Grant, Q. Mr. Vesey Knox ; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 282
  - National Board of, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 391
  - Technical, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 910
- Enniskillen Fusiliers, Enlistment, Q. Mr. J. Hammond ; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 5, 1427
- Erasmus Smith Schools, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy ; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 276. Q. Mr. T. M. Healy ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 673. Qs. Mr. Arnold-Forster, Mr. W. Johnston ; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1302
- Evicted Tenants, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. J. Dillon ; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 21, 179. Q. Mr. M. Healy ; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 274. Qs. Mr. W. Abraham (Cork), Mr. J. Dillon, Captain Donelan ; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1537
- Evictions
  - Connemara, Q. Mr. W. O'Malley ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1036
  - Leitrim, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1419
- Fair Rent
  - Agreements, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1425
  - Applications, Monaghan, Qs. Mr. J. Daly, Mr. M. McCartan ; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 384
- Fee Farm Tenants, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 390
- Financial Relations between Great Britain and Ireland (see that Title)
- Finner Rifle Range, Donegal, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien ; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 2, 1063. Q. Mr. P. O'Brien ; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 8, 1536

[cont.

IRELAND—cont.

- Floods, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell ; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1045
- Government Valuation, Clare, Q. Mr. T. M Healy ; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 276
- Grangegorman Prison, Dublin, Qs. Mr. J. L Carew, Mr. P. O'Brien ; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 383
- Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland, Qs. Mr. D. Macaleese, Mr. W. Johnston ; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 911. Qs. Mr. J. Daly ; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1047
- Horse Breeding, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 388
- Illegal Trawling
  - Cork, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. P. J. Power ; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1559
  - Irish Coast, Qs. Mr. J. Gilhooly, Captain Donelan, Colonel Waring ; As. Mr. Macartney, Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 913. Q. Colonel Waring ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1056
- Intermediate Education Exams., Q. Mr. R. M. Dane ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1290
- Irish-speaking Witnesses, Q. Mr. P. J. Power ; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 403
- Judicial Rents, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. M. McCartan ; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 21, 180
- Kerry County
  - Bog Slide, Q. Mr. James Roche ; A. Mr. G Balfour Jan 28, 668
  - Warden Estate, Qs. Mr. J. Dillon ; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 915
- Kilcrea Abbey, Cork, Q. Dr. Tanner ; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 682
- Labourers
  - Acts, Longford, Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell ; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1426
  - Allotments, Qs. Mr. M. Davitt ; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1554
  - Cottages, Q. Sir T. G. Esmonde ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 380
- Land
  - Commission
    - Buchanan v. Cowell, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 921
    - Leitrim, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 673
    - Office, Dublin, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1291
  - Purchase, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 390
  - Sub-Commissioners, Q. Mr. M. McCartan ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 399
- Lane-Fox Estate, Leitrim, Qs. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh, Mr. J. C. Flynn ; [Mr. Speaker ;] As. Mr. J. Atkinson Feb 5, 1423
- Leitrim
  - Eviction, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1419
  - Land Commission, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 673
  - Lane-Fox Estate, Qs. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh, Mr. J. C. Flynn ; [Mr. Speaker ;] As. Mr. J. Atkinson Feb 5, 1423
  - Road Contracts, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh ; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1422
  - South, Postal Arrangements, Q. Mr. J. Tully ; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 502
- Licensed Pawnbrokers, Q. Mr. D. Crilly ; A. Mr G. Balfour Jan 28, 689

[cont.

IRELAND—cont.

- Light Railways, Q. Dr. R. Ambrose; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1545
- Lights Board, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Akers-Douglas Jan 21, 190. Qs. Mr. W. Field; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. J. Atkinson, Mr. Ritchie Jan 22, 290. Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 29, 785. Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell, Mr. J. O'Connor; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 915
- Lightship, Daunt's Rock, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. W. Field; As. Mr. Akers-Douglas Jan 21, 181. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Mr. T. Harrington; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 22, 273. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 405. Qs. Mr. W. Field, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 28, 672
- Limerick
  - City, Postal Facilities, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 790
  - Military Barracks, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Brodrick Jan 22, 280
  - Post Office, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 21, 178
- Listowel Union, Distress in, Q. Mr. M. Austin; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1541
- Loan Fund
  - Acts, Qs. Mr. R. M. Dane, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. Mr. J. Atkinson, Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 22, 269
  - Board, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill, Mr. A. O'Connor; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 21, 191
- Loans to Tenants, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1044
- Local Government, Q. Mr. J. O'Connor; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 922
- Londonderry Corporation Stock, Qs. Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Feb 4, 1305; Feb 8, 1549
- Longford
  - Fee Farm Tenants, Q. Mr. J. P. Parrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 390
  - Floods, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1045
  - Labourers' Acts, Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1426
  - Land Purchase, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 390
  - Postal Facilities, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 5, 1419
  - Royal Canal Harbour, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1275
  - School Accommodation, Letter-Gunnell, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1426
- Mail Service, Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Mr. J. Dillon, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. W. Field, Mr. P. J. Power, Mr. P. O'Brien; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 393. Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 683. Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell, Mr. P. O'Brien; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1279
- Mails, Irish, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 508. Q. Mr. J. L. Carew; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1055. Qs. Mr. James Roche, Captain Donelan, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 8, 1544
- Medicine Contract, Mullingar Union, Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 502

[cont.

IRELAND—cont.

- Military Barracks, Limerick, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Brodrick Jan 22, 280
- Militia, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 28, 677
- Monaghan
  - Fair Rent Applications, Qs. Mr. J. Daly, Mr. M. McCartan; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 384
  - Newbliss Court-house, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1298
  - Sanitary Accommodation, Clones, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1425
  - Tenants' Holdings, Q. Mr. J. Daly; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1052
- Mountjoy Prison, Health of Prisoner, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 908
- Mullingar Union, Medicine Contract, Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 502
- Municipal Franchise, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. J. C. Flynn; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 499
- National
  - Board of Education, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien: A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 391
  - Schools, Qs. Mr. J. C. Flynn; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1050; Feb 4, 1300
- Newbliss Court-house, Monaghan, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1298
- Newry Board of Guardians, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 669. Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 29, 787
- Paupers, Deportation of, to Ireland, Q. Mr. J. Daly; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1052
- Pensions, School Teachers, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach, Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 278. Qs. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; As. Mr. Hanbury, Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1049
- Petty Sessions
  - Castlepollard, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1423
  - Donegal, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1284
- Police
  - Divisional Commissioners, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1281
  - Reserve Force, Dublin, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1041
  - Royal Irish Constabulary (see below)
- Pollen Fishery, Lough Neagh, Qs. Mr. P. C. Doogan, Mr. J. Dillon; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 912
- Poor
  - Law Unions, Amalgamation of, Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1425
  - Relief, Q. Mr. J. Dillon; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 685
- Port Charges, Dublin, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. J. L. Carew; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 279
- Postal
  - Arrangements
    - Bournae, Tipperary County, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 497
    - Cavan (West), Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 901
    - Leitrim (South), Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 502
  - Facilities, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 5, 1419

[cont.

IRELAND—cont.
- Post Office
  - Accommodation, Thurles, Tipperary County, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 272
  - Female Clerks, Dublin, Q. Mr. J. J. Clancy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 512
  - Limerick, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 21, 178
  - Sligo, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 906
  - Trosses, Donegal County, Q. Mr. Swift MacNeill; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 401
- Prisons
  - Grangegorman, Dublin, Qs. Mr. J. L. Carew; Mr. P. O'Brien; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 383
  - Mountjoy, Health of Prisoner, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 908
  - Service, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 921
- Private Bill Legislation, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1290
- Probate Duty Grant, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 21, 194
- Protection of Ancient Monuments, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 797
- Public
  - Boards, Audit, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 389
  - Works, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 681
- Purchase of Holdings, Q. Mr. J. O'Kelly; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 906
- Queen's College, Cork, Q. Mr. Vesey Knox; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1306
- Railway
  - Connections, Q. Sir T. G. Esmonde; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 381
  - Extensions
    - Donegal, Q. Mr. Vesey Knox; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1309
    - Ireland, Q. Mr. J. Pinkerton; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1430
    - Mid Cork, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 683
  - Rates, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 21, 190. Q. Mr. J. Tuite; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 29, 797. Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1045
- Railways (see under Title RAILWAYS)
- Resident Magistracy, Major N. Gosselin, Qs. Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1307
- Rifle Range, Finner, Donegal, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 2, 1063. Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 8, 1536
- River Suck Drainage, Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 399. Q. Mr. J. Roche; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 499
- Road Contracts, Leitrim, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1422
- Royal
  - Barracks, Dublin, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 29, 791
  - Canal
    - Harbour, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1275
    - Repair of, Q. Mr. J. Tuite; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 790

[cont.

IRELAND—cont.
- Royal—cont.
  - Irish Constabulary, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 400. Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 511. Qs. Mr. J. Daly, Mr. R. M. Dane, Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 671. Qs. Mr. T. Lough, Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1286
  - Residence in, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 4, 1311
- Sanitary Accommodation, Clones, Monaghan, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1425
- Schools
  - Accommodation, Letter-Gunnell, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1426
  - Attendance, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 289
  - Erasmus Smith, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 276. Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 673. Qs. Mr. Arnold-Forster, Mr. W. Johnston; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1302
  - Irish, Drawing, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 382
  - Teachers' Pensions, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach, Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 278. Qs. P. A. M'Hugh; As. Mr. Hanbury, Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1049
  - Workmistresses, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1556
- Secret Service Fund, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 22, 292
- Seed Rate, Q. Mr. E. Crean; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1428
- Sligo
  - Abbey, Q. Mr. B. Collery; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 407
  - Post Office, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 906
  - Street Preaching in, Qs. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh, Mr. B. Collery, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 498
  - Union, Q. Mr. B. Collery; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 792
- Solicitors' Licence Duty, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 26, 495
- Statutory Term Applications, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 29, 793
- Stipendiary Magistrates, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 674
- Street Preaching in Sligo, Qs. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh, Mr. B. Collery, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 498
- Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 291
- Supply: Irish Estimates, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 4, 1311
- Taxation, Qs. Mr. A. F. Jeffreys, Mr. A. O'Connor, Mr. T. Lough; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 25, 378
- Technical Education, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 910
- Telegraph Facilities, Fairview, Dublin, Q. Mr. J. J. Clancy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 407

[cont.

IRELAND—cont.
- Telegraph Service, Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 283
- Telephone Trunk Line, Cork and Dublin, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 683
- Tenants
  - Application for Re-instatement, Carlow, Q. Mr. J. Hammond; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 675
  - Fee Farm, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 390
  - Holdings, Monaghan, Q. Mr. J. Daly; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1052
  - Town, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 510
- Tipperary County
  - Postal Arrangements, Bournae, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 497
  - Post Office Accommodation, Thurles, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 272
- Town Tenants, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 510
- Training Ship, Belfast Lough, Q. Mr. S. Young; A. Mr. Austen Chamberlain Jan 29, 789
- Transit of Cattle by Sea, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 509
- Treasury Loans, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 787
- Under-sheriffs, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 29, 791
- Unions
  - Belmullet, Distress in, Q. Mr. D. Crilly; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 403
  - Listowel, Distress in, Q. Mr. M. Austin; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1541
  - Mullingar, Medicine Contract, Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 502
  - Poor Law, Amalgamation of, Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1425
  - Sligo, Q. Mr. B. Collery; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 792
  - Westport, Distress in, Qs. Dr. R. Ambrose, Mr. R. M. Dane; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1284
- Voluntary School Grant (Irish Equivalent), Qs. Mr. J. C. Flynn; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 4, 1311
- Warden Estate, Kerry, Qs. Mr. J. Dillon; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 915
- Waterford Bacon Trade Dispute, Qs. Mr. P. O'Brien; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 504
- Westport Union, Distress in, Qs. Dr. R. Ambrose, Mr. M. Davitt, Mr. A. O'Connor; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 21, 174. Qs. Dr. R. Ambrose, Mr. R. M. Dane; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1284
- Workmistresses, Irish Schools, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1556

Ireland (Supreme Court of Judicature)
- Copy of Account of Receipts and Payments of Accountant General Pres. (c.) Jan 19, 40

ISAACSON, Mr. F. WOOTTON, Tower Hamlets, Stepney
- Election Petitions Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 295

JAMESON, Major J. EUSTACE, Clare, W.
- Queen's Speech Jan 21, 249

JEBB, Mr. R. C., Cambridge University
- Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1220
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 959

JEFFREYS, Mr. A. F., Hants, Basingstoke
- Aldershot Autumn Manœuvres Jan 25, 378
- Land Tax Jan 29, 786
- Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 635
- Queen's Speech Jan 25, 435
- Taxation, Ireland Jan 25, 378

JOHNSTON, Mr. WILLIAM, Belfast, S.
- County Surveyors (Ireland) Amendment Bill, Intro. Feb 2, 1083
- Educational Endowments (Ireland) Act (1885) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 29, 876
- Erasmus Smith Schools, Ireland Feb 4, 1302
- Great Northern of Ireland Railway Feb 1, 911
- Municipal Elections (Ireland) (Women) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 300
- Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1196
- Post Office Savings Bank Deposits Feb 4, 1272
- Queen's
  - Reign, Elementary Schools Jan 25, 387
  - Speech Jan 21, 267; Jan 22, 308, 309
- Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 658

JOHNSTONE, Mr. J. HEYWOOD, Sussex, Horsham
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1359

JONES, Mr. D. BRYNMOR, Swansea District
- Swansea Post Office Feb 4, 1273

JONES, Mr. L. ATHERLEY- (see ATHERLEY-JONES)

JONES, Mr. W., Carnarvon, Arfon
- Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 691, 694

Judicature Acts
- Mr. Atherley-Jones (Notice of Motion) Jan 26, 489

KEARLEY, Mr. H. E., Devonport
- Army Pension: Kelly (John) Jan 28, 681
- Flogging Prisoners Jan 22, 282
- Leaseholders (Purchase of Fee Simple) (No. 2) Bill, Intro. Jan 27, 660
- Military Works Bill Feb 1, 1024
- Naval Outfit Feb 4, 1292
- Queen's Speech Jan 25, (Amendt.) 431, 443, 457
- Royal Patriotic Fund Feb 2, 1034, 1066
- Sale of Food and Drugs Bill, Intro. Jan 27, 660

KEMP, Mr. G., Lancashire, S.E., Heywood
- Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 633
- Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act (1888) Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 293

Kennaway, Right Hon. Sir John H., Bart., Devonshire, Honiton
- Slavery at Zanzibar Jan 21, 195
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1136

Kenyon, Lord
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 9

Kenyon, Mr. James, Bury, Lancashire
- Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 631

Kilbride, Mr. Denis, Galway, N.
- Queen's Speech Jan 21, 206

Kimberley, Earl of
- Business of the House Jan 28, 662
- Indian Famine Feb 1, 898, 899
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 12, 18, 28

King, Sir H. Seymour, Hull, Central
- Exchange Compensation, India Jan 26, 506
- Indian Artillery and Engineers, Cadets Feb 2, 1040
- Madras Infantry Regiments Jan 26, 510
- Mauritius Police Jan 26, 510
- Port Precautions against Disease Jan 26, 506

Kinnaird, Lord
- Indian Famine Feb 1, 885; Feb 8, 1529

Knowles, Mr. Lees, Salford, W.
- Inebriates Feb 4, 1287
- Plumbers' Registration Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 295

Knox, Mr. E. F. Vesey, Londonderry City
- Agricultural Land Rating (Ireland) Bill Jan 28, 687
- Army Estimates: £255,300 for Volunteer Corps Capitation Grant (Supplementary) Jan 29, 843, 844, 847
- Barracks Act (1890) Feb 8, 1543
- Business of the House: Supply Jan 29, 837
- Education Fee Grant, Ireland Jan 22, 282
- Insanity Feb 4, 1283
- Irish Mail Service Feb 8, 1545
- Londonderry Corporation Stock Feb 4, 1305, 1306; Feb 8, 1549
- Military Works Bill Feb 1, 1024
- Queen's
  - College, Cork Feb 4, 1306
  - Speech Jan 22, 327, 330
- Railway Extensions, Donegal Feb 4, 1309
- School Teachers' Pensions, Ireland Jan 22, 278
- Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1489
- University Education of Roman Catholics Jan 28, 690

Labouchere, Mr. Henry, Northampton
- Army Estimates: £145,000 for Pay of Indian Troops at Suakim (Supplementary) Feb 5, 1522
- Business of the House
  - Supply Jan 29, 834
  - Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1070

[cont.

Labouchere, Mr. H.—cont.
- Northampton Prison, Advertisements Feb 8, 1543
- Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1178, 1182, 1184, 1201, 1203, 1204
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 92
- Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1445, 1447, 1480, 1481, 1482

Labour Bureaux Bill
- c. Intro., Mr. D. F. Goddard; Read 1° Jan 22, 299

Labourers' Cottages (Ireland) Bill
- c. Intro., Mr. W. Field; Read 1° Jan 25, 488

LABOUR QUESTIONS, ETC.
- Associations of Workmen, Contracts, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 5, 1433
- Belfast Textile Trades, Fines, Qs. Sir C. Dilke; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 2, 1034
- British Museum Staff, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1046
- Contracts (see that Title)
- Current Rate of Wages, Woolwich District, Qs. Sir C. Dilke; As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 25, 408
- Dangerous Trades, Q. Mr. R. McKenna; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 386
- Factories and Workshops Act (Particulars Section), Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 5, 1422
- Factory
  - Accident, Batley, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir R. Webster Feb 8, 1562
  - Acts, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 21, 184
- Factory Acts (Fishing Trade) Bill (see that Title)
- Foundry Workers, Q. Mr. J. McKillop; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 26, 494
- Irish Lights Board, Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell, Mr. J. O'Connor; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 915
- Labour Department, Local Correspondence, Q. Mr. H. H. Marks; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 922
- Labourers'
  - Acts, Longford, Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1426
  - Allotments, Ireland, Qs. Mr. M. Davitt; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1554
  - Cottages, Ireland, Q. Sir T. G. Esmonde; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 380
- Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill (see that Title)
- Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries, Qs. Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. Bromley Davenport, Mr. Gibson Bowles; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1058
- Privilege Cab System, Q. Mr. T. Lough; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 396
- Shuttle Guards, Q. Mr. C. E. Schwann; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 22, 284. Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 379. Q. Mr. C. E. Schwann; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 688
- Wool Sorting, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 664

[cont.

LABOUR QUESTIONS, ETC.—cont.
  Workmen
    Imposition of Fines on, Qs. Mr. G. W. Wolff, Mr. J. Samuel; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 409
    Injuries to, Foreign Shipowners, Q. Mr. J. F. Flannery; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 685
  Workmistresses, Irish Schools, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1556

Lambert, Mr. G., Devon, South Molton
  Indian Famine and Plague Jan 21, 177
  Public Health (Scotland) Bill Jan 25, 488
  Queen's Speech Jan 25, 446

Land Law (Ireland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. T. J. Healy; Read 1° Jan 22, 293

Land Law (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. O'Kelly; Read 1° Jan 22, 300

Land Tenure (Wales and Monmouthshire) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Vaughan-Davies; Read 1° Jan 22, 295

Land Values (Towns) Assessment Bill
c. Intro., Mr. C. Harrison; Read 1° Jan 22, 298

LANSDOWNE, Marquess of (Secretary of State for War)
  Army, Increase of Strength Feb 4, 1246, 1265, 1267

Laurie, General J. W., Pembroke and Haverfordwest
  Leaseholder's Purchase of Fee Simple Bill, Intro Jan 22, 300
  Lighthouse Keepers Feb 2, 1064
  Military Works Bill Jan 29, 869
  Queen's Speech Jan 25, 449
  Telegraph Cable, West Indies Feb 1, 917

LAW AND JUSTICE AND POLICE
  Assize, Special Commisioner of (Mr. Darling), Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Sir R. Webster Jan 21, 196. Mr. C. J. Darling, (Personal Explanation) 200; Sir M. Hicks Beach, 200 Jan 21
  Assizes
    Committals to, Qs. Mr. A. O'Connor; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 395
    Cork Winter, Qs. Mr. J. C. Flynn, Mr. Swift MacNeill; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 25, 401
    Liverpool, Housebreaking, Q. Mr. H. Seton-Karr; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 664
  Bacon Trade Dispute, Waterford, Qs. Mr. P. O'Brien; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 26, 504
  Charge of Larceny, Cork, Q. Mr. J. C. Flynn; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1427
  Codification of Laws, Qs. Mr. M. Healy; As. Mr. J. Atkinson, Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 21, 194

[cont.

LAW AND JUSTICE AND POLICE—cont.
  Consolidation of Irish Acts, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 291
  Cork Winter Assizes, Qs. Mr. J. C. Flynn, Mr. Swift MacNeill; [Mr. Speaker;]; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 25, 401
  Escaped Convicts, Qs. Mr. M. Davitt, Mr. E. H. Pickersgill, Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. J. A. Pease; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 21, 188
  Eviction, Leitrim, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1419
  Factory Accident, Batley, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Sir R. Webster Feb 8, 1562
  Fair Rent
    Agreements, Ireland, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1425
    Applications, Monaghan, Qs. Mr. J. Daly, Mr. M. McCartan; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 384
  Housebreaking, Liverpool Assizes, Q. Mr. H. Seton-Karr; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 664
  Illegal Trawling, Scotland, Qs. Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 21, 193. Qs. Mr. D. N. Nicol, Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 28, 675
  Irish
    Land Commission (Buchanan v. Cowell), Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 921
    Resident Magistracy (Major M. Gosselin), Qs. Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1307
  Irish-speaking Witnesses, Q. Mr. P. J. Power; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 403
  Jury Service, Yeomanry Officers, Q. Mr. J. C. H. Hozier; A. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 26, 500
  Law of Evidence (Criminal Cases) Bill (see that Title)
  Leitrim
    Eviction, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1419
    Land Commission, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 673
    Lane-Fox Estate, Qs. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh, Mr. J. C. Flynn; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. J. Atkinson Feb 5, 1423
  Licensed Premises, Advertisements, Q. Mr. S Young; A. Sir R. Webster Feb 4, 1310
  Manslaughter at Manchester, Q. Mr. C. E. Schwann; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 2, 1039
  Mauritius Police, Q. Sir H. S. King; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 26, 510
  Musgrave Street Police Barracks, Belfast, Q. Mr. G. W. Wolff; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1307
  National Portrait Gallery, Police Protection, Q. Lord Balcarres; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 782
  Oaths Act, Scottish Form, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Sir R. Webster Feb 2, 1065
  Payment of Common Jurors, Q. Mr. Lloyd Morgan; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 1, 914
  Petty Sessions
    Castlepollard, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1423
    Donegal, Qs Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1284

[cont.

LAW AND JUSTICE AND POLICE—cont.

- Police
  - Barracks, Musgrave Street, Belfast, Q. Mr. G. W. Wolff; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1307
  - Divisional Commissioners, Ireland, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1281
  - Mauritius, Q. Sir H. S. King; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 26, 510
  - Protection, National Portrait Gallery, Q. Lord Balcarres; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 782
  - Reserve Force, Dublin, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1041
  - Royal Irish Constabulary (see below)
- Prisoners
  - Flogging, Qs. Mr. J. A. Pease, Mr. M. Healy, Mr. J. Morley, Sir W. Lawson, Sir J. F. Leese, Mr. H. E. Kearley; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 22, 280
  - Property Fund, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 4, 1309
  - Treason-felony (see below)
- Prisons
  - Grangegorman, Dublin, Qs. Mr. J. L. Carew, Mr. P. O'Brien; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 383
  - Mountjoy, Health of Prisoner, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 908
  - Northampton, Advertisements, Q. Mr. H. Labouchere; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 8, 1543
  - Officers' Instruction, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 671
  - Service, Ireland, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 921
  - Visiting Committees, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 670
- Royal Irish Constabulary, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 400. Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Mr. G. Balfour, Jan 26, 511. Qs. Mr. J. Daly, Mr. R. M. Dane, Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 671. Qs. Mr. T. Lough, Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1286
- Settled Property, Estate Duty, Q. Captain Pretyman; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1547
- Special Commissioner of Assize (Mr. Darling), Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Sir R. Webster, Jan 21, 196. Mr. C. J. Darling, (Personal Explanation) 200; Sir M. Hicks Beach, 200 Jan 21
- Statutory Term Applications, Ireland, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 29, 793
- Stipendiary Magistrates, Ireland, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 674
- Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 291
- Tenant's Application for Re-instatement, Carlow, Q. Mr. J. Hammond; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 675
- Treason-felony Prisoners
  - Duff, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 667

[cont.

LAW AND JUSTICE AND POLICE—cont.

- Treason-felony Prisoners—cont.
  - Fetherstone and Flanagan, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Sir Matthew White-Ridley Jan 26, 509
  - Queen's Reign, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 28, 690; Feb 5, 1435
- Under-sheriffs, Ireland, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 29, 791
- Unlawful Possession Bill (see that Title)

Law of Evidence (Criminal Cases) Bill

- c. Sir R. Webster, (Motion for leave to Intro.) 268; Mr. T. M. Healy, 268 Jan 21
- Debate Resumed: Mr. T. M. Healy, 874; Sir R. Webster, 875 Jan 29
- Intro., Sir R. Webster; Read 1° Jan 29, 875

Law of Libel Amendment Bill

- c. Intro., Mr. Griffith-Boscawen; Read 1° Jan 22, 299

Lawrence, Mr. E., Cornwall, Truro

- Business of the House: Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1070
- Notice of Motion Jan 27, 602

Lawson, Sir Wilfrid, Bt., Cumberland, Cockermouth

- Arabi Pasha Feb 8, 1546
- Armenian Refugee Killed in London Jan 28, 667
- British South Africa Committee Jan 29, 826
- Business of the House Jan 28, 780
- Flogging Prisoners Jan 22, 282
- Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, House of Commons Committee Jan 29, 882
- Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1195, 1211
- Sale of Intoxicants, Houses of Parliament Jan 21, 197; Feb 5, 1434

Leaseholders' Purchase of Fee Simple Bill

- c. Intro., General Laurie; Read 1° Jan 22, 300

Leaseholders' Purchase of Fee Simple (No. 2) Bill

- c. Intro., Mr. H. E. Kearley; Read 1° Jan 27, 660

Lea, Sir Thomas, Bart., Londonderry, S.

- Assistant County Surveyors (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 302

Lecky, Mr. W. E. Hartpole, Dublin University

- Queen's Speech Jan 22, 313
- Sale of Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill, Intro. June 22, 295
- University Education of Roman Catholics Jan 28, 690

LEESE, Sir JOSEPH F., Lancashire, N.E., Accrington
Flogging Prisoners Jan 22, 282
Members of Parliament (Vacation of Seats) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 297
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 999

LEES, Mr. ELLIOTT, Birkenhead
Parliamentary Elections (Mariners' Votes) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 300

LENG, Sir JOHN, Dundee
Grocers' Certificate (Scotland) Abolition Bill, Intro. Jan 26, 515
Local Government Board, Audit Department Jan 22, 279
Mail Service
  Bag Seals Feb 4, 1272
  Canadian Jan 25, 380
Peterhead Harbour Feb 4, 1272
Queen's Speech Jan 20, 140; Jan 25, 451
Shuttle Guards Jan 25, 379

Licences (Ireland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. D. Crilly; Read 1° Jan 22, 303

Liquor Traffic Local Veto Bill
c. Intro., Mr. T. P. Whittaker; Read 1° Jan 22, 296

Liquor Traffic Local Veto (Scotland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Hedderwick; Read 1° Jan 22, 298

LLOYD-GEORGE, Mr. DAVID, Carnarvon Boroughs
Notice of Motion Jan 27, 602
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 740, 742, 745, 746
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1149

Local Authorities Officers' Superannuation Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. L. Wanklyn; Read 1° Jan 25, 488

Local Government Act (1894) Amendment Bill
c. Intro., Mr. H. Hobhouse; Read 1° Jan 27, 659

Local Government (Aldershot and Farnborough) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Powell-Williams; Read 1° Feb 8, 1639

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD
President—Mr. H. CHAPLIN
Secretary—Mr. T. W. RUSSELL

Agricultural Rates Order, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 28, 687
Audit Department, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 22, 279. Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. G. Balfour Jan 25, 389
Board of Guardians, Belfast, Q. Mr. M. McCartan; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 391
[cont.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—cont.
Children's Metropolitan Asylums Board, Q. Dr. Farquharson; A. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 8, 1548
Cholera Outbreak, s.s. Nubia, Q. Sir B. W. Foster; A. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 22, 288
Cottage Gardens, Qs. Sir C. Dilke; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1281
Elementary Schools, Rating, Qs. Mr. Ellis Griffith; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 8, 1550
Gloucester, Small-pox Epidemic, Qs. Mr. T. Bayley; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1291
Incorporation, Metropolitan Districts, Qs. Mr. T. Lough; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 1, 910
Light Locomotives Act, Traction Engines, Q. Mr. Griffith-Boscawen; A. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 28, 668
Parish
  Council
    Accounts, Q. Sir B. W. Foster; A. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 22, 277
    Elections, Q. Mr. H. C. F. Luttrell; A. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 28, 684. Qs. Sir B. W. Foster; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 2, 1056
  Documents, Q. Mr. J. H. Roberts; A. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 8, 1551
Poor Law Schools
  Metropolis, Qs. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1310; Feb 5, 1433; Feb. 8, 1552
  Report of Departmental Committee, Qs. Mr. G. Drage, Mr. G. C. T. Bartley, Mr. T. Lough; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 1, 902
Port Precautions against Disease, Qs. Sir H. S. King, Sir B. W. Foster; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach, Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 26, 506
Sheffield Cottage Homes for Children, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1309
Small-pox Epidemic, Gloucester, Qs. Mr. T. Bayley; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1291
Traction Engines, Light Locomotives Act, Q. Mr. Griffith-Boscawen; A. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 28, 668
Vaccination
  Laws, Q. General Russell; A. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 8, 1540
  Medical Officers, Q. Sir B. W. Foster; A. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 2, 1043
  Officers' Fees, Q. Mr. L. R. Holland; A. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 1, 923
  Prosecutions, Qs. Mr. J. W. Logan, Mr. T. Lough; As. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 21, 192
  Royal Commission, Qs. Mr. T. Bayley, Dr. Farquharson; As. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 26, 493. Q. Mr. J. W. Logan; A. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 28, 677
Water Supply, Rural Districts, Qs. Sir Cameron Gull; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1274
Weak-minded and Imbecile Children, Q. Mr. J. G. Talbot; A. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1296

Local Government Elections Bill
c. Intro., Mr. H. C. F. Luttrell; Read 1° Jan 28, 780
Read 2° and com. Feb 1, 1026
In Com., Rep. without Amendt. Feb 2, 1172
Read 3° Feb 2, 1172
l. Read 1ª Feb 4, 1243

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 1) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. Atkinson; Read 1° Jan 20, 121

LOCKWOOD, Colonel A., Essex, Epping
Guards (The) in the Mediterranean Feb 8, 1629
Health of Troops in India Jan 25, 397, 398
Wreck of Indian Troopship Warren Hastings Jan 25, 383

LOGAN, Mr. J. W., Leicester, Harborough
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 637, 640
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 712
Sale of Intoxicants, Houses of Parliament Jan 21, 198
Vaccination, Royal Commission Jan 21, 192, 193: Jan 28, 677

London (Borough Road, Southwark) Provisional Order Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Jesse Collings; Read 1° Jan 20, 121

London (Churchway, St. Pancras) Provisional Order Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Jesse Collings; Read 1° Jan 20, 121

London (Clare Market, Strand) Provisional Order Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Jesse Collings; Read 1° Feb 3, 1173

London Water Companies Amalgamation Bill
c. Intro., Sir F. Dixon-Hartland; Read 1° Jan 22, 302

LONG, RIGHT HON. WALTER H. (President of the Board of Agriculture), Liverpool, West Derby
Carriage of Animals, Channel Traffic Jan 22, 289
Dog Muzzling, Metropolis Feb 1, 920

LOUGH, Mr. THOMAS, Islington, W.
Adjournment Feb 5, 1528
Army Estimates
  £145,000 for Pay of Indian Troops at Suakim (Supplementary) Feb 5, 1521
  £255,300 for Volunteer Corps, Capitation Grant (Supplementary) Jan 29, 845
Barracks Act (1890) Feb 8, 1542, 1543
Business of the House
  General Jan 20, 122
  Supply Jan 29, 832
  Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1074
Collection of Licences Feb 4, 1285
Electric Meters Jan 22, 270
Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Jan 21, 199
Gas Meters Jan 22, 271
Incorporation, Metropolitan Districts Feb 1, 910, 911
India Famine and Plague Jan 21, 176, 177
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 616, 620

[cont.

LOUGH, Mr. THOMAS—cont.
Military Works Bill Jan 29, 866, 867; Feb 1, 1020; Feb 8, 1542
Poor Law Schools Feb 1, 904
Privilege Cab System Jan 25, 396
Queen's Speech Jan 21, 244, 245, 246; Jan 25, 455
Royal Irish Constabulary Feb 4, 1286
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1517
Taxation (Ireland) Jan 25, 379
Unlawful Possession Bill, 2R. Jan 29, 878
Vaccination Jan 21, 193
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 1028; Feb 2, 1150, 1151; Feb 8, 1640

LOWTHER, MR. J. W. (Chairman of Committees of Ways and Means and Deputy Speaker), Cumberland, Penrith
Private Bills Feb 2, 1030

(Rulings as Chairman of Committees)
Army Estimates: £255,300 for Volunteer Corps Capitation Grant (Supplementary)
  The Chairman said, the hon. Member would be quite out of order in discussing the general question on that Vote. The hon. Member must strictly confine himself to the limits of the items of the Vote which was then presented to the Committee Jan 29, 843
  The Chairman said: "Order, order! That argument is applicable to the original Vote. It does not apply to this part. The hon. Member must confine himself strictly to this Supplementary Estimate. He must not discuss the general principles of Volunteer Corps or whether the money applied to Volunteer Corps should be applicable to Ireland or not. It does not arise on this Vote." Jan 29, 843
  The Chairman said it would not be in order to discuss that matter, which was not included in the Vote. It was not the capitation grant that came under discussion, only the supplementary grant Jan 29, 845
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government
  The Chairman said: "As I informed the hon. Member the last time he tried to raise that question, it would be distinctly out of order on a Supplementary Estimate" Feb 5, 1489
  The Chairman said: "The matter cannot be discussed on this Vote; it is not relevant. Even if the hon. Member succeeded in diminishing the amount it would not relieve Ireland from contributing her share." Feb 5, 1489
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant)
  The Chairman said: "The hon. Member is not addressing himself to the Amendment. There may be reasons why the Amendment should be accepted, but the hon. Gentleman is not dealing with the Amendment at all. He is urging no reason why it should be accepted in place of the original Motion." Feb 2, 1151

[cont.

LOWTHER, Mr. J. W.—cont.
(Rulings as Chairman of Committees)—cont.
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant)—cont.
The Chairman said: "The process is not so elaborate as the hon. Member seems to think it is. If he will look at Rule I. he will observe that the Closure may be moved 'on the interruption of business.' It was moved on the interruption of business. The interruption of business took place when the hon. Member objected to my putting the Question. That was the interruption of business, and thereupon the Closure was moved according to Rule I. The Question is, That the Question be now put." Feb 2, 1162
Miscellaneous Rulings—Feb 1, 1019; Feb 2, 1155, 1161

LOWTHER, RIGHT HON. JAMES, Kent, Isle of Thanet
Elections, Interference of Peers in Jan 19, 38
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 622, 625, 638
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 750, 753, 754, 755; Feb 2, 1058, 1060
Queen's Speech Jan 22, 373, 374
Reform Prisoners at Pretoria Jan 21, 183

LOYD, Mr. A. K., Berks, Abingdon
Elementary Schools (Parliamentary Grant) Jan 26, 494

LUBBOCK, Right Hon. Sir JOHN, Bart., London University
British South Africa Committee Jan 28, 775; Jan 29, 826
Business of the House: Supply Jan 29, 839
Shops (Early Closing) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 303
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 1000, 1002

LUCAS-SHADWELL, Mr. W., Hastings
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 633
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1142

Lunacy
Alien Pauper Lunatic, Scotland, Q. Sir M. Stewart; A. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 28, 685
District Asylums, Civil Service Retirement, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 386
Insanity, Qs. Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 4, 1282
Weak-minded and Imbecile Children, Q. Mr. J. G. Talbot; A. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1296.

LUTTRELL, Mr. H. C. FOWNES, Devonshire, Tavistock
Inland Money Orders, Feb 5 1428, 1429
Parish Council Elections Jan 28, 684

LYTTELTON, Hon. ALFRED, Warwick and Leamington
Queen's Speech Jan 19, 46

MACALEESE, Mr. D., Monaghan, N.
Divisional Police Commissioners, Ireland Feb 4, 1281
Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland Feb 8, 1545
Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland Feb 1, 911
Newbliss Court-house, Monaghan Feb 4, 1298
Sanitary Accommodation, Clones, Monaghan Feb 5, 1425
Workmistresses, Ireland Feb 8, 1556

MCARTHUR, Mr. W. A., Cornwall, St. Austell
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1498, 1499

MACARTNEY, MR. W. G. ELLISON (Secretary to the Admiralty), Antrim, S.
Belleville Boilers Jan 26, 513
Illegal Trawling, Irish Coast Feb 1, 913
Naval
  Outfit Feb 4, 1292
  Pensions Jan 26, 512
  Repairs, H.M.S. Black Prince Jan 26, 513
  Reserve Jan 26, 509
Troopships, Ballasting Feb 1, 905
Unification of Time at Sea Jan 21, 191

MCCALMONT, General HUGH, Antrim, N.
Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1605

MCCARTAN, Mr. M., Down, S.
Belfast Board of Guardians Jan 25, 391
Fair Rent Applications, Monaghan Jan 25, 384
Judicial Rents, Ireland Jan 21, 180
Land Sub-Commissioners Jan 25, 399
Queen's Speech, Jan 21, 238

MACDONA, Mr. J. CUMMING, Southwark, Rotherhithe
Floating Derelicts Feb 2, 1034
Notice of Motion Jan 27, 602
Parish Registers Bill, Intro. Jan 26, 516
Railway Return Tickets Bill, Intro. Feb 8, 1639

M'HUGH, Mr. P. A., Leitrim, N.
Agricultural Prices, Ireland Feb 2, 1035
Army Contracts, Ireland Jan 29, 788
Catholic University, Ireland Feb 1, 925
Congested Districts Board, Ireland Jan 25, 388
Horse Breeding, Ireland Jan 25, 388
Irish Public Boards, Audit Jan 25, 389
Leitrim
  Eviction Feb 5, 1419
  Land Commission Jan 28, 673
  Lane-Fox Estate Feb 5, 1423
  Road Contracts Feb 5, 1422
Loans to Tenants, Ireland Feb 2, 1044
Newry Board of Guardians Jan 29, 787
Police Reserve Forces, Dublin Feb 2, 1041
Private Bill Legislation Feb 4, 1290
Queen's Speech Jan 21, 210
Royal Irish Constabulary Jan 28, 671
School Teachers' Pensions, Ireland Feb 2, 1049
[cont.

M‘Hugh, Mr. P. A.—cont.
  Sligo
    Post Office Feb 1, 906
    Street Preaching in Jan 26, 498
  Stipendiary Magistrates, Ireland Jan 28, 674
  Technical Education, Ireland Feb 1, 910
  Treasury Loans, Ireland Jan 29, 787
  Unlawful Possession Bill, 2R. Jan 29, 879, 880, 881

McIver, Sir Lewis, Bart., Edinburgh, W.
  Police (Scotland) Law Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 303

McKenna, Mr. R., Monmouthshire, N.
  Dangerous Trades Jan 25, 386
  Notice of Motion Jan 27, 601
  Queen's Speech Jan 26, 560
  Unlawful Possession Bill, 2R. Jan 29, 879

McKillop, Mr. James, Stirlingshire
  Foundry Workers Jan 26, 494

Maclean, Mr. J. M., Cardiff
  British South Africa
    Committee Jan 26, 514; Jan 28, 762; Jan 29, 822
    Company Jan 20, 172
  Indian Famine
    Plague, and Jan 21, 178; Jan 22, 287
    Sale of Silver Jan 26, 507
  Queen's Speech Jan 26, 546, 548
  Reform Prisoners at Pretoria Jan 21, 183; Feb 4, 1296
  Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 651, 652

McLeod, Mr. John, Sutherland
  Mediterranean Garrison, Brigade of Guards Feb 4, 1278
  Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 625
  Queen's Speech Jan 22, 346
  Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1409, 1410

Maclure, Mr. J. W., Lancashire, S.E., Stretford
  Unlawful Possession Bill, 2R. Jan 29, 881

MacNeill, Mr. J. G. Swift, Donegal, S.
  Barracks Act (1890) Feb 8, 1543
  Cork Winter Assizes Jan 25, 402
  Donegal
    Petty Sessions Feb 4, 1284, 1285
    Post Office, Trosses Jan 25, 401
  Experiments on Living Animals Feb 4, 1287, 1288, 1289; Feb 5, 1431
  Irish Resident Magistracy Feb 4, 1307
  Lighthouse Keepers Feb 2, 1064
  Loan Fund Board, Ireland Jan 21, 191
  Queen's
    Reign (Treason-felony Prisoners) Jan 28, 690; Feb 5, 1435
    Speech Jan 21, 262
  Relief of Kassala Feb 8, 1557, 1558
  Royal Irish Constabulary Jan 25, 400, 401; Jan 26, 511; Feb 4, 1286
  Special Commissioner of Assize (Mr. Darling) Jan 21, 196, 197
  Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1161

Manhood Suffrage (Ireland) Bill
  c. Intro., Mr. J. H. Parnell: Read 1° Jan 22, 302

Maple, Sir J. Blundell, Camberwell, Dulwich
  School Board for London (Elections) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 297

Marine Insurance Bill
  l. Pres., Lord Herschell; Read 1ª Feb 4, 1241

Marks, Mr. Harry H., Tower Hamlets, St. George's in the East
  Labour Department, Local Correspondents Feb 1, 922
  Rating of Government Property, London Feb 4, 1308
  Service Franchise Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 294

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill
  c. Intro., Mr. A. Spicer; Read 1° Jan 22, 297

Married Persons Small Industrial Incomes (Tax Relief) Bill
  c. Intro., Mr. G. C. T. Bartley; Read 1° Feb 1, 1027

Massey-Mainwaring, Hon. W. F. B., Finsbury, Central
  South Kensington Museum Feb 1, 923

Members of Parliament (Vacation of Seats) Bill
  c. Intro., Sir J. F. Leese; Read 1° Jan 22, 297

Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill
  c. Intro., Sir H. Vincent; Read 1° Jan 22, 302
    2R., Sir H. Vincent, 602, 604, 608, 611, 616, 618, 620, 632, 640, 641, 642; Sir J. Woodhouse, 604; Mr. A. F. Godson, 605; Mr. Ritchie, 605, 608, 609; Mr. J. Bryce, 608, 609, 618; Mr. T. P. Whittaker, 610, 611; Sir A. K. Rollit, 613, (Motion) 616, 620; Mr. T. Lough, 616, 620; [Mr. Speaker, 616, 619, 644;] Mr. W. Field, 616; Sir W. Harcourt, 617, 618; Sir F. S. Powell, 619; (Motion withdrawn, 620); Mr. R. Purvis, 622; Mr. J. Lowther, 622, 625, 638; Mr. J. McLeod, 625; Mr. A. J. Mundella, 626, 628; Mr. Gibson Bowles, 628; Mr. F. A. Channing, 631; Mr. J. Kenyon, 631; Colonel Milward, 631, 632; Mr. G. Kemp, 633; Mr. Lucas-Shadwell, 633; Mr. A. F. Jeffreys, 635; Mr. G. Whiteley, 635; Mr. J. W. Logan, 637, 640; Sir W. Hart Dyke, 638; Mr. Jesse Collings, 640, 641, 642; (Division, 644) Jan 27
    2R. negatived Jan 27, 644

MERCHANT SHIPPING
  Balintore Harbour, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1269
  Carriage of Animals, Channel Traffic, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. W. Long Jan 22, 289
  Cholera Outbreak, s.s. Nubia, Q. Sir B. W. Foster; A. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 22, 288
  Coal Shipments, Q. Mr. D. A. Thomas; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 26, 496

[cont.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—cont.

- Collisions at Sea
  - New Regulations, Q. Mr. Gibson Bowles; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 29, 795
  - Steamship Siren with H.M. Gunboat Landrail, Q. Mr. J. Gilhooly; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 28, 677
- Colour-blind Tests, Sailors, Qs. Mr. W. Ambrose, Mr. G. W. Wolff; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 907
- Costa Rica Packet Case, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Curzon Jan 26, 498
- Daunt's Rock Lightship, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. W. Field; As. Mr. Akers-Douglas Jan 21, 181. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Mr. T. Harrington; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 22, 273. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 405. Qs. Mr. W. Field, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 28, 672
- Dublin Port and Docks Bill, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 29, 794
- Dublin, Port Charges, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. J. L. Carew; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 279
- Duty on Scotch Herrings, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 2, 1039
- Harbours
  - Balintore, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1269
  - Peterhead, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1272
  - Port Ness, Island of Lewis, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1269
  - Royal Canal, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1275
- Illegal
  - Supply of Seamen, Glasgow, Q. Mr. J. G. A. Baird; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1283
  - Trawling
    - Cork, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. P. J. Power; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1559
    - Irish Coast, Qs. Mr. J. Gilhooly, Captain Donelan, Colonel Waring; As. Mr. Macartney, Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 913. Q. Colonel Waring; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1056
    - Penalties, Qs. Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 21, 193
    - Scotland, Qs. Mr. D. N. Nicol, Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 28, 675. Qs. Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1036; Feb 4, 1287
- Injuries to Workmen, Foreign Shipowners, Q. Mr. J. F. Flannery; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 685
- Irish Lights Board, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Akers-Douglas Jan 21, 190. Qs. Mr. W. Field; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. J. Atkinson, Mr. Ritchie Jan 22, 290. Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 29, 785
- Island of Lewis
  - Port Ness Harbour, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1269
  - Tiumpan Head Lighthouse, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1048
- Lighthouse
  - Keepers, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill, General Laurie; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1064
  - Tiumpan Head, Island of Lewis, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1048

[cont.

MERCHANT SHIPPING—cont.

- Lightship, Daunt's Rock, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. W. Field; As. Mr. Akers-Douglas Jan 21, 181. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Mr. T. Harrington; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 22, 273. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 405. Qs. Mr. W. Field, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 28, 672
- Loss of Life at Sea, Mercantile Marine, Qs. Colonel Denny, Mr. J. Havelock Wilson; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1300
- Mail Contract Subsidies, Q. Mr. Henniker Heaton; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 919
- Mercantile Marine
  - Classification, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 919
  - Loss of Life at Sea, Qs. Colonel Denny, Mr. J. Havelock Wilson; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1300
- Missing Steamer, State of Georgia, Q. Mr. J. Bryce; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 28, 689
- North Sea Convention, Qs. Mr. J. G. Weir, Captain Sinclair; As. Mr. Graham Murray, Mr. Curzon Feb 8, 1539
- Peterhead Harbour, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1272
- Pollen Fishery, Lough Neagh, Qs. Mr. P. C. Doogan, Mr. J. Dillon; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 912
- Port Charges, Dublin, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. J. L. Carew; As. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 279
- Port Ness Harbour, Island of Lewis, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1269
- Quarantine, Qs. Sir W. Wedderburn, Sir B. W. Foster; As. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 5, 1420
- Royal Canal Harbour, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1275
- Shipping
  - Maritime Property, and (Compensation for Injury), Q. Sir J. Colomb; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 1, 925
  - Masters at Antwerp, Q. Mr. T. P. Whittaker; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 1, 900
- Siren, Steamship, Collision with H.M. Gunboat Landrail, Q. Mr. J. Gilhooly; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 28, 677
- State of Georgia, Missing Steamer, Q. Mr. J. Bryce; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 28, 689
- Tiumpan Head Lighthouse, Island of Lewis, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1048

Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill

- c. Intro., Mr. W. Field; Read 1° Jan 27, 660

METHUEN, Lord

- Army, Increase of Strength Feb 4, 1263

METROPOLIS

- Armenian Refugee Killed in London, Qs. Sir W. Lawson, Mr. J. O'Kelly; As. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 28, 667
- Bethnal Green, St. Jude's School, Q. Mr. A. E. Hutton; A. Sir J. Gorst Jan 25, 385
- Birth Certificates, Q. Mr. E. Boulnois; A. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 28, 663
- British Museum Staff, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1046

[cont.

METROPOLIS—cont.
Cab Licences, Q. Mr. T. G. Fardell; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Feb 1, 908
Children's Metropolitan Asylums Board, Q. Dr. Farquharson; A. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 8, 1548
Dog Muzzling, Q. Dr. Farquharson; A. Mr. W. Long Feb 1, 920
Hours of Polling, Q. Mr. F. W. Wilson; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 4, 1312
Houses of Parliament
  Members' Smoking Accommodation (Commons), Qs. Mr. G. Wolff, Mr. Rees Davies; As. Mr. Akers-Douglas Feb 4, 1302
  Sale of Intoxicants, Qs. Sir W. Lawson, Mr. J. W. Logan, Mr. T. Bayley; As. Sir R. Webster Jan 21, 197. Qs. Sir W. Lawson; As. Lord Stanley, Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 5, 1434
Incorporation, Metropolitan Districts, Qs. Mr. T. Lough; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 1, 910
Mall, Condition of Road, Q. Mr. C. J. Monk; A. Mr. Akers-Douglas Feb 8, 1540
Metropolitan Railway, Ventilation, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1276
National
  Gallery and British Museum, Sundays, Qs. Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1293
  Portrait Gallery, Police Protection, Q. Lord Balcarres; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 782
Poor Law Schools, Qs. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1310; Feb 5, 1433; Feb 8, 1552
Privilege Cab System, Q. Mr. T. Lough; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 396
Rating of Government Property, Qs. Mr. H. H. Marks; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1308
South Kensington Museum, Qs. Mr. Massey-Mainwaring; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 923
Willesden, St. Andrew's School, Qs. Mr. J. H. Yoxall, Mr. A. J. Mundella; As. Sir J. Gorst Feb 2, 1043
Wimbledon Elementary Schools, Q. Mr. J. C. Williams; A. Sir J. Gorst Feb 4, 1289

Metropolitan Police
Sessional Order (c.) Jan 19, 39

Metropolitan Police Provisional Order Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Jesse Collings; Read 1° Feb 3, 1173

Military Forces (Maintenance)
On Motion, That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair: Sir C. Dilke, (Amendt.) 1565, 1569, 1586, 1587, 1589; Mr. Brodrick, 1569, 1582, 1586, 1587, 1589, 1605; Major Rasch, 1578; Sir H. Havelock-Allan, 1591; Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, 1593, 1597; Mr. G. J. Goschen, 1597; Mr. A. M. Brookfield, 1598; Sir J. Colomb, 1601; General McCalmont, 1605; Sir E. T. Gourley, 1608; Colonel Sandys, 1609, 1611; [Mr. Speaker, 1611, 1614;] Captain Pirie, 1611, 1614; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1615; Mr. Arnold-Forster, 1615; Mr. W. Allan, 1618; Colonel Welby, 1619; Mr. T. C. T. Warner, 1622; General Russell, 1623; Mr. R. G. Webster, 1624; (Division, 1626) Feb 8

Military Lands Act (1892) Amendment Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Brodrick; Read 1° Feb 1, 926

Military Works Bill (Schedule of Proposed Works)
Copy Pres. (c.) Feb 1, 1027

Military Works Bill
c. In Com., Mr. Brodrick, (Motion) 848, 867, 872; Sir C. Dilke, 860; Sir J. Colomb, 862; Mr. T. Lough, 866, 867; General Laurie, 869; Mr. W. Allan, 870; Colonel Welby, 871, 872; Mr. J. G. Weir, 873. Motion Agreed to, 874 Jan 29
On Rep. of Reso.: Mr. T. Lough, 1020; Mr. Brodrick, 1020; Sir C. Dilke, 1021; Sir J. Colomb, 1022; Sir W. Harcourt, 1022; Sir M. Hicks Beach, 1023; Mr. J. Dillon, 1023; Mr. H. E. Kearley, 1024; Mr. Vesey Knox, 1024; Dr. Tanner, 1024; (Division, 1024) Feb 1
Reso. Agreed to Feb 1, 1024
Intro., Mr. Brodrick; Read 1° Feb 1, 1025
(For Questions see ARMY)

Militia Bill
c. Intro., Major Rasch; Read 1° Jan 22, 301

MILWARD, Colonel VICTOR, Warwickshire, Stratford-on-Avon
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 631, 632
Parcels Post, Switzerland Jan 28, 666

Mines (Eight Hours) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. W. Allen; Read 1° Jan 22, 294

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS
Birth Certificates, Q. Mr. E. Boulnois; A. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 28, 663
Cathedral Maintenance, Q. Mr. J. C. Williams; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 21, 198
Emigrants' Information Office, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 26, 503
Episcopal Elections, Discreditable Scenes, Q. Mr. H. S. Foster; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 4, 1312
International Monetary Conference, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 25, 409
Licensed Premises, Advertisements, Q. Mr. S. Young; A. Sir R. Webster Feb 4, 1310
Patented Inventions, Q, Mr. W. O'Malley; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 914
Queen's
  Diamond Jubilee, Visit of Colonial Premiers, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 1, 924
  Reign
    Colonies, Q. Sir G. Baden-Powell; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 29, 800
    Elementary Schools, Q. Mr. W. Johnston; A. Sir J. Gorst Jan 25, 387
    Gifts of Real Property, Q. Sir J. T. Brunner; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 5, 1435
    Treason-felony Prisoners, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill; As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 28, 690; Feb 5, 1435

[cont.

MISCELLANEOUS QUESTIONS—cont.
  Rating of Government Property, London, Qs. Mr. H. H. Marks; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1308
  Royal
    Bounty Fund: George Brooks, Qs. Mr. M. Davitt, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 8, 1562
    Patriotic Fund, Q. Mr. H. E. Kearley; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 2, 1066
    Residence in Ireland, Q. Mr. R. M. Dane; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 4, 1311
  Secret Service Fund, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 22, 292
  South Kensington Museum, Qs. Mr. Massey-Mainwaring; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 923
  Turkish Loans, Q. Mr. P. J. Stanhope; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 29, 799

Monk, Mr. C. J., Gloucester
  County Courts Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 299
  Mall, Condition of Road Feb 8, 1540
  Military Works Bill Feb 8, 1541

Monkswell, Lord
  Army, Increase of Strength Feb 4, 1265

Monteagle, Lord
  Queen's Speech Jan 19, 35

More, Mr. R. Jasper, Shropshire, Ludlow
  Corn Sales Feb 4, 1297

Morgan, Mr. J. Lloyd, Carmarthenshire, W.
  Payment of Common Jurors Feb 1, 914
  Peasant Freeholders, Wales Jan 26, 489

Morley, Mr. Charles, Brecknockshire
  Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 979

Morley, Right Hon. John, Montrose Burghs
  Advance to the Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1430
  Flogging Prisoners Jan 22, 281
  Queen's Speech Jan 21, 216; Jan 22, 325
  Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1449, 1452, 1455, 1475, 1488, 1489

Morton, Mr. E. J. C., Devonport
  Business of the House: Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1068

Mundella, Right Hon. A. J., Sheffield, Brightside
  Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 626, 628
  Metric System Feb 4, 1276
  Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 755
  St. Andrew's School, Willesden Feb 2, 1043
  Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1313

Municipal Elections (Ireland) (Women) Bill
  c. Intro., Mr. W. Johnston; Read 1° Jan 22, 300

Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Bill
  c. Intro., Mr. Engledow; Read 1° Jan 22, 298

Municipal Franchise (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill
  c. Intro., Mr. J. L. Carew; Read 1° Jan 22, 301

Murnaghan, Mr. G., Tyrone, Mid
  Boards of Guardians and Labourers (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 298
  Queen's Speech Jan 20, 128; Jan 21, 235; Jan 26, (Amendt.) 565, 567

MURRAY, Right Hon. A. GRAHAM (Lord Advocate), Buteshire
  Alien Pauper Lunatic, Scotland Jan 28, 686
  Balintore Harbour Feb 4, 1269
  Congested Districts (Highlands and Islands, Scotland) Bill Feb 2, 1048
  Crofters Act (1886) Feb 2, 1049
  Elementary Schools, Scotland Feb 2, 1048
  Government Bills Jan 19, 42
  Harbours
    Balintore Feb 4, 1269
    Peterhead Feb 4, 1272
    Port Ness, Island of Lewis Feb 4, 1269
  Illegal
    Supply of Seamen Feb 4, 1284
    Trawling, Scotland Jan 21, 193, 194; Jan 28, 675, 676; Feb 2, 1036; Feb 4, 1287
  Jury Service, Yeomanry Officers Jan 26, 500
  Local Government Board, Audit Department Jan 22, 279
  North Sea Convention Feb 8, 1539
  Parish Councillors, Scotland Jan 25, 396
  Parochial Board of Sanquhair Feb 1, 919
  Peterhead Harbour Feb 4, 1272
  Port Ness Harbour, Island of Lewis Feb 4, 1269
  Public Health (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Jan 25, 488
  Queen's Speech Jan 22, 349, 351, 355
  School
    Boards, Scotland Feb 2, 1044
    Text-books, Scotland Feb 8, 1539
  Trusts (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Feb 4, 1314

National Museum (Wales)
  Mr. Alfred Thomas (Notice of Motion) Jan 26, 489

NAVY
  First Lord—Mr. G. J. Goschen
  Secretary—Mr. W. G. E. Macartney
  Civil Lord—Mr. J. Austen Chamberlain

  Admiralty Charts, Q. Mr. Gibson Bowles; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 26, 491
  Belleville Boilers, Q. Mr. W. Allan; A. Mr. Macartney Jan 26, 513

[cont.

NAVY—cont.
  Boat Accidents, Q. Mr. Gibson Bowles; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 28, 665
  Collision at Sea, H.M. Gunboat Landrail and and s.s. Siren, Q. Mr. J. Gilhooly; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 28, 677
  Dartmouth, Naval College, Q. Admiral Field; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 26, 497
  H.M.S. Black Prince, Naval Repairs, Q. Captain Donelan; A. Mr. Macartney Jan 26, 513
  Illegal Trawling, Irish Coast, Qs. Mr. J. Gilhooly, Captain Donelan, Colonel Waring; As. Mr. Macartney, Mr. G. Balfour Feb 1, 913
  Lee-Metford Rifle, Royal Marines, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Austen Chamberlain Jan 29, 796
  Missing Steamer, State of Georgia, Q. Mr. J. Bryce; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 28, 689
  Naval
    College, Dartmouth, Q. Admiral Field; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 26, 497
    Examining Boards, Q. Mr. Gibson Bowles; A. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 26, 500
    Outfit, Q. Mr. H. E. Kearley; A. Mr. Macartney Feb 4, 1292
    Pensions, Q. Mr. R. G Webster; A. Mr. Macartney Jan 26, 512
    Repairs, H.M.S. Black Prince, Q. Captain Donelan; A. Mr. Macartney Jan 26, 513
  Rams of Warships, Qs. Mr. Gibson Bowles; As. Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 26, 491
  Royal Naval Reserve, Qs. Mr. W. Field, Mr. R. G. Webster; As. Mr. Macartney, Mr. G. J. Goschen Jan 26, 508
  Training Ship, Belfast Lough, Q. Mr. S. Young; A. Mr. Austen Chamberlain Jan 29, 789
  Troopships (Ballasting), Q. Mr. Vicary Gibbs; A. Mr. Macartney Feb 1, 904

NICOL, Mr. DONALD N., Argyllshire
  Illegal Trawling Jan 28, 675

NORTHBROOK, Earl of
  Indian Famine Feb 1, 896

NORTHCOTE, Hon. Sir STAFFORD, Bart., Exeter
  Registration of Firms Bill, Intro. Feb 5, 1436

O'BRIEN, Mr. J. F. X., Cork City
  Queen's Speech Jan 20, 136

O'BRIEN, Mr. PATRICK, Kilkenny City
  British South Africa Committee Jan 29, 823
  Customs Outdoor Officers, Ireland Feb 4, 1294
  Dog Licences Feb 1, 909
  Finner Rifle Range, Donegal Feb 2, 1063; Feb 8, 1536
  Grangegorman Prison, Dublin Jan 25, 383
  Insanity Feb 4, 1282
  Irish Mail Service Jan 25, 395; Feb 4, 1279, 1280
  Mountjoy Prison, Health of Prisoner Feb 1, 908
  National Board of Education, Ireland Jan 25, 391

[cont.

O'BRIEN, Mr. P.—cont.
  Poor Law Franchise (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 301
  Queen's Speech Jan 19, 120; Jan 20, 123
  Secret Service Fund Jan 22, 292
  Treason-felony Prisoners Jan 28, 667
  Waterford Bacon Trade Dispute Jan 26, 504, 505

Occupying Tenants' Enfranchisement (Purchase of Fee Simple) Bill
  c. Intro., Mr. G. C. T. Bartley; Read 1° Feb 1, 1027

O'CONNOR, Mr. ARTHUR, Donegal, E.
  Agricultural Distress, Westport Union Jan 21, 175
  Army Retired Pay Feb 8, 1554
  Committals to Assizes Jan 25, 395, 396
  Loan Fund Board, Ireland Jan 21, 192
  Taxation, Ireland Jan 25, 379

O'CONNOR, Mr. JAMES, Wicklow, W.
  Convicts, Escaped Jan 21, 189
  Irish
    Lights Board Feb 1, 915
    Resident Magistracy Feb 4, 1307
  Local Government, Ireland Feb 1, 922

O'CONNOR, Mr. T. P., Liverpool, Scotland
  Royal Bounty Fund: George Brooks Feb 8, 1563

O'KEEFFE, Mr. F. A., Limerick
  Askeaton and Kilmallock Abbeys Jan 22, 270
  Irish Militia Jan 28, 677
  Limerick
    Military Barracks Jan 22, 280
    Post Office Jan 21, 178
  Protection of Ancient Monuments, Ireland Jan 29, 797
  Queen's Speech Jan 20, 139
  Solicitors' Licence Duty, Ireland Jan 26, 495
  Telegraph Facilities, Limerick Jan 29, 790

O'KELLY, Mr. JAMES, Roscommon, N.
  Armenian Refugee Killed in London Jan 28, 667
  Land Law (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 300
  Purchase of Holdings, Ireland Feb 1, 906
  Queen's Speech Jan 21, 243

Old Age Provident Pensions Bill
  c. Intro., Mr. G. C. T. Bartley; Read 1° Jan 26, 516

O'MALLEY, Mr. W., Galway, Connemara
  Connemara
    Distress Jan 25, 385
    Evictions Feb 2, 1036
  Patented Inventions Feb 1, 914
  Queen's Speech Jan 21, 250

ONSLOW, EARL OF (Under Secretary of State for India)
  Indian Famine Feb 1, 894, 899; Feb 8, 1532

Outdoor Provident Relief Bill
c. Intro., Mr. G. C. T. Bartley; Read 1° Jan 26, 516

Outlawries Bill
c. Read 1° Jan 19, 39

Parish Registers Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. C. Macdona; Read 1° Jan 26, 516

Parliament.

LORDS

Meeting of Parliament Jan 19
The Session of Parliament opened by Commission

Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech
Delivered by the Lord Chancellor

Roll of the Lords—Delivered Jan 19, 6

The Queen's Speech having been Reported by the Lord Chancellor: An Address to Her Majesty thereon Moved by the Marquess of Bath, the Motion being Seconded by Lord Kenyon Jan 19, 6

Address in Answer
Jan 19—Marquess of Bath, 6; Lord Kenyon, 9; Earl of Kimberley, 12, 18, 28; Marquess of Salisbury, 18, 25, 28; Lord Castletown, 35; Lord Monteagle, 35; Address Agreed to nemine dissentiente, 36
Jan 28—Her Majesty's Answer to the Address—Reported, 661

Business of the House
Adjournment — Marquess of Salisbury (Motion) Jan 21, 173. Marquess of Salisbury, (Motion) 662; Earl of Kimberley, 662 Jan 28

Committees
Appeal—Appointed Jan 19, 36
Chairman—The Earl of Morley appointed, nemine dissentiente, to take the Chair in all Committees of this House for this Session Jan 19, 36
House of Lords Offices, Select—Appointed Feb 4, 1242
Journals, Sub-Committee for the—Appointed Jan 19, 36
Privileges—Appointed Jan 19, 36
Selection—Appointed Feb 4, 1242; Feb 5, 1417
Standing—Ordered Feb 4, 1242
Standing Orders—Appointed Feb 4, 1241
Statute Law Revision Bills, etc., Joint—Resolved, That it is desirable to Appoint, and Message sent to Commons to Acquaint therewith, and to desire their Concurrence Jan 28, 661
Seven Lords Appointed, and Message sent to Commons to Acquaint therewith, and to request them to Appoint Seven of that House to be joined with them Feb 2, 1029

[cont.

PARLIAMENT—Lords—cont.
Miscellaneous
Stoppages in the Streets—Order to Prevent, Renewed Jan 19, 36

Peers Introduced
Jan 19—Augustus Lord Bishop of Lichfield
Frederick Lord Archbishop of Canterbury
Mandell Lord Bishop of London

Representative Peers for Ireland
Limerick, Earl of, Claim to Vote Read and Referred to Lord Chancellor Jan 28, 661

Sat First
Jan 19—Marquess of Bath, after the death of his father
Earl Sondes, after the death of his father

COMMONS

Address in Answer to Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech
Jan 19—The Queen's Speech having been reported by Mr. SPEAKER: An humble Address thereon Moved by Viscount Folkestone, 42; and Seconded by Mr. A. Lyttelton, 46. Debate: Sir W. Harcourt, 49, 54, 76, 79; Sir M. Hicks Beach, 54; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 71, 76, 77, 78, 80; Mr. E. Blake, 77, 80; Mr. T. M. Healy, 77; Mr. J. Dillon, 77; Mr. S. Smith, 80; Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett, 83; Mr. H. Broadhurst, 86; Mr. D. H. Coghill, 88; Mr. H. Labouchere, 92; Sir C. Dilke, 93, 97; Lord G. Hamilton, 97; Mr. J. Bryce, 98; Mr. Curzon, 98, 101, 119, 120; Mr. F. S. Stevenson, 101; Mr. R. Pierpoint, 102; Mr. J. J. Clancy, 103; Mr. Gibson Bowles, 104; Mr. J. C. Rickett, 107; Major Rasch, 109; Mr. T. R. Buchanan, 110; Mr. J. A. Pease, (Amendt. Slavery in Zanzibar) 112; Mr. T. Bayley, 118; Mr. Sydney Buxton, 119; (Amendt. withdrawn, 120); Mr. P. O'Brien, 120; Mr. J. Chambelrain, 120
Jan 20—Debate Resumed: Mr. P. O'Brien, (Amendt. Treason-felony Prisoners) 123; Mr. J. C. Flynn 126; Mr. G. Murnaghan, 128; Mr. J. J. Clancy, 129, 131; [Mr. Speaker, 131, 134, 135, 147, 153;] Mr. J. Tully, 132; Mr. H. J. Wilson, 133; Mr. T. M. Healy, 134, 135, 147; Mr. J. O'Brien, 136; Mr. W. Field, 136; Mr. W. Abraham (Cork), 138; Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe, 139; Sir J. Leng, 140; Sir Matthew White Ridley, 142 147, 152, 153; Mr. T. Harrington, 148; Mr. M. Davitt, 151, 152, 153;

[cont.

PARLIAMENT—Commons—cont.

Address in Answer to Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech—cont.

Mr. T. D. Sullivan, 154; Dr. Tanner, 154; (Division, 156); Mr. J. Dillon, (Amendt. Agriculture in Ireland) 157, 161; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 161; Mr. J. Daly, 170

Jan 21—Debate Resumed on Mr. Dillon's Amendt.: Mr. J. Daly, 202; Mr. G. Drage, 203; Mr. R. M. Dane, 206; Mr. D. Kilbride, 206; Mr. P. A. M'Hugh, 210; Mr. J. Atkinson, 215, 216, 217, 245; Mr. J. Dillon, 215; Mr. J. Morley, 216; Mr. J. J. Clancy, 216, 229, 233; Mr. Serjeant Hemphill, 222; Mr. T. M. Healy, 225, 227; [Mr. Speaker, 226, 227, 239, 246;] Mr. M. Davitt, 233; Mr. J. Tully, 233; Mr. G. Murnaghan, 235; Mr. W. Field, 236; Mr. P. C. Doogan, 237; Mr. M. McCartan, 238; Mr. J. P. Farrell, 239; Mr. J. O'Kelly, 243; Mr. T. Lough, 244, 245, 246; Major Jameson, 249; Mr. W. O'Malley, 250; Mr. D. Sheehy, 251; Dr. R. Ambrose, 253; (Division, 256); Mr. Engledow, (Amendt. Catholic University Education in Ireland) 257; Mr. Swift MacNeill, 262; Mr. W. Johnston, 267; Mr. T. Harrington, 268

Jan 22—Debate Resumed on Mr. Engledow's Amendt.: Mr. T. Harrington, 305, 308, 309, 320; Mr. W. Johnston, 308, 309; Mr. W. E. H. Lecky, 313; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 319, 320, 330, 362, 370; Mr. J. Morley, 325; Mr. Vesey Knox, 327, 330; Mr. T. M. Healy, 331, 333, 334, 366; Mr. E. H. Carson, 333, 334; Mr. Engledow, 335; (Amendt. withdrawn, 335); Mr. J. G. Weir, (Amendt. Crofters in Scotland) 335, 351; Mr. J. Caldwell, 341; Dr. Farquharson, 343; Mr. J. McLeod, 346; Mr. M. Davitt, 347, 351, 376; Mr. Hedderwick, 348; Mr. J. Colville, 349; Mr. Graham Murray, 349, 351, 355; Dr. G. B. Clark, 352; Sir W. Wedderburn, 355; Mr. A. D. Provand, 356; (Division, 358); Sir H. Howorth, (Amendt. Dynamitards' Release) 359, 362, 366, 368; [Mr. Speaker, 367;] Mr. J. Lowther, 373, 374; Sir Matthew White Ridley, 373, 374

Jan 25—Debate Resumed on Sir H. Howorth's Amendt.: Mr. M. Davitt, 411; Sir Matthew White Ridley, 418, 428; Mr. H. H. Asquith, 425, 428; Mr. J. Dillon, 427, 428; Mr. Sydney Gedge, 428; Sir H. Howorth, 429; [Mr. Speaker, 430, 457;] Mr. T. M. Healy, 430; (Amendt. negatived, 431); Mr. H. E. Kearley, (Amendt. Food Products) 431, 443, 457; Mr. A. F. Jeffreys, 435; Mr. M. Healy, 436; Mr. Radcliffe Cooke, 440; Mr. T. W. Russell, 441, 443; Sir B. W. Foster, 444; Mr. G. Lambert, 446; General Laurie, 449; Mr F. A. Channing, 449; Sir J. Leng, 451; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 454, 457; Mr. T. Lough, 455; (Amendt. negatived, 457); Mr. E. Strachey, 457; Mr. J. H. Wilson, (Amendt. Manning of British Merchant Vessels) 458, 481, 482, 487; Mr. A. D. Provand, 471; Sir A. B. Forwood, 473, 474, 475, 486; Mr. J. Burns, 474; Sir C. Dilke, 475; Mr. Ritchie, 480, 481, 482; Mr. A. F. Warr, 483; Dr. G. B. Clark, 485, 486; (Amendt. withdrawn, 487)

Jan 26—Debate Resumed: Sir W. Wedderburn, (Amendt. Indian Famine) 517, 528, 533; Mr. H. J. Wilson, 520; Sir J. Fergusson, 522; Mr. J. H. Roberts, 525; Mr. Bhownaggree, 527, 528, 531, 549, 550; Mr. C. E. Schwann, 531; Lord G. Hamilton, 532, 534; Sir H. Fowler, 541; Mr. J. M, Maclean, 546, 548; [Mr. Speaker. 548, 550, 567, 584, 596;] Dr. G. B. Clark, 549, 550; (Division, 552); Mr. T. M. Healy, 553; Mr. E. Strachey, (Amendt. Registration Laws) 554; Mr. J. Brigg, 558; Mr. R. G. Webster, 560; Mr. R. McKenna, 560; Mr. T. W. Russell, 561; Sir A. K. Rollit, 562; Sir C. Dilke, 564; (Division, 564); Mr. G. Murnaghan, (Amendt. Deportation of Paupers) 565, 567; Mr. J. P. Farrell, 568; Mr. J. Daly, 568; Mr. P. J. Power, 571; Mr. G. Balfour, 571; Mr. Serjeant Hemphill, 573; Mr. J. J. Clancy, 574; Sir M. J. Stewart, 575, 576; Mr. J. Caldwell, 575, 576; Mr. W. Field, 576; Mr. P. C. Doogan, 576; (Amendt. withdrawn, 577); Mr. Disraeli, (Amendt. Ottoman Empire Reforms) 577, 588, 589; Mr. F. G. Banbury, 579; Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett, 579, 584, 586, 590; Mr. Curzon, 585, 586, 588, 589, 590; Sir W. Harcourt, 591: Mr. A. J. Balfour, 593; Mr. Gibson Bowles, 595, 596; (Amendt. withdrawn, 597). Address Agreed to, 597

Feb 3—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS—Reported, 173

Business of the House and Public Business

Adjournment—Sir W. Harcourt, 780: Mr. A. J. Balfour, 780; Sir W. Lawson, 780; Dr. Tanner, 780 Jan 28

Mr. T. Lough, 1528; Mr. Hanbury, 1528 Feb 5

[cont. [cont.

PARLIAMENT—Commons—cont.

- Business of the House and Public Business—cont.
  - Ballot for Bills and Notices of Motions—Mr. A. J. Balfour (Notice of Motion) Jan 19, 41
    Mr. A. J. Balfour, (Motion) 122; Mr. T. M. Healy, 122; Mr. T. Lough, 122; (Motion as Amended Agreed to, 123) Jan 20
  - Business of the House—Mr. A. J. Balfour, 599, 600; Dr. Clark, 600 Jan 26
    Qs. Sir W. Harcourt, Sir J. Colomb, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 8, 1563
  - Egyptian Expedition—Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1067; Sir C. Dilke, 1067 Feb 2
  - Government Bills—Mr. A. J. Balfour, (Notice of Motion) 41; Sir Matthew White Ridley, (Notice of Motion) 41; Sir R. Webster, (Notice of Motion) 41; Mr. Brodrick, (Notice of Motion) 41; Mr. G. Balfour, (Notice of Motion) 42; Mr. Graham Murray, (Notice of Motion) 42 Jan 19
  - Introduction of Bills—[Mr. Speaker, 201] Jan 21
  - Notices of Motion—Sir C. Dilke, 601, 602; Mr. R. McKenna, 601; Mr. Gibson Bowles, 601; Dr. G. B. Clark, 601; Mr. E. Lawrence, 602; Mr. J. C. Macdona, 602; Mr. D. Lloyd-George, 602 Jan 27
  - Private Bills—Order of Consideration Feb 2, 1030
  - Reports of Money Committees—Mr. A. J. Balfour (Motion) Jan 29, 848
  - Standing Orders
    - Alteration of Order LVI—Mr. A. J. Balfour, (Motion) 800; (Agreed to) Jan 29
    - Suspension of Order XI—Mr. A. J. Balfour, (Motion) 800; (Agreed to) Jan 29
  - Supply
    - Irish Estimates—On Motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair: Sir C. Dilke, (Amendt.) 1565, 1569, 1586, 1587, 1589; Mr. Brodrick, 1569, 1582, 1586, 1587, 1589, 1605; Major Rasch, 1578; Sir H. Havelock-Allan, 1591; Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, 1593, 1597; Mr. G. J. Goschen, 1597; Mr. A. M. Brookfield, 1598; Sir J. Colomb, 1601; General McCalmont, 1605; Sir E. T. Gourley, 1608; Colonel Sandys, 1609, 1611; [Mr. Speaker, 1611, 1614;] Captain Pirie, 1611, 1614; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1615; Mr. Arnold-Forster, 1615; Mr. W. Allan, 1618; Colonel Welby, 1619; Mr. T. C. T. Warner, 1622; General Russell, 1623; Mr. R. G. Webster, 1624; (Division, 1626;) Colonel Lockwood, (Amendt.) 1629; Lord A. Compton, 1632; Captain Bagot, 1635; (Adj.) Feb 8
      Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 4, 1311
    - Order of Last Session, Q. Mr. T. R. Buchanan; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 21, 200
    - Point of Order—Mr. Gibson Bowles, 1437; [Mr. Speaker, 1438] Feb 5
    - Resolution and Order—Jan 26, 598

[cont.

PARLIAMENT—Commons—cont.

- Business of the House and Public Business—cont.
  - Supply—cont.
    - Rule for Business—Mr. A. J. Balfour, (Motion) 828, 830, 839; [Mr. Speaker, 830;] Sir W. Harcourt, 830; Mr. H. Seton-Karr, 831; Mr. T. Lough, 832; Mr. G. C. T. Bartley, 834; Mr. H. Labouchere, 834; Mr. B. L. Cohen, 835; Mr. F. A. Channing, 836; Mr. Vesey Knox, 837; Dr. G. B. Clark, 837; Sir R. T. Reid, 838; Mr. T. M. Healy, 838; Sir J. Lubbock, 839; Sir F. S. Powell, 842; (Reso. Agreed to, 842) Jan 29
  - Temporary Chairmen—Nominated Jan 26, 600
  - Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant, etc.)—Mr. E. J. C. Morton, 1068; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1068, (Motion) 1068, 1069, 1072, 1075; Mr. J. Ellis, 1068, 1069; Mr. H. Labouchere, 1070; Mr. E. Lawrence, 1070; Sir W. Harcourt, 1070; Mr. H. Broadhurst, 1073; Mr. T. Lough, 1074; Mr. J. G. Weir, 1075; (Divisions, 1076, 1079) Feb 2
  - Votes and Proceedings—Sessional Order Jan 19, 39
  - Ways and Means—Resolution Jan 26, 598
  - Wednesday Sittings, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 22, 293
  - Witnesses—Resolutions Jan 19, 38

Committees

- British South Africa, Select, on, Qs. Mr. J. M. Maclean, Sir W. Harcourt, Mr. T. M. Healy; As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 26, 514
  Special Rep. brought up and Read Feb 5, 1417
  (For Debates see that Title)
- Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, Select—Sir W. Walrond, (Motion) 882; Sir W. Lawson, 882; Sir R. Webster, 882. Ordered and Nominated, 883 Jan 29
- Merchandise Marks, Select—Ordered Jan 28, 779
- Privileges—Appointed Jan 19, 39
- Public Petitions, Select—Ordered and Nominated Feb 4, 1416
- Selection—Ordered and Nominated Jan 28, 662
- Standing Orders—Ordered and Nominated Jan 28, 662

Miscellaneous

- Elections, Interference of Peers in—Sir M. Hicks Beach, (Motion) 38; Mr. J. Lowther, 38; (Division, 38) Jan 19
- Houses of Parliament
  - Members' Smoking Accommodation, Qs. Mr. G. W. Wolff, Mr. Rees Davies; As. Mr. Akers-Douglas Feb 4, 1302
  - Sale of Intoxicants, Qs. Sir W. Lawson, Mr. J. W. Logan, Mr. T. Bayley; As. Sir R. Webster Jan 21, 197. Qs. Sir W. Lawson; As. Lord Stanley, Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 5, 1434
- Journal—Sessional Order Jan 19, 40

[cont.

PARLIAMENT—Commons—cont.

New Members Sworn

Jan 19—Captain Ronald Henry Fulke Greville, commonly called the Hon. Ronald Henry Fulke Greville, for Borough of Bradford (East Division)

Jan 28—Augustus Henry Eden Allhusen, esquire, for Borough of Salisbury

Feb 4—Captain John Sinclair, for County of Forfar

Louis Sinclair, esquire, for County of Essex (Southern or Romford Division)

Samuel Woods, esquire, for County of Essex (South Western or Walthamstow Division)

New Writs Issued

During Recess

For the Borough of Bradford (East Division) v. Henry Byron Reed, esquire, deceased

For the County of York, North Riding (Cleveland Division) v. Henry Fell Pease, esquire, deceased

Jan 19—For the City of Salisbury v. Edward Henry Hulse, esquire (Manor of Northstead)

For the County of Forfar v. James Martin White, esquire (Chiltern Hundreds

Jan 20—For the County of Essex (Walthamstow Division) v. Edmund Widdrington Byrne, esquire, Q.C., one of the Justices of the High Court

For the County of Essex (Southern or Romford Division) v. Alfred Money Wigram, esquire (Chiltern Hundreds)

Feb 5—For the County of Surrey (Chertsey Division) v. Charles Harvey Combe, esquire (Chiltern Hundreds)

For the Borough of Glasgow (Bridgeton Division) v. Sir George Otto Trevelyan, baronet, Manor of Northstead

Parliamentary Elections (Mariners' Votes) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Elliott Lees; Read 1° Jan 22, 300

Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. F. F. Begg; Read 1° Jan 22, 294
2R., Mr. F. F. Begg, 1173, 1178, 1202, 1204, 1231; Mr. H. Labouchere 1178, 1182, 1184; 1201, 1203, 1204; Mr. Atherley-Jones, 1179, 1183, 1184, 1186; Mr. Radcliffe Cooke, 1185, 1186, 1195, 1196, 1198, 1199; Sir W. Lawson, 1195, 1211; [Mr. Speaker, 1195, 1196, 1199, 1231;] Mr. W. Johnston, 1196;

[cont.

Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill—cont.

Mr. W. Allan, 1198; Colonel Waring, 1214; Mr. G. Wyndham, 1216; Sir J. S. B. Simeon, 1219; Mr. R. C. Jebb, 1220; Sir W. Harcourt, 1225; Mr. L. Courtney, 1229; (Divisions, 1232, 1235) Feb 3
Read 2° Feb 3, 1239
Mr. F. F. Begg, (Motion), 1638; [Mr. Speaker, 1638] Feb 8
In Com., R.P. Feb 8, 1639

Parliamentary Franchise (Women) Bill [H.L.]

l. Pres., Viscount Templetown; Read 1ª Feb 1, 885

Parliamentary Registration Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Mr. J. Brigg; Read 1° Jan 22, 297
Withdrawn Jan 25, 488

Parnell, Mr. J. H., Meath, S.
Manhood Suffrage (Ireland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 302

Peasant Freeholders (Wales)
Mr. Lloyd Morgan (Notice of Motion) Jan 26, 489

Pease, Mr. Joseph A., Northumberland, Tyneside
Convicts, Escaped Jan 21, 189
Flogging Prisoners Jan 22, 280, 282
Queen's Speech Jan 19, (Amendt.) 112
Slavery at Zanzibar Feb 4, 1297
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1379, 1380

Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries
On Motion for Adjournment: Mr. W. Jones, 691, 694; [Mr. Speaker, 691, 739, 746;] Mr. Bromley Davenport, 694, 709, 712, 719, 721, 722, 742, 745; Mr. Bryn Roberts, 697, 704; Mr. Douglas-Pennant, 700, 704, 705, 707, 745, 746; Mr. H. Broadhurst, 705, 707; Mr. J. W. Logan, 712; Mr. Ritchie, 715, 719, 721, 722, 754, 755; Sir F. S. Powell, 718; Sir W. Harcourt, 723, 750; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 729; Mr. J. Burns, 733, 739; Mr. D. Lloyd-George, 740, 742, 745, 746; Colonel Blundell, 747; Mr. John Wilson (Durham) 747, 753; Mr. J. Lowther, 750, 753, 754, 755; Mr. A. J. Mundella, 755; Mr. G. W. Wolff, 758; Mr. Ellis Griffith, 760; (Motion negatived, 762) Jan 28
(For Questions see Wales)

Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries (Correspondence)
Copy Ordered (c.) Jan 20, 121
Return Pres. (c.) Jan 22, 269; Ordered to be Printed Jan 25, 377

Pensions
- Army
  - Crimean Veteran : Brennan (John), Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 28, 680
  - Fitzpatrick (John), Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 4, 1280
  - Kelly (John), Qs. Mr. J. Tully, Mr. H. E. Kearley; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Powell-Williams Jan 28, 680
  - Retired Pay, Qs. Mr. A. O'Connor; As. Mr. Powell-Williams Feb 8, 1554
- Naval, Q. Mr. R. G. Webster; A. Mr. Macartney Jan 26, 512
- School Teachers', Ireland, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach, Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 278. Qs. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; As. Mr. Hanbury, Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1049

Pensions (Old Age) Bill
c. Intro., Sir B. W. Foster; Read 1° Jan 22, 297

Perks, Mr. R. W., Lincolnshire, Louth
- Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 981

Pickersgill, Mr. E. H., Bethnal Green, S.W.
- Agricultural Rates Order Jan 28, 687
- Associations of Workmen, Contracts Feb 5, 1433
- Convicts, Escaped Jan 21, 188
- Court of Criminal Appeal Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 295
- Oaths Act, Scottish Form Feb 2, 1065
- Poor Law Schools, Metropolis Feb 4, 1310; Feb 5, 1433, 1434; Feb 8, 1552, 1553
- Prison
  - Officers' Instruction Jan 28, 671
  - Visiting Committees Jan 28, 670
- Prisoners' Property Fund Feb 4, 1309
- Sheffield Cottage Homes for Children Feb 4, 1309

Pierpoint, Mr. R., Warrington
- Queen's Speech Jan 19, 102
- Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1507

Pinkerton, Mr. J., Galway Borough
- Railway Extension, Ireland Feb 5, 1430

Pirie, Captain D. V., Aberdeen, N.
- Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1611, 1614

Places of Worship (Leasehold) Enfranchisement Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Rees Davies; Read 1° Jan 22, 299

Plumbers' Registration Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Lees Knowles; Read 1° Jan 22, 295

Police (Scotland) Law Amendment Bill
c. Intro., Sir L. McIver; Read 1° Jan 22, 303

Poor Law Franchise (Ireland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. P. O'Brien; Read 1° Jan 22, 301

Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act (1896) Amendment Bill
c. Intro., Mr. C. G. Pym; Read 1° Jan 22, 304

Poor Law Officers' Superannuation (Ireland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. J. Clancy; Read 1° Jan 26, 517

POST OFFICE

Postmaster General—Duke of Norfolk
- Australian and Indian Mails, Qs. Mr. Henniker Heaton; As. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 404
- Book Post Charges, Q. Mr. Henniker Heaton; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 783
- Boscombe Post Office, Q. Mr. A. H. Smith; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1293
- Bournae, Tipperary, Postal Arrangements, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 497
- Calais Harbour, Q. General Sir J. B. Edwards A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1037
- Canadian Mail Service, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr J. Chamberlain Jan 25, 380
- Cavan (West) Postal Arrangements, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 901
- Charges
  - Book Post, Q. Mr. Henniker Heaton; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 783
  - Parcel Post, Q. Mr. Henniker Heaton; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 783
- Cork and Dublin, Telephone Trunk Lines, Q. Mr. M. Healy; As. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 683
- Donegal, Post Office, Trosses, Q. Mr. Swift MacNeill; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 401
- Dublin
  - Post Office, Female Clerks, Q. Mr. J. J. Clancy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 512
  - Telegraph Facilities, Fairview, Q. Mr. J. J. Clancy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 407
- Inland Money Orders, Qs. Mr. H. C. F. Luttrell; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 5, 1428
- Irish Mail Service, Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Mr. J. Dillon, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. W. Field, Mr. P. J. Power, Mr. P. O'Brien; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 393. Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 508. Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 683. Q. Mr. J. L. Carew; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1055. Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell, Mr. P. O'Brien; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1279. Qs. Mr. James Roche, Captain Donelan, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 8, 1544
- Leitrim (South), Postal Arrangements, Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 502
- Limerick
  - Post Office, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 21, 178
  - Telegraph Facilities, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 790
- Longford, Postal Facilities, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 5, 1419

[cont.

POST OFFICE—cont.

Mail

Bag Seals, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1272.

Contract Subsidies, Q. Mr. Henniker Heaton; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 919

Service

Australian and Indian, Qs. Mr. Henniker Heaton; As. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 404

Canada, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 25, 380

Irish, Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Mr. J. Dillon, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. W. Field, Mr. P. J. Power, Mr. P. O'Brien; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 393. Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 508. Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 683. Q. Mr. J. L. Carew; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1055. Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell, Mr. P. O'Brien; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1279. Qs. Mr. J. Roche, Captain Donelan, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 8, 1544

Stornoway, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1275

Parcel Post

Charges, Q. Mr. Henniker Heaton; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 783

Switzerland, Q. Colonel Milward; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 666

Postal

Arrangements

Bournae, Tipperary, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 497

Cavan (West), Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 901

Leitrim (South), Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 502

Facilities

Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 5, 1419

Rushden, Qs. Mr. F. A. Channing; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1294.

Telegraph, Services and (Revenue), Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 8, 1535

Post Office

Accommodation, Thurles, Tipperary, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 272

Boscombe, Q. Mr. A. H. Smith; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1293

Dublin, Female Clerks, Q. Mr. J. J. Clancy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 512

Establishments, Qs. Mr. C. E. Schwann; As. Mr. Hanbury Jan 21, 174; Feb 1, 914. Q. Sir A. K. Rollit; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 5, 1429

Limerick, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 21, 178

Savings Bank Accounts, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 8, 1534

Sligo, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 906

Swansea, Q. Mr. Brynmor Jones; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1273

Trosses, Donegal, Q. Mr. Swift MacNeill; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 401

Post Office Amendment Act 1895, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1048

Rushden, Postal Facilities, Qs. Mr. F. A. Channing; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1294

[cont.

POST OFFICE—cont.

St. Helena, Qs. Admiral Field; As. Mr. Hanbury, Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1537

Sample Post, Butterflies, Q. Admiral Field; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 917

Savings Banks Deposits, Qs. Mr. Henniker Heaton, Mr. W. Johnston; As. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1271

Sligo Post Office, Q. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 1, 906

Stornoway, Mail Service, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1275

Swansea Post Office, Q. Mr. Brynmor Jones; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1273

Switzerland, Parcels Post, Q. Colonel Milward; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 666

Telegraph

Facilities

Fairview, Dublin, Q. Mr. J. J. Clancy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 407

Limerick City, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 790

Postal Services, and (Revenue), Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 8, 1535

Service, Ireland, Q. Mr. J. Tully; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 283

Telephone

Service, Tunbridge Wells, Q. Mr. Griffith-Boscawen; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1038

Trunk Line, Cork and Dublin, Q. Mr. M. Healy; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 28, 683

Tipperary

Postal Arrangements, Bournae, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 26, 497

Post Office Accommodation, Thurles, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 272

Tunbridge Wells, Telephone Service, Q. Mr. Griffith-Boscawen; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1038

Post Office Consolidation Bill

l. Pres., Duke of Norfolk; Read 1^{a} Feb 2, 1029
Read 2^{a} Feb 5, 1417

Post Office (Four-mile Radius)

Mr. C. T. Giles (Notice of Motion) Feb 2, 1033

POWELL, Sir FRANCIS S., Bart., Wigan

Business of the House: Supply Jan 29, 842
Merchandise Marks Acts (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 619
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 718
Rivers Pollution Prevention Bill, Intro. Jan 26, 516
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 996; Feb 2, 1143

POWELL-WILLIAMS, Mr. J. (see WILLIAMS)

POWER, Mr. P. J., Waterford, E.

Illegal Trawling, Cork Feb 8, 1559
Irish Mail Service Jan 25, 394
Irish-speaking Witnesses Jan 25, 403
Queen's Speech Jan 26, 571

Preferential Payments in Bankruptcy Act (1888) Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Mr. G. Kemp; Read 1^{o} Jan 22, 293

Preferential Payments Bankruptcy Act (1888) Amendment (No. 2) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. R. Ascroft; Read 1° Jan 22, 300

PRETYMAN, Captain ERNEST GEORGE, Suffolk, Woodbridge
Settled Property, Estate Duty Feb 8, 1547

Prisons (see LAW AND JUSTICE AND POLICE)
(For Irish Questions see under Title IRELAND)

PROVAND, Mr. ANDREW D., Glasgow, Blackfriars
Queen's Speech Jan 22, 356; Jan 25, 471

Public Health (Scotland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Graham Murray, 488; Mr. G. Lambert, 488; [Mr. Speaker, 488] Jan 25
Read 1° Jan 25, 488
2R., Dr. Farquharson, 1524; Sir M. Stewart, 1525; Mr. T. R. Buchanan, 1525; Mr. A. Cross, 1526; Mr. R. B. Haldane, 1526; Mr. J. H. Dalziel, 1527; Sir R. B. Finlay, 1527 Feb 5

PURVIS, Mr. ROBERT, Peterborough
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 622

PYM, Mr. C. GUY, Bedford
Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act (1896) Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 304

Queen's Speech (see PARLIAMENT: LORDS; COMMONS)

Railway Return Tickets Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. C. Macdona; Read 1° Feb 8, 1639

RAILWAYS
Cavan and Leitrim Light, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1275
Congo, Native Labour, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Jan 29, 781
Connections, Ireland, Q. Sir T. G. Esmonde; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 381
Extensions
  Donegal, Q. Mr. Vesey Knox; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1309
  Ireland, Q. Mr. J. Pinkerton; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1430
Fishguard Bay, Q. Mr. Rees Davies; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 389
Great Northern Company of Ireland, Qs. Mr. D. Macaleese, Mr. W. Johnston; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 911. Qs. Mr. J. Daly; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1047
Light
  Cavan and Leitrim, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1275
  Ireland, Q. Dr. R. Ambrose; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1545

[cont.

RAILWAYS—cont.
Maps, Q. Mr. Tomlinson; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 29, 789
Metropolitan, Ventilation, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1276
Mid Cork, Q. Dr. Tanner; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 683
Privilege Cab System, Q. Mr. T. Lough; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 25, 396
Railways in Ireland, Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell; As. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 29, 784
Rates, Ireland, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 21, 190. Q. Mr. J. Tuite; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 29, 797. Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1045
Sierra Leone, Q. Mr. C. Bill; A. Mr. J. Chamberlain Feb 1, 920
Tralee and Dingle, Q. Sir T. G. Esmonde; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 25, 381

RANKIN, Mr. J., Hereford, Leominster
Corn Sales Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 303

RASCH, Major F. C., Essex, S.E.
Army Officers' Uniform Feb 2, 1053
Health of Troops
  India Jan 25, 397, 398
  United Kingdom Jan 29, 781, 782
Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1578
Militia Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 301
Queen's Speech Jan 19, 109
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 981

Rating of Machinery Bill
c. Intro., Mr. E. Strachey; Read 1° Jan 22, 297

Rating of Machinery Suspensory Bill
c. Intro., Mr. G. Whiteley; Read 1° Jan 22, 296

Rating (Places of Worship and Schools) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. W. D. Green; Read 1° Jan 22, 298

RECKITT, Mr. H. J., Lincolnshire, Brigg
Employers' Liability (Foreign Shipowners) Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 26, 516

Registration of Firms Bill
c. Intro., Sir Stafford Northcote; Read 1° Feb 5, 1436

Registration of Parliamentary Voters Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. Brigg; Read 1° Feb 5, 1436

REID, Sir R. T., Dumfries Burghs
Business of the House: Supply Jan 29, 838

RICHARDS, Mr. HENRY C., Finsbury, E.
Gold and Silver Plate Licences Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 302

RICKETT, Mr. J. COMPTON, Scarborough
Queen's Speech Jan 19, 107

RIDLEY, RIGHT HON. SIR MATTHEW WHITE, BART. (Secretary of State for the Home Department), Lancashire, N., Blackpool
Armenian Refugee Killed in London Jan 28, 667
Belfast Textile Trades, Fines Feb 2, 1034
Burial Fees, Ulverston Jan 21, 173, 174
Cab Licences, Metropolis Feb 1, 908
Committals to Assizes Jan 25, 395, 396
Dangerous Trades Jan 25, 386
Escaped Convicts Jan 21, 189
Experiments on Living Animals Feb 4, 1288, 1289; Feb 5, 1432
Factories and Workshops Act (Particulars Section) Feb 5, 1422
Factory Acts Jan 21, 184
Flogging Prisoners Jan 22, 281, 282
Foundry Workers Jan 26, 495
Government Bills Jan 19, 41
Housebreaking, Liverpool Assizes Jan 28, 665
Inebriates Feb 4, 1287
Insanity Feb 4, 1283
Manslaughter at Manchester Feb 2, 1039
Midwives' Registration Feb 4, 1270
Mill Accident, Batley Jan 29, 794
Northampton Prison Advertisements Feb 8, 1544
Oil Lamp Accidents Jan 29, 793
Payment of Common Jurors Feb 1, 915
Prison
  Advertisements, Northampton Feb 8, 1544
  Officers' Uniform Jan 28, 671
  Visiting Committee Jan 28, 670
Prisoners
  Flogging Jan 22, 281, 282
  Property Fund Feb 4, 1309
  Treason-felony Jan 26, 510; Jan 28, 668
Privilege Cab System Jan 25, 397
Queen's Speech Jan 20, 142, 147, 152, 153; Jan 22, 373, 374; Jan 25, 418, 428
Shuttle Guards Jan 22, 284; Jan 25, 380; Jan 28, 688
Treason-felony Prisoners Jan 26, 510; Jan 28, 668
Wool Sorting Jan 28, 664
Workmen
  Imposition of Fines on Jan 25, 410
  Injuries to, Foreign Shipowners Jan 28, 685

RITCHIE, RIGHT HON. CHARLES T. (President of the Board of Trade), Croydon
Alien Immigration Jan 26, 492
Associations of Workmen, Contracts Feb 5, 1433
British Trade and Foreign Competition Jan 29, 884
Coal Shipments Jan 26, 496
Collisions at Sea, New Regulations Jan 29, 795
Colour-blind Tests, Sailors Feb 1, 907, 908
Companies' Limited Liability Acts Feb 1, 922
Corn Sales Feb 4, 1298
Daunt's Rock Lightship Jan 22, 273, 274; Jan 25, 405, 406; Jan 28, 672
Electric Meters Jan 22, 271
Foreign-made Prison Goods Feb 8, 1534
Gas Meters Jan 22, 271

[cont.

RITCHIE, Right Hon. C. T.—cont.
Irish Lights Board Jan 22, 290; Jan 29, 785; Feb 1, 915
Labour Department, Local Correspondents Feb 1, 922
Lighthouses
  Keepers Feb 2, 1064, 1065
  Tiumpan Head Feb 2, 1048
Mercantile Marine
  Classification Feb 1, 919
  Loss of Life at Sea Feb 4, 1300
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 605, 608, 609; Jan 28, 677
Metric System Feb 4, 1277
Patented Inventions Feb 1, 914
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 715, 719, 721, 722, 754, 755; Feb 2, 1059, 1060, 1061, 1062, 1063
Queen's Speech Jan 25, 480, 481, 482
Railways
  Connections, Ireland Jan 25, 381
  Fishguard Bay Jan 25, 389
  Great Northern of Ireland Feb 1, 911; Feb 2, 1047
  Maps Jan 29, 789
  Metropolitan, Ventilation Feb 4, 1276
  Rates, Ireland Jan 29, 797
Royal Canal Harbour, Longford Feb 4, 1275
Southwold, Damage by Gales Feb 4, 1304

Rivers Pollution Prevention Bill
c. Intro., Sir F. S. Powell; Read 1° Jan 26, 516

ROBERTS, MR. J. BRYN, Carnarvon, Eifion
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 697, 704
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1515
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 1012

ROBERTS, MR. J. HERBERT, Denbigh, W.
Parish Documents Feb 8, 1551
Queen's Speech Jan 26, 525
Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 303; 2R. Jan 27, 645, 646, 652
Turkey, Parliamentary Paper Jan 21, 178

ROBERTSON, MR. EDMUND, Dundee
Education Grant, Scotland Feb 2, 1067
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1376, 1378

ROCHE, HON. JAMES B. B., Kerry
Bog Slide, Kerry Jan 28, 668
Companies' Limited Liability Acts Feb 1, 922
Irish Mails Feb 8, 1544
River Suck Drainage Jan 26, 499

ROLLIT, SIR ALBERT K., Islington, S.
Borough Funds Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 298
Factory Acts (Fishing Trade) Bill Intro. Jan 22, 304: 2R. Jan 27, 658, 659
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 613, 616, 620; Jan 28, 677
Post Office Establishments Feb 5, 1429
Queen's Speech Jan 26, 562
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1124

Royal Commissions
  Crofter (see SCOTLAND)
  Financial Relations between Great Britain and Ireland (see that Title)
  Licensing Laws (see CUSTOMS, EXCISE, AND INLAND REVENUE)
  Vaccination (see that Title)

Royal Patriotic Fund
  Mr. H. E. Kearley (Notice of Motion) Feb 2, 1034

RUSSELL, General F. S., Cheltenham
  Crofter Commission Feb 4, 1305
  Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1623
  Vaccination Laws Feb 8, 1540

RUSSELL, MR. T. W. (Secretary to the Local Government Board), Tyrone, S.
  Agricultural Rates Order Jan 28, 687
  Birth Certificates Jan 28, 663
  Cholera Outbreak, s.s. Nubia Jan 22, 288
  Light Locomotives Act, Traction Engines Jan 28, 668
  Parish Council
    Accounts Jan 22, 277
    Elections Jan 28, 684
  Queen's Speech Jan 25, 441, 443; Jan 26, 561
  Vaccination, Royal Commission Jan 21, 193; Jan 26, 493, 494; Jan 28, 677

Russia in North East Asia
  Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett (Notice of Motion) Feb 2, 1033

Sale of Food and Drugs Bill
c. Intro., Mr. H. E. Kearley; Read 1° Jan 27, 660

Sale of Intoxicants: Houses of Parliament (see PARLIAMENT: COMMONS, subheading Miscellaneous)

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill
c. Intro, Mr. W. E. H. Lecky; Read 1° Jan 22, 295

Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sundays Bill
c. Intro., Mr. C. H. Wilson; Read 1° Jan 22, 296

SALISBURY, MARQUESS of (Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)
  Business of the House Jan 21, 173; Jan 28, 662
  Queen's Speech Jan 19, 18, 25, 28

Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) Acts Amendment Bill
c. Intro., Mr. H. Seton-Karr; Read 1° Feb 5, 1436

SAMUEL, Mr. J., Stockton-on-Tees
  Imposition of Fines on Workmen Jan 25, 410
  Steam Engines and Boilers (Persons in Charge) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 294

SANDYS, Colonel T. M., Lancashire, S.W., Bootle
  Benefices (No. 3) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 303
  Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1609, 1611

SAUNDERSON, Colonel E. J., Armagh, N.
  British South Africa Committee Jan 29, 823

School Board Electorate (Scotland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. G. Weir; Read 1° Jan 22, 304

School Board for London (Elections) Bill
c. Intro., Sir J. Blundell Maple; Read 1° Jan 22, 297

Schools
  Accommodation
    Castleton, Q. Mr. A. E. Hutton; A. Sir J. Gorst Feb 4, 1308
    Letter-Gunnell, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 5, 1426
  Attendance, Ireland, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 289
  Bethnal Green, St. Jude's, Q. Mr. A. E. Hutton; A Sir J. Gorst Jan 25, 385
  Boards, Scotland, Q. Mr. J. Wilson (Falkirk); A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1044
  Buildings, Q. Mr. A. E. Hutton; A. Sir J. Gorst Feb 4, 1295
  Elementary
    Building Grants, Q. Mr. A. E. Hutton; A. Sir J. Gorst Feb 5, 1432
    Highlands and Islands of Scotland, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1048
    Parliamentary Grant, Q. Mr. A. K. Loyd; A. Sir J. Gorst Jan 26, 494
    Queen's Reign, Q. Mr. W. Johnston; A. Sir J. Gorst Jan 25, 387
    Rating, Qs. Mr. Ellis Griffith; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 8, 1550
    Wimbledon, Q. Mr. J. C. Williams; A. Sir J. Gorst Feb 4, 1289
  Erasmus Smith, Ireland, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. J. Atkinson Jan 22, 276. Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 28, 673. Qs. Mr. Arnold-Forster, Mr. W. Johnston; As. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 4, 1302
  Fee Grant, Scotland, Q. Mr. J. Caldwell; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 25, 398
  Irish
    Drawing, Q. Mr. T. M. Healy; A. Mr. G. Balfour Jan 25, 382
    Workmistresses, Q. Mr. D. Macaleese; A. Mr. G. Balfour Feb 8, 1556
  Necessitous Board, Scotland, Q. Mr. J. Caldwell; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 5, 1435
  Poor Law
    Metropolis, Qs. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 4, 1310; Feb 5, 1433; Feb 8, 1552
    Report on, Qs. Mr. G. Drage, Mr. G. C. T. Bartley, Mr. T. Lough; As. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 1, 902.

[cont.

Schools—cont.
- Public, Heywood, Q. Mr. J. C. Williams; A. Sir J. Gorst Jan 25, 387
- Teachers' Pensions, Ireland, Qs. Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Vesey Knox; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach, Mr. Hanbury Jan 22, 278. Qs. Mr. P. A. M'Hugh; As. Mr. Hanbury, Mr. G. Balfour Feb 2, 1049
- Text-books, Scotland, Qs. Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 8, 1539
- Voluntary
  - Aid Grant, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 22, 376. Q. Mr. J. Dillon; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 4, 1308. Q. Mr. A. J. Mundella; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 4, 1313
  - (For Debates see Voluntary Schools [Aid Grant, etc.] and Voluntary Schools Bill)
  - Equivalent Grants
    - Irish, Qs. Mr. J. C. Flynn; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 4, 1311
    - Scotch, Q. Mr. Hedderwick; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 4, 1312
- Willesden, St. Andrew's, Qs. Mr. J. H. Yoxall, Mr. A. J. Mundella; As. Sir J. Gorst Feb 2, 1043

Schwann, Mr. C. E., Manchester, N.
- Manslaughter at Manchester Feb 2, 1039
- Midwives' Registration Feb 4, 1270
- Post Office Establishments Jan 21, 174; Feb 1, 914
- Queen's Speech Jan 26, 531
- Shuttle Guards Jan 22, 284; Jan 28, 688

Scoble, Sir A. R., Hackney, Central
- Indian Famine and Plague Jan 22, 284, 287

SCOTLAND

Secretary for—Lord Balfour
Lord Advocate—Mr. A. Graham Murray
Solicitor General—Mr. C. Scott Dickson

- Alien Pauper Lunatic, Q. Sir M. Stewart; A. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 28, 685
- Balintore Harbour, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1269
- Congested Districts, Highlands and Islands, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1047
- Crofter Commission, Q. General Russell; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1305
- Crofters Act 1886, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1049
- Duty on Scotch Herrings, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Curzon Feb 2, 1039
- Edinburgh University, Library Buildings, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Hanbury Jan 29, 796
- Education Grant, Q. Mr. E. Robertson; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 2, 1067
- Elementary Schools, Highlands and Islands, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1048
- Equivalent Grant, Qs. Mr. W. Thorburn, Mr. J. Bryce; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 2, 1054

[cont.

SCOTLAND—cont.
- Financial Relations, Great Britain and Ireland, Qs. Mr. Munro Ferguson, Dr. G. B. Clark, Mr. T. Lough, Sir W. Harcourt: [Mr. Speaker;] As Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 21, 198. Q. Dr. G. B. Clark; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 22, 293. Qs. Sir W. Dunn, Mr. J. Dillon, Mr. J. J. Clancy, Dr. R. Ambrose; As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 26, 513
- Harbours
  - Balintore, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1269
  - Peterhead, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1272
  - Port Ness, Island of Lewis, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1269
- Highlands and Islands
  - Congested Districts, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1047
  - Elementary Schools, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1048
- Holyrood Palace, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Akers-Douglas Jan 29, 797
- Illegal
  - Supply of Seamen, Glasgow, Q. Mr. J. G. A. Baird; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1283
  - Trawling, Qs. Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 21, 193. Qs. Mr. D. N. Nicol, Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 28, 675. Qs. Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1036; Feb 4, 1287
- Island of Lewis
  - Port Ness Harbour, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1269
  - Tiumpan Head Lighthouse, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1048
- Jury Service, Yeomanry Officers, Q. Mr. J. H. C Hozier; A. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 26 500
- Local Government Board, Audit Department, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 22, 279
- Necessitous Board Schools, Qs. Mr. J. Caldwell; As. Mr. A. J. Balfour Feb 5, 1435
- North Sea Convention, Qs. Mr. J. G. Weir, Captain J. Sinclair; As. Mr. Graham Murray, Mr. Curzon Feb 8, 1539
- Oaths Act, Scottish Form, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Sir R. Webster Feb 2, 1065
- Parish Councillors, Q. Dr. Farquharson; A. Mr. Graham Murray Jan 25, 396
- Parochial Board of Sanquhair, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 1, 918
- Peterhead Harbour, Q. Sir J. Leng; A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1272
- Port Ness Harbour, Island of Lewis, Qs. Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 4, 1269
- Post Office Amendment Act 1895, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 2, 1048
- School
  - Boards, Q. Mr. J. Wilson (Falkirk); A. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 2, 1044
  - Fee Grant, Q. Mr. J. Caldwell; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 25, 398
  - Text-books, Qs. Mr. J. G. Weir; As. Mr. Graham Murray Feb 8, 1539

[cont.

SCOTLAND—cont.
  Stornoway Mail Service, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1275
  Tiumpan Head Lighthouse, Island of Lewis, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1048
  Voluntary Schools Grant (Scotch Equivalent), Q. Mr. Hedderwick; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 4, 1312

Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. R. B. Haldane; Read 1° Feb 8, 1639

Select Vestries Bill
l. Read 1ª Jan 19, 6

Service Franchise Bill
c. Intro., Mr. H. H. Marks; Read 1° Jan 22, 294

Seton-Karr, Mr. H., St. Helens
  British South Africa Committee Jan 29, 827, 828
  Business of the House: Supply Jan 29, 831
  Food Supplies, United Kingdom Feb 2, 1033
  Housebreaking, Liverpool Assizes Jan 28, 664
  Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) Acts Amendment Bill, Intro. Feb 5, 1436

Shadwell, Mr. W. Lucas- (see Lucas-Shadwell

Sharpe, Mr. W. E. T., Kensington, N.
  Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1497

Shaw, Mr. T., Hawick Burghs
  Succession (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Feb 3, 1240

Sheehy, Mr. D., Galway, S.
  Queen's Speech Jan 21, 251

Shipwrecks
  Warren Hastings, Indian Troopship, Qs. Colonel Lockwood, Mr. P. M. Thornton; As. Mr. Brodrick Jan 25, 383. Q. Mr. Vicary Gibbs; A. Mr. Brodrick Feb 1, 905

Shop Assistants (Half Holiday) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. H. V. Duncombe; Read 1° Feb 2, 1083

Shops Bill
c. Intro., Sir C. Dilke; Read 1° Jan 22, 304

Shops (Early Closing) Bill
c. Intro., Sir J. Lubbock; Read 1° Jan 22, 303

Simeon, Sir J. S. B., Bart., Southampton
  Netley Hospital Assessment Feb 2, 1054
  Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1219

Sinclair, Captain John, Forfarshire
  North Sea Convention Feb 8, 1539

Smaller Dwellings (Scotland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. A. Cross; Read 1° Feb 5, 1436

Smith, Mr. Abel H., Christchurch
  Boscombe Post Office Feb 4, 1293

Smith, Mr. Samuel, Flintshire
  Persecution of Nestorians Feb 4, 1278
  Queen's Speech Jan 19, 80

Speaker, Mr.

The Right Hon.
WILLIAM COURT GULLY, Q.C.,
Carlisle

  Notices of Motion
    May I ask the hon. Members, when they bring up notices of motions in order to hand them in, to put on them the number they have obtained in the ballot? This will facilitate the labour of the clerks at the table Jan 21, 201
  Questions
    I should prefer not to answer a hypothetical question of that kind until I see what is really before the House Jan 22, 292
    That does not arise out of the question. The hon. Member proposes to ask a general question about the practice in England Jan 25, 402
    The Question which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Macclesfield is irregular and ought not to appear on the Paper, because it refers to a previous Debate in this House, and questions a statement there made. But as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, in answering a question of the right hon. Member for Thanet, did give a kind of anticipatory answer to the question of the hon. Member for Macclesfield, and went with great detail into what has taken place with reference to that Debate, I think it only fair that the hon. Member should be allowed to put his Question or ask the right hon. Gentleman any further question Feb 2, 1061
    If a Minister refers to a particular document by quoting part of it, or stating what the effect of the contents of that particular document is, then the House is entitled to see the whole document. But I do not understand that any question of that kind arises here. A Minister is not bound, having stated, in answer to a question or otherwise, that there have been communications generally to such and such an effect with a foreign Government, to produce the document which would bear out his statement Feb 8, 1558
    There is a great difference between specifically referring to communications generally and specifically referring to the contents of a particular document. Nothing of the latter kind seems to have taken place here Feb 8, 1558

[cont

SPEAKER, Mr.—cont.

Rules and Order of Debate

I must remind the hon. Member that the question before the House is not the propriety of the conduct of the Home Secretary in releasing those who have been released, but as to whether those who are still prisoners should be released Jan 20, 131

I must remind the hon. Member that he must not discuss matters that might arise upon the Amendment given notice of by the hon. Member for Salford Jan 20, 134

The observations of the hon. Member are not pertinent to the Amendment before the House. The hon. Member is not entitled to discuss the general question of the mode of prosecuting criminals in Ireland or elsewhere Jan 20, 135

I have not hitherto interrupted the right hon. Gentleman in dealing with the case of the four prisoners released, because a good many observations had been incidentally made about them. I hope, however, the right hon. Gentleman will not further argue their case upon an Amendment which does not really raise it Jan 20, 147

The whole of this discussion on the case of Bell is foreign to the question before the House. An hon. Member referred to the case of Bell, not for the purpose of arguing the merits of the case, but merely as an illustration. To that there was no objection, and, the matter having been referred to, the Home Secretary thought it right to give an explanation of what was stated by that hon. Member. The question of the prosecution of this man has really nothing to do with the question before the House Jan 20, 153

The hon. and learned Member is really going too far in entering upon these matters. They do not apply at all to the question of the Amendment Jan 21, 227

The hon. Member is a long way from the Amendment, which deals with the fall in the value of agricultural produce and the remedies proposed Jan 21, 239

The question of Irish taxation does not arise in the Amendment. It has been reserved for discussion on another day Jan 21, 246

The hon. Gentleman is now discussing the conduct of the Government with reference to the existing famine and plague in India. That is not raised in the Amendment. The Amendment only deals with the predisposing causes of the famine and plague Jan 26, 548

These personal questions are a long way from the Amendment before us Jan 26, 550

The policy of Lord Beaconsfield in the East is not raised on this Motion, and has nothing to do with the sending of a special envoy to the Turkish Government Jan 26, 584

It will be observed that Mr. Speaker Peel said there it was not a question of order. Moreover, he was speaking after the Second Reading of the Bill had been moved, and a Motion for the Adjournment had been made. It was only a question as to whether or not he ought to consider that Motion as an abuse of the Rules of the House. The time for raising such a point has not yet come Jan 27, 646

I cannot put that Motion, considering that the discussion has not lasted an hour, and that the Bill only came from the printers after the hour when the House met Jan 27, 658

I hope the hon. Gentleman will be able to conclude his speech without so many colloquies across the floor of the House Jan 28, 746

An Amendment of which notice must be given can only be moved by the hon. Member who put it down Jan 29, 823

The hon. Member is entitled to use the argument that he objects to this Vote because nothing has been said about an equivalent grant for Scotland, but he cannot go beyond that Feb 4, 1343

The hon. Member cannot enter upon the general question of the financial relations Feb 4, 1410

The hon. Gentleman has taken two objections. The first is as to the description of the Vote on the Paper. The Vote is, in fact, a Vote for the service of the year ending 31st March 1897, supplemental or additional to those Votes which have been already dealt with for that year, and that it is so sufficiently appears on the Paper. I think there is no doubt that if this, instead of being an additional Estimate, formed part of the original Estimates, it would appear upon the Civil Service Estimates. As regards the suggestion that it is a new matter altogether, and should be dealt with as a separate and original, and not supplemental, Vote, plenty of cases are to be found in which additional Estimates of this kind have been voted by the House upon notices, similar to this. In March 1895 there was a grant in aid for Cyprus—a matter upon which there had been no previous opportunity of discussion upon the Estimates. That was brought on in March as an additional Estimate just as this is brought on here. Therefore, as regards that part of the hon. Member's contention the matter is perfectly in order. As regards the other point, that there should be a Motion that I now leave the Chair, with opportunity for Debate before I leave the Chair, I think that objection also is groundless. The Standing Order 56, to which the hon. Member refers, expressly says that, "Whenever Committee of Supply stands as an Order of the Day on Monday or Thursday," or now, under the Sessional Order, on Friday, "Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without question put." To-day, Committee of Supply is an Order of the Day, and

[cont.

[cont.

SPEAKER, Mr.—cont.

Rules and Order of Debate—cont.

therefore the Standing Order compels me to leave the Chair without question put. The invariable practice has been, that when the Motion has been carried "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," upon first going into the Estimates, any additional or supplementary Vote in Committee of Supply afterwards for a further expenditure in that year, is put to the Committee without the question being put that I leave the Chair. Therefore I think that the notice and procedure are quite in order, and I shall now leave the Chair without putting any question Feb 5, 1438

As some Members appear to object to my leaving the Chair, it is desirable that I should explain why it is not competent for them to do so. Standing Order No. 51 compels me to leave the Chair, on the Order for the Committee being read, unless there is a Notice of Instruction on the Paper. There are two Notices of Instruction on the Paper, but these being Instructions that are not valid I may—in accordance with previous and, if I may respectfully say so, correct ruling from the Chair—treat them as nullities and step out of the Chair at once. But the more usual and convenient course is that I should first make a statement as to the reasons why they are not valid Instructions. Therefore, I will say that the Instruction of the hon. Member for Caithness is out of order, in the first place because it is a mandatory injunction to a Committee of the Whole House, and, in the second place, because the subject-matter of it may be dealt with by way of Amendment. The Instruction of the hon. and gallant Member for Torquay is bad, so far as it relates to women's votes, because it may be made the subject of an Amendment; and in so far as it relates to taking away men's votes it is bad as being outside the scope of the Bill. Both Instructions are bad, and that being so, under the provisions of Standing Order No. 51, I am obliged to leave the Chair forthwith Feb 8, 1638

Miscellaneous Rulings

Jan 20, 131, 135, 172; Jan 21, 199, 226, 246; Jan 22, 290, 367; Jan 25, 379, 394, 395, 401, 430, 457, 488; Jan 26, 492, 505, 567, 596; Jan 27, 616, 619, 644; Jan 28, 681, 739; Jan 29, 823, 830; Feb 3, 1195, 1196, 1199, 1231; Feb 4, 1280, 1289, 1301, 1366, 1380, 1385, 1409, 1415; Feb 5, 1423; Feb 8, 1561, 1562, 1565, 1611, 1614

SPICER, Mr. A., Monmouth Boroughs
Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 297
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 988

STANHOPE, Hon. P. J., Burnley
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1510, 1512
Turkish Loans Jan 29, 799

STANLEY, LORD (Lord Commissioner of the Treasury), Lancashire, S.E., Westhoughton
House of Commons, Sale of Intoxicants Feb 5, 1434

STANLEY, Mr. H. M., Lambeth, N.
Supply: £798,802 for Egyptian Government Feb 5, 1487, 1488, 1489

Stationery Office (Parliamentary Printing)
Copies Pres. of Four Contracts (c.) Feb 1, 899

Steam Engines and Boilers (Persons in Charge) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. Samuel; Read 1° Jan 22, 294

STEPHENS, Mr. H. C., Middlesex, Hornsey
Cemeteries Rating Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 296

STEVENSON, Mr. F. S., Suffolk, Eye
Political Prisoners, Turkey Jan 22, 275
Queen's Speech Jan 19, 101
Syria and Macedonia Jan 22, 275

STEWART, Sir MARK J., Bart., Kirkcudbrightshire
Alien Pauper Lunatic, Scotland Jan 28, 685
Khama's Territory, Liquor Licences Feb 1, 924
Public Health (Scotland) Bill, 2R. Feb 5, 1525
Queen's Speech Jan 26, 575, 576
Teind Court (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 299

STONE, Sir J. B., Bart., Birmingham, E.
Unlawful Possession Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 302; 2R. Jan 26, 598; Jan 29, 877

Stoppages in the Streets
Order to Prevent, Renewed (l.) Jan 19, 36

STRACHEY, Mr. E., Somerset, S.
Queen's Speech, Jan 25, 457; Jan 26, 554
Rating of Machinery Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 297

Street Noises Bill
c. Intro., Mr. Radcliffe Cooke; Read 1° Jan 22, 297

Succession (Scotland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. T. Shaw; Read 1° Feb 3, 1240

SULLIVAN, Mr. T. D., Donegal, W.
Distress, West Donegal Jan 22, 282; Jan 26, 504
Queen's Speech Jan 20, 154

Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. H. Roberts; Read 1° Jan 22, 303
2R., Mr. J. H. Roberts, 645, 646, 652; Mr. W. J. Galloway, 645; [Mr. Speaker, 646, 658;] Sir W. Harcourt, 651; Mr. J. M. Maclean, 651, 652; Mr. W. T. Howell, 656, 658; Mr. W. Johnston, 658 Jan 27

SUPPLY

Army and Navy Estimates (see under those Titles)

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1896-97

£798,802 for Egyptian Government, Grant in Aid
In Com., Sir M. Hicks Beach, 1439, 1445, 1447, 1452, 1466, 1467, 1468, 1478, 1479, 1482, 1505, 1506, 1512, 1518; Mr. H. Labouchere, 1445, 1447, 1480, 1481, 1482; Mr. J. Morley, 1449, 1452, 1455, 1475, 1488, 1489; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1455, 1516; Sir C. Dilke, 1458, 1461, 1463, 1473; Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett, 1461, 1462, 1463, 1479; Sir W. Harcourt, 1465, 1466, 1467, 1468, 1473, 1476, 1505, 1518; Mr. Curzon, 1468, 1473, 1475, 1480; Mr. L. Courtney, 1476, 1478, 1479, 1514; Mr. Arnold-Forster, 1484; Mr. H. M. Stanley, 1487, 1488, 1489; Mr. Vesey Knox, (Amendt.) 1489; [Chairman, 1489;] (Division, 1494); Mr. Munro Ferguson, 1495; Mr. W. E. T. Sharpe, 1497; Mr. W. A. McArthur, 1498, 1499; Mr. M. Davitt, 1499; Admiral Field, 1500; Mr. J. Dillon, 1502, 1505, 1506; Mr. R. Pierpoint, 1507; Mr. P. J. Stanhope, 1510, 1512; Captain Bethell, 1512, 1514; Mr. Bryn Roberts, 1515; Mr. T. Lough, 1517; (Division, 1520); Vote Agreed to, 1520 Feb 5
Reso. Rep. and Agreed to Feb 8, 1637

Supply
Reso. and Order (c.) Jan 26, 598

Surveyors (County Dublin) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. J. J. Clancy; Read 1° Jan 25, 488

TALBOT, Mr. J. G., Oxford University
Weak-minded and Imbecile Children Feb 4, 1296

TANNER, Dr. C. K. D., Cork County, Mid
British South Africa Committee Jan 29, 823
Business of the House Jan 28, 780
Kilcrea Abbey, Cork Jan 28, 682
Military Works Bill Feb 1, 1024
Public Works, Ireland Jan 28, 681
Queen's Speech Jan 20, 154
Railways, Mid Cork Jan 28, 683

Taxation on Clerical Incomes
Mr. L. Hardy (Notice of Motion) Feb 2, 1033

Teind Court (Scotland) Bill
c. Intro., Sir M. Stewart; Read 1° Jan 22, 299

Tenant Right in Towns (Ireland) Bill
c. Intro., Mr. W. Field; Read 1° Jan 27, 660

THOMAS, Mr. ALFRED, Glamorgan, E.
National Museum, Wales Jan 26, 489

THOMAS, Mr. DAVID A., Merthyr Tydvil
Coal Shipments Jan 26, 496

Thompson's Divorce Bill
l. Read 1ª Feb 1, 885

THORBURN, Mr. W., Peebles and Selkirk
Equivalent Grant, Scotland Feb 2, 1054

THORNTON, Mr. PERCY M., Clapham
Vehicles (Lights) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 298
Wreck, Indian Troopship Warren Hastings Jan 25, 384

TOMLINSON, Mr. W. E. M., Preston
Railway Maps Jan 29, 789
Telegraph Cable, West Indies Feb 1, 917
Unlawful Possession Bill, 2R. Jan 29, 878
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 1019

TRADE, BOARD OF
President—Mr. C. T. RITCHIE
Secretary—Earl of DUDLEY

Alien Immigration, Qs. Sir H. Vincent; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 26, 492
Associations of Workmen, Contracts, Q. Mr. E. H. Pickersgill; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 5, 1433
British Trade and Foreign Competition, Q. Sir H. Vincent; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 29, 884
Coal Shipments, Q. Mr. D. A. Thomas; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 26, 496
Collisions at Sea, New Regulations, Q. Mr. Gibson Bowles; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 29, 795
Colour-blind Tests, Sailors, Qs. Mr. W. Ambrose, Mr. G. W. Wolff; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 907
Companies' Limited Liability Acts, Q. Mr. James Roche; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 922
Corn Sales, Q. Mr. R. J. More; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1297
Daunt's Rock Lightship, Qs. Capt. Donelan, Mr. W. Field; As. Mr. Akers-Douglas Jan 21, 181. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Mr. T. Harrington; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 22, 273. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 405. Qs. Mr. W. Field, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 28, 672
Electric Meters, Q. Mr. T. Lough; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 22, 270
Fishguard Bay Railway, Q. Mr. Rees Davies; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 389
Foreign Prison-made Goods, Qs. Sir H. Vincent; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 8, 1534
Gas Meters, Q. Mr. T. Lough; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 22, 271

[cont.

TRADE, BOARD OF—cont.

Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland, Qs. Mr. D. Macaleese, Mr. W. Johnston; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 911. Qs. Mr. J. Daly; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1047
Irish Lights Board, Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Akers-Douglas Jan 21, 190. Qs. Mr. W. Field; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. J. Atkinson, Mr. Ritchie Jan 22, 290. Q. Mr. W. Field; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 29, 785. Qs. Mr. J. P. Farrell, Mr. J. O'Connor; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 915
Labour Department, Local Correspondence, Q. Mr. H. H. Marks; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 922
Lighthouse
  Keepers, Qs. Mr. Swift MacNeill, General Laurie; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1064
  Tiumpan Head, Island of Lewis, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1048
Lightship, Daunt's Rock, Qs. Captain Donelan, Mr. W. Field; As. Mr. Akers-Douglas Jan 21, 181. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Mr. T. Harrington; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 22, 273. Qs. Mr. M. Healy, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 405 Qs. Mr. W. Field, Captain Donelan; As. Mr. Ritchie Jan 28, 672
Mercantile Marine
  Classification, Q. Sir C. Dilke; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 919
  Loss of Life at Sea, Qs. Colonel Denny, Mr. J. Havelock Wilson: [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1300
Merchandise Marks Act, Q. Sir A. K. Rollit; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 28, 677
Metric System, Q. Mr. A. J. Mundella; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1276
Metropolitan Railway, Ventilation, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1276
Oil Lamp Accidents, Q. Captain Donelan; A. Sir Matthew White Ridley Jan 29, 793
Patented Inventions, Q. Mr. W. O'Malley; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 914
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries, Qs. Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. Bromley Davenport, Mr. Gibson Bowles; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1058
Railways
  Connections, Ireland, Q. Sir T. G. Esmonde; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 381
  Fishguard Bay, Q. Mr. Rees Davies; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 389
  Great Northern Company of Ireland, Qs. Mr. D. Macaleese, Mr. W. Johnston; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 1, 911. Qs. Mr. J. Daly; As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1047
  Maps, Q. Mr. Tomlinson; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 29, 789
  Metropolitan, Ventilation, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1276
  Rates, Ireland, Q. Mr. J. Tuite; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 29, 797
Royal Canal Harbour, Longford, Q. Mr. J. P. Farrell; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1275
Southwold, Damage by Gales, Q. Mr. H. S. Foster; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 4, 1303
Tiumpan Head Lighthouse, Island of Lewis, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1048
Unification of Time at Sea, Q. Mr. J. F. Hogan; A. Mr. Macartney Jan 21, 191

TREASURY

First Lord—Mr. A. J. Balfour
Patronage Secretary—Sir W. H. Walrond
Financial Secretary—Mr. R. W. Hanbury
Lords Commissioners—Mr. H.T. Anstruther; Mr. W. H. Fisher; Lord Stanley

Truck Acts Amendment Bill

c. Intro., Mr. H. Broadhurst; Read 1º Feb 3, 1239

Trusts (Scotland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. Graham Murray; Read 1º Feb 4, 1314

TUITE, MR. JAMES, Westmeath, N.
  Railway Rates, Ireland Jan 29, 797
  Royal Canal, Ireland Jan 29, 790

TULLY, MR. JASPER, Leitrim, S.
  Army Pension: Kelly (John) Jan 28, 680
  Crimean Veteran: Brennan (John) Jan 28 680
  Mullingar Union, Medicine Contract Jan 26, 502
  Postal Arrangements, South Leitrim Jan 26, 502
  Queen's Speech Jan 20, 132; Jan 21, 233
  River Suck Drainage Jan 25, 399
  Telegraph Service, Ireland, Jan 22, 283

University Education (Ireland) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. J. J. Clancy; Read 1° Jan 22 301

Unlawful Possession Bill

c. Intro., Sir J. B. Stone; Read 1º Jan 22, 302
  2R., Sir J. B. Stone, 598; Mr. T. M. Healy, 598 Jan 26
  Debate Resumed: Mr. S. T. Evans, 876: Sir J. B. Stone, 877; Mr. Rees Davies, 877; Sir R. Webster, 878; Mr. Tomlinson, 878; Mr. T. Lough, 878; Mr. R. McKenna, 879; Mr. P. A. M'Hugh, 879, 880, 881; Mr. H. V. Duncombe, 879; Mr. J. F. Flannery, 881; Mr. J. W. Maclure, 881; (Adj. 881) Jan 29

Vaccination
  Laws, Q. General Russell; A. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 8, 1540
  Medical Officers, Q. Sir B. W. Foster; A. Mr H. Chaplin Feb 2, 1043
  Officers' Fees, Q. Mr. L. R. Holland; A. Mr. H. Chaplin Feb 1, 923
  Prosecutions, Qs. Mr. J. W. Logan, Mr. T. Lough; As. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 21, 192
  Royal Commission Report, Qs. Mr. T. Bayley, Dr. Farquharson; As. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 26, 493. Q. Mr. J. W. Logan; A. Mr. T. W. Russell Jan 28, 677

Vehicles (Lights) Bill

c. Intro., Mr. P. M. Thornton; Read 1° Jan 22, 298

Vincent, Colonel Sir C. E. Howard, Sheffield, Central
Alien Immigration Jan 26, 492
Aliens Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 304
Appointment of New Commercial Attachés Jan 25, 377
Army Estimates: £255,300 for Volunteer Corps Capitation Grant, etc. (Supplementary) Jan 29, 844, 845
British Trade and Foreign Competition June 29, 884
Contracts with Foreigners Feb 4, 1270
Foreign Prison-made Goods Feb 8, 1534
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 302; 2R. Jan 27, 602, 604, 608, 611, 616, 618, 620, 632, 640, 641, 642
Trade with British Colonies Jan 26, 496
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 1028
Working Men's Dwellings Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 303

Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant, etc.)
In Com., Mr. A. J. Balfour, (Motion) 926, 937, 938, 947, 948, 949, 956, 967, 1002; Mr. L. Courtney, 936, 971; Mr. G. C. T. Bartley, 937, 984; Mr. J. Dillon, 938; Mr. A. H. D. Acland, 944, 947, 948, 949, 952, 953, 956; Sir M. Hicks Beach, 952; Mr. R. C. Jebb, 959; Sir C. Dilke, 965, 967; Mr. C. A. Cripps, 974; Mr. C. Morley, 979; Major Rasch, 981; Mr. R. W. Perks, 981; Mr. A. Spicer, 988; Mr. G. Dixon, 993; Sir F. S. Powell, 996; Sir J. F. Leese, 999; Sir J. Lubbock, 1000, 1002; Mr. J. H. Yoxall, 1003; Mr. A. Hopkinson, 1007; Mr. J. C. Williams, 1008; Mr. H. Hobhouse, 1010; Mr. Bryn Roberts, 1012; Mr. E. Gray, 1014, 1019; Mr. Tomlinson, 1019; [Chairman, 1019] Feb 1
On Motion for Adjournment: Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1027, 1028; Sir H. Vincent, 1028; Mr. T. Lough, 1028; Sir W. Harcourt, 1028 Feb 1
Precedence for the Education Resolution: Mr. E. J. C. Morton, 1068; Mr. A. J. Balfour; 1068, 1069, 1072, 1075; Mr. J. Ellis, 1068, 1069; Mr. H. Labouchere, 1070; Mr. E. Lawrence, 1070: Sir W. Harcourt, 1070; Mr. H. Broadhurst, 1073; Mr. T. Lough, 1074; Mr. J. G. Weir, 1075; (Divisions, 1076, 1079) Feb 2
In Com., Debate Resumed: Mr. E. Gray, 1084; Mr. D. F. Goddard, 1087; Sir W. Hart Dyke, 1089; Sir H. Fowler, 1098, 1099, 1100, 1101, 1102, 1106; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1099, 1100, 1101, 1106, 1150, 1152, 1153, 1161, 1171; Sir R. B. Finlay, 1111, 1112; Sir W. Harcourt, 1112, 1154, 1155; Mr. Humphreys-Owen, 1121; Sir A. K. Rollit, 1124; Mr. J. Dillon, 1128, 1129; Sir M. Hicks Beach, 1129; Sir J. H. Kennaway, 1136; Mr. S. Buxton, 1139; Mr. Lucas-Shadwell, 1142; Mr. A. Birrell, 1143, 1144; Sir F. S. Powell, 1143; Mr. D. Lloyd-George, (Amendt.) 1149; Mr. T. Lough, 1150, 1151; [Chairman, 1151, 1155, 1161, 1162;] Mr. H. H. Asquith, 1151, 1152; (Division, 1158); Mr. Swift MacNeill, 1161; (Divisions, 1164, 1167); (Reso. to be Rep., 1171); Mr. A. H. D. Acland, 1171 Feb 2

[cont.

Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant, etc.)—cont.
Reso. Rep.: Mr. H. H. Asquith, 1315, 1319; Sir W. Hart Dyke, 1319; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1324, 1337, 1347, 1378, 1380, 1394, 1415; Sir W. Harcourt, 1337, 1382, 1385, 1391, 1392, 1394, 1399, 1402, 1403, 1404, 1408; Mr. R. B. Haldane, 1338, 1343; [Mr. Speaker, 1343, 1366, 1380, 1385, 1409, 1410, 1415;] Colonel Williams, 1344; Mr. S. T. Evans, 1347, 1348; Mr. B. L. Cohen, 1351; Mr. F. A. Channing, 1353; Mr. J. H. Johnstone, 1359; Mr. H. Broadhurst, 1362, 1363; Sir R. B. Finlay, 1363; Mr. G. Drage, 1365, 1366; Mr. Munro Ferguson, 1367; Mr. T. P. Whittaker, 1369; Mr. H. S. Foster, 1372; Mr. E. Robertson, 1376, 1378; Mr. J. A. Pease, 1379, 1380; Mr. J. Chamberlain, 1385, 1392, 1401, 1402, 1403, 1404, 1408; Mr. G. C. T. Bartley, 1391; Mr. J. Dillon, 1399; Mr. J. McLeod, 1409, 1410; (Division, 1412) Feb 4
Reso. Agreed to Feb 4, 1412

Voluntary Schools Bill
c. Intro. and Read 1° Feb 4, 1415
On Motion for Adjournment: Mr. T. Lough, 1640; Mr. G. C. T. Bartley, 1640; Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1640; Mr. J. C. Williams, 1640 Feb 8

WALES
Fishguard Bay Railway, Q. Mr. Rees Davies; A. Mr. Ritchie Jan 25, 389
Howell's Charity, Qs. Mr. Humphreys-Owen; As. Sir J. Gorst Jan 26, 493; Feb 4, 1304
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries, Qs. Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. Bromley Davenport, Mr. Gibson Bowles; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Mr. Ritchie Feb 2, 1058
(For Debate see that Title)
Swansea Post Office, Q. Mr. Brynmor Jones; A. Mr. Hanbury Feb 4, 1273

Wallace, Mr. Robert, Perth
Lee-Metford Rifles Jan 26, 495

WALROND, Sir WILLIAM H., Bart. (Patronage Secretary to the Treasury), Devon, Tiverton
Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, House of Commons Committee Jan 29, 882

Wanklyn, Mr. James Leslie, Bradford, Central
Local Authorities Officers' Superannuation Bill, Intro Jan 25, 488

Wantage, Lord
Army, Increase of Strength Feb 4, 1257

Waring, Colonel T., Down County
Illegal Trawling, Irish Coast Feb 1, 914; Feb 2, 1056
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1214

Warner, Mr. T. Courtenay T., Staffordshire, Lichfield
Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1622

WAR OFFICE
Secretary of State—Marquess of Lansdowne
Under Secretary of State—Mr. Brodrick
Financial Secretary—Mr. J. Powell-Williams
(See Army)

Warr, Mr. Augustus F., Liverpool, East Toxteth
Queen's Speech Jan 25, 483

WAYS AND MEANS
Resolved:
That this House will, to-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty Jan 26, 598
Estate Duty, Settled Property, Q. Captain Pretyman; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1547
Income Tax on Unpaid Dividends, Qs. Mr. G. C. T. Bartley; As. Sir M. Hicks Beach Feb 8, 1550
Land Tax, Q. Mr. A. F. Jeffreys; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 29, 786
Licensing Laws Commission, Q. Mr. F. A. Channing; A. Mr. A. J. Balfour Jan 25, 408
Solicitors' Licence Duty, Ireland, Q. Mr. F. A. O'Keeffe; A. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 26, 495
Taxation, Ireland, Qs. Mr. A. F. Jeffreys, Mr. A. O'Connor, Mr. T. Lough; [Mr. Speaker;] As. Sir M. Hicks Beach Jan 25, 378

Webster, Mr. R. G., St. Pancras, E.
Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1624
Naval Pensions Jan 26, 512
Queen's Speech Jan 26, 560
Royal Naval Reserve Jan 26, 509

WEBSTER, Sir RICHARD E. (Attorney General), Isle of Wight
Factory Accident, Batley Feb 8, 1562
Government Bills Jan 19, 41
Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, House of Commons Committee Jan 29, 882
Law of Evidence (Criminal Cases) Bill Jan 21, 268; Intro. Jan 29, 875
Licensed Premises Advertisements Feb 4, 1310
Oaths Act, Scottish Form Feb 2, 1065
Sale of Intoxicants, Houses of Parliament Jan 21, 198
Special Commissioner of Assize (Mr. Darling) Jan 21, 196, 197
Unlawful Possession Bill, 2R. Jan 29, 878

Wedderburn, Sir W., Bart., Banffshire
Indian Famine Feb 5, 1431
Quarantine Feb 5, 1420
Queen's Speech Jan 22, 355; Jan 26, (Amendt.) 517, 528, 533

Weir, Mr. J. G., Ross and Cromarty
Army Estimates: £255,300 for Volunteer Corps, Capitation Grant, etc. (Supplementary) Jan 29, 847
Balintore Harbour Feb 4, 1269
[cont.

Weir, Mr. J. G.—cont.
Business of the House: Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 2, 1075
Congested Districts (Highlands and Islands, Scotland) Bill Feb 2, 1047
Crofters Act (1886) Feb 2, 1049
Crofters' Holdings (Scotland) Act (1886) Amendment Bill, Intro. Feb 2, 1083
Duty on Scotch Herrings Feb 2, 1039
Edinburgh University Library Buildings Jan 29, 796
Elementary Schools, Scotland Feb 2, 1048
Harbours
Balintore Feb 4, 1269
Port Ness Feb 4, 1269
Holyrood Palace Jan 29, 797
Illegal Trawling, Scotland Jan 21, 193; Jan 28, 675, 676; Feb 2, 1036; Feb 4, 1287
Lee-Metford Rifles, Royal Marines Jan 29, 796
Metropolitan Railway Ventilation Feb 4, 1276
Military Works Bill Jan 29, 873
North Sea Convention Feb 8, 1539
Port Ness Harbour, Island of Lewis Feb 4, 1269
Postal and Telegraph Services, Revenue Feb 8, 1535
Post Office Amendment Act (1895) Feb 2, 1048
Post Office Savings Bank Accounts Feb 8, 1534
Queen's Speech Jan 22, 835, 851
School Board Electorate (Scotland) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 304
School Text-books, Scotland Feb 8, 1539
Stornoway Mail Service Feb 4, 1275
Tiumpan Head Lighthouse Feb 2, 1048

Welby, Colonel A. C. Earle-, Taunton
Military Forces (Maintenance) Feb 8, 1619
Military Works Bill Jan 29, 871, 872

Wenlock, Lord
Indian Famine Feb 1, 897

Whiteley, Mr. George, Stockport
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 635
Rating of Machinery Suspensory Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 296

Whittaker, Mr. T. P., Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley
Liquor Traffic Local Veto Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 296
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 610, 611
Shipping Masters at Antwerp Feb 1, 900
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1369

Williams, Colonel Robert, Dorset, W.
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 4, 1344

Williams, Mr. J. Carvell, Nottinghamshire, Mansfield
Burial Fees, Ulverston Jan 21, 173, 174
Cathedral Maintenance Jan 21, 198
Public Schools, Heywood Jan 25, 387
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 1008; Feb 8, 1640
Wimbledon, Elementary Schools Feb 4, 1289

WILLIAMS, MR. J. POWELL- (Financial Secretary to the War Office), Birmingham, S.
Army
Contracts, Ireland Jan 29, 789
Foreign Meat Supply Jan 21, 182, 183; Jan 22, 290; Jan 25, 406, 407
Pensions
Fitzpatrick (John) Feb 4, 1280
Kelly (John) Jan 28, 681
Retired Pay Feb 8, 1554
Army Estimates: £145,000 for Pay of Indian Troops at Suakim (Supplementary) Feb 5, 1521
Barracks Act (1890) Feb 8, 1543
Crimean Veteran: Brennan (John) Jan 28, 680
Egyptian Expedition, Indian Troops Feb 4, 1302
Enniskillen Fusiliers, Enlistment Feb 5, 1428
Explosion
Cordite, of, Woolwich Arsenal Feb 8, 1547
Woolwich, at Feb 4, 1313
Finner Rifle Range, Donegal Feb 8, 1536
Irish Militia Jan 28, 678
Local Government (Aldershot and Farnborough) Bill, Intro. Feb 8, 1639
Royal Barracks, Dublin Jan 29, 791

WILLOX, MR. J. A., Liverpool, Everton
Benefices Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 295

WILSON, MR. C. H., Hull, W.
Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sundays Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 296

WILSON, MR. F. W., Norfolk, Mid
Hours of Polling, Metropolis Feb 4, 1312

WILSON, MR. H. J., Yorkshire, W.R., Holmfirth
Importation of Drugs, Ceylon Feb 5, 1433
Queen's Speech Jan 20, 133; Jan 26, 520

WILSON, MR. JOHN, Durham, Mid
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 747, 753

WILSON, MR. JOHN, Falkirk Burghs
Lanarkshire Militia Feb 1, 906, 907
School Boards, Scotland Feb 2, 1044

WILSON, MR. JOSEPH HAVELOCK, Middlesbrough
Loss of Life at Sea Feb 4, 1301
Queen's Speech Jan 25, (Amendt.) 458, 481, 482, 487

WINGFIELD-DIGBY, MR. J. K., Dorset, N.
Agricultural Produce (Marks) Bill, Intro. Jan 22, 294

WOLFF, MR. G. W., Belfast, E.
Colour-blind Tests, Sailors Feb 1, 907, 908
House of Commons, Members' Smoking Accommodation Feb 4, 1302
Imposition of Fines on Workmen Jan 25, 409
Musgrave Street, Police Barracks, Belfast Feb 4, 1307
Penrhyn's (Lord) Quarries Jan 28, 758

WOODALL, MR. WILLIAM, Hanley
Explosion at Woolwich Feb 4, 1313

WOODHOUSE, SIR JAMES T., Huddersfield
Merchandise Marks Act (1887) Amendment Bill, 2R. Jan 27, 604

WOODS, FORESTS, AND LAND REVENUES OF THE CROWN
Holyrood Palace, Q. Mr. J. G. Weir; A. Mr. Akers-Douglas Jan 29, 797
Mall, Condition of Road, Q. Mr. C. J. Monk; A. Mr. Akers-Douglas Feb 8, 1540

Working Men's Dwellings Bill
c. Intro., Sir H. Vincent; Read 1° Jan 22, 303

Working Men's Dwellings (No. 2) Bill
c. Intro., Sir A. Hickman; Read 1° Feb 4, 1416

WORKS, FIRST COMMISSIONER
Mr. A. AKERS-DOUGLAS

WYNDHAM, MR. GEORGE, Dover
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. Feb 3, 1216

YOUNG, MR. SAMUEL, Cavan, E.
Licensed Premises, Advertisements Feb 4, 1310
Training Ship, Belfast Lough Jan 29, 789

YOXALL, MR. J. H., Nottingham, W.
St. Andrew's School, Willesden Feb 2, 1043
Voluntary Schools (Aid Grant) Feb 1, 1003

END OF VOLUME XLV., AND FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1897.

PRINTED BY WATERLOW AND SONS LIMITED, LONDON WALL, LONDON.